UMI

TO

His Most Sacred MAJESTY

WILLIAM III.

King of Great-Britain, France and Ireland,

Defender of the Faith, &c.

SIR,

HE that writes the Lives and Reigns of Sovereign Princes, and the Affairs of Kingdoms and States as becomes an Hiſtorian, ought to diveſt himſelf of all private Affections, and to be exact in recounting paſt Tranſactions with Candor and Fidelity.

I would not have preſumed to dedicate this Hiſtory to Your Sacred Majeſty, who hath as much reaſon to love Truth as moſt Princes have to fear it, were I not aſſured I had carefully obſerved that Maxim; and if I could not truly ſay, I have been ſtrictly juſt to the moſt Authentick Accounts of thoſe Authors from whom I have gathered my Materials; have repreſented the Failings as well as the Merits of the Perſons herein mention'd; and endeavour'd, with utmoſt ſincerity, to make the whole ſpeak the Truth of their Actions, together with the various Events and Conſequences of them.

The favourable Reception that my Firſt Attempt of this kind has met with from One of Your Majeſty's Prime Miniſters of State, encourages me to lift up my Eyes to the Throne, and, through Your Permiſſion, to lay with all Humility this my Second, and more perfect, Performance, at the feet of Your Royal Majeſty.

Give me leave to add, SIR, That this Volume more peculiarly belongs to Your Majeſty, ſince it commences at that Memorable Period with which the Norman Race of Kings began, the Firſt of whom (Your Majeſty's Great Anceſtor) was of the ſame Name with Your Self, and is commonly ſtiled THE CONQUEROR; tho all muſt confeſs, Your moſt Excellent Majeſty, by a much better Right, deſerves that Title: for You have not only ſubdued Your Enemies by the Terror of Your Arms, but have overcome their Paſſions and their Prejudices, whilſt at home You powerfully reign in the Hearts of Your Subjects, by (nobler Ways than thoſe of Force and Violence) a ſteddy Courſe of juſt and gentle Government, by which a Throne is beſt eſtabliſhed.

The Titles and Reigns of ſeveral of the Eight Princes (which is the Subject of this Volume) are particularly remarkable, and being here faithfully repreſented, may, I hope, be of publick Service and Advantage, were it only to ſhew, how much Your Majeſty excells the beſt and moſt Illuſtrious of Your Royal Progenitors.

SIR,

The Eyes of all Europe are now fixed upon Your Majeſty, for You have been as a Guardian Angel to her Princes and States: and as it hath been Their Glory to commit both Themſelves and their Intereſts to Your Care and Vigilance; ſo was it much more Your Majeſty's, to uſe that Truſt intirely for their Deliverance and Preſervation.

Your Majeſty hath reſcued them from their Fears, I had almoſt ſaid from their Deſpair, and reſtored them to their antient Rights and Dominions, by Your tranſcendent Courage and Conduct; and at laſt perfected a moſt Glorious Revolution, with ſuch an Honourable and Advantageous Peace, as never any CONQUEROR yet attain'd, and which hath juſtly ſtruck the World with Wonder and Aſtoniſhment.

May

May the Supreme Ruler make Your Majeſty as Glorious in Peace, as He hath in War; may You ſtill govern in the Affections of Your People, the beſt and moſt certain way to ſecure Your Power and Greatneſs; and may They always, as it is their Duty, with an intire Zeal and Fidelity, continue to aſſiſt Your Majeſty to the utmoſt of their Power, in advancing all Your Pious and Noble Deſigns, of maintaining our Holy Religion and Civil Liberties, together with the common Intereſt and Tranquillity of Chriſtendom.

So moſt heartily prays,

May it pleaſe Your Majeſty,

Your Majeſty's moſt Humble, moſt Obedient, and moſt devoted Subject,

JAMES TYRRELL.

THE PREFACE TO THE READER.

AS in the Preface to my last Volume, I undertook to give you an account of its main Design, and of the Writers and Authorities both in Print and Manuscript, which I there made use of, so I shall here persue the same Method.

BUT I shall first indeavour to remove some Prejudices against this Undertaking it self, as that I being a private Man, not famed for much Reading, or deep Learning, should, almost unassisted with Materials from the present Historians and Antiquaries of the Nation, attempt to write a General History of England, out of my own private Reading and Collections: whereas according to the late Idea of the French Jesuit, Father Le Moyne, the Accomplishments necessary to make a Person fit for the performing such a great Design, are so various, and require so many several Talents, that he tells us, Such an Historian is a man not yet born, nor will be before the Year that discovers the perpetual Motion, and Philosopher's Stone; that is to say in plain terms, he looks upon it as an impossibility in nature to produce a compleat Author in this kind.

AND another Modern Writer will have his Historian, not only a Soldier, a Statesman, and a Philosopher, but he must be also a Divine, a Lawyer, an Orator, and a Poet; and beyond all this, a down-right honest Country Gentleman. At least he must be plentifully stock'd with Wit, or an Universal Disposition, and unbounded Spirit, that comprehends all that's Great and Glorious in the several States and Empires of the whole World; and to these intellectual Indowments, we must add the great Moral one of being PHILALETHES, a Person of that just Integrity, as not to be biast by Passion or Interest. Mr. Nicholson, Arch-Deacon of Carlisle's Preface to his English Historical Library.

THESE are the Conditions and Accomplishments that I find laid down all together, in the first pages of the Preface of a late learned Author, who, I hope, has publish'd his two Treatises concerning our English Historians, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, now extant either in Print or Manuscript, (as the Title of the former of them sets forth) out of a pure design to be serviceable to the Undertakers of a General History of this Kingdom, rather than out of any Ostentation to shew his great Reading and Knowledg of Authors of this kind.

BUT to speak something to what these Reverend Gentlemen have laid down, I can only say, that a great deal of it is merely Notional and Romantick; tick: for if the Perſon that is to ſet up for a Hiſtorian, is not yet born, nor will be till the perpetual Motion, and Philoſopher's Stone be found out, to what purpoſe is it for that Writer, or any Body elſe, to give Inſtructions to One that can never exiſt, much leſs make the leaſt uſe of them?

AND indeed theſe Gentlemen, after making the Qualifications of an Hiſtorian ſo difficult and hard to be met with, do very prudently not to give us any thing of their own, more than bare Collections; ſince if they ſhould take upon them to write a Hiſtory, they muſt at the ſame time own themſelves thoſe rare and moſt accompliſh'd Perſons, they before ſuppos'd almoſt impoſſible to be produced; that is, they muſt not be yet born, nor will be, till the perpetual Motion, and Philoſopher's Stone be found out.

BUT to help theſe ſeeming Impoſſibilities, and to mend the many unſucceſsful Deſigns of ſome late Authors in undertaking to write a Hiſtory of England, this worthy Writer laſt mentioned, propoſes a noble Project indeed, of compiling a compleat body of Engliſh Hiſtory, and which (ſays he) " can only be carried on with ſucceſs, by a Club of Men of different Parts
" and Learning; ſome whereof he would have to be Maſters of antient
" Languages, and others of the Modern; ſome vers'd in the Writings of " the old Britains, Romans, Saxons, and Danes, and others throughly Id. in Pref. " acquainted with the Hiſtorians ſince the Conqueſt; ſome that know the " Geography, and others the Law of the Realm; ſome that have been bred
" at Court, and others in the Camp, &c.

AFTER this there follows an, &c. that may (for ought I know) take in Merchants, Sea Captains, and God knows how many Trades more, all whom he likewiſe requires, " ſhall be men of Leiſure and Fortune, as ad- " ditional Accompliſhments over and above all thoſe already mention'd; or
" elſe he hopes to ſee a College of Hiſtorians, as nobly endow'd here, as that " of the Antiquaries is in Sweden, whoſe Stipends I ſhall not trouble my- " ſelf to ſet down; but only obſerve, that every one of this Club muſt take " their particular part or task of this intended Hiſtory; which being fi-
" niſh'd, he would have carefully perus'd by every particular Member of the " Society, as well as by him whoſe peculiar Province it ſhall be to inſpect
" and ſuperviſe the whole.

AND he farther tells us, " That it is to ſerve this Imaginary Frater- " nity, that he has drawn together the following Papers; to give the Reader
" as ſhort, and as methodical an Abſtract of a great many larger Collecti- " ons on this Subject, as he could readily furniſh himſelf with.

AND then he proceeds to give us a Catalogue of the performances of other Modern Writers of this kind, with the Names of our beſt and moſt antient Hiſtorians, as alſo thoſe that have bin of late publiſh'd from Manuſcripts in ſeveral Libraries and private hands, together with an Account of the late publiſh'd Catalogue of Manuſcripts in both Univerſities.

NOW, tho I grant this to be uſeful and diverting enough for common Readers, yet that they can be of Benefit to that airy Fraternity for which he deſigns them, I muſt beg his pardon if I doubt, ſince beſides ſome few fears I have upon me, that his Book will be out of Print before that Deſign will be reduced to Practice, it will be alſo needleſs upon other Accounts: for if the Perſons he mentions be Men of ſuch general Learning and great Accompliſhments, as he ſuppoſes they ought to be, and ſo throughly vers'd in all the antient, as well as modern Hiſtorians, it will not be only an unneceſſary Undertaking, but a great Preſumption, to go about to inſtruct Perſons already ſo well ſkill'd in what is ſuppoſed to be their particular Talent and Buſineſs; or if they are not ſo without his Inſtructions, I doubt they will make but very mean Members of this Imaginary Society.

BUT to come to the main Buſineſs of this Preface, which is not to find fault with the Performances of others, but to apologize for my own; ſince I cannot expect to ſee ſuch a Club as this Author propoſes ſet up in my Time, and that I never yet ſaw or heard of any Hiſtory, writ after ſuch a manner; I cannot but ſtill think, and am pretty well ſatisfied, that a Hiſtory of England may ſucceed well enough without all theſe wonderful Conditions and Precautions this Author has laid down.

FOR we have ſeen in this preſent Age, a General Hiſtory of France written by one * man's ſingle Pen, without the help of any ſuch Club of Antiquaries and Hiſtorians, and which has bin received with the Univerſal Applauſe of the Learned and ingenious World. And tho I will not take upon me to compare my Performances with that great Man's, yet this I think I may boldly affirm, that I have made it my buſineſs for divers years paſt, carefully to collect out of all our Hiſtorians, as well in Print, as in Manuſcript (that I could eaſily come at) whatever I thought worthy to be inſerted into a general Hiſtory of England.

* Mr. Mezeray.

AND, I think, whoſoever truly conſiders the largeneſs of this Volume, in reſpect of the Time it comprehends, and the various Subjects herein treated of, will not ſay it wants ſufficient matter for a juſt Hiſtory.

SO that the main Queſtion will be, whether theſe Collections are made with that Judgment as is requiſite for a work of this nature; to which I ſhall only ſay, concerning the due choice of the Materials, that as I have taken all the Care I could, not to let ſlip any thing I thought worth the committing to Poſterity, ſo have I alſo left out, whatever I found in our antient Authors that was light and trivial, or ſavour'd of the Credulity of a ſuperſtitious Age; unleſs it be ſometimes, and that too but rarely, to give the Reader a taſte what ſtuff our Monkiſh Writers would have had men ſwallow in thoſe dark Times.

AND tho for variety I have frequently intermixed things Eccleſiaſtical with Civil, and ſet down the moſt conſiderable matters relating to Church-Affairs under the ſame Years; yet it hath been chiefly when they are ſo connected, and dependent upon each other, that the one ſeems obſcure and imperfect if the other be omitted. As to inſtance in that great Affair of Thomas Becket and King Henry the Second, which imployed eight years of his Reign; and without a Relation of which, the Civil Hiſtory of thoſe times would be very dark and defective.

AND for the ſame Reaſon I have alſo inſerted into this Volume the great Differences that fell out in the Reigns of King William Rufus and Henry the Firſt, between the Pope and thoſe Princes, about the Inveſtitures of Biſhops and Abbots with the Staff and Ring; which, tho a mere Ceremony in it ſelf, yet was of main Conſequence for the diſcharging of the Prelates of thoſe times from all Dependance on the Civil Power. I have alſo given a full Account of that long Diſpute between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York about Precedence, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience, which the former for many Years after the Conqueſt required of the latter, till they were freed from that Dependance in the Reign of Henry the Second, by a Bull of Pope Alexander the Third, as you will find in the following Hiſtory.

I HAVE likewiſe taken notice of ſome of thoſe many Diſputes that happen'd between the Monks of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury, and their Arch-

Archbiſhops, about the building and founding a Chappel for Regular Chanons firſt at Canterbury, and afterwards at Lambeth, which the Monks were jealous might in time become the Chapter of the Archbiſhop, and ſo rob them of their antient Right of electing him.

BUT as for many other Diſputes between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, and thoſe Monks; as alſo thoſe of St. Auguſtin in the ſame City, I have purpoſely omitted them, being not willing to over-clog the Reader with things of this nature; for it is indeed almoſt an endleſs, as well as an unprofitable Labour, to ſet down all the Quarrels that happen'd between divers other Biſhops who had Priors and Convents of Monks for their Chapters, as alſo thoſe that frequently fell out between the Abbots of divers other Monaſteries; or between them and the Biſhops; or between the Biſhops themſelves about the particular Juriſdictions, Privileges, and Exemptions of their ſeveral Religious Houſes and Sees, in an Age when theſe things were contended for, by frequent Appeals to Rome, as if they had been pro Aris & Focis.

SO that for thoſe Church-Affairs which I thought fit to inſert here, they are either ſo mix'd and interwoven with the Civil Hiſtory of thoſe Times, that they could not well be ſeparated; or elſe they may be inſtructive to ſuch as are deſirous to know the ſtate of the Church (that is, of the Clergy) of thoſe Times; but thoſe that think ſuch things inſignificant and not worth their knowledg, may (if they pleaſe) paſs them over, ſince they are for the moſt part noted in the Margins, and commonly placed by themſelves at the end of the Year.

I COME now to give you ſome Account of thoſe many and various Authors, as well in Print as in Manuſcript, out of whom I have drawn theſe Collections; that ſo the more curious Readers, who deſire to have recourſe to the Originals, may know where to find them; ſince I do not deſign by this performance to take off men's Appetites from reading thoſe antient Authors, but rather to excite them to it, as well for my own Juſtification, as for their better Inſtruction.

BUT I will now give you the names of the Writers here made uſe of: As for the Reigns of the Three firſt Norman Kings contained in this Work, they are drawn in great part from thoſe Authors mention'd in my laſt Preface, viz. the Saxon Chronicle, ſo often cited in the former Volume, and which is continued (tho more briefly) as far as the Reign of King Stephen. Next to this follow William of Malmsbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham; to all which I muſt alſo add Roger Hoveden, tho he is but ſeldom made uſe of in the firſt Four Reigns, becauſe he commonly borrows his matter from ſome of thoſe already mention'd. And tho Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, wrote only the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, during the Reigns of King William and Rufus his Son, and Henry I. yet there are alſo intermixt with it, ſeveral other Matters of great moment relating to the Civil Hiſtory of thoſe Times, which I have inſerted into the following Volume, together with ſuch Paſſages of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory as may ſerve to illuſtrate the former; ſuch as are the frequent Synods, and great Councils held in thoſe Times; the erection of new Biſhopricks; and the recovery of their Lands from the Normans; and the like.

I HAVE alſo in my Reigns of thoſe four Firſt Kings, made uſe of ſome Foreign Writers, who, tho they chiefly deſign'd to write the Hiſtory of Normandy, yet have likewiſe given us a great deal of that of England, it being ſo nearly connected with their own. And notwithſtanding I took divers Paſſages out of ſome of theſe in my former Volume, yet ſince they were not many, and that the Authors were Foreigners, I forbore mentioning of them until now; being theſe that follow.

THE firſt is Gulielmus Pictavienſis, i. e. William of Poictiers, * who was a ſecular Prieſt, and Arch-deacon of Liſieux, and for a long time Chaplain to William the Conqueror, and wrote the † four firſt years of his Reign, that is, as far as the year 1070. but of this we have not the firſt year left us entire. So that I could wiſh a more perfect Copy of this Author could be diſcovered in ſome of the Libraries in France or England, ſince it is very probable it would give us a far better account of this King's Reign, as far as this Author wrote, than we have from any other now extant.

† Id. ib. p. 521.

NEXT to him follows in the ſame Volume of Norman Writers, another of the ſame Name with the former, viz. Gulielmus Gematicenſis, i. e. William of Jumiegue, a Monaſtery in Normandy, of which he was Abbot, and who wrote a Hiſtory of the Dukes of that Province, from Rollo, to the end of King Henry the Firſt.

Vid. Scriptor. Norman. per And. Du Cheſne, Pag. 1619.

AFTER whom follows Ordericus Vitalis, who was a Monk of the Abbey of St. ‖ Evroul, and may be counted a Foreigner, not becauſe of his Birth, for in that reſpect he was an Engliſh-man, but by reaſon of his Education, being carried over into Normandy, as he himſelf relates, when he was but a Child, and there lived to write the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of that Province, from the birth of Chriſt, to Anno Dom. 1141. the ſixth year of King Stephen.

‖ Called in Latin Cœnobium Uticenſe.

AND it is to this laſt Author I confeſs my ſelf beholden for divers choice pieces of Hiſtory, eſpecially thoſe relating to Normandy, during the Reigns of the firſt four Kings; yet in his Accounts of England he is ſometimes miſtaken, both in reſpect of Time, Place, and other Circumſtances: but in this he is to be the more excuſed, if we conſider him as a Foreigner by Education; as alſo ſome Allowances are to be made for his great credulity of Legendary Fables, and his making long winded Speeches: theſe being the common faults of the Age wherein he lived. But there is no Writer from whom we may receive greater Light concerning the Families and Deſcents of ſuch of the Norman Nobility as firſt came over and ſettled here, having great Eſtates given them by William the Firſt.

TO theſe I ſhall alſo add the Manuſcript Chronicle of Robert de Monte, ſo called from his being Abbot of St. Michael's Mount near the Sea in Normandy; and who, tho he borrowed what relates to the Affairs of England, from Henry of Huntington, and other Engliſh Writers (as he himſelf acknowledges in his Preface) yet he has alſo added divers Paſſages of the Norman Hiſtory, which he chiefly undertakes to write, that are not to be found elſewhere; his deſign being to continue the Chronicle of Sigebert, from Anno Dom. 1100. to the year 1182. being the 28*th year of K.* Henry II.

I TAKE the more notice of this Author for his rarity, having never ſeen any more than two Copies, the one whereof is preſerved in the publick Library of the Univerſity of Cambridge, which is very antient, and ſeems to have been written about the time in which the Author himſelf lived; and the other is in that of Oxford, but of a much more Modern hand.

AND I muſt alſo let the Reader know, that this is the ſame Perſon who wrote the Chronica Normanniæ, that are printed at the end of the Scriptores Normannici, and which in this printed Copy are very imperfect, beginning but at Anno Dom. 1139. and ending at 1168. and tho they are continued by ſome other hand as far as the year 1259. being the 43d year of Henry the 3d. yet the Additions of this laſt Writer are very ſhort and trivial; whereas the Author whom he continues, gives a much larger account of the Norman Affairs, as far as he takes upon him to write them: So that I wiſh that the learned Du Cheſne could have had either of theſe Manuſcript Copies laſt mention'd communicated to him, when he publiſhed that Norman Chronicle from a Manuſcript Copy in the Library of St. Victor in Paris; which being imperfect, he was therefore fain to ſupply that defect from a far meaner hand. So that I ſhall only further take notice, that it is to this Chronicle that we owe a great part of the Hiſtory of Normandy, during the Reigns of King Stephen, and Henry the Second, which are not to be found elſewhere. I ſhould not have mentioned this Manuſcript of Robert de Monte among the printed Authors, were he not the ſame who wrote the Norman Chronicle, as I have already ſaid, and which being join'd with the Manuſcript in the Original, cannot be well parted from it in this Place.

AS for the latter end of the Reigns of Henry the Firſt, and the beginning of King Stephen, (beſides thoſe already mention'd) they are taken from the Continuators of Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham; the latter of whom calls himſelf John of Hagulſtad or Hexham, being a Monk of that Monaſtery, as was alſo Richard of the ſame Place and Name, who gives us a faithful account of many things done in the North parts of England in thoſe times, and particularly that of the great Battel between the King of Scots and the Barons of the North, called the Battel of the Standard; in which the King of Scots with his whole Army were put to flight, and many of them killed, or taken Priſoners, by a much ſmaller Body of Engliſh: which Action is alſo deſcribed ſomewhat more at large by Alfred Abbot of Rievaulx in Yorkſhire, in a Narrative entitled de Bello Standardi, printed among the Decem-Scriptores.

A GREAT part of the reſt of this laſt King's Reign, is taken from Radulphus de Diceto, Dean of St. Pauls, and Brompton's Chronicle, or elſe that of Gervaſe a Monk of Canterbury, who all follow each other in the ſame Volume, and lived in the ſame or the next Age; and of whom as well as the reſt of the Writers therein contained, ſince the ſhortneſs of this Preface will not permit me to ſpeak particularly, I refer the Readers to the Introduction before that great Work, written by the moſt learned Mr. Selden.

BUT I muſt not omit taking notice of the great Aſſiſtance I have had in the Reign of King Stephen, from an Anonimous Writer of his Actions, who flouriſhed in his time, and wrote his Actions under the Title of Geſta Regis Stephani, in which he gives us a more exact account of the Atchievements of that valiant Prince, till about Anno Dom. 1147. (being the 11th year of his Reign) than is to be found in any other Author: and it is pity that ſo great a part of this Hiſtory is loſt; for it wants both the beginning and the Concluſion: but what remains is to be found in the Volume of Norman Writers, publiſhed by Du Cheſne.

Edit. Pariſ. 1618.

I MENTION this, becauſe neither Dr. Brady, nor any other Engliſh Hiſtorian that I know of, have thought fit to take any notice of this Author, or to extract any thing out of him.

AS for the Reigns of King Henry the Second, and his Son Richard the Firſt, beſides Rad. de Diceto, and Gervaſe of Canterbury, I have chiefly chiefly made uſe of the elaborate Collections of Roger Hoveden, who lived in the Times of thoſe Princes, and was one of King Henry's Domeſtick Clerks or Secretaries, and was alſo (as appears from Walter of Coventry's Manuſcript Chronicle, called Memoriale Hiſtoriarum) ſometimes imploy'd as an Agent or Commiſſioner from the King, and ſent by him to viſit the Convent of Norwich, and take an Account of their Receipts and Expences after the death of their Abbot, as likewiſe to confirm their Election of a new one; which Commiſſion he faithfully performed, not only in that Monaſtery, but in ſome others that were then vacant. In Bibl. Cottonian.

BUT as for this laſt King's Voyage to the Holy Land, beſides what I have borrowed from the Authors laſt mentioned, I have been beholden not only to Roger Hoveden's, but alſo to an exact Relation of it written by Gaufridus de Vine Salvo, that is, Geoffrie Vineſauf, an elegant Author of that Age, which has been lately printed from an antient Manuſcript in the publick Library of Cambridge, among other Writers of our Engliſh Affairs, by the very learned Dr. Gale, the preſent Dean of York. Vol. II. Edit. Oxon.

AND I hope the Reader will not look upon it as tedious or impertinent to our Engliſh Hiſtory, if I have from theſe Authors given a brief Account of King Richard's Expedition to the Holy Land, with the principal Actions which he there performed: ſince his Reign would ſeem imperfect without it, yet it is omitted by Dr. Brady, and ſome of our other Writers, or at leaſt they give but a lame Account of that Expedition.

I HAVE likewiſe taken divers conſiderable Paſſages relating to the Reigns of thoſe Princes, from William of Newburgh, a Chanon Regular of the Abbey of the ſame name in Yorkſhire, who was alſo (I ſuppoſe from the ſmallneſs of his Stature) called Petyt or Parvus; and he deſerves our notice, not only becauſe he was the firſt who undertook to write an Epitome of our Engliſh Hiſtory from the Conqueſt, as far as the latter end of the Reign of King Richard the Firſt, but withal diſcovered the Forgeries of Geoffery of Monmouth, and had the Courage to write againſt them, not many years after they were publiſhed, and when they were moſt in vogue. I have likewiſe in this Period borrowed divers material things from the Hiſtory of Roger of Wendover, augmented and continued by Matthew Paris; as alſo from Matthew Weſtminſter's Chronicle, in the Relation of ſuch things as are not to be found elſewhere; and I muſt not forget to add the Scotiſh Chronicle of Mailroſs, from whom I often borrow the Succeſſion of the Kings of Scotland, with other matters relating to that antient Kingdom.

BUT as for thoſe Authors that remain ſtill in Manuſcript, either in the Cottonian or other Libraries; I have in the Reign of King Henry the Second, chiefly taken an Account of the actions of Thomas Becket, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, from his Life written by Fitz Stephens a Clerk of London, who flouriſhed not long after; as alſo from the Quadripartite Hiſtory of the ſame Perſon's Life, commonly ſtil'd Hiſtoria Quadriloga, as being a Collection out of four ſeveral Writers of it; which (tho it was printed in Germany) I never ſaw, and is more rare than the Manuſcripts themſelves, for they are in ſeveral Libraries both private and publick.

I HAVE choſen to confine my ſelf to theſe few Authors, who lived and wrote not long after his Death: for if I ſhould have made uſe of all thoſe Manuſcript writers of his Life, that yet remain in private or publick lick Libraries; and who either tranſcribe from each other, or elſe add freſh Legends of his Miracles out of their own heads, there would be no end of it.

AND I muſt here moreover mention, as to Civil Affairs, the exact Chronicle of Benedict Abbot of Peterburgh, who begins to write about the fourth year of Henry the Second, and carries his Hiſtory as far as about Anno Dom. 1178. being the 24th year of his Reign: and I wiſh he had continued it farther, he being a Judicious and a Faithful Writer, and from whom Roger Hoveden has borrowed a great deal of his Hiſtory word for word, tho without owning where he had it: which, by the way, is a fault in this Author, he having done the like by Simeon of Durham.

BUT for other Manuſcript Hiſtorians, who have wrote of the Reigns laſt mentioned, I know of none conſiderable beſides Richard of the Devizes, who begins his Hiſtory a little before the Conqueſt, and ends with King Richard the Firſt's Impriſonment, in his return from the Holy Land. In him I could obſerve little worth noting but what was related by others, until the Reigns of Henry the Second, and Richard the Firſt, in both which I have found divers remarkable Tranſactions, not to be met with elſewhere: and it is pity he did not draw down the Reign of this King longer; for he was ſo conſiderable an Author, that I find Roger Hoveden hath borrowed ſome things from him too. But I ſhall ſlightly mention ſome other Manuſcripts, ſince I have been but little aſſiſted by them, ſuch as John of Tinmouth's Hiſtoria Aurea, whoſe chief Deſign was to write the Lives of our Engliſh Saints: but there are intermix'd in it ſeveral curious Remarks of our Civil Hiſtory, collected from divers antient Manuſcript Chronicles, not now Extant; ſome of which I have inſerted into this Volume.

I HAVE likewiſe borrowed ſomewhat out of the Manuſcript Chronicle of the Abbey of Cheſter, a Copy of which is now in the Cuſtody of the Right Reverend and moſt Learned Dr. Lloyd, the preſent Lord Bp of Worceſter.

AS for the Reign of King John; the Three firſt years of it are almoſt wholly taken from Roger Hoveden, with ſome Additions from Matthew Paris's Hiſtory, which is chiefly owing to Roger of Wendover, as far as the end of the year 1235. being the 19th year of Henry the Third. But as to the remaining part of this King's Reign, it is of Matthew Paris's own compoſing as far as the latter end of the year 1259. being the 43d of this King, when our Author ceaſed to write, and indeed not long after to live. And it is much to be lamented that he did not live to finiſh that King's Reign, his Hiſtory being the moſt exact Collection of all Affairs, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, which happened in his time, that perhaps ever was wrote of any Kingdom, or State. To whom I may alſo add the Annals of the Monaſtery of Burton, publiſh'd in the firſt Volume of Engliſh Writers printed at Oxford by the care of the moſt Reverend Dr. Fell late Biſhop of that Place. And it is to theſe Annals that we owe ſeveral Tranſactions of great Moment, during the Reigns of theſe two laſt Kings.

THE reſt of King Henry's Reign is partly extracted from William of Riſhanger, Matthew Paris's Continuator, tho he was no ways equal to him whom he undertakes to continue, either in reſpect of the Exactneſs or Truth of his Collections; being guilty of a great many groſs miſtakes, beſides the omiſſion of divers material Actions, during the Years he takes upon him to write of: therefore I have ſupplied thoſe Defects and Omiſſions from the Chronicle of Thomas Wikes, a Chanon of Oſney near Oxford, as alſo from the Annals of the Abbey of Waverly, to which I may add the Chronicle of Walter Hemingford, called Walter of Gisbourn, a Monaſtery in Yorkſhire, where he was a Chanon Regular, and flouriſhed till towards the middle of the Reign of King Edward the Third.

Chronicle

BUT we owe the publiſhing of theſe three laſt Writers to the great Care and Charge of the Reverend Dr. Gale, who caus'd thoſe Authors to be printed from ſuch Manuſcript Copies of them as are to be found in the Cotton-Library, or elſe in thoſe of Trinity and Bennet College in Cambridge, as alſo out of his own private Treaſury.

BESIDES theſe great Acceſſions to our Engliſh Hiſtory, which have been hitherto ſcarce made uſe of by our Modern Writers, I have alſo been beholden for divers choice Paſſages in the Reigns of King John and Henry the Third, to the Manuſcript Chronicle of Radulph Abbot of Cogſhal, who continued the ſhort Chronicle of Radulph Niger a Benedictine Monk, that flouriſhed in the Reign of Henry the Second, and upon whom when dead he was very ſevere; but as for this his Nameſake and Continuator, he began with the Reign of King John, and goes no farther than the beginning of that of Henry the Third.

AND alſo for the firſt ten years of this King (beſides the Authors abovementioned) I own my ſelf much beholden to the Manuſcript Hiſtory of Walter, a Monk of Coventry, who tho he borrowed moſt of his Collections of the former Reigns from Henry of Huntington, Roger Hoveden, and others, yet when he comes to write of his own time, viz. that of King John and Henry the Third, he relates ſeveral curious Paſſages of his own knowledg, not to be met with any where elſe. This Chronicle is extant in Bennet College Library, as I have already ſaid, under the Title of Memoriale Hiſtoriarum; and there is alſo a fairer Copy of it in the Cotton-Library, tho under another Title; but that it is one and the ſame Work, any one may find who will take the pains to compare them, as the learned Dr. Gale has remarked in a Note before it.

BUT as for the briefer Chronicle which is in the ſame Library, that goes under the name of this Author, it is none of his; for beſides that his Name which is prefix'd to it, is of a very Modern hand, it likewiſe appears from Leland's Hiſtory of Britiſh Writers, (which is in the publick Library at Oxford, and will ſhortly be publiſhed by the Learned Mr. Tanner, Fellow of All-Souls College there) that this Author died ſometime in the Reign of Henry the Third, and therefore what follows can be none of his; and I could further prove this from divers other Circumſtances, if they were needful to be here inſerted.

BUT as for the laſt Thirteen years of the Reign of King Henry the Third, beſides the printed Authors already mention'd, I have alſo been beholden to divers choice Manuſcripts, (particularly to the Annals of St. Auguſtin of Canterbury) whoſe Writers have given us a moſt exact Account of the Barons Wars during this King's Reign. Theſe Annals end with the Reign of King Edward the Firſt, being, I ſuppoſe, continued by another Hand.

TO theſe I muſt alſo add an old Chronicle or Book that belongs to the City of London, now in the Cuſtody of the worthy Mr. Goodfellow, the preſent Town-Clerk there, which is ſtil'd Liber de Antiquis Legibus, the peruſal of which I obtain'd by the eſpecial favour of the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, and the Right Worſhipful the Court of Aldermen: where among the ſeveral By-Laws and Cuſtoms of that antient Famous City, are recorded divers particular Accounts of the Civil and Military Tranſacti- ons that happened in the Reigns of this King and his Son Edward the First; and it is from these two last rare Manuscripts that I think I have been able to give a more particular account of what happened in the Reign of Henry the Third, especially relating to the Affairs of London, after the time that Matthew Paris left off Writing. And without this Assistance, as also of the printed Chronicles of Burton, Wikes, Waverly and Hemingford, the latter end of this King's Reign would have been very obscure and imperfect, as any one may see that will but take the pains to compare the History of that time contained in this Volume with any other of our Modern English Historians.

* Vid. Sir Will. Dugd. Chronica Series, p. 23, 25, &c. at the end of his Origin. jurid.

TO all these I must likewise add the Annals of Nicholas Trivet, Son of Sir Thomas Trivet, * whom we find to have twice rode One of the Justices Itinerant, in the latter end of the Reign of King Henry the Third; but this Nicholas was Prior of a Monastery of Dominican Friers in London, and died about the year 1328. This learned Frier wrote a General History of Europe, beginning Anno Dom. 1136. with the Reign of King Stephen, and ending 1361. being the 35th year of King Edward the Third; in which he gives us an exact Synchronism of Popes, Emperors, and Kings, in the Order in which they lived: but as he is more large and exact in the Affairs of England than of other Countries, I have therfore extracted from him divers curious Passages relating to our History, which are not to be found in other Authors. And tho this Chronicle is now printed at Paris in the 8th Tome of the learned Father Dacherie's Spicilegium; yet it being very scarce, I have made use of a choice Manuscript of it, that formerly belonged to the Abbey of St. Edmunds-Bury, and which is now in the hands of the Reverend Dr. Halton, Provost of Queen's College Oxford, who did me the favour to afford me the use of it.

THERE are likewise some other Historians, who borrowing chiefly from those that wrote before them, I have only taken a few Passages from them, which I could not meet with elsewhere; such as are Ranulph Higden (a Monk of St. Werburg's in Chester) in his Polychron; and Thomas of Walsingham his Ypodigma Neustriæ, who, tho he there has a more particular regard to the Affairs of Normandy, giving an Account at large of that Dukedom, from the time it first came into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the sixth year of Henry the Fifth; yet the Reader will there find many other Occurrences not to be pick'd up from any Author besides: but as for these two last Writers, as also the History of Henry de Knighton, Chanon of Leicester, I hope they will prove more useful in my next Volume, in which Period they come to treat of the Affairs and Actions of their own times.

I HAVE also omitted a great number of Manuscript Annals and Chronicles, some with, and some without names, which lie hid in the Libraries already mention'd; such as are the Annals of Hide near Winchester, John Castorius alias Fiber, or Bever, a Monk of Westminster, who wrote a Chronicle that is still extant in some of our English Libraries; John Shepshevet, who wrote a Chronicle mostly relating to Henry the Third's time, which is in the Library of the Heralds Office, as also in that of Sir John Cotton; to these I may add John Ross or Rous of Warwick, who wrote a short History of our English Kings, to the end of the Reign of King Henry the Sixth: but of these last, being chiefly either short Accounts of Actions, or else brief Collections out of other Historians, I have made but little use, tho what I may do hereafter I know not.

I SHALL now conclude with a ſhort Cenſure of one printed Hiſtorian, and that is Polydor Virgil, whom for the ſame reaſon, as alſo for his great Ignorance and Miſtakes in our Engliſh Affairs, I have avoided citing as much as I could, unleſs it were in ſome particular things omitted by others, and which he may very well be ſuppoſed to have taken from Manuſcript Writers, tho now they are loſt: for beſides what he borrowed out of the Publick Library at Oxford, without taking any care to reſtore them; he likewiſe pillaged the Libraries of Religious Houſes at his pleaſure, and, at laſt, (as they ſay) ſent over a whole Ship-load of Manuſcripts to Rome; which if true, we are not like to be much the better for them.

BESIDES the Authors abovementioned, I have alſo been as careful as I could, to look into thoſe who have written the Hiſtories or Annals of France, during the Reigns of theſe Princes I have here treated of; ſuch as are Sugerius Abbot of St. Denis, Rigordus, and Gulielmus Brito, or William the Breton, and Paulus Æmilius; from all whom I have taken ſeveral conſiderable Paſſages, not only for the Augmenting, but Illuſtrating theſe Annals. And I have alſo endeavoured ſometimes to rectify their miſtakes, when I thought without any juſt Cauſe they differ from our Engliſh Hiſtorians.

THE like I have done in reſpect of Scotland, from Johannes Major, Hector Boethius, and eſpecially Buchanan, who tho he was juſtly a celebrated Hiſtorian, yet he often runs into the ſame miſtakes with thoſe that went before him, out of his too great partiality to his own Nation: ſo that who ever undertakes to write a General Hiſtory of the Affairs of this Kingdom, as they have a near Relation to, and Connection with thoſe of our Neighbours, either in reſpect of the Alliances or Wars that have happen'd between them, it is abſolutely neceſſary that they ſhould conſult the Hiſtories of thoſe Nations with whom we were then concern'd.

AND the Reader may alſo take notice, that I have extracted the Affairs of Wales, as far as they relate to our own, out of Dr. Powel's Welſh Chronicle, which is indeed but a tranſlation from Caradoc of Lancarvan, a much antienter Author; and he likewiſe extracted his Hiſtory from two antient Welſh Chronicles, the One of which belonged to the Abby of Conway in North-Wales, and the Other to that of Stratfleur in South-Wales, and are both extant, the one in the Exchequer, the other in the Cotton Library.

BUT ſince the narrow limits of this Preface will not allow a larger Account and Character of the Authors, both in Print and Manuſcript, from whence this Volume is collected, I ſhall therefore refer thoſe that deſire farther ſatisfaction on this Subject, to a Modern Treatiſe, called the Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, a Book I have already quoted at the beginning of this Preface, written by the Reverend Mr. William Nicholſon Arch-Deacon of Carliſle, who it muſt be confeſſed has been very diligent in his Collections, tho he hath not put down all that are extant, and which may be neceſſary for a Work of this nature; for I my ſelf have made uſe of ſome, which he has not had the good luck to light upon: but this I impute not to his want of Skill, but Opportunity, by reaſon of his living in the more remote parts of England, which has hindered his being perſonally converſant in the moſt noted Repoſitories of theſe kind of Rarities.

HAVING now given you as brief an Account as I could of the Authors from whom I extracted my Materials, and where you may alſo find them, if you pleaſe; I think I need ſay no more, but that I hope theſe Collections lections (for I will not preſume to give them the Title of a Complete Hiſtory) being Regiſter'd in a due and exact Order of time, may at leaſt deſerve the name of Annals. And as ſuch may prove uſeful in time to ſome abler Pen to compile out of them a complete Body of Engliſh Hiſtory, at leaſt with the help of ſuch Additions and Alterations as may be judged neceſſary for ſo great a Work.

BUT before I quit this Subject, I muſt ſay ſomewhat concerning the Abſtract of Laws at the end of each King's Reign, in which I have follow'd the Model propoſed by the Lord Bacon, that learned Chancellor, and which I have added, to give the Reader a ſhort Hiſtory of our Laws, as alſo to excite our young Nobility and Gentry, who ſhall happen to peruſe this Work, to a more diligent Reading of our Antient, as well as Modern Statutes, without a competent knowledg of which it is impoſſible to underſtand the true antient Conſtitution of our Engliſh Government.

I SHALL add to this an Appendix at the end of this Volume, wherein I have given exact Tranſcripts of ſuch Charters of our Kings, as relate to the antient Privileges and Liberties of the Clergy and People of England, beginning at William I. and ending with the Great Charters of Liberties granted by King John, and confirmed by his Son Henry the Third; to which I have alſo added ſuch Charters, or Records, out of the Rolls in the Tower, as may any way ſerve to illuſtrate and confirm ſeveral material Paſſages in the enſuing Hiſtory.

THE firſt of theſe, tho already printed, I have tranſcribed for two Reaſons; the One, to ſhew the Reader that I have fairly tranſlated thoſe Charters in my Collection of the Laws of thoſe Kings; the Other, to confute Dr. Brady's raſh Aſſertion in the beginning of his Preface before his complete Hiſtory, That all the Liberties and Privileges the People can pretend to, were the Grants and Conceſſions of the Kings of this Nation, and were derived from the Crown: whereas it appears from Matthew Paris, as well as other Hiſtorians, that moſt of them were claimed before, as the Laws of King Edward, which William ſirnamed the Conqueror, did take a ſolemn Oath faithfully to obſerve; and in purſuance of which, there is this remarkable Clauſe in the Charter of Liberties granted by Henry I. Lagam Regis Edwardi vobis reddo cum illis emendationibus, quibus Pater meus eas emendavit Conſilio Baronum ſuorum, i. e. I reſtore to you the Laws of King Edward, with thoſe Amendments that were made by my Father with the Advice of his Barons.

Pag. 252. AND therefore Matthew Paris tells us, that when the Clergy, Nobility and People of England demanded the Reſtitution of their antient Liberties from King John, they did not ask them as new Favours, but as the antient Laws and Liberties of King Edward, together with ſome other Liberties granted by his Great Grandfather King Henry the Firſt, which * Id. p. 254. they then required to be confirmed; and therefore the ſame * Author ſays in the next Page, that the Heads of the Laws and Liberties, which the Great Men then required King John to confirm, were partly contained in the former Charter of King Henry the Firſt, or were partly drawn from the antient Laws of King Edward, as that Author ſays he will ſhew us in his following Hiſtory, that is, from the very Charter it ſelf which he there gives us. And that the People of England had divers great Liberties and Privileges under the Saxon Kings precedent to thoſe Laws, I think I have ſufficiently made out in my Introduction to the former Volume, and could alſo add more upon that Subject, were I not ſenſible that it would make this Preface too prolix.

* BUT

BUT that these Laws and Liberties were never lost or forfeited by Dr. Brady's pretended Conquest, I hope I have sufficiently proved in the ensuing Introduction, and therefore need say no more upon that head; nor yet prove that it was for more than a bare relaxation of the Rigour of the Feudal Laws, concerning Knight's Service, that the Clergy, Nobility and People took up Arms in the Reigns of King John and Henry the Third, as the Doctor would in both his Prefaces make his Readers believe; there being several other Clauses in those Great Charters relating to the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, that are of a much different, and more important nature, which being too long to be noted in this Preface, I refer the Reader to the Charters themselves, both in English and Latin.

BUT as for the Doctor's next Assertion, concerning the Ordinary People, or Bulk of this Nation, that they were in most things of the same Condition, as well before the Conquest as after, and their Quality was not different, tho under the Normans they were obnoxious to greater Rigor, and more Severities in the same way of living, or as we now would call it, Servitude. Pref. to the Reader, p. 1, 2.

I MUST beg the Doctor's pardon, if I cannot come up to the heighth of his Notions: for, tho I grant, that the Condition of the Ordinary or Vulgar sort of People was not in all points so easy and Free as it is at this day, since Freehold Estates have become more common; yet that their condition (I mean of such as were Freemen, and not Villains) was never such as would bear the Title of Servitude, either before or after his Conquest, I think I have sufficiently proved in my Introduction to the former Volume; and that they were not so afterwards, even before the granting of Magna Charta, will plain enough appear by divers Passages in this Volume; and I shall take occasion to say somewhat more concerning this Subject hereafter, and had not said so much of it in this Preface, but only to justify my self for inserting so many printed Charters in the Appendix; for I do not design to imitate the Doctor, who, besides Authorities from Manuscripts and Records, has for the most part stuft his Appendix with Epistles, Pope's Bulls, and Ecclesiastical Canons, with other pieces that are for the most part printed in Eadmerus, Spelman's Councils, Roger Hoveden, Matthew Paris, and other Authors not much harder to come by, than the Doctor's Compleat History.

BUT as to the rest of the Collections in the Appendix to this Volume, they are chiefly such things as relate to the antient Authority of our Great Councils or Parliaments, and the Members whereof they antiently consisted; concerning all which you will find sufficient references in the History it self: and I shall make further use of these Records, if ever it shall please God to give me another Opportunity of handling that Great and Noble Question, concerning the Antiquity of the Commons, their appearing and acting in Parliament, as a Constituent Part and Member thereof.

BUT as for Transcripts of Leagues and Treaties, tho I could have given you a large Collection of that kind, yet I have rather chosen not to do it, because I would not intrench upon another Gentleman's Province.

AND I am very well inform'd, that the Learned and Ingenious Mr. Rymer, his Majesty's Historiographer, designs to give the World a large Collection of Leagues, Treaties, and Articles of Peace between the Kings of England and other Foreign Princes, collected not only from printed Authors, but also from that hidden Treasure of Originals and Records, at this day deposited in the old Chapter-House of the Abbey of Westminster; and therefore I have not thought fit to tranſcribe any more than two pieces of this nature; the former of which contains the Charters of King Henry the Third, and the Barons of England, whereby they bind themſelves to refer all their Differences and Diſputes to the final Judgment and Arbitrement of Lewis the 9th King of France, both which are recited verbatim in the Sentence, that That King gave on the behalf of his Brother-in-law King Henry, againſt the Confederate Earls and Barons; which, tho it is to be found in divers Manuſcripts in our own Libraries, yet I have choſe rather to tranſcribe it from Father Dacherie's * Spicilegium, or choice Collections from Manuſcripts in the Benedictine Libraries of France; † from whence I have alſo taken that Treaty or Agreement between the ſaid Kings abovementioned, concerning the perpetual Renunciation of the King of England's Title to Normandy, and his other Dominions in France, upon the French King's Conceſſion of Guienne under the Title of the Dutchy of Acquitain; which I thought fit to inſert at large, becauſe I have made a particular mention of it in the enſuing Hiſtory: and tho it be already printed, yet the Author's Collections conſiſting of many Volumes, they are very ſcarce to be had in England.

AMONG theſe alſo, the Reader may ‖ find an exact Tranſlation of King John's Magna Charta into the French of that Age, which juſtifies the Authentickneſs of thoſe few Originals that are yet left us of that Charter; ſo that to conclude this Subject, I ſhall only deſire the Reader to judg of the following Appendix, not by its Bulk, or the number of Pieces therein contain'd, but by their Weight and Moment in relation to the enſuing Hiſtory; eſpecially ſince the Records in the Tower do not furniſh us with very many things concerning Parliamentary Affairs, during the Period I now write of; moſt Records of that nature being loſt, as far as the fifth year of Edward the Second. And there are alſo great Chaſmes and Breaches, even in the Parliament Rolls, found after that time, as well as before it; which I purpoſely mention, that ſo the Reader may not wonder that there are ſo many old Charters and Records now wanting, they having been imbezelled and taken off the Rolls, perhaps ſome Ages ago; ſo that we are fain to be beholden to private men's Libraries and Collections, for the Originals of the Great Charters of K. John and Henry the Third, as alſo for Tranſcripts of ſeveral of our antient Statutes of that King, and of Edward the Firſt; for the Originals of them too have been for divers years wanting on the Rolls.

BUT I expect it may be here objected, That if this be all I have done, to what purpoſe was it for me to undertake a new Collection of this kind, after what the learned Dr. Brady hath already publiſhed in the ſame Method; ſince he ſeems not only to have made uſe of moſt of the Hiſtorians I have mention'd, but hath alſo conſulted the Records of the Tower for new matter, to render his Hiſtory more Intelligible and Advantageous, and that I my ſelf have been beholden to thoſe very Collections?

IN anſwer to which I muſt freely acknowledge, that I do not go about any way to derogate from the Doctor's Performance, in whatever it may truly merit Commendation; I own his Induſtry in great part of his Hiſtory, which is written in a plain and eaſy Stile; tho I fear, not always with that correctneſs as the dignity of the Subject may require; but I ſhall not inſiſt upon this, for I do not pretend my ſelf to exact or elegant Writing. And tho I alſo grant, that the Doctor has taken a great deal of pains in furniſhing us with Records out of the Tower, whileſt he was Keeper of them, to illuſtrate or augment his Hiſtory, yet I think they ſometimes ſeem of no great Moment:

Moment: So that the whole conſider'd, perhaps I may without Offence affirm, that his Performance falls very ſhort of (what he calls) a Compleat Hiſtory.

BUT the things that are wanting to make it deſerve that Title, are chiefly theſe two, Sincerity and Diligence; I ſay, Sincerity, in not fairly repreſenting the true ſenſe of his Authors, without wreſting and miſtranſlating their Words and Expreſſions; or omitting and paſſing by what he did not like, or thought would not ſute well with thoſe Notions and Opinions he deſign'd to advance; and indeed the Paſſages omitted, are often of great importance for the right underſtanding the antient Conſtitution of the Kingdom, and the true State of Affairs at that time.

TO inſtance in particulars, they are moſtly ſuch as * relate to the King's ſuppoſed Prerogative, in raiſing Money and making Laws during the Period he writes of; both which he would in effect make us believe our Kings could heretofore lawfully do by their ſole Authority; and that if it be otherwiſe now, it proceeds wholly from their gracious Condeſcentions: † And that as to the Charters of King William and Henry the Firſt, they were never meant or intended for the Benefit of the Engliſh, but only the Norman Biſhops and Noblemen; and for thoſe of King John and Henry the Third, none had any ſhare in them, but the Community of the Kingdom; and that (according to his Notion) only conſiſted of the Tenants in Capite, and their Feudatory Tenants by Knight's Service: to all which I ſhall ſpeak more at large in another Place, this being none fit for Controverſy; therefore will now only obſerve, that the Doctor takes all Occaſions, as well in his Prefaces, as in the Body of his Hiſtory, to ſhew his Partiality, whilſt he endeavours to repreſent the Engliſh Nation as Slaves by Conqueſt, thereby to advance an Arbitrary Power to an unreaſonable Heighth, and at the ſame time to depreſs the antient Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and diminiſh (as far as he is able) the antient Power and Authority of the Great Council, or Parliament, in making Laws, and redreſſing the Grievances of the Kingdom. And to this end he does all he can to conceal or excuſe the Faults and illegal Actions of our former Princes, and their Miniſters, eſpecially in the Reigns of King John and Henry the Third.

THE Doctor likewiſe ſhews his Inſincerity, as well as Partiality in omitting the greateſt part of thoſe Grievances and intolerable Oppreſſions under which the Nation then groaned, and which cauſed the greateſt part of the Clergy and Laiety to take up Arms againſt them, and by which means it muſt be acknowledged, they firſt obtain'd the Great Charter of Liberties and Foreſts; not that I will go about to vindicate all ſuch taking up of Arms from a juſt imputation of Rebellion, eſpecially in the War begun and carried on by Simon Montfort, and the Barons of his Party, in the latter part of the Reign of Henry the Third.

YET whatever Hiſtorian does not fairly repreſent as well the Errors, Failings, and Violence of Princes, and their Miniſters, as the Wilfulneſs, Obſtinacy, and Rebellion of their Subjects, will never be able to render his Hiſtory ſo uſeful to Poſterity as it ought to be; ſince neither the Former can thereby receive any notice or warning, how to avoid the like Miſmanagements for the time to come; nor can the People learn what Breaches have been formerly made upon their antient Rights and Liberties, ſo that they may not think it a thing ſtrange and unheard of, if the like ſhould happen again in their Times.

AND

AND beſides all this, the Doctor hath conceal'd (whether ignorantly or wilfully I will not here determine) divers Paſſages in our antient Hiſtorians and Records, which may any ways ſerve to prove, that long before the 49th of Henry the Third, there was another ſort or State of Laymen, which being neither Lords, nor Tenants in Capite, muſt be called Commons; and for whom I have collected ſeveral Authorities from our antient Annals and Hiſtorians in the enſuing Volume; as alſo from ſome Records in the Appendix to it, which I ſhall leave to the Conſideration of the Judicious and Impartial Reader.

AND indeed the Doctor's wilful (I doubt) Omiſſions in this kind, as alſo in the points abovementioned, are ſo many and frequent, that tho I will not ſay he deſerves the Title of a falſe Witneſs in Hiſtory, yet he has all the Artifices of an Advocate that writes or pleads for a Party; and who conceals and ſuppreſſes the main Evidence that makes againſt the Cauſe he maintains; or elſe wreſts and miſconſtrues the words that chiefly make againſt him. And for the truth of this, I need but refer the Reader to the following Introduction, as alſo to divers Paſſages which I have noted in the Hiſtory it ſelf, and are too many to be here particularly mention'd. And indeed the Doctor's faults in both theſe kinds are ſo conſiderable for Weight and Number, that I once deſign'd, before I undertook this Work, to have written ſome Animadverſions upon his Hiſtory; but finding it would be like to make a large Treatiſe, I thought it a more grateful (tho not an eaſier) Task to new write the whole as far as he had undertaken it.

BUT I cannot paſs by another great Omiſſion of the Doctor's, eſpecially in the Reign of Henry the Third; and it is of divers of thoſe great Grievances and Oppreſſions which the Nation lay under during his Reign, by reaſon of the Pope's uſurp'd Power in diſpoſing of Biſhopricks and Benefices at his pleaſure; or in exacting Money both from the Clergy and People, by new and unheard of Methods; or elſe in combining with the King in impoſing ſuch involuntary Contributions, upon condition that his Holineſs himſelf ſhould have a large ſhare out of them; many of which Frauds and Abuſes, together with the ſevere Reflections Matthew Paris (who then lived) makes upon them, the Doctor has for ſome Reaſons, beſt known to himſelf, thought fit to overlook: tho, whoever will take the pains to conſider the time when his Hiſtory was publiſhed, and the Prince to whom it is dedicated, may very well gueſs upon what grounds he did it: but I ſhall ſay no more upon that Head, becauſe I will avoid, as much as poſſible, all perſonal Reflections.

THEREFORE leaving this ungrateful Subject, I ſhall now come to the next point of my charge againſt the Doctor, and that is, his want of Diligence in Collecting all the Materials that may be neceſſary for ſo great a Work, to make it deſerve the noble Title it bears of a Compleat Hiſtory. And for proof of this, beſides the Omiſſions of ſeveral conſiderable Paſſages of great moment I could inſtance in, and which might have been neceſſary to the right underſtanding of the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Affairs that happened during the Reigns he writes of, which he might have taken from thoſe very Authors he quotes; He has likewiſe omitted what he might alſo have added out of the Annals of Mailroſs and Burton, which are printed in the firſt Volume of Engliſh Writers publiſhed at Oxford, unleſs it be in one or two Paſſages in the latter, concerning the Statutes or Proviſions made there, and the manner how they were obtain'd; which, I ſuppoſe, he did put in, becauſe he thought it ſerved his purpoſe, viz. to ſhew the ſtubborn and reſtleſs reſtleſs Humour of the Engliſh Nobility and People at that time; but without fairly putting down the great Provocations which induced them to preſcribe that Remedy, which indeed proved more fatal to the publick Peace than the Diſeaſe it ſelf, they pretended to cure.

BUT as for thoſe Chronicles and Annals abovemention'd, which are publiſhed by the learned Dr. Gale, in his ſecond Volume of Engliſh Writers (printed at the ſame place with the former, and which I need not particularly name, having already mentioned them) Tho Dr. Brady may perhaps endeavour to excuſe himſelf, by ſaying that theſe Authors were not publiſhed when he wrote his Hiſtory; yet this excuſe will not ſerve him, ſince they were then extant in Manuſcript, and to be found in the Cotton or other Libraries in London, or elſe in thoſe in the Doctor's own Univerſity, to all which he very well knows he had free acceſs whenever he pleas'd; but as for ſuch Authors as remain ſtill in Manuſcript in the places laſt mention'd, the Doctor has given us ſuch a ſlender Account of them, that out of all that vaſt Treaſure which belonged to divers Monaſteries, or elſe thoſe compoſed by other Authors, he has made uſe of but three Writers, and thoſe only in the Reign of King Henry the Second, which are theſe that follow, Fitz-Stephens's Life of Thomas Becket, and the Hiſtoria Quadriloga or Quadripartite Hiſtory of the ſame Perſon's Actions; and Abbot Benedict's Chronicle of part of the Reign of Henry the Second, which are but a very few in Compariſon of many other Authors, from whom it ſeems the Doctor did not think it worth while to borrow any thing that might render his Hiſtory more compleat and uſeful, in which whether he has done well or ill, I muſt leave to the Judgment of the Readers.

I SHALL now conclude my Animadverſions upon the Doctor's Performance, and could have willingly been excuſed from ſo invidious a Task, had it not been to juſtify the Convenience, if not Neceſſity, of new writing this Volume of Hiſtory, which contains thoſe eight Kings, whoſe Reigns the Doctor hath ſo partially repreſented, that the Reader cannot without ſome better Light truly underſtand what ſort of men thoſe Princes were, what Alterations happened in their times, nor what were the true cauſes of them.

I WOULD not be thought to paſs this Cenſure out of any particular prejudice to, or diſlike of, either the Doctor's Perſon, or his Opinions, ſince as I have not the Fortune to be acquainted with the former, ſo have I no other diſguſt to the latter, but only as they are contrary to Truth, and not only derogatory to the antient Rights and Privileges of the whole Body of the Clergy and Laity of this Kingdom, (for both their Liberties are founded upon the ſame Bottom) but alſo may prove highly prejudicial both to the Prince and People, by inducing the former to believe that all the Rights, Privileges, and Liberties the People of this Nation enjoy, are but the Spoils of the Crown, and Encroachments upon the Royal Prerogative: and at the ſame time inducing unwary Readers to think, that it was a Sin to defend them when ever they happened to be illegally attacqu'd: and if both were once poſſeſſed of ſuch falſe Notions, I leave it to any indifferent Perſon to judg how long they were like to continue.

BUT I expect it may now be asked me, What courſe I intend to ſteer to avoid the like Rocks? To which my anſwer is very ſhort, That it ſhall be by going (as near as I can) between the two oppoſite extreams, of neither defending thoſe Kings whoſe Reigns I write, in their wilful and violent Breaches upon the antient Rights and Liberties of the People, nor yet in juſtifying the latter in their Encroachments upon the King's juſt Prerogatives, and rendring his Government wholly precarious and insignificant, as it proved in the latter end of Henry the Third's Reign, by the factious Intrigues of Simon Montfort and his Accomplices.

IN short, I shall endeavour strictly to observe that antient Rule, which comprehends the chief Duty of an Historian, Ne quid falsum audeat, ne quid verum dicere non audeat; that is, neither to tell lies for a Party, nor yet to conceal any Truth fit to be known on that or any other Account. And I hope I shall have no temptation to do otherwise in this Volume, the Persons I write of being so long since gone off the Stage, that we need have no other Concern for them then what their own Merits, or the justice of the Cause may require.

BUT as for the composition of this Work, since I chiefly designed to do it by way of Annals, in imitation of the Learned and Impartial Thuanus, I have therefore taken the utmost Care I could to register Things and Actions in a due order of Time; and for this end, where our Historians differ about it, I have always followed the most approved Authors, when the Reason and probability of the thing will allow it; not that I blindly tie my self to any one in particular whenever I find them guilty of a mistake.

AND therefore I have taken the pains to correct several Errors in Chronolgy, in our Modern English Chroniclers, not excepting Dr. Brady himself, who has not bin so careful as he ought in this point; As for instance, when following the Authority of the Norman Chronicle, he places the Actions he relates from thence about a year sooner than they really happened, according to the Account of our best English Historians, whom I take to be much more exact in reckoning the years of our Lord; but from whence this mistake in this French Writer should proceed, I will not take upon me to determine, tho I am sure it could not be from beginning the year at our Lady-day, whereas the old English Chroniclers begin ours at Christmas, since according to this way of reckoning, it is not the French Account, but Ours, that would get the start of the other.

BUT to say somewhat more concerning the choice of the Materials; as I have gathered them out of the most antient and authentique Writers I could find; so I have been as careful to peruse not only those that are printed, but whatever I could meet with considerable in Manuscript either in London, or both the Universities, besides what I have borrowed of private Persons; but I can never sufficiently acknowledg the Obligation I have to that worthy Patron, as well as Master of all choice Literature, Sir John Cotton Baronet, to whose Library (that great Store-house of Antiquities) I have not only had the Honour of a free Access, but had also lent me whatever I wanted or desired to borrow from thence; and I hope this Volume will shew that I have made the best use I could of that noble Favour, as I have done also in other Libraries, whose Manuscripts I have had the liberty to peruse, without omitting any thing I thought might serve to render this Work either more pleasant or useful to the Readers.

AND if any learned Person will do me the Kindness to shew me any considerable Error I have committed, or any Omission of any thing material and fit to be known in this Volume, I shall not only make a particular Acknowledgment of it, but I will cause it to be amended in the next Edition, if ever I live to see another come out; for I do not pretend to write without Faults, for that is almost impossible in so great an Undertaking; and therefore all that can be required of Writers in this kind, is, that they take the beſt care they can, and when that is done, he deſerves beſt, who is found guilty of the feweſt Failings. And I hope I may ſay of this Performance, that as it is not without any at all, ſo there are none that are directly contrary to Truth; but only ſuch as may concern the names of Men, or miſtakes of Days or Months, or ſome ſmaller circumſtances of Actions, which may ſometimes happen, either through the careleſneſs of the Printers, or the inadvertenſy of the Amanuenſis, and which will often eſcape, notwithſtanding the ſtricteſt Examination.

AND as for the manner of the Compoſition, as I have not endeavoured at a lofty and florid Stile, which is not at all proper for an Hiſtorian; ſo I hope I have avoided a mean and abject way of Writing, below the dignity of the Subject. And becauſe meer Hiſtorical matter of Fact will not generally pleaſe alone, I have imbelliſh'd this Work with ſuch Relations, as may any way ſerve to make it more agreeable to the Reader; to which end I have alſo added ſhort Characters of the Kings, Princes, and other moſt conſiderable Perſons whom I have had occaſion to mention; which I have not taken at random, but either drawn them from the moſt exact Hiſtorians that lived in thoſe times, or elſe from the chief Actions they perform'd; which by the way is, I think, the trueſt method of judging the Tempers and Principles not only of Princes, but private men.

TO this I have alſo added here and there, as the Subject would afford, ſome political Obſervations, that may be of uſe to ſuch Readers, as not being converſant in State-Affairs, may perhaps not be able to make 'em themſelves; and without theſe two laſt mention'd Qualifications, Hiſtories, tho never ſo faithfully written, will prove but dry, and no more inſtructive than our ordinary News-papers and Gazettes.

TET the giving ſuch juſt Characters, is not ſo eaſy a Task as may be at firſt imagined, ſince writing the Actions of thoſe who lived many ages ago, I am forced to take their Characters, not from my own Obſervation, but the Relation of other Writers who often differ among themſelves in the Deſcriptions they give us of thoſe Princes and Great men; and this too frequently proceeds not ſo much from the partiality of the Hiſtorian, as from the uncertain and variable nature of thoſe Perſons they undertake to deſcribe; and therefore it proves very difficult to give a juſt Character of thoſe Prince, who tho they were endued with divers Vertues and good Qualities, yet were they alſo attended with no leſs, or perhaps greater Vices and failings: for there being in ſuch Perſons matter ſufficient, either to be praiſed and commended, or elſe juſtly blamed and cenſur'd; it often gives Hiſtorians a liberty of taking notice of the One, and paſſing by the Other, according to the particular Inclinations and Affections of thoſe who undertake to write their Lives.

THUS William commonly called the Conqueror, is repreſented by foreign Hiſtorians, (ſuch as are Willielmus Pictavienſis, and Gemiticenſis) as alſo by our own William of Malmesbury, as a Prince of great Piety, Juſtice and Moderation; whereas divers other Monkiſh Writers of our own Nation, make him appear in many of his Actions (if truly related) as Sacrilegious, Cruel, and Avaritious, and no true obſerver of his Oaths and Promiſes, when contrary to his own private Intereſt. And both theſe Characters of him are in a great meaſure true, ſince that King was endued with many ſingular Vertues, tho allayed with as great Faults, and ill Qualities, as you may find at the end of his Reign, where both the one and the other are fairly, and at once laid open to your view. The like I may say of his Son Henry the First, and Great Grandson Henry the Second, who tho they were Great and Wise Princes, yet had the Fate either to be enveighed against, or else as immoderately praised according to the various Tempers of the Monks who wrote the Reigns.

AND indeed had they always fairly represented their good as well as their evil Qualities; they had not done amiss, since we can scarce find a Great man, either in Antient or Modern Times, who was both Valiant and Ambitious, but was also endued with as many Vices as Vertues; since as it is hard for such men to be perfectly vertuous, so it is impossible for them to be wholly wicked, and yet to succeed in their Designs.

BUT to return to our own Princes: those have commonly been most favourably (if not partially) dealt with by the Monks (then almost the only Writers of History) who shewed themselves most indulgent to the Church (that is, the Clergy) by being wholly govern'd by them, and by confering on them the largest Privileges, or by building them the richest Monasteries: nor is this the fault of that Age alone, but would prove the same in ours, were the Talent of writing History possest, as it was then, by only one Sort or Order of Men.

I SHALL advertise the Reader but of one thing more, which is, That in great part of this History, especially in the two last Reigns, where Dr. Brady and I have been forced to have recourse to, and translate the same Authors, I have made use of the Doctor's own Words and Expressions, only with some alterations in the Stile and connection of the Matter, which I did not out of lazines, or to shew my self a Plagiary of the Doctor's Labours, but rather for his as well as my own Justification: for his, to shew wherein he is not to be found fault with; and for my own, that the Reader, upon comparing them together, may find, that I have not only (as well as the Doctor) exactly followed the true sense of those Authors, but have also altered him in some places, and added to him in many more; divers Errors and Omissions of which kind, when of any considerable moment, I have made bold to take notice of; and therefore having all along compar'd his Performance with the Original, I hope in whatever we agree, the Reader may accept it as Money twice told; and wherever we differ, as we sometimes do, either in the sense of an Author, or a plain matter of fact, I leave it to his Judgment to follow which he pleases, provided he will first consult the Originals. And now I shall only desire him to take notice, that throughout all this Work I have shortned the military or fighting part as much as I could, unless it be in K. Richard's Expedition to the Holy Land, and in the rest of his Reign after his Return; and this I have done, that I may have the larger Scope for Civil and Ecclesiastical Affairs, which I look upon as the more necessary and instructive of the two; and to be equally large in both, would be more than what this Volume would well bear.

TO conclude, That I may as little as can be, derogate from Dr. Brady's laborious Work, I must own my self much beholding to him for the assistance he has given me in the Writing of this Volume, were it only, that by seeing those faults he has committed, I might the better avoid falling into the like; tho I must also acknowledg my self obliged to him for his industrious Collections out of the Records of the Tower, the Heads of which I have inserted in their proper places, but have forbore transcribing the Originals, unless it be one or two in his Appendix, or from the Introduction to his Engliſh Hiſtory, (and which I ſhall hereafter make uſe of for another purpoſe) becauſe I would enter as little as I could upon another man's Labours, and alſo deſire to leave his Work as beneficial as poſſible, for thoſe who ſhall think fit to make uſe of, or conſult it.

AND I am ſo far from diſcouraging the Doctor's performances in this kind, that I hope we may e're long ſee the ſecond Volume of his Hiſtory, which (as I hear) he has given the World ſome hopes he will ſhortly publiſh; and which if it be written with that Faithfulneſs, Impartiality and Diligence as it ought, I ſhall then deſiſt from the further proſecuting my preſent Deſign of writing it anew. And as for what I have now ſaid of him, I hope he will pardon it, ſince it wholly proceeds from my zeal for Truth, and a tenderneſs for the antient Liberties and Government of my Country, which ought to be of the higheſt Concern to every honeſt Engliſh*man, and which in my Opinion his Writings have too much endeavoured to undermine.*

BUT if we ſhould both happen to write again upon the ſame Subject, I hope the World will only look upon it as a generous Emulation, who ſhall do the beſt and moſt faithful Service to his Country: and they may at leaſt reap this Benefit by it, that as the Doctor and I have different Notions of things, and conſequently different Proſpects in writing, which will alſo produce Collections of a different nature; ſo it may happen hereafter that ſome other Pen indued with a better Talent for ſuch a Performance, may out of both our Works, compile a compleat Body of Engliſh Hiſtory; a Title, which tho I will not preſume to give to my own Endeavours, yet is a thing ſo much to be deſired by all Ingenious Men, that if what I have already written on that Subject may any ways contribute to ſo noble a Deſign, I would not grudg if both this and the former Volume ſhould happen to be eſteemed little better than waſte Paper, ſo that Poſterity might know that I had been any ways a Contributor to ſo great and publick a Benefit.

BUT before I make an end of this Preface, I cannot forbear taking notice of a late imperfect endeavour towards an Epitome of Engliſh Hiſtory, which tho written in the French Tongue, and conſequently cannot find very many Readers till it be tranſlated into ours, yet however I think fit to warn our Engliſh Gentlemen that they read it with Caution, and not to be ſo tranſported with the elegancy of the Stile, or the artificial Compoſition of it, as to ſwallow the Errors of the Author (who writes himſelf Father D'Orleans, before two Volumes of a Hiſtory of the Revolutions in England) as not to diſcover the malignity that lies hid under a ſmooth and taking piece of Oratory.

BUT ſince the narrowneſs of this Preface will not permit me to make Animadverſions upon the whole, I ſhall only obſerve ſome of his groſſeſt miſtakes in this Hiſtory; paſſing by thoſe of leſſer Conſequence, and of which I could give you a great many inſtances, tho ſome of them are rather ridiculous than fatal to the Truth of the Hiſtory; ſuch is his calling King Edward the Elder, Son to King Alfred, Edward le Vieux, (i.e.) the Old, becauſe (ſays this Author) he had White or Greyiſh Hairs from his Childhood; a reaſon, which, I believe, never any one thought of before Father D'Orleans, whereas indeed this Prince had this Sirname given him by after-Writers, only to diſtinguiſh him from two other Edwards, who were both his Deſcendents and Succeſſors, that is, Edward called the Martyr, and Edward ſirnamed the Confeſſor. But perhaps this Author thinking ſuch Miſtakes not to be of any great moment to the Truth of his Hiſtory, may commit them on purpoſe to render it more agreeable to Vulgar Readers, which if ſo, I ſhall not envy him that ſmall Satisfaction.

BUT we come now to the next Book, which begins with the Conqueſt, wherein, as well as in thoſe that follow, I find ſome things that may better deſerve our Cenſure, as particularly, when he tells us, * That William the Conqueror introduced the Laws of Normandy into England, yet nevertheleſs intermix'd with them ſome of the Laws of the antient Saxon Kings; and that out of this Collection he made one Body of Laws, to which he gave the Title of Norman.

* Pag. 74.

IN which Aſſertion each of the Propoſitions are either Falſe, or Miſtaken: for in the firſt place, tho I do not deny but that this King introduced ſome of the Laws of his own Country, yet that the greater part of them were ſo, I am ſure is a notorious Miſtake, and to which I ſhall ſay no more, than that the Reader may find it ſufficiently confuted in the following Introduction: but that he gave to this Collection the Title of Norman Laws, is altogether falſe; for we neither have now, nor ever had any Body of Laws that were ſo called.

I NOW come to the Second Book, wherein I ſhall not trouble my ſelf to confute what he ſays to prove Thomas Becket, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, both a Saint and a Martyr; for that he could not be ſo, I need but appeal to the Original of his Troubles, and the cauſe and manner of his Death, as this Author himſelf has related them, and as they may be ſeen more at large in the following Hiſtory, being faithfully collected out of thoſe very Writers of his Life, who flouriſhed and wrote not many years after. But as for the great Teſtimony brought by this Author, to make this Prelat a Saint (to wit) the Miracles ſaid to be done at his Tomb, it is very well known that the Church of Rome has never wanted ſuch Teſtimonies, (whether Real or Pretended, it matters not) when ever ſhe had a mind to Canonize any Perſons who had loſt their Lives, I do not ſay for the Chriſtian Religion, but to advance her Temporal Grandeur, which was the caſe of this Prelate; and certainly his Gift of Miracle-working was grown very much out of Date in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, when this man's Miracles were declared to be Impoſtures, and his Bones burnt as a Traytor's.

I CANNOT alſo omit taking notice, that this Author does all he can to detract from the Worth and Grandeur of ſome of our Greateſt and Beſt of Princes, as may be ſeen in the partial Account he gives of King Henry the Second, and Richard the Firſt his Son, eſpecially the Latter, whoſe Actions he falſly repreſents in many Inſtances that I could give, but none ſo Remarkable as when he caſts all the fault of the War between him and King Philip of France upon the former, tho it plainly appears even by the Teſtimony of the French Hiſtorians of that time, that Philip began to make War upon our Richard during his Impriſonment with the Emperor, and that contrary to that King's own Oath and the Pope's Declaration againſt his Proceedings. So that the truth of the caſe was no more than this; King Philip had without any juſt Cauſe, or Demand of Satisfaction from King Richard, invaded his Territories, and taken ſeveral of his Towns and Caſtles, and yet it is repreſented by this Father as meer Obſtinacy and love of War, when he would not be contented tamely to ſit down a Loſer, but endeavoured to recover his juſt Rights by Arms; and therefore this Father's Reflection is very unjuſt, (and perhaps may better belong to a certain Prince now living ſome where in the World) † when upon King Richard's raiſing of great Taxes on the already too much oppreſs'd People,

People, to carry on the War against France, he makes this Reflection; That a false Ambition transported him more to ruin his Kingdom, than not to extend his Dominions; and that he chose rather to impoverish his greatest Towns, then to want one of the least of them.

BUT as for the Instance this Author gives us, to prove his obstinate Passion and Concern for War, it is, that Richard having heard King Philip had taken a Town in Normandy, thereupon swore that he would never turn his Face from that Province, until he had arrived there, and given his Enemy Battel; and that to this end, he made the Wall in the Room where he then was, and which look'd towards Normandy, to be presently beaten down, that he might go out at the Breach, without turning his Back on that Province; which tho it be related but by one * Historian, and he too a Writer that lived long after this King's time, yet is it set down by this Author as an unquestionable Truth; however impossible it was for this Prince to have executed any such thing, tho he had never so much resolved, nay and sworn to do it.

* Bromton's Chron. Col. 1259.

I COME now to the Reign of King John, in which there are several Mistakes, tho of less moment; † as when he calls the Princess of Wales the Daughter of the King of Scotland, whereas she was indeed the natural Daughter of King John himself, as all our Historians agree.

† Pag. 244.

BUT I confess I cannot find fault with this Author so long as he follows so good a Guide as Matthew Paris, as he does pretty well, till towards the latter end of this King's Reign; and then, without the Authority of any Writer that I know of, he relates, "That Lewis, Son to Philip King "of France, having been sent for over into England by the Barons, in "opposition to K. John, he adds, that this Prince was received triumphantly "at London, and that some days after his Entry, every one being impatient "to see him mount that Throne to which he was called, he was thereupon so- "lemnly Proclaim'd and Crown'd King of England, with the accustom'd "Ceremonies.

THIS is so remarkable a Transaction, that I could have wished this Father would have told us where we might find it. As for my own part, I have search'd all the Historians, both French and English, to see if I could light upon this Passage, but all in vain; nor do I know where it may lie hid, unless it should be among that unknown Collection of Manuscripts in the French King's Library, from whence Monsieur Varillas had his Memoires for the writing the History of our Reformation, which hath bin so handsomly confuted and expos'd by a ‖ Learned Pen: but since it is inconsistent with the Volubility and Freedom of the French Writers, to cite any Authors in the Histories they compose, I think it may seem very suitable to our English Phlegme, not to be over-hasty to believe what they write in this kind, farther than we can find they are able to produce their Vouchers for what they say.

‖ Dr. Burnet, now Lord Bishop of Salisbury.

AS for what this Father has written concerning the Reign of Henry the Third, I have not much to object against it, so long as he follows the Author abovenamed, without adding any thing of his own, which whenever he does, it is most commonly false, or grounded upon no good Authority; as when he says in the beginning of this King's Reign, That the greatest part of our Historians make him the Author of his own Misfortunes, by introducing the Institution of Parliaments: whereas I know none of them that say any such thing; but indeed our Author will not shew himself altogether so credulous, and therefore acknowledges that the Assembly of the Barons (which in his Reign began firſt to be called a Parliament) was often called by the greateſt part of his Anceſtors. But if he had ſaid by all of them ſince the Conqueſt, he had been much more in the right: But as for what immediately follows, he is as much in the wrong, viz. That our Hiſtories make no mention of the Chamber, or Houſe of Commons, but ſo long after him, (that is, King Henry) that one cannot ſay who was the Author of it, which (by the way) is a notable Reaſon, that the Original of a thing ſhould be more obſcure for its being Modern.

BUT as to the matter of Fact, this Author ſpeaks like a Stranger; for had he lookt into our Statutes, Records, and Manuſcripts, or even into our printed Hiſtorians, as he might have done, he would there have found the Commons mention'd in the Writs of Summons in this King's Reign, as alſo in ſome of our antient Statutes, both in his and in his Son Edward the Firſt's Reign, and I could produce ſeveral expreſs Teſtimonies for that purpoſe, which I ſhall recite in another place: but indeed this Author is not ſo much to be blamed in this Affair, as ſome of our own Nation, who I ſuppoſe gave him this falſe Information. But when he farther lays it down as his own Opinion, That after having read what the moſt antient Hiſtorians have writ on this Subject, he is perſwaded that the Parliament of England is ſo far from being the Product of the Royal Authority, that it is a Tribunal inſenſibly erected by it ſelf to counterballance it, and to give it Bounds. Which is ſo Falſe and Precarious, that if a man ſhould ſay ſo of the Aſſembly of the Eſtates of France, before the time of Lewis the Eleventh, I doubt not but any knowing and intelligent Frenchman would laugh at him for his pains: and I think it may be as eaſily proved, that our Parliament does not challenge to it ſelf any greater Power, either as to raiſing Taxes, and making Laws, than what was exercis'd by their Aſſembly of Eſtates, before that Kingdom became (inſtead of a Limited) an Abſolute Deſpotick Monarchy.

BUT this Author is much more to be blamed for his Cenſure of their Good King St. Lewis, who (he ſays) rather hearken'd to the tenderneſs of his own Conſcience, then his true Intereſt in yielding up ſo many Rich Provinces (which his Grandfather had Conquer'd) to a Rebellious Vaſſal, (viz. our Henry the Third) and that Lewis can never be pardoned in Hiſtory this ſo ill grounded a Scruple; for none of their Kings have found the ſecret of putting France out of danger from the unquietneſs of the Engliſh, as that Prince who expell'd them thence, and made the Sea the Bounds between them and France.

THO I grant this may be a very good Reaſon in Policy, yet I am ſure it can be none in reſpect of Conſcience, and I doubt not but King Lewis was then very well convinced, that his Grandfather Philip's Title to Normandy, and thoſe other Provinces he had wrongfully taken from King John, was grounded upon no better Right than that of the Sword; for as to the pretended Forfeiture of them by that Prince's non-appearance at the Court of Peers at Paris, to anſwer for the Murther of his Nephew Duke Arthur, I have ſhewn in the enſuing Hiſtory, that neither that King nor his Court of Peers had then any Right to paſs ſo ſevere a Sentence.

BUT it is well this Author publiſhed his Hiſtory before his own ſo much admired King's late Peace with the Confederate Princes, by the Reſtitution of ſo many large and rich Provinces: for if ever this Father is put upon writing his Hiſtory, he will do well to inquire, whether his Maſter's Con- ſcience was not well inform'd when he reſtor'd them to their juſt and antient Owners; for ſure it muſt not be ſuppos'd that ſo great a Monarch, who took upon him to give Peace to Europe, ſhould act any thing from ſuch mean motives as Fear or Conſtraint.

YET I ſhall eaſily pardon our Author this ſlip, ſince it may be ſo well turn'd upon himſelf, and it muſt be confeſſed, that in all the parts of this Hiſtory, he ſhews himſelf ſo true a Frenchman, that he never fails upon all occaſions to extol the Valour, Juſtice and Conduct of the Kings of France, as well as of the People, above thoſe of England; and therefore I ſhall leave it to the conſideration of the impartial Reader, whether he truly obſerves thoſe Rules he has laid down in his Preface, as eſſential to a juſt Hiſtorian; not to favour nor vilify one Nation or Party, only to flatter and oblige another.

TO conclude; Tho I will not diſſuade any one from reading this Hiſtory, as if it were time caſt away, yet I hope I may venture to adviſe him, not to truſt this Writer further than he is ſupported by good Authorities. And ſince he never cites any at all, I think I have given ſufficient Inſtances to prove that he is not to be truſted farther, than what he writes is confirmed by thoſe Authors from whom he borrows his Collections, or at leaſt by ſome of our beſt Engliſh Chronicles that faithfully extract from them; otherwiſe you will never be able to diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood in his Relations; of which I ſhall ſay no more at preſent, (tho perhaps I may hereafter); for being come to the end of this Period, with which I conclude the enſuing Hiſtory, I will not follow him farther, but reſerve what I have to remark upon the ſucceeding Reigns to another Volume, if I find ſufficient Encouragement to proceed in this Undertaking.

THE INTRODUCTION.

HAVING in the Introduction to my first Volume of the General History of England, laid down a large and true Scheme of the English Saxon Government, as it stood before the coming in of the Normans; and being now to commence a new Period of Time, and a Succession of Princes of another Race and Nation, I shall here pursue the like Method as before, and shew how far the same sort of Government was continued during the Reigns of these eight Kings, which I have here undertaken to write, except in such particulars as I shall in their due place take notice of.

THIS may perhaps seem unnecessary to some, upon a supposition that we are not to look beyond the pretended Conquest of King William the First, since (as they say) by his subduing of Harold and the whole English Nation at the Battel of Hastings, he thereby put an end to the old Saxon Government and Laws; so that no man at this day can claim any Right to their Liberties or any kind of Property, but what must be own'd as wholly derived from the Laws, Concessions and Charters, that have been from time to time granted by Him and the succeeding Kings of this Realm.

BUT I must beg these Gentlemens pardon, if I cannot rest satisfied with their Suppositions, since they being greater Friends to the Arbitrary Power of Kings, than to the Laws and Liberties of their Country, lay down this Hypothesis of a Conquest, thereby to confer on the Prince an absolute Power to break all our Laws, and seize upon our Liberties and Properties at his pleasure, and thereby reduce this Kingdom to the same miserable State of Slavery with some of our Neighbouring Nations; upon the aforesaid pretence, That all the Liberties and Privileges we now enjoy, being at first derived from the Concessions of former Kings (and those in great part wrested from them by Force) their Successors may, whenever they shall think it conducing to the greater safety of the Kingdom, (of which they are to be the sole Judges) reassume them, and thereby make themselves absolute Masters of the Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes of their Subjects, as they suppose their Conqueror and his Son William Rufus to have been during their Times. Nor may any body question or resist such Princes if they shall think fit so to do, since they have by this supposed Conquest of their Predecessors, an Absolute and Indefeasible Right to the Crown of England, paramount to all Laws, Compacts, and Coronation-Oaths, the Interpretation of which must lie wholly in their Breasts, as being responsible to none but God, if they either wrest, or wilfully break and transgress them.

BEFORE I come to answer directly the foregoing Pretences, I would here ask those Gentlemen, What Advantage can accrue to a King by maintaining ſuch Opinions as reſolve his Right to the Crown into mere Force and Conqueſt; ſince then it may be as natural for the People likewiſe to inquire, Whether it be not lawful for them to repel Force with Force, and thereby to defend their Liberties and Properties (which from all times immemorial have belonged to them) whenever they find them invaded, or are like to be deprived of them, under the falſe Notion of an unbounded Prerogative.

AND when thoſe Bonds and Obligations of Oaths and Laws ſhall be once broken and diſannulled on the Prince's part, I doubt it will be a hard matter to perſuade the Subjects, that the Oaths they have taken to him, and the Laws that are made for his Advantage, muſt ſtill bind and continue in full force againſt them, notwithſtanding all the Breaches and Exorbitances committed by him. I ſhall not determine who is in the Right in this Diſpute, but it is moſt likely that this Doctrine is the ready way to make the People always to ſtand upon their Guard againſt their Prince; and whenſoever it comes to a Civil War, it has been found by too dear bought an Experience, that it has ſeldom ended to his Advantage, but rather to his Ruin; nor have we found thoſe ſo much cried up Doctrines of Paſſive-Obedience and Non-Reſiſtance, to have had that general Effect, even upon thoſe who pretended moſt to maintain them, of which I could give ſufficient Modern Inſtances were there occaſion.

NOW if any ſhall doubt, whether this Hypotheſis of their reſolving the King's Power and Prerogative into a Right by Conqueſt, have any juſt grounds, I deſire they would conſult not only the late Writings of Dr. Brady, Dr. Johnſton, and others, but thoſe that were written in defence of the Cauſe of King Charles the Firſt, againſt the long Parliament, by Dr. Fern and Mr. Dudley Digs: in both which latter it is laid down and maintained, "That the King's Power is ſuperi-
" our to all Others on the account of the Abſolute Conqueſt of Eng- " land, made by King William I. whereby he acquired to Himſelf
" and his Succeſſors an Abſolute Dominion over all men's Perſons and " Eſtates, which was not to be queſtion'd or limited any farther than
" he ſhould think good.

AND to the ſame End and Deſign ſeveral of Sir Robert Filmer's Treatiſes were written and publiſh'd in thoſe times, as well as after in our own, by Perſons in love with ſuch Arbitrary Principles, tho they tended to the betraying and giving up of the Laws and Liberties of the Nation.

BUT ſince I do not take upon me to write as a Caſuiſtical Divine, I ſhall not much meddle with any Arguments that appertain to that Faculty, but confine my ſelf to what may be ſaid upon this Subject either from the Law of Nature or right Reaſon, or elſe as an Hiſtorian or an Antiquary, whoſe Buſineſs it is to look into the truth of matters of Fact, and the Original of Cuſtoms and Laws; in order to which I ſhall divide what I intend to ſay againſt this ſuppoſed Conqueſt of King William I. and that Abſolute Deſpotick Power pretended to be from thence derived to him and his Succeſſors, into theſe three Heads.

FIRST, I ſhall examine the Right on which the Gentlemen of this Opinion found this Title by Conqueſt.

SECONDLY,

SECONDLY, I ſhall look into the matters of Fact, and from thence obſerve how far King William by his Actions and Dealings with the Engliſh Saxon Nobility and People, either actually did, or intended to claim and exerciſe an abſolute Dominion over the Lives and Liberties of all his Subjects.

AND Thirdly, I ſhall anſwer the chief Arguments and Objections that are or may be urged by Dr. Brady, and others, in maintenance of this Opinion.

BUT before I proceed further, I deſire the Reader to take notice, that it is not my Intention, neither will the narrow limits of this Introduction permit me, to treat of the Rights of Princes to ſuch Kingdoms or Territories as they have gain'd by Right of War or Conqueſt, as it is now commonly called; or what Power ſuch Princes may, by the Law of Nature and Nations, exerciſe over the Perſons of a vanquiſh'd Nation or People: but I ſhall refer thoſe who are deſirous to inquire into the determinations of theſe Queſtions, to the learned Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis, and the ſagacious Author of the late two Treatiſes concerning Government; in the * former of which he will find, that the Victors or Conquerors in an unjuſt War acquire nothing, but are bound to make Reſtitution of all they have thus unjuſtly ſeized upon, or taken away from the conquer'd and ſubdued Prince or People.

* L. 3. c. 10. ſ. 3, 4, 5.

BUT tho it is not my Buſineſs here to determine how far an Unjuſt War may give the conquering Prince or State a Right to detain the Dominions ſo unjuſtly acquired; or how far the Vanquiſh'd Prince or State are obliged to ſit down contented with their Loſſes, without endeavouring to be reſtored; or how long their Right ſhall laſt and continue to them and their Poſterity; or what ſhall be allowed to be ſuch a perfect Conqueſt or Acquiſition, as that the Subjects ſhall have no longer any Right to reſiſt or endeavour to eſtabliſh the former Prince or his Poſterity, ſuppoſing they have ſufficient Protection and Security under the preſent Poſſeſſor; yet thus much I think I may ſafely affirm, (ſince Grotius himſelf admits this Diſtinction) that whatever Rights abſolute Princes or Commonwealths by Conqueſt, may claim over each others Subjects and Dominions, where a Prince poſſeſſes one ſhare in the Government or Legiſlature, and the Clergy, Nobility, and People, have a Right of granting Taxes, and of joining in the making and enacting of Laws; in caſe ſuch a King ſhall enter into a War with any Neighbouring Kingdom or Commonwealth, without the Conſent of his Great Council, or Eſtates, who repreſent the whole Body of the People, tho he himſelf may be vanquiſh'd in that War, and be outed of his Dominion; yet do not the People thereby loſe their Right to thoſe Liberties and Properties which they before had and enjoyed; ſince thoſe were not derived from the Prince at firſt, nor have the People done any thing againſt the Conqueror whereby to forfeit their Right to them.

L. 3. c. 8. ſ. 1. & in Annot.

AS for Inſtance, in the Second Dutch War, in the Reign of King Charles the Second, which he began with the States of Holland without any juſt Provocation, and before he had taken the Advice, Approbation or Aſſiſtance of the Parliament, that was then in being; let us ſuppoſe that the State's Fleet had not only beaten us at Sea, but landing upon England and totally routing the King's Forces, had either expell'd or kill'd him: I think no reaſonable man will affirm, that this

Conqueſt had given the Dutch an abſolute indefeiſable Right over the Lives, Liberties and Fortunes of the Engliſh Nation.

I HAVE given this Inſtance, becauſe it will very much influence and govern this Caſe of the pretended Conqueſt of England by William Duke of Normandy, in his conquering Harold and his Army, at the Battel abovemention'd: Therefore I ſhall now come to the firſt Queſtion propoſed, and conſider how far the Duke could claim any Right by Conqueſt to this Kingdom; in order to which, it will be requiſite to ſtate the Caſe, and to give a ſhort Account of his Pretentions, as I have laid them down in the former Volume of my Hiſtory.

KING Edward called the Confeſſor dying without Iſſue, there were no leſs than three Competitors that laid claim to the Crown; the Firſt was Edgar Atheling, as next Heir by Blood, being Grandſon to King Edmund ſirnamed Ironſide, by his Son Edward, called the Out-Law, and Great Nephew by the Half Blood to the Confeſſor; but this Prince being under age when his Uncle died, there was no great Account then made either of Him, or his Title.

THE Second was William Duke of Normandy, as being Edward's neareſt Kinſman by Queen Emma his Mother, Siſter to Richard the Second, Duke of Normandy, Grandfather to Duke William; and from this match between King Ethelred and this Lady, Henry of Huntingdon ſays, the Normans claim'd, and obtain'd the Crown of England according to the Law of Nations. Yet this Title, if examined, could ſignify nothing, for Edgar Atheling was more nearly related to the Crown of England, than He by the Male ſide; whereas Duke William's Relation being only by the Mother's ſide, he could lay no claim to it by Right of Blood; ſo that the Duke's beſt Title was a Teſtament or Will, (ſaid to be made by King Edward long before his Death, by which he conſtituted him his Heir) and the Election of the Great Council of the Kingdom in perſuance thereof.

THE Third was Harold, Son to Earl Godwin, being after his Father's death highly in the King's Favour, and alſo a Man very powerful, popular and valiant; and his Siſter Edithe being married to King Edward, it is very probable that by her Perſuaſions, as well as his own Inclinations, he might upon his Death-Bed bequeath the Kingdom to him; by virtue of which, and his being alſo elected by the Clergy and Nobility, and then ſolemnly Crown'd, he had for the preſent the ſtrongeſt Title, viz. poſſeſſion of the Throne.

YOU may alſo read in the former Volume, the Story of Earl Harold's going into Normandy, his being there kindly received by Duke William; and how the Earl promiſed him to marry his Daughter, and ſecure the Kingdom for him, when-ever King Edward ſhould deceaſe; and that upon Harold's taking it to himſelf, Duke William thought he had a good Title to the Crown by King Edward's Will or Deſignation, or at leaſt a much better than Harold, who was no way related to it. And you may add to this, that the Duke had alſo a juſt perſonal Quarrel againſt Harold, for breach of his Oath, who, inſtead of ſecuring the Crown for the Duke, had put it upon his own Head.

WHEREFORE Duke William appeal'd to the Pope, and having received his Approbation, rais'd an Army, came over into England, fought Harold and kill'd him, with the total rout of his whole Army; and ſo was ſhortly after Elected and Crowned King. This being the caſe, it is plain, that the Duke could have no juſt cauſe of War againſt any Body but Harold, and his Adherents, ſince they only had injured him: As for the Engliſh Nation, or People, admitting they did elect Harold King, yet could not the Duke have any juſt cauſe of War againſt them on that Account; ſince it does not appear that they were ever made acquainted with his Title to the Crown, much leſs of Harold's ſecret Agreement to ſecure it for him, after King Edward's deceaſe; and therefore had King Edward on his Death-bed appointed Edgar Atheling to ſucceed him, and the Great Council of the Kingdom actually made him King, (as they ought to have done) I cannot ſee how Duke William (notwithſtanding any former Will and Deſignation of King Edward) could have had any juſt cauſe of making War upon England, ſince he could have no Right to the Crown by Inheritance; and as for the Will or Deſignation of the late King, the Law of Nations, as well as the Civil Law, declares, that it may be alter'd and revoked at any time during the Life of the Teſtator.

SO that, I ſay, this being the caſe, it is evident that Duke William could obtain no Right to England, and conſequently to the People's Allegiance, but by the abovemention'd Teſtament or Deſignation, confirm'd and ratified by the People's Election, and his ſubſequent Coronation: for (as I have already proved) theſe were the ſolemn and eſſential Forms of making a King according to the antient Engliſh Saxon Conſtitution: ſo that the Duke by his Victory only conquering Harold and his Adherents, (who were very far from being the whole Body of the Nation,) it was They, and They alone, that could juſtly forfeit any thing by this Conqueſt. For we do not find that he ever conſulted the People of England in any Wittena-Gemot, or publick Council, or ſo much as deſired their Approbation and Aſſiſtance to carry on the War againſt the Norman Duke, and therefore (according to the Diſtinction already laid down) Harold, not having the ſole and entire Power or Dominion over the Kingdom of England in his own Perſon, as an abſolute Monarch, could not loſe or forfeit any thing but what belonged to himſelf; and that therefore the Duke upon his Victory, could obtain no Right by Conqueſt over the whole Nation or People, ſo as to ſeize their Eſtates, and annul their Liberties; for the greater part of them immediately after his Victory coming in, and being received by him upon Terms of Pardon and Protection, he thereby renounced all Right of Conqueſt; as appears by this Paſſage in Florence of Worceſter, where he relates that Archbiſhop Aldred, with Edgar Atheling and the two Earls Edwin and Morchar, with moſt of the chief Citizens of London, waiting upon Duke William at Barkhamſted, ſubmitted themſelves and ſwore Fealty to him; and that upon their delivery of Hoſtages, he made a League or Covenant with them, (for ſo I underſtand thoſe words fœdus pepigit, made uſe of by our Author, to ſignify;) and granted or agreed, that they ſhould be no longer treated like Enemies, but as Friends and Subjects: and if ſo, he was no more a Conqueror but their lawful Prince. And I conceive this is a far more natural Interpretation of the ſenſe of theſe words, than what the * Doctor will have them to ſignify, viz. no more than, that he made a Truce with them.

* Anſw. to Arg. Antinorman.

BUT what more certainly fixes this matter, and muſt, I think, for ever bar not only King William, but all his Succeſſors under his Title, Title, from any Claim by Conqueſt, is, That at his Coronation he took the ſame Oath as Edward the Confeſſor, and the former Engliſh Saxon Kings had done before him; the ſubſtance of which was, That he would defend the Church, with its Governours or Rulers; and juſtly and with Royal Prudence govern the People ſubject to him; and make and obſerve juſt Laws; and prohibit Rapines and unjuſt Judgments.

TO which William of Malmesbury alſo adds, quod æquo Jure Anglos & Francos tractaret, that he would treat both the French and Engliſh with equal Right or Juſtice. And farther, (ſays our Author) ſo long as he obſerved that Temper towards his Subjects, Aldred Archbiſhop of York (who put the Crown upon his Head, and adminiſtred that Oath to him) loved him as his Son, and honoured him as his King; but when this Archbiſhop afterwards ſaw he broke it, and impoſed an inſupportable Tax upon his Subjects, he curſed him; which I only mention here, becauſe I have related it more at large in the following Hiſtory. De Geſt. Pontif. p. 154.

BUT I cannot here omit * Dr. Brady's trifling Objections againſt the validity of the abovementioned Coronation-Oath; as firſt, That neither William Pictavienſis, Ordericus Vitalis, Henry Huntington, nor Matthew Paris, make mention of any ſuch Oath taken by him at his Coronation; and yet at the ſame time the Doctor owns it to be related by Simeon of Durham, and Roger Hoveden, who here tranſcribes it from him; but yet he leaves out the Teſtimony of Florence of Worceſter, who wrote firſt, and relates this Oath in the ſame Terms as Simeon alſo gives it us, who was an Author cotemporary with the former. But why the Doctor in his Hiſtory omits the Teſtimony of Florence, and William of Malmesbury above-cited, tho of better Authority than thoſe he has made uſe of, as writing their Hiſtories before either of them, I know not; only I think I may ſafely affirm, that he cannot pretend Ignorance or Forgetfulneſs of thoſe Paſſages; for that he muſt needs have read them both in Florence, and William of Malmeſbury, appears, by his there citing divers things from the former; and that this very place of Malmesbury lay before him, when he wrote this Reign of King William the Firſt, is plain, becauſe in the very next Leaf but one, * the Doctor repeats the ſame Paſſage concerning Archbiſhop Aldred's curſing King William; which manifeſtly ſhews, that he wilfully conceal'd theſe words of the Oath immediately precedent, viz. Quod ſe modeſtè erga ſubditos ageret, & æquo Jure Anglos quo Francos tractaret: which is a full Evidence that by this Oath he was no more a Conqueror over the one than the other; and the Doctor is the leſs to be excuſed for this wilful Omiſſion, becauſe he ſo ſeverely charges thoſe he writes againſt with the like unfair dealing. Complete Hiſtory, p. 190. * Pag. 193.

BUT as for the Doctor's laſt Evaſion, whereby he would excuſe King William from Perjury, in dealing with the Engliſh as a Conqueror, becauſe (forſooth) there is not one word mentioned of King Edward's Laws in the Coronation-Oath, this ſeems very frivolous and trifling; as if there had been any neceſſity for the inſerting that Clauſe there, before it was certainly known whither he would break them or not; but when it was found he did, then Abbot Frederic taking up Arms againſt him, made him, ſome few years after, ſwear upon the Relicts of St. Alban, faithfully to obſerve thoſe Laws. And as to what the Doctor adds, that the Oath he took was the ſame with that when he was inſtall'd Mat. Paris, in vit. Abbat. St. Alban. p. 48.

ſtall'd Duke of Normandy, * the place he cites for it will not prove it; the Oath there mention'd being ſet down without any Date when it was made, and not being word for word with that uſed in England, it ſeems more likely to be borrowed from This, than Ours from That.

BUT admitting it had been as the Doctor ſuppoſes; What good will this do him, unleſs he could prove that the Duke was an abſolute Sovereign in Normandy, before he came over hither, and might break their Laws, and take away their Liberties at his Pleaſure? The direct contrary to which was true, as farther appears in the next page to that above cited, (viz. p. 1051. of the ſame Volume,) where the Duke of Normandy at his Entrance into Roüen, is among other things to ſwear, That he will guard and defend the Church and its Miniſters, with the Nobles and People of his Dutchy of Normandy, in their Rights and Privileges, Liberties, and Franchiſes.

NOW that a Prince who has ſworn to govern his People juſtly, to eſtabliſh good Laws, and to prohibit Rapines and unjuſt Judgments, and alſo to treat the Engliſh and French Subjects by equal Law or Right, can afterwards have any Right to claim as a Conqueror; and, contrary to that Oath, take away all their Laws, and the Engliſh-men's Eſtates, and give them to Frenchmen, for no other Crime but becauſe they were Engliſh: whither, I ſay, he could do all this, and not be guilty of Perjury, I leave it to the Judgment of the unprejudiced Reader to determine.

THIS may be, I think, ſufficient to ſhew the Doctor's Partiality as an Hiſtorian, whoſe Duty it is not only to write nothing but Truth, but alſo to conceal nothing that is fit to be known. Tho indeed (to give the Doctor his due) when he cannot evade the matter of Fact, that King William took the Coronation-Oath, the ſubſtance of which is abovemention'd, it being urged ſo home by the Ingenious Author of Argumentum Antinormannicum, that he cannot conceal nor deny it; he has, in his Anſwer to that Treatiſe, no way left to excuſe his Conqueror's Perjury, but by downright confeſſing it; and which (ſays he) † "May receive this eaſy Anſwer, from an Engliſh Proverb, that "there is never an Oath but is either broken or kept; and ſo his Adverſarie's "Proof from the Conqueror's taking an Oath ſignifies nothing, unleſs he can alſo prove that he kept it. More Conquerors than one "have uſed fair Pretences, and made ſmooth Promiſes, and dealt cunningly with the People to carry on their Deſigns, and have at firſt "taken plauſible Oaths, and broken them afterwards; nay took them "when they intended not to keep them, and knew they could not: "And for Oath-breaking, Harold in his Anſwer to him, (viz. Duke "William,) when he demanded the Kingdom, had given him an Example, that ‖ Stultum Sacramentum eſt frangendum, a fooliſh Oath "is to be broken; and that is (ſays he) the reaſon that this Author, "viz. his Antagoniſt, omitted theſe words in the Anſwer of Harold "to Duke William, leſt it ſhould have defeated the Force and Conſequences of the Duke's Oath, which he made uſe of in favour of "his Aſſertion.

† Anſwer to Arg. Antinorman. p. 241.

‖ This is part of Harold's Anſwer to Duke William, as it is related by William of Malmesbury.

"MANY ſpecious Oaths, Proteſtations, Vows, and Covenants "were contrived and taken by Crafty and Deſigning men, in the "times before mentioned, and impoſed upon the People contrary "to the Oaths of Allegiance they had before taken, for no other "ends

" ends than to cheat them into Rebellion, and make them the Authors " of their own Slavery; which was diſcovered too late, and when " they were under the power of an Army, and could not help them- " ſelves.

WHICH Paragraphs I have here tranſcribed verbatim, that ſo the Reader may ſee how miſerably the Doctor is put to it, when he finds he has no way to evade the Breach of a juſt, lawful, and ſpontaneous Oath, but by this mean ſhift, that many Conquerors have broke their's, and that (as it ſeems) without any blame, provided they did not intend to keep them. And now I leave the Doctor himſelf in cold Blood to judg, whither this might not be as good an Excuſe for a certain modern Prince's breaking his Coronation-Oath to protect and defend the Church of England, and obſerve the Laws of the Nation, as any Jeſuit about him could furniſh him with; nor can I ſee in the preſent caſe of King William, how Harold's Anſwer of Stultum Sacramentum eſt frangendum, could take off the Force and Obligation of King William's Oath to his People, ſince it was not his after-Breach of it, but the Obligation he lay under by it, that was, and is the main Subject of the Diſpute between the Doctor and thoſe of the contrary Opinion: for If the Non-obſervance of a Coronation-Oath may give Princes a Right of Conqueſt, I cannot ſee what Nation (where ſuch an Oath is taken) can be ſecure from their Prince's ſetting up for a Conqueror, whenever he has Power, or thinks he may ſafely put it in Practice.

BUT the Doctor has no way left to amuſe the Reader, and extenuate the Perjury of his Conqueror, but by falling into a long and impertinent Digreſſion (which takes up no leſs than eight Pages) in ſetting forth the Falſhood and the Perjuries of Oliver Cromwel, the Scotiſh Covenanters, and the long Parliament's Ordinances and Declarations, only to make out this wonderful Myſtery, That deſigning men will often Promiſe, Proteſt, Vow, and Covenant, and all falſly, that ſo they may cheat the People into Rebellions, and at laſt make them Slaves to their own arbitrary Power and Dominion: all which being nothing at all to the purpoſe, I ſhall not trouble my ſelf to tranſcribe, ſince I need make no other Anſwer to it, than that I do not ſee how the Perjury of Cromwel, and the Long-Parliament, can be any Excuſe for the like Proceedings of King William the Firſt, above ſix hundred years before, or of any after him: for either the Actions he inſtances in were lawful, or they were not; if the former, then the ſame pretences will juſtify Cromwel and the Rump, as well as his Conqueror; but if the latter, to what Purpoſe does he make uſe of this Argument, unleſs he can prove, that Monarchs have a Diſpenſation to break their Oaths, which Subjects have not? This indeed would prove very comfortable Doctrine to a Friend of his, but I hope to no body elſe.

THE Doctor, after this long Digreſſion above mention'd, returns to King William's Coronation-Oath, and to leſſen the validity of it, he urges firſt, " That neither Gulielmus Pictavienſis, Eadmerus, Ordericus Vitalis, Henry Huntingdon, nor Matthew Paris, do write of any " Oath taken by him: Florence of Worceſter is the firſt (ſays he) who " mentions it, and Simeon of Durham, and Roger Hoveden tranſcribed " it from him. Then the Doctor ſets down the Account given of the Ib. p. 250.

" Oath, Se velle Sanctas Dei Eccleſias, &c. Which ſince I have already given you in Engliſh, I need not here repeat.

BUT in anſwer to this, he tells us, The Oath was conceived in general words, and ſuch as were of a great latitude, and he might by the power and help of his Sword expound, or interpret them in almoſt what ſenſe he pleaſed, and make them far more eaſily correſpond with his Actions, than if it had conſiſted of many ſtrict particulars.

BUT the Doctor's Objections, both againſt the reality of this Oath, and againſt its Obligation (in the ſenſe in which the words ought naturally to be taken) may be eaſily anſwered. As to the firſt, That no antient Author but Florence mentions it: this, if true, is but a negative Argument, and proves little, ſince the Oath might be taken, and yet none of thoſe Authors he mentions, thought fit to record it; and as for Eadmerus, and Ordericus Vitalis, they being Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, their chief buſineſs was to relate Church-Matters, and Civil-Affairs only by the by: and one main end of the Coronation of Princes being to oblige them by an Oath to govern juſtly, it was look'd upon as a matter of Courſe, and which was ſo generally known that it might be thought unneceſſary by ſome of our Hiſtorians to record it: but Florence was an Author too diligent and near thoſe times, to be deceived, or impoſed upon in a matter of that Moment; and lived long before the three laſt Authors mention'd by the Doctor. And the ſame I may ſay of Simeon, who, tho he often copied Florence, yet lived at the ſame Time; nor would ſo judicious an Author as Hoveden have tranſcribed from one of thoſe, what he had not lookt upon as an undoubted Truth.

AS for the Doctor's next Objection, The general Terms in which this Oath was adminiſtred, and which his Conqueror might, by the power and help of his Sword, interpret in what ſenſe he pleaſed, &c. It is well the Doctor has added the power of the Sword, which I grant is a notable Interpreter, not only of Laws, but Scripture too in ſome Countries; and we ſee thoſe Princes that exerciſe it to the heighth, have in our Times expounded their own Leagues, confirmed by ſolemn Oaths, in what ſenſe they pleaſed: and I could bring Inſtances of the like in Coronation Oaths too; and that in our own or Father's Memories; but I ſuppoſe this will not give ſuch Princes a Right to perjure themſelves, or make them Conquerors by their ſo doing.

THEREFORE I think I may ſtill affirm, that King William was as much bound by this Oath to obſerve the antient Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, as were the Engliſh Saxon Kings his Predeceſſors; the Oath above mention'd being no more, but the ſame that was taken by them, tho in other words, as any body may ſee, that will compare the ſubſtance of that King's Oath with the form ſuppoſed to be taken by King Ethelred and his Son Edward the Confeſſor, which is cited by Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour, and which I my ſelf have tranſcribed from a very antient Manuſcript in the Cottonian-Library, and is inſerted in the Introduction to my former Volume. So that if the Engliſh Saxon Kings were thereby bound to preſerve and defend the Liberties of the Church, ſo was King William; if they were bound to govern all their Subjects juſtly, ſo was he; and if they were bound by their Oath to prohibit all Ra-pines and Injuſtice in all ſorts of men, ſo was he: were they obliged to preſcribe Equity and Juſtice in all their Judgments? ſo was he. And if all this be true, I deſire to know (granting the matters of Fact, as the Doctor will have them) what Right King William had to alter the antient Laws of the Kingdom, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, by his own ſingle Authority; or how it could any ways conſiſt with the genuine and literal ſenſe of this Oath, to take away the Lives, Liberties and Eſtates of his Engliſh Subjects for no fault at all, but becauſe they were Engliſh? Nothing but the Doctor's great Interpreter, the Sword, can cut this Gordian Knot; which Inſtrument, tho I am ſenſible it too often ties up men's Tongues and Pens from either ſpeaking or writing Truth; yet I am ſure can never alter the nature of things, and make Right and Wrong, Juſtice and Injuſtice, to be all one.

BUT to proceed; The Doctor confeſſes that his Author (viz. the Gentleman he writes againſt) hath added one extraordinary neceſſary Article at that time, from William of Malmesbury, which is, Quod æquo Jure Anglos quo Francos tractaret: and the Doctor has no way to take off the force of this Authority, but by confeſſing it; yet thinks he wholly deſtroys it, by ſhewing from the ſame Author, that when Archbiſhop Aldred, who crown'd King William, and adminiſtred the Coronation Oath to him, heard how ſeverely he uſed the Engliſh (in laying a great Tax upon them) he curſed him and his Progeny for it. This Paſſage being omitted by his Adverſary, the Doctor thereupon triumphs, as if it had been done on purpoſe, becauſe (as he thinks) it would have deſtroyed the whole Argument from King William's Coronation-Oath, as being a pregnant Teſtimony he never kept it: whereby the Doctor runs into the ſame Error as before, in making the Obligation of the Oath to conſiſt in the Taker's keeping, or not keeping it; which is not the matter in Diſpute, but whither he did not ſtand oblig'd to keep it, and was barr'd by it from ever claiming as a Conqueror?

BUT his Antagoniſt having taken upon him demonſtratively to evidence, that it was not ſo much Conqueſt, or the Sword, that King William firſt relied upon when he was ſettled in his Throne, as his Claim to the Crown of England, Jure Hereditario, by Right of Inheritance, and proves this from ſome of his own Charters, as well as from others of his two Sons, William Rufus and Henry the Firſt. But the Doctor thinks to evade this Argument by confeſſing and avoiding it (as we ſay in a Law-plea) and affirms, "That this Hereditary Right was "only the Donation of Edward the Confeſſor, as Mr. Selden explains it, "who thereby admits and approves it as a Lawful Title: yet that by this the Conqueror was no more than an Epiſtolary or Teſtamentary Heir by Queen Emma his Aunt. And then the Doctor produces a Clauſe from a Charter of King William (cited by his Adverſary) wherein he calls England, Regnum mihi cum providentia Dei deſtinatum, & Beneficio Cognati mei Glorioſi Regis Edwardi Conceſſum: the Kingdom deſign'd him by the Providence of God, and granted to him by the Beneficence of his Kinſman, the Glorious King Edward; and the Doctor himſelf cites divers other Charters of this King, wherein he calls himſelf Heir, and adoptive Heir to King Edward.

FROM whence (ſays he) it is plain, that whatever his Hereditary Right was, yet whither he relied more upon that than his Sword and

Conqueſt,

Conqueſt, is left to the indifferent Reader to judg by what hath been ſaid, and ſhall be further deliver'd in his inſuing Anſwer, viz. to Argumentum Antinormannicum above mention'd.

BUT the Doctor would have done well to have ſhewn us any Charter or Law of this King, wherein he ſtiled himſelf Conqueror of the Engliſh, or that he ever pretended to claim by the Sword; whereas he himſelf cannot deny but that in all his own, as well as his Son's Charters, which are yet extant at this day, his Title to the Crown is ſet forth quite another way; which, whither he ever waved, and only claimed by the Sword, (as the Doctor here ſuppoſes) ſhall be farther inquired into by and by: for it is not King William's great Severity, or indeed the Cruelty which he ſometimes uſed towards the Engliſh, or his bare and open ſeizing their Eſtates, that can ſhew he acted as a Conqueror, ſince he might inflict this as a juſt Puniſhment upon Rebels and Traytors: as when he deſtroy'd the Inhabitants of Yorkſhire and Northumberland, for killing Earl Robert and Biſhop Walcher, and took away the Eſtates of a great many of the chief Nobility for their actual Rebellion, or (at leaſt) conſpiring againſt him. But I do not find the Doctor to give us any ſufficient proof, that he diſpoſſeſt any of the Engliſh of their Eſtates, only becauſe they were ſuch; but of this I ſhall ſay more hereafter.

THE point of Right being now (I hope) fully ſettled, that King William by his Victory over Harold and his Army, could acquire no juſt Title either to himſelf or his Succeſſors, over the Perſons, Eſtates and Liberties of the Engliſh Nation; I come in the next place to the matter of Fact: and ſince I find the Doctor, and thoſe of his Opinion, divide their Arguments for it into theſe following Heads, I ſhall perſue their Method, and examine each of them in this Order.

1. THE firſt is, That King William, ſome time after his Entrance, took away all the Lands of the Engliſh Nobility and Gentry, and gave them to his Normans and other Foreign Followers; and in ſhort diſtributed almoſt all the Lands of England, then in Lay-hands, to thoſe that had ſerved him in his Conqueſt, according to their Deſerts, and his own Will and Pleaſure.

2. THAT upon this Diſtribution, he introduced a new Military Tenure from Normandy, called Knight's Service, with all its Dependences, of Wardſhip, Marriage, and Relief of the Heir; and this upon all the Lands of England, except ſome ſmall matter that was held by Soccage Tenure, which was but a ſmall part in compariſon of the reſt: all which could not have been done had he not acted like a Conqueror; and that at one time or other he thus diſpoſed of moſt of the Lands of England.

3. THAT not only in this, but in divers other Points he alter'd the old Engliſh Laws, called the Laws of King Edward, and introduced divers others more ſevere and rigorous, and that by his ſole Authority, without the Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom.

4. THAT, as another Badg of this Conqueſt, he drew up and made his firſt Body of Laws in the French or Norman Tongue, and conſtituted Normans to be Judges in his Courts, and ordered all Pleadings there to be in that Language, which continued till the 35*th* year of Edward the Third.

THAT

THAT, as an Abſolute Conqueror over this Kingdom, he at his Death bequeathed it to William Rufus, his Younger Son, paſſing by Robert his Eldeſt, which all Writers agree may be done in Patrimonial Kingdoms that are conquer'd by the Sword, and do not deſcend by Right of Blood, unleſs the Conqueror pleaſe ſo to appoint.

TO begin with the firſt Inſtance in relation to the Lands; In anſwer to this, I think I may poſitively aſſert, that no Perſon, during this King's Reign, was outed of his Eſtate, meerly becauſe he was an Engliſh man, without any other Crime laid to his Charge: not but that it is certain, and very natural to ſuppoſe, that after ſuch a Victory, and before things could be ſettled, there were great Outrages and Oppreſſions committed by the Conqueror's Officers and Soldiers, as likewiſe many falſe Accuſations laid againſt innocent Perſons, for being of Harold's Party, or for being concerned in thoſe other Plots, Conſpiracies, and Rebellions which were frequently raiſed by the Engliſh Nobility during this King's Reign; whereby ſeveral of them poſſibly might be thrown out of their Eſtates, as alſo many Uſurpations made upon other men's Rights, which might be afterwards again recover'd by the true Owners; and this was done not only in the Lands and Poſſeſſions of private Perſons, but in thoſe of Biſhops, Abbots, and other Eccleſiaſticks, over whom that King could pretend no Right by Conqueſt; as appears by thoſe Relations of the Tryals and Recoveries of ſeveral of their Lands and Mannors (which we ſhall mention by and by) when things grew more ſettled, and that the Laws came again into their Old Channel.

AND as for the Poſſeſſions of private Perſons, we have the unqueſtionable Authority of Gulielmus Pictavienſis, who, in his Hiſtory of the beginning of this King's Reign, ſays expreſly concerning his rewarding his Norman and French Followers, Nulli tamen Gallo datum eſt, quod Anglo cuiquam injuſtè fuerit ablatum: "Nothing was given "to any French man, that was unjuſtly taken from any Engliſh man.

AND if Ingulph, Abbot of Croyland, complains of the Violence and Invaſion of the Rights and Lands of his Abbey, by Ivo de Talboys, and which could never be fully recover'd, notwithſtanding all his Complaints; this is to be imputed to the Iniquity of the Times, and the great Power which ſeveral Norman Lords had in ſome Counties.

BUT ſuch Inſtances as theſe are not ſufficient proofs of Conqueſt; for there are few Countries in the World, where Favourites and men in Power, having the King's Ear, and repreſenting men's Perſons and Merits falſly to him, do not ſometimes oppreſs and injure others, and that often without any Redreſs; and thereby make good that old Engliſh ſaying, that Might overcomes Right.

BUT the Doctor being urged with theſe Authorities, in his Anſwer to Argumentum Anti-normannicum * above mention'd, is fain to diſtinguiſh, that the Queſtion is not there fairly put by his Antagoniſt, viz. "Whither Duke William obtain'd the Crown of England by "the Sword, and made an Abſolute Conqueſt of the Nation at his "firſt Entrance; but that it ought to have been thus: Whither, in proceſs of Time, and by degrees, he did not, by Force and Artifice, "make an Abſolute Conqueſt of the Nation. For we are not ſo much "to conſider (ſays he) what he did upon his firſt Invaſion of England, * Pag. 252.

" or ſome ſhort time after, as to take notice of the manner of his Eſta-
" bliſhment and Government when it was wholly under his Power,
" and that by the daily Acceſſion of Normans or other Foreigners,
" and by building very many Caſtles and Forts in all parts of the Na" tion, and placing Gariſons in them, he had ſecured himſelf and thoſe
" that came with him. For (proceeds the Doctor) we ſeldom or never " read of any one, who deſigned to Conquer a Nation or People, who " told them before hand, that he would deprive them of their Eſtates
" or Fortunes, and give them New Laws, or abridg their Antient Li" berties; and eſpecially if he had any pretence of a Title, as Duke
" William then had to England.

" HENCE it is that Gulielmus Pictavienſis, and Ordericus Vitalis, " do ſometimes mention William the Conqueror's ſmooth Behaviour to" wards the Engliſh, and his equal and juſt Dealings with them upon " his firſt entrance into the Kingdom, and for four or five years after" wards. And, to give the Doctor his due, he is ſo fair as to repeat the former of thoſe Author's own words, when he ſays, " That after
" this King's Coronation at London, he ordered many things prudent-
" ly, wiſely, and juſtly, &c. And he adds from the ſame Writer, this remarkable Paſſage above mention'd, Nulli Gallo datum eſt quod Anglo cuiquam injuſte fuerit ablatum: ſo that tho the Doctor allows all this to be true for the firſt Four years of this King's Reign (viz. till the year 1070.) yet he excepts againſt this Author laſt mention'd as an incompetent witneſs, concerning the means King William made uſe of for his Eſtabliſhment; that being for the greateſt part finiſh'd and perfected after the time that Gulielmus Pictavienſis left of writing his Hiſtory, which ended with the year 1070. as appears from the Teſtimony of Ordericus Vitalis.

I SHALL, in anſwer to the Doctor's Inſtances and Objections, make bold to begin with the laſt in the firſt place. As for his Exception againſt the Teſtimony of Gulielmus Pictavienſis, it is not material; for we have no more than one year and half of his writing of this King's Reign, viz. as far as his firſt return out of Normandy into England, the reſt being loſt; which if we could recover, perhaps we might draw from thence ſome other Arguments, that he never intended to ſet up for a Conqueror: tho what we have left of this Author is ſufficient to prove it; ſince if he had intended to Claim by that Title, he ought to have done it at firſt, and not after he had barr'd himſelf from it by ſo many ſolemn Oaths to the contrary.

P. 104, 105. BUT however, the Doctor cannot except againſt William of Malmeſbury's Teſtimony, who all along imputes King William's ſeverity to the Engliſh, not to any Right by the Sword, but to their frequent Plots and Rebellions againſt him. And ſure the Doctor cannot deny, but during the firſt Four years of his Conqueror's Reign, he had brought the whole Kingdom under his Subjection, and that there was no place left but what was in his Power; for as to the Rebellion in the Iſle of Ely, that was not till the Fifth year of his Reign: ſo that one would believe, that if he ever had any Right to claim as a Conqueror, he would then have exerted it; ſince a Conqueror (as far as I can obſerve from all Hiſtorians) is One, who, having no Right to a Kingdom or Country but by the Sword, as ſoon as he is once poſſeſt of it, deals with with the Inhabitants as his Slaves and Vaſſals, and immediately makes himſelf Maſter of their Eſtates and Liberties, without any precedent Oath or Compact; as the Saxons dealt with the Britains.

BUT indeed the Doctor hath found out a nice diſtinction between Duke William's Conqueſt of England, and his Settlement in it; ſo that, it ſeems, according to his pleaſant Notion, a Monarch is never well ſettled in his Throne, till he has made himſelf maſter of the Liberties and Eſtates of his Subjects; and thus the moſt Rightful King, if he had found any Reſiſtance from the People in his obtaining the Crown, might upon this pretence, ſet up for a Conqueror; and notwithſtanding his Coronation-Oath to obſerve and maintain the Laws of the Kingdom, might take away the Eſtates, not only of his Enemies, but of all others; and ſo King Edward the Fourth, upon this Author's Principles, might have ſet up for a Conqueror, as well as William the Firſt.

BUT tho the Doctor does not pretend to aſſert that King William took away all the Engliſh men's Eſtates at once, and made them abſolute Vaſſals during the firſt Four years of his Reign: however he ſtill inſiſts, That whatſoever thoſe Hiſtorians may ſay of him in the beginning of his Reign, yet whoever attends to his Actions, as his drawing his Army about Weſtminſter-Abbey at the time of his Coronation, his building Fortreſſes within the City of London, and placing Norman Gariſons and French Governors in divers Caſtles in the Country, his carrying the chief of the Engliſh Nobility with him as Hoſtages into Normandy, (which was but an Honourable Impriſonment) and his dictating new Laws; cannot but believe he intended to rule as a Conqueror, and by the Sword, from the very beginning. And ſome Pages after, to obviate the Objection of Duke William's Quarrel to Harold, as being rather Perſonal than National, and tho he was victorious over him, yet he was no Abſolute Conqueror, the Doctor here puts ſome Queſtions to his Adverſary, and asks him, why, after Harold was ſlain, he did not then disband his Army? &c. and why he ſo often ſent for freſh Forces out of ſeveral Nations? why he appointed Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, and William fitz Osberne (both great Normans) his Lieu-tenants, to govern the Nation, when he return'd into Normandy, and carried with him all the prime Saxon Nobility within leſs than ſix Months after this Battel of Haſtings?

Arg. Antinorman. p. 237.

Ib. p. 241.

I HAVE already ſhewn from the manner of King Harold's coming to the Crown, that Duke William could have no juſt Quarrel againſt the Engliſh Nation, for crowning his Competitor, and therefore could not upon that account have any Right to take away their Eſtates: But ſince the Doctor has been pleaſed to make uſe of theſe Inſtances, to ſhew his Claim and Intentions to act as a Conqueror, from the very beginning; I ſhall deſire that he would be pleaſed to ſhew us any Seal of this King, wherein he ſtiles himſelf Willielmus Conqueſtor, or any of his Charters wherein he ſets forth his Title by Conqueſt; whereas I can produce ſeveral Charters, wherein he claims as Heir, Jure Hereditario, to King Edward the Confeſſor.

BUT to come to the Doctor's Queries, concerning the matters of Fact in order. To the firſt I anſwer, that there was no reaſon for him to disband his Army ſo long as the Earls Edwin and Morchar continued in Arms againſt him.

TO

TO the Second, that his building Fortreſſes in London, might be very well juſtified without any pretence to Conqueſt; ſince that City had ſo lately ſhewn it ſelf very averſe to give him Entrance, and would alſo have ſet up Edgar Atheling againſt him. And the ſame diſtruſt he could not but have of moſt of the Engliſh Nation; of whom ſo great a number had lately fought with, and near overcome him: and this might very juſtly make him truſt the command of his Gariſons only in the hands of Normans and Frenchmen. The like diſtruſt of the Engliſh Nobility (the greateſt part of whom had been againſt him) might very well juſtify his leaving only Normans, as his Lieu-tenants in his Abſence; as alſo his prevailing with the prime Engliſh-Saxon Nobility to go over with him; for all Princes will ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of what they have once obtain'd by all the wiſe and politick Methods they can. And if King William was then their lawful Prince, he might alſo very well require their Attendance upon him into Normandy, and that without making them Priſoners, as the Doctor will needs have it.

AS for his giving the Normans great Eſtates, that might likewiſe very well be anſwer'd for; ſince perhaps it was done out of the confiſcated Fortunes of ſuch as had fought againſt him at the Battel of Haſtings: all which he might juſtly do, ſuppoſing his Title to be Juſt. As for his ſending for freſh Forces from other Nations, I do not find he did ſo during the firſt Four years of his Reign, to which the Doctor confines this preſent Inquiry; tho if he had done ſo, he might very well have juſtified it, without intending to make an Abſolute Conqueſt of the Kingdom; for ſeveral of his Norman Souldiers left him, and returned home at the beginning of his Reign, and therefore it was neceſſary that he ſhould ſend for freſh Recruits either from Normandy or other Countries.

THESE Anſwers, I hope, may ſerve to prove, that what King William acted in the beginning of his Reign for his own Security, and the common Peace of the Nation, might very well be defended upon thoſe Grounds; without reſolving the Actions into Conqueſt, or abſolute Arbitrary Power. As for his dictating new Laws, I know of none, but ſuch as were made by him with the common Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, as his own Laws themſelves ſet forth.

HAVING thus diſpatched the point of Right, I come to thoſe of Fact, and ſhall now examine the truth of his firſt Aſſertion, "That King William took away all the Lands of the Engliſh Nobility "and Gentry, and gave them to Normans and other Foreigners; and, "in ſhort, diſtributed almoſt all the Lands of England, then in Lay-"hands, to thoſe that had ſerved him in his Conqueſt, according to his "Will and Pleaſure.

IN the firſt place therefore it is allowed on all hands, that King William never took away the Lands of the Biſhops and Abbots of England, much leſs thoſe that belonged to Deans, and Chapters, or to private Churches; and if his Nobles or Followers had unjuſtly diſſeized any Biſhop or Abbot of their Eſtates, we find that upon Complaint, the King cauſed them to be reſtored, as appears by many Precedents of this kind, which are to be found in Ingulphus, and Eadmerus; beſides the old Leiger-Books of the Churches of Rocheſter, Ely, and other Monaſteries.

THIS being premiſed, let us ſee in the next place what proportion the Lands that then belonged to the Church did bear to the reſt of the Lands in England: now you may find in the old Leiger-Book, cited by Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour, and particularly from a Manuſcript Leiger call'd Secretum Abbatis (formerly belonging to the Abbey of Glaſtenbury, and now in the Library of the Univerſity of Oxon) that there were, ſome years after the ſuppoſed Conqueſt, ſixty thouſand two hundred and fifteen Knight's Fees in England, of which the Biſhops, Abbots, and other Churchmen then enjoyed twenty eight thouſand and fifteen. Yet ſince we are not ſure but that this Account might not be taken till above 150 years after the Conqueſt, during which time a great deal of Land might be beſtowed upon the Church by King William and ſeveral other Kings, as alſo by divers Biſhops and Noblemen's founding of ſeveral Religious Houſes endow'd with great Revenues, I will not reckon the Church-Lands of England to have amounted (not long after the ſuppoſed Conqueror's Entrance) to above twenty thouſand Knight's Fees; which nevertheleſs will make near a third part of ſuch Lands, as were then held by Military Tenure, the number of which was about ſixty thouſand Knight's Fees, as Ordericus Vitalis reckons them to have been. Now if King William did not diſpoſſeſs the Biſhops and Abbots, &c. of their Lands, you may ſay the ſame of their Tenants, whoſe Eſtates the King had nothing to do with, and the better ſort, and greater number of theſe then came to hold their Eſtates by Knight's Service, in Fee, or at leaſt for Lives (Leaſes for years being not then in uſe) and many of thoſe Tenants were great and powerful men in their Countries; hence we read in the antient Hiſtories and Leiger-Books of Abbeys and Cathedrals, of the many Barons and Knights that held of the Biſhops and great Abbots, ſeveral Examples of which you will find in Sir Henry Spelman's Gloſſary, Title Baro: as alſo in the Leiger-Books of Ely and Abingdon, of which I ſhall make further uſe by and by.

ALL that I know can be urged to the contrary, is, that many of the Tenants of theſe Biſhops and Abbots, &c. might either take part with Harold at the Battel of Haſtings, or elſe rebell'd afterwards againſt the King, who might ſeize thoſe Lands (as forfeited) for Treaſon; to this it may be anſwer'd, that ſuppoſing it to be ſo, yet they could not be very many, for we read of no Biſhops, and not of above three or four Abbots, who were with King Harold at that Battel; and if they were not there in Perſon, it was not likely that many of their Tenants ſhould, contrary to their Lordſhip's deſires (who moſt of them privately ſided with King William) without any neceſſity, concern themſelves in ſo dangerous a Quarrel.

BUT to counterballance theſe, it is alſo certain, that few of the Tenants in antient Demeſne, and Gavel-kind in Kent, (which in thoſe times made above two thirds of the Lands of that County) were diſpoſſeſt of their Eſtates at the Conqueror's Entrance, ſince they were not in thoſe times forfeitable for Treaſon.

AND to theſe we may alſo add all ſuch Norman Noblemen and Gentlemen, who having ſettled themſelves in England during the Reigns of King Ethelred and his Son Edward, would not ſide with Harold againſt Duke William; and theſe were ſo numerous and conſider-able that we find amongſt the Laws of this King, one particularly inſerted for their enjoying all the Rights and Privileges of Natural Engliſh men; by all which (when reckon'd up together) it will appear, that King William could not diſpoſſeſs ſo much as one Half of the Engliſh Gentry and ordinary People of their Eſtates; ſo that the matter will amount to no more than this, that this King, for ſome years after his firſt Entrance, diſpoſed of no more Lands than what were thought legally forfeited to him by the death or flight of thoſe who were at the Battel of Haſtings, or elſe had rebelled againſt him by ſeizing the Iſle of Ely, or had joined with the Danes in the North, or were concern'd in the Rebellion of Ralph Guader and Roger Bigot: in all which, tho I grant a great many Noblemen and Gentlemen loſt their Eſtates, yet he took them not away upon pretence of Conqueſt, but as a Lawful Prince may deal with thoſe that he ſuppoſes either had conſpired, or elſe had actually rebelled againſt him.

HAVING thus ſtated the matter of Fact, as it really was during this King's Reign, I ſhall now ſay ſomething to the Authorities which Dr. Brady and Others produce, to make good the contrary Aſſertion; and I ſhall begin with that famous Paſſage in the black Book of the Exchequer, ſuppoſed to be written by Gervaſe of Tilbury, about the 23d of Henry the Second, which the Doctor ſo much inſiſts upon, and therefore I ſhall give you a true Tranſlation of it (for the Doctor's is not ſo exact as it ſhould be) leaving the Reader to compare it if he pleaſe with the Latin Original. The Engliſh runs thus:

Cap. 27. "† AFTER the Conqueſt of the Kingdom, and the juſt ſubverſion
" of the Rebels, when the King himſelf and his Great-men had view-* Loca. "ed their new * Acqueſts, there was a ſtrict Enquiry made, who they " were that had fought againſt the King, and ſaved themſelves by † In Bello. "flight; from theſe and the Heirs of ſuch as were ſlain in the † Field,
" all hopes of enjoying either the Lands or the Rents they before poſ-" ſeſs'd were cut off; for they counted it a great Favour to enjoy their " Lives under their Enemies; but ſuch as were called out to fight a-" gainſt King William, and did not, being hindred by their own, or " other Affairs, if in proceſs of time by an humble Submiſſion they " could gain the favour of their Lords, they then had the liberty of " poſſeſſing ſomewhat in their own Perſons, but without any hope of " leaving it in Succeſſion; their Children enjoying it only at the Will of " their Lords; to whom when in after times they became odious, they " were driven from their Eſtates, neither would any reſtore what " they had taken away.

" WHEREUPON, when a general Complaint of the Natives
" came to the King, informing him that being hated by all, and ſpoiled
" of their Fortunes, they muſt be forced to go over to Strangers:
" At length, upon Conſultation about theſe matters, it was order'd
" that what they could obtain of their Lords by their deſerts, or by " way of Bargain, they ſhould hold by an inviolable Right; but they " ſhould not claim any thing from the time the Nation was conquer'd,
" under the Title of Succeſſion, or Deſcent. Upon how great Con-
" ſideration this was done, is manifeſt, (ſays Gervaſe) for they being " obliged for their Intereſt, by Complyance and Obedience to pur-
" chaſe their Lord's favour, therefore whoever of the conquer'd Na" tion

" tion poſſeſs'd Lands, or ſuch like, obtain'd them not as if they " were their Right by Succeſſion, or Inheritance, but as their Merits " acquired, or elſe by ſome intervening Agreement.

FROM whence we may obſerve, that according to this Author, the Engliſh, who thus forfeited their Eſtates, are divided into three Claſſes, or Diviſions. The firſt is of ſuch who had actually fought againſt the King; and as for theſe, both they and their Heirs loſt all their Eſtates. The Second is, of thoſe, who tho they did not fight againſt him, yet the former Propriety and Dominion of their Lands were taken from them, and they were only allowed to enjoy ſome part of their Eſtates, and that only for term of Life. The Third is the Children of theſe, who were turn'd out of their Eſtates at the will of their Lords, and that without any Redreſs, till at laſt they were allowed to enjoy what they could obtain from their Lords by Purchaſe, Favor, or Money; ſo that, according to this Author's Account, by the latter end of the Conqueror's Reign, few or none of the Engliſh were Tenants in Capite, or had any more than ſome ſmall Eſtates left them, which were held of Norman or French Lords.

AND the Teſtimony of this Author is farther confirmed from the Catalogue of all the Tenants names * who held Lands of this King in every County of England when it was ſurveyed, and the whole Nation was then divided between the Conqueror and his Followers, ſo that whoſoever held any Lands, Mannors, or Towns, held them of the Perſons there named, who were all Strangers, except ſome very few Biſhops, Abbots, or Church-men, who had their Lands reſtored to them by the Mediation of Archbiſhop Lanfranc, or elſe ſuch Taini, or Miniſtri, Rural Servants, or other ſmall Officers that had ſerved Edward the Confeſſor, and were afterwards retain'd by the Conqueror.

* Dr. B's Anſw. to Arg. Antinorman. p. 270. and Append. n. 10. from Doomſday-Book.

HAVING thus fairly given you a juſt Tranſlation of the Doctor's two Principal Authorities, and which (if true) ſeem very ſtrange; I ſhall, ſince they are of ſo great weight, make bold to conſider them. In the firſt place, As to this famous Paſſage cited from the Black-book of the Exchequer, I have theſe things to object. Firſt, I find it much doubted by ſome of our Antiquaries, whither this Book was really written by Gervaſe or not, for in a Tranſcript of this Paſſage made by Sir William Dugdale, in a certain Volume of Hiſtorical Collections which is now in the Muſæum at Oxford, over againſt it in the Margin is ſet this note of Sir William Dugdale's own hand-writing, Ex Codice nigro penes Theſaurarium & Camerarios Scaccarii, vulgaritèr Gervaſii Tilburienſis nuncupato, ſed falsè. The like note I alſo found in certain Extracts out of this very Book, made by that Learned Antiquary Sir Simonds D'ews; tho what reaſon they had for this Opinion I cannot tell, yet ſure it was ſufficient to ſatisfy them that it was ſpurious, or elſe they would never have made ſuch a Note upon it. But ſuppoſing I ſhould grant this Treatiſe to have been written by him, who is the reputed Author, yet I can have but very little reſpect to his Authority; for what ever the Doctor may pretend concerning this Author's receiving his Memoirs from Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, younger Brother to King Stephen: However if he were no more careful of what he ſays in this Treatiſe, than of what he has wrote in his Geographical and Hiſtorical Collections, entitled, Otia Imperialia, which he dedicated to the Emperor Otto IV. and is ſtill extant in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library, as alſo in that of Bennet College, in both which there is a ſhort Hiſtorical Account concerning the Kings of England, from Edward the Confeſſor to his own time, no Credit would be given to him; for in that Treatiſe there are ſuch groſs Errors concerning the Hiſtory of thoſe Princes that had flouriſh'd not an Age before his own time, that no man who underſtands any thing of Engliſh Hiſtory, but will conclude him to have been very Ignorant or at leaſt Careleſs of what he wrote concerning the Affairs of his own Country.

And that I have good Warrant for what I ſay, the Reader may find this fragment I now mention, printed in the Third Volume of the
P. 371, 372. old French Hiſtorians, publiſh'd by Andrew Du Cheſne, after certain excerpta out of the ſame Author concerning the Kings of France. And that I may further give the Reader a taſte of this Writer's Ignorance in our Engliſh Hiſtory, as to the Pages above cited, he there ſays that K. William the Firſt, after his being made King, married Harold's Siſter, when as K. William had a Wife of his own then alive; He alſo ſuppoſes William Rufus to have been the Elder Brother, and Duke Robert the Younger; and that Stephen, Earl of Boloigne, was by his Uncle King Henry appointed to be King, during the Minority of his Grandſon Henry, Son to the Earl of Anjou; a Title which no Body ever knew or heard of, before this Author; beſides divers other groſs Miſtakes, of which I have only given theſe for a Taſte, that ſo he may be as little credited as to what he here ſays concerning the Engliſh their being turn'd out of their Eſtates by their Norman Lords: tho as to what relates to thoſe that took part with Harold, I ſuppoſe may be true enough; but I deny that it was ſo with all the reſt, who had never join'd with him, nor had given him any Aſſiſtance: but admitting the whole matter of Fact ſhould be granted to have been as this Author ſuppoſes, yet would not this make King William a Conqueror, ſince he took away the Eſtates of the Engliſh, either becauſe they were Traytors to him, or elſe becauſe they were Engliſh-men. Now if it were for the former cauſe, it might be very well juſtified, it being no more than what all Princes do at this day; but if for the latter, he could not act as a Conqueror, but as an Uſurper of the Rights of his Subjects, and in direct violation of his Coronation-Oath, by which he ſtood obliged to treat both the Engliſh and French with equal Law or Right, as has been already ſaid.

YET it cannot be denied but that he uſed the Engliſh too ſeverely, and ſometimes might take away their Eſtates without any juſt Cauſe.
P. 659. Accordingly Ordericus Vitalis makes this King, (as being touched in Conſcience upon his Death-bed for his Cruelty and Injuſtice) to have begg'd God's pardon (among his other Sins) that he had too much hated the natural-born Subjects of this Kingdom; that he had cruelly oppreſſed both the Nobles and vulgar People; had unjuſtly diſinherited many, and put to Death vaſt multitudes in Yorkſhire by the Sword and by Famine. The truth of which dying Speech, tho I will not take upon me to aſſert, ſince it looks as if it were made out of this Monk's Fancy, yet it gives us a true Idea of what the indifferent men of that Age thought of theſe Actions, as no way juſtifiable by Law or Equity.

BUT as to the Authority of the Doomeſday-Book, I confeſs that would be undeniable, were it as the Doctor cites it: for tho I grant that that at the time of the making of that Survey, the Norman Lords and Gentlemen held a great part of the Lands of England, yet that there were divers very conſiderable men of Engliſh Extraction, who were Owners of conſiderable Eſtates at the time of the making this Survey, appears by that Catalogue the Learned Mr. Atwood has given us of them in his Jus Anglorum ab Antiquo, extracted out of Doomſday Book, and that only in running over fifteen Counties of the Thirty ſurveyed in that Book, moſt of which Perſons by their names, and want of Sirnames, ſeem to have been Engliſh: and They or their Anceſtors held their Eſtates T. R. E. which ſignifies Tempore Regis Edwardi, that is, held the ſame Eſtates in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor. And I doubt not but that there were many more Engliſh Proprietors, who having Sirnames with De put before them, cannot be now diſtinguiſhed from Frenchmen or Normans: as for Example, it appears from the ſame Survey in Surrey, that Hugo de Port was a very great Proprietor, as may be ſeen under the Title Terra Hugonis de Port; many Mannors he had, as appears, in this as well as other Counties; and yet it is certain he was ſettled here before the Conqueſt. Vid. Jus Anglor. per W. A. p. 80.

TO whom I may likewiſe add, from the Authority of Sir William Dugdale in his Deſcription of Warwick-ſhire, Turckil of Warwick, who was ſo called from being Governor of that Caſtle under the Earl: This Man, having never given any Aſſiſtance to Harold, held a great many Mannors in this County immediately of the King, for which I appeal to Doomſday-Book it ſelf; and I could give ſeveral other Inſtances of the like nature, in this as well as other Counties, would the narrowneſs of this Introduction allow me to be more particular. P. 302.

THEREFORE I ſhall take notice but of one more, that is allowed by the Doctor himſelf, and that is of the famous Hereward, who notwithſtanding all his oppoſition of King William in the Iſle of Ely, yet was afterwards reſtored to his Eſtate, which conſiſted of divers Mannors in Lincolnſhire, all which he held till he long after died in Peace, as Ingulphus himſelf informs us: and of this Hereward's Actions, there is at this day a large Hiſtory ſtill extant in Manuſcript in an antient Leiger-Book, which formerly belonged to the Abbey of Peterborow, and is now in the keeping of the Dean and Chapter of that Church, wherein he is called Hereward Le-Wake; and this I take notice of, that the Reader may ſee, how far the Cuſtom of the Norman Sirnames then prevail'd in that Age; ſo that it is difficult to diſtinguiſh by that Mark the Engliſh from the Norman Nobility.

THESE being the moſt conſiderable Authorities alledg'd by Dr. Brady, to prove, that King William took away far the greateſt part of the Engliſhmens Eſtates; his other Quotations are of leſs moment, and may be more eaſily anſwered; as firſt that of Ordericus Vitalis, who relates, that King William having circumvented Edwin and Morchar, the two great Earls of Northumberland and Mercia; after the former was ſlain, and the latter impriſoned, he began to ſhew himſelf, and gave his Aſſiſtants the beſt and moſt conſiderable Counties in England, and made rich Colonels and Captains of very mean Normans: to which the Doctor adds, "That he thus diſpoſed of whole Counties "to divers Great Men, appears by Doomſday-Book, wherein it ſeems "as if the whole County of Cheſter was beſtowed by the Conqueror on "Hugh Lupus a Norman: as that of Yorkſhire was to Alan Earl of " Bretaign, and ſo likewiſe the greateſt part of Shropſhire to Roger de " Montgomery.

" AND that further he took away from the Engliſh their Eſtates, and " gave them to his Normans; even from his firſt Entrance: for Fitz- " Osbern was made Earl of Arundel and Hereford at his firſt coming " in; and being Lord of Bettiville in Normandy, eſtabliſhed the Laws " of that Town at Hereford: the ſame Earl Alan had all Earl Edwin's " Lands given him at the Siege of York, about three years after the " Conqueſt. And the Doctor further mentions the 795 Mannors which " Robert Earl of Moreton held in Normandy and England; and that " Geoffrey Biſhop of Conſtance had 280 Mannors given him by the " Conqueror, beſides many other Lands of the Saxon Earls, Thanes, " &c. which were all given to Normans or French-men, who had no " other Title than King William's conquering Sword.

SO that the Doctor thinks it very evident, that this King had diſtributed moſt of the Lands of the Nation to his Normans long before the Survey was begun; and that by that infallible Record it is clear that he gave near all the Lands of the Nation to his Followers, and very little or none to the Engliſh, who held what they had by a new Title and new Services from the Conqueror or his great Lords, or became Tenants or Drudges upon their own Lands; as we learn from Bracton and Fleta, who expreſly tell us, that divers old Engliſh Proprietors being thrown out of their Eſtates, by powerful men, preſently after the Conqueſt, were fain to take them again upon performing Villane Services, tho they themſelves remain'd Freemen.

HAVING thus fairly repreſented Dr. Brady's Arguments and Authorities, I think they may be eaſily anſwered. In the firſt place, I ſhall not deny the matter of Fact to be in great part true, but not as the Doctor has laid it; for Ordericus does neither ſay, that King William diſpoſed of the Lands of ſeveral whole Counties to the Norman Lords there mention'd; nor yet does he date thoſe large Grants from the time the Doctor ſuppoſes, as you will ſee more at large in the enſuing * Hiſtory. However it will not follow, that becauſe King William beſtowed great Eſtates upon the Norman or French Noblemen above mentioned, he therefore diſpoſſeſſed far the greater part of the Engliſh of their Eſtates, much leſs that therein he always intended to act as a Conqueror. For in the firſt place the Lands here inſtanc'd in, will not amount to a tenth part of thoſe of England; and as for the 795 Mannors, which the Earl of Moreton had in Normandy and England, the Doctor ſhould have told us how many of theſe he held in England, for as to thoſe in Normandy they ſignify nothing to the matter in Diſpute; and it appears by Doomſday-Book in Surrey, Quod ipſe Comes (ſcil. Moretoniæ) tenuit Eſtreham T. R. E. viz. That this Earl held this Mannor of Eſtreham in Tenrige Hundred in the time of King Edward: and tho he had very great Poſſeſſions granted him by King William, yet I believe that if this Book were diligently ſearch'd, we ſhould find that the ſame Earl held alſo other Lands in K. Edward's time. Nor is the Doctor leſs miſtaken when he ſuppoſes, that Hugh Lupus, and Roger de Montgomery, and thoſe other Norman Lords on whom King William is ſaid to have beſtowed whole Counties, had by thoſe Grants a right to quſt all the Engliſh Proprietors, and that they beſtowed thoſe whole Counties among their Norman Vaſſals and Tenants; ſince it is evident by the manner of thoſe great Earldoms falling to the Crown, viz. by the attainder of their Owners, that only they themſelves, and not their under Tenants or Feudataries forfeited their Eſtates: and it appears by the very time of King William's beſtowing them, that he did it not as a Conqueror, but as a lawful Prince, ſince the Lands of Edwin were not diſpoſed of till after his Rebellion at York; and thoſe of Morchar could not be beſtowed, till after his laſt Defection, A. D. 1071. which was in the 5*th* year of this King's Reign. And as for the other great Conſpiracy of the Earls Ralph de Guader, Waltheof, and Roger Bigot, That did not happen till five years after, viz. in the 10*th* year of this King, whoſe Lands being likewiſe forfeited for Treaſon, he might lawfully diſpoſe of them without claiming them by Conqueſt.

AND as Dr. Brady in his Hiſtory ſets forth, it appears that he did not then act as a Conqueror: for when the Doctor, tho falſly, dates this King's diviſion of the Lands of the whole Nation among his Aſſiſtants and Followers from the 5*th* year of his Reign; it plainly appears that he did not do this as a Conqueror; for then he ſhould have taken away the Engliſh men's Eſtates at his firſt entrance. And it is plain by many Paſſages in Doomſday-Book it ſelf, that divers of them are there mention'd to have forfeited their Lands for Treaſon againſt the King; which had been altogether needleſs, had he claim'd a general Right by Conqueſt over the Lands of the whole Engliſh Nation. But indeed the Doctor's main Miſtake lies in ſuppoſing, that when King William ſeem'd to beſtow whole Counties, or the greateſt part of them to his Favorites, that they had preſently all the Lands in theſe Counties to diſpoſe of at their pleaſure, and that they turned out all the old Proprietors. But that it is certain they did not, I could prove to you by ſeveral Inſtances of antient Engliſh Families, who have to this day held their Lands, and enjoyed the ſame Seals they had in the Conqueror's time: So that there is a great deal of difference between the Grant of all the Lands of a whole County, and that of the County: what is meant by the former is plain, but as for the latter, it generally implys nothing elſe than the Government of that County; or at leaſt no more than thoſe Demeſnes and Mannors that were annex'd to that Dignity. P. 197.

THUS whereas the Doctor would have it, that the greateſt part of Shropſhire was given to Roger de Montgomery, yet Doomſday Book only ſays, that He had the City of Shrewsbury, & totum Comitatum: but that is ſoon explain'd by what follows, & totum Dominium, quod Rex ipſe tenebat; where it is plain, that by Dominium is meant no more than that Power to govern it, which King Edward had, for otherwiſe the Grant of totum Comitatum had been ſufficient.

BUT the Reader may take notice, that in this Controverſy I have not made uſe of the famous Inſtance of Edward of Sharnburn, tho inſerted by Sir Henry Spellman in his Gloſſary; and alſo recited by Sir William Dugdale in his Baronage of England, who both give credit to it: For upon the peruſal of the Hiſtory of that Family, I find it to have been of no great Antiquity, and that Sharnburn's name is not to be found in Doomſday Book: and the Owners of Sharnburn are there only William de Warenna, Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, Bernerius Arbaliſtarius, and William de Pertenac, without any mention of William de Albiney, biney, under whom Sharnburn was ſuppoſed to hold. There is likewiſe another Authority made uſe of by the Doctor from William of Malmesbury, and Henry Huntington, who both poſitively affirm, that in their times, viz. in the Reign of Henry I. and King Stephen, there was no Engliſh man, Biſhop, Abbot, or Earl in England, but that Strangers gnawed and devoured its Bowels, that is, enjoyed its chiefeſt Riches and Preferments.

THIS being ſo expreſs a Teſtimony, and that alſo of two ſuch grave Authors of that very Age, I will not go about to deny it; but however it does not prove the Point in queſtion: for tho admitting that at that time when they wrote, there had been no Engliſh man in any Great Office either in Church or State, but the Norman Nobility were then poſſeſt of the chief Honors and beſt Eſtates of the Kingdom; yet this does not prove that there were no Engliſh men of Note, who then poſſeſt Eſtates of any conſiderable value; much leſs that this Alteration proceeded from Conqueſt; ſince William Rufus and Henry the Firſt (who both perſued this Method of Government) ſucceeded to the Crown; the One partly by his Father's Teſtament, and partly by Election of the Biſhops and Nobility; and the Other without any Right at all but that of their Free choice, as I ſhall ſhew further by and by. But that even in the Reign of King William, until the Rebellion of Earl Waltheof, divers Engliſh men continued, or elſe were created Earls, I have already hinted, and may be further ſeen at large in the following Hiſtory: and the Engliſh might have continued longer poſſeſſed of that Honour, had not the Rebellion of the Earls Ralph and Waltheof ſo provoked him againſt the Engliſh, that (as William of Malmesbury relates) he was to be excuſed, if he were more ſevere to them than otherwiſe he would have been, becauſe he ſcarce found one of them faithful to him.

BUT what if the Normans did injoy the chief Dignities and Offices in Church and State? what is this to their poſſeſſing all the Lands of the Kingdom? As ſuppoſe King James the Firſt had made none but Scots men Earls, Barons or Biſhops, and that his Son and Grandſons had taken the ſame courſe; I ſay, would this have taken away the Lands of all the Engliſh Gentry?

BUT the Doctor has alſo urged another notable Authority from Matt. Paris, in his Life of Frederic Abbot of St. Albans, where, after he has related how that Abbot, joyning with Edgar Atheling, and a great Army of Engliſh, had compell'd King William (ſore againſt his will) to ſwear upon the Relicts of St. Alban, that he would for the future obſerve King Edward's Laws; they thereupon being all very well ſatisfied, departed to their own homes. See what follows in the ſame Author.

" THEN the King craftily concealing his Intentions, within a " few days, privily and ſuddenly ſurprized them, when ſingle and " diſperſed, whom being united in a Body he could not overcome; " many he put to death, from others he took their Eſtates, and many " more he baniſhed; violating the Law he had ſworn to obſerve, " taking away their Eſtates at his own pleaſure, without any Judicial " Proceedings, thereby impoveriſhing the natural Engliſh, and en- " riching his Normans: And as for Edgar Atheling, he was forced to " fly into Scotland, and Abbot Frederic into the Iſle of Ely, where he " ſoon after died.

I WILL not much diſpute the truth of this Story, tho it is found in no other Author, and indeed does not well agree with the Time of Edgar Atheling's going into Scotland, whither, according to the Saxon Chronicle, and Florence of Worceſter, he retired in the year 1068. and continued there for four years, and did not return into England till 1072. which was the year after the Surrender of the Iſle of Ely; and ſo conſequently he could not be in England, when himſelf and Abbot Frederic are ſuppoſed to have made this Reſiſtance in the year 1069. nor could the Abbot have taken Refuge in that Iſland at all. Not, I ſay, but that the ſubſtance of the Story may be true for all this; and yet the Monkiſh Writers may too much aggravate this King's Severity towards the Engliſh: But William of Malmesbury is more favourable, who makes him to have dealt gently with his Subjects, and ſharply only with thoſe that had rebelled againſt him.

BUT let the Doctor make the beſt of this Authority of Matthew Paris, and ſay that this King diſpoſſeſs'd a great many Engliſh of their Eſtates; yet will not his Perjury, and Breach of his Coronation-Oath, as alſo this laſt, which he had ſo ſolemnly taken, make him a Conqueror over the Nation, but rather a Tyrant and Uſurper of the Antient Rights and Liberties of his Subjects.

I HAD not dwelt ſo long upon this Subject, were it not for the Doctor's improving even King William's Violence and Perjury into a Right by Conqueſt, and that he had a juſt Pretence to do ſo: and I wonder the Doctor does not by the like reaſon draw an Argument, from this King's robbing of the Monaſteries of their Plate, Money and Ornaments, as our Hiſtorians relate he did in the 4*th* year of his Reign, to prove that his Conqueſt would likewiſe give him a Right to commit Sacrilege, and that he deſign'd to do it from his firſt Enterance into England; for I know no more Right he had to turn his Subjects out of their Eſtates, without any Crime, and without any legal Tryal, than it was for him to plunder Monaſteries and Churches.

AND that the Engliſh Nobility and Gentry had a conſiderable ſhare in the Lands of England in William Rufus's Reign, appears from the Saxon Chronicle, lately publiſh'd at Oxford by the Learned Mr. Gibſon, the Writer of which liv'd (as he himſelf ſays) at that very time, who after he has related the Treaſon and Rebellion of the Normans againſt W. Rufus, headed by Odo Bp of Bayeux, and William Bp of Durham, and the miſchief they did in Kent and other places, proceeds thus; That then K. William ſent for the Engliſhmen, and declar'd to them his neceſſity, and promiſed them, if they would give him their Aſſiſtance, better Laws than ever they had had before, and granted to his Subjects their Woods, and free hunting in them. But this did not hold long; nevertheleſs the Engliſh aſſiſting the King their Lord, marched towards Rocheſter, intending to take Bp Odo Priſoner, &c. Which Story is alſo related by Florence of Worceſter to the ſame effect, tho much ſhorter; viz. that the King hearing of theſe things, gathered together as many as he could of the Normans, but moſt of the Engliſh, and with an Army of Horſe and Foot marched towards Rocheſter. But Simeon of Durham is more particular than either, and ſays, that King William hearing of theſe things, call'd together the Engliſh, and declaring to them the Treaſon of the Normans, deſired them to help him, and in this his neceſſity to ſtand by him; and if they would do ſo, they ſhould have what Chron. Sax. P. 194.

Laws they would chuſe; and he alſo would forbid all unjuſt Taxes, and grant them their Woods and Hunting, and upon theſe terms the Engliſh faithfully helped him: which is almoſt the ſame words as the Saxon Chronicle hath given us before, from whence I ſuppoſe it was borrowed.

BUT Will. of Malmesbury relates this matter more briefly, and ſays, that this King finding moſt of the Norman Lords to have conſpired againſt him, and taken part with his Brother D. Robert, ſent by his Letters for the honeſt and ſtout Engliſh (men of Eſtates) * who yet remained, to whom he complained of the Injuries done him by the Normans; and by promiſing them good Laws, eaſe from Taxes, and free hunting in their Woods, he gained them to his party. From all which plain Authorities it appears, that the Engliſh, notwithſtanding all the Oppreſſions they had lain under in this King's Father's time, had ſtill Lands and Woods left them in which they might hunt; and that they then made a conſiderable Figure and Intereſt in the Nation.

* Qui adhuc erant reſidui.

BUT the Doctor finding himſelf gall'd by theſe ſo plain proofs, has no way left to evade them, but inſtead of untying, to cut this Gordian knot; and therfore in his Gloſſary at the end of the Introduction to his Engliſh Hiſtory, he has found out a very notable way of doing it, by confounding theſe Names, Angli, Angligenæ, Normanni, and Franci, which, notwithſtanding the plain different import of the words, muſt all (in the Doctor's ſenſe) ſignify only French-men or Normans, and not an Engliſh-man among them; ſo that theſe Engliſh and French, tho put under as diſtinguiſhing Characters in theſe our Hiſtorians, as words are able to expreſs them, yet (if the Doctor's word may be taken) they were all of them no other than ſuch Perſons as were born in Normandy, or other places beyond Sea: But by the Angli and Angligenæ, were meant only ſuch Normans and Frenchmen, as were either born here, and ſo enjoy'd their Father's Eſtates, or elſe were the very ſame who firſt came over with the Conqueror, and had Eſtates given them for their good Service and Merits.

P. 8, 9, 10.

I SHALL now fairly give you the Doctor's Reaſons and Authorities for thus ſtraining the literal Conſtruction of theſe words, beyond what our Dictionaries can teach us. However in the firſt place I cannot deny, but the Doctor has truly ſet down in his Gloſſary the very ſame Quotations in Latin out of thoſe very Authors whom I have now made uſe of; but yet to blind the eyes of the ignorant or unwary Readers, he takes care not to tranſlate them fairly, for then his impoſing upon them would be eaſily diſcovered. Thus, when he cites the paſſage above-mentioned out of Simeon of Durham, Convocari fecit Anglos, & oſtendit eis traditionem Normannorum; theſe laſt words he omits in his Tranſlation, and only renders it, The King (meaning Rufus) call'd together the Engliſh, and asked help of them, &c. and yet at the ſame time fairly tranſlates the Paſſage of Florence of Worceſter, already cited, Congregato quantum potuit ad præſens Normannorum, ſed tamen maximè Anglorum, equeſtri ac pedeſtri exercitu, tendere diſpoſuit Roucceaſtream; i.e. he gathered together as many as he could of the Normans, but chiefly of the Engliſh, and with an Army of Horſe and Foot marched toward Rocheſter. By which the Doctor allows that this Army conſiſted moſt of mere natural Engliſh-men, becauſe theſe being lookt upon as only mean mercenary Fellows, cannot do his Nation any great harm.

P. 6, 7, 8.

YET notwithſtanding this his Civility to the Common Souldiers, however as to the Chief Men of the Engliſh, whom as the Saxon Chronicle, Simeon of Durham, and W. of Malmesbury relate, he cauſed to be aſſembled; and whom the laſt Author ſays, he ſent for by his Letters; theſe the Doctor will not allow to be really Engliſh-men; and tho he truly tranſcribes the Paſſage in Malmesbury already cited, yet he does not think fit to put theſe words into Engliſh: Rex videns Normannos pænè omnes in unâ Rabie conſpiratos, Anglos probos, & fortes viros qui adhuc Reſidui erant invitatoriis ſcriptis arceſſit. "The King ſeeing almoſt all the Normans "conſpired together in the ſame madneſs, by invitatory Letters ſends "for the honeſt and valiant Engliſh, who yet remained. Since this Author here makes ſo plain a diſtinction between the Normans that had conſpired againſt the King, and the honeſt Engliſh men whom he ſent for, therefore the Doctor takes care to leave this Paſſage untranſlated, and only gives us in ſhort what immediately follows concerning the King's drawing off from his Enemies, Roger Earl of Shrewsbury, by which he broke the Party; becauſe this Roger being a Norman, it would help to countenance his preſent Fancy, which you will ſee by and by.

FOR the Doctor finding the Engliſh Authors not at all favorable to his Notion, flys off from them to a Norman Writer, viz. Ordericus Vitalis, whoſe words he indeed fairly gives us both in Latin and Engliſh, becauſe he hopes to pick ſomething out of them that may ſerve his preſent purpoſe: the paſſage ſtands thus, That King William, ſo ſoon as he ſaw the Norman's contrivance againſt him, Lanfrancum Archiepiſcopum cum Suffraganeis Præſulibus, & Comites, Angloſque naturales convocavit, & conatus Adverſariorum & velle ſuum, expugnandi eis, indicavit; i. e. He call'd together Lanfranc the Arch-Biſhop with his Suffragan Biſhops, and the Earls and natural Engliſh, and ſhewed them the Deſigns of his Adverſaries, and his intention to fight them: but as for the next paſſage from the ſame Author (being much to the ſame purpoſe) I ſhall only give it you in Engliſh; then all the Biſhops of England, with the Engliſh faithfully aſſiſted the King; Hugh Earl of Cheſter, William Earl of Warren (in Normandy) Robert Fitz-Haimon, and others, too many to be here recited; only it is certain that they were all Normans by birth or extraction. From which two places put together, the Doctor hopes to make out, that this Author muſt here needs mean by Naturales Anglos, meer Normans and French-men, diſguiſed under the name of Engliſh, and therefore in the next page he proceeds thus with great confidence; F. 668.

"ACCORDING to the Sound of the word Angli, and a ſuper- Gloſſ. p. 8.
"ficial reading of the Authors here cited, moſt men would think
"they were only Saxon Engliſh intended, and expreſſed by that "word; but upon due obſervation of the Hiſtorians and Perſons
"who were by them call'd Angli, it cannot be ſo; for the Primates
"Angliæ on both ſides, the Chief men of England, who favour'd both
"the Duke and the King, were Nobiliores Normanni, the more Noble
"Normans; and as it is clear by the particular enumeration of the "Perſons, that they were ſo on the Duke's ſide; ſo it is evident they
"were Normans who aſſiſted King William, and kept the Crown
"upon his Head: He called together the Engliſh, ſays Malmesbury,
"and Simeon of Durham, and promiſed them the beſt Laws they
"ſhould chuſe, and eaſe in their Taxations, the enjoyment of their
"Woods or Foreſts, and the Privilege of Hunting.

NOW

" NOW certainly (ſays the Doctor) theſe were Great Men " that He called together, Engliſh Earls and Barons, and not men of " the middle or ordinary Rank; for They could never have met in ſuch " numbers, as was requiſite for them to do, to protect and defend " King William, had They not been headed by ſuch, as if they had " either Arms, or Power, or Eſtates that depended not upon the " Normans: and if any man (ſays he) can ſhew me an Engliſh Sax- " on that was either Earl or Baron, or that had any Power or Share " in the Government, or many that had conſiderable Eſtates, " that did not hold them of the Normans; or that at this time had " great Woods, Foreſts, and Privilege of Hunting in them, I will " confeſs I am miſtaken: 'Tis true, Malmesbury ſays, Rufus called to- " gether Anglos probos, & fortes viros qui adhuc Reſidui erant, &c. " But by theſe were meant none but the legitimi, & maturi Barones, " ſuch as Ordericus tells us of, that came in with his Father, ran many " hazards with him, and firſt ſetled themſelves here after the Con- " queſt; ſuch as petition'd King William for favour toward their " Country-men ſhut up in Rocheſter Caſtle; as many of theſe (that " were alive) as he could, he fixed to his Intereſt by the Promiſes be- " fore mention'd, &c.

I HAVE here given you the Doctor's own words, tho ſomewhat prolix, becauſe I would not be thought to curtail or miſrepreſent ſuch doughty Arguments; to confute which there ſcarce needs any more than the bare repeating them, ſince all their force lies either in wreſting or miſapplying the words of the Authors he makes uſe of: for if the Doctor allow that they, viz. the Engliſh, of mean or ordinary Rank, could meet in ſuch numbers as to protect and defend King William; he is to prove that thoſe Engliſh the King then alſo wrote to, or ſummon'd to come to his Aſſiſtance, were of another Nation from thoſe that made up this Army, fought for him, and kept the Crown upon his Head; and for this I appeal to the Authors themſelves already cited.

FOR can any one believe that the Writer of this part of the Saxon Chronicle (who was himſelf an Engliſh Monk) ſhould in all this Relation concerning his Country-men's aſſiſting King William, mean no other than meer Normans, for whom he always expreſſes a great averſion? The like I may ſay for the reſt of thoſe Hiſtorians, which both the Doctor and I have made uſe of; for ſure no men that ever underſtood Senſe or Grammar, would all agree to relate this Story after ſuch a rate, as that no body without the Doctor's learned Notes could underſtand, whither they meant Engliſh or French-men when they ſpeak of them.

NOW I leave it to any unprejudiced Reader to judge, whither when William of Malmesbury ſays, Rufus called together Anglos probos, qui adhuc Reſidui erant, &c. Theſe here meant were only ſuch loyal and grave Norman Barons as Ordericus tells us came in with his Father, and ſtill remain'd alive? &c. And as for this laſt Writer, on whoſe Authority the Doctor moſt relyes, I might juſtly except againſt him, (tho an Engliſh man by Birth) for he was a Norman by Affection, and alſo lived and wrote near eighty years after this Action; yet for all this, any man that conſiders the Paſſages the Doctor cites from him, may ſee, that he plainly diſtinguiſhes the Natural Engliſh from thoſe Biſhops and Norman Lords who then alſo adhered to the King.

* BUT

BUT I am ſenſible the Doctor may have one ſhift ſtill left to evade the plain words of this Author, viz. That theſe natural Engliſh were no other than young Norman Noblemen born in England ſince the Conqueſt, and might by this time be about twenty years old. But yet this Interpretation will do him little or no good, for had this Author meant only Engliſh Normans, he would never have called them Natural Engliſh, but rather Indigenas; in the ſame ſenſe, as I grant Henry the Firſt is ſuppoſed by Matthew Paris to have made a Speech to the Nobility of England of both Nations: neither could ſuch Young men be properly called the Maturi Barones, who the Doctor ſays came in with the Conqueror. P. 62.

BUT there is ſtill another greater Difficulty, if theſe words are to be taken in this ſenſe; for how could a few young Norman Engliſh Gentlemen (moſt of whom were little better than Boys) give the King ſuch an Aſſiſtance, as to make him able to reſiſt and overcome a far greater Number of Normans, who then took part with Duke Robert? But indeed the Doctor himſelf has ſufficiently ſettled this Matter, by his own relation of this Affair, in his Compleat Hiſtory, from Ordericus Vitalis; for he ſays, that K. William, reſolving to ſuppreſs their Inſurrections (viz. of the Normans) to that purpoſe convoked ABp Lanfranc, and all the Biſhops, Earls, and Natural Engliſh, ſhewing them his Intentions, &c. Now I would fain know if any Man, without the help of the Doctor's forced Paraphraſe, could ever find out that here by Natural Engliſh were meant Engliſh Normans; and immediately after in the ſame Page, could convert all theſe Normans into an Army of Engliſh, only from Florence of Worceſter's words already cited. But he ſhould have done well to have added a Marginal Note from his own Gloſſary, to have ſhewn his Readers, that tho the Army might be for the moſt part Engliſh, yet that their Leaders muſt be all Engliſh-Norman Lords and Gentlemen. But if we examine the Doctor's Reaſons for this forced Interpretation, they conſiſt, as you will obſerve, either in the falſe repreſenting or wreſting the words of his Authors, who, becauſe they all agree in ſaying, That King William promiſed the Engliſh better Laws, eaſe from Taxes, and injoyment of their Woods or Foreſts, with privilege of Hunting; therefore theſe muſt certainly be Great men that he called together, Engliſh Earls and Barons, and not men of ordinary Rank. Now I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me which of his Authors calls theſe Engliſh, who then aſſiſted King William, either Earls or Barons, but only plain, honeſt, brave Engliſh men? and why might not theſe have met in ſuch numbers as was requiſite to protect and defend the King, without being headed by any of his Engliſh-Norman Earls or Barons? But the Doctor indeed begs the Queſtion that is to be proved, viz. that the Engliſh had neither Arms, Power nor Eſtates left, but what depended upon the Normans: for he ſhould firſt have proved that they had no Arms, and conſequently no Power; and ſecondly, that tho many of their Eſtates might depend upon ſuch Normans as were then againſt the King, yet their Engliſh Military Tenants could never have taken Arms againſt their own Lords in hopes of better Terms, and an eaſier Government. And the Doctor muſt grant, that the Engliſh then met in ſuch Numbers, as ſerved to defend this King, or elſe he muſt contradict Florence of Worceſter whom he has cited to that purpoſe.

THEREFORE as to the Doctor's Challenge, wherein he defies any man to ſhew him any Engliſh-Saxon, that was either Earl or Baron, or that had any Power or Share in the Government, or many that had conſiderable Eſtates (it then ſeems however there were ſome) who did not hold them of the Normans. To this I anſwer, That I hope he will one day be ſo ingenuous as to perform his Promiſe, and confeſs himſelf miſtaken; for moſt of theſe Queries he here makes, are either falſe or impertinent: for the Queſtion is not, Whether there were any Engliſh men Earls or Great Peers of the Realm at this time, or whether they were Privy Counſellors? But that divers of them were Tenants in Capite, and conſequently Barons of leſs Degree, if not of the Superior, at the end of the Reign of William the Firſt, I have already in part proved from Doomſday-Book, and ſhall prove it farther anon; and if they were Barons, they had alſo a Voice in the Common Council of the Kingdom, and as ſuch had a ſhare in the Government.

BUT the Doctor makes it a great Buſineſs, that this King granted the Engliſh their Woods and Foreſts, and Hunting in them, and deſires to know what great Woods or Foreſts the Engliſh then had: and I ask him how he can prove that his Normans had then any Foreſts? for he is but meanly skill'd in our Foreſt-Law, that does not know that a Foreſt can only belong to the King; and if any ſuch be granted to a Subject, it loſes both its Name and Privileges, and becomes a Chaſe. But indeed the Doctor impoſes upon himſelf as well as his Readers, by tranſlating the words ſuas Sylvas, in our Authors, their Foreſts; whereas by thoſe words there is no more meant, than ſuch Woods adjoining to Foreſts that then belonged to Engliſh Subjects, ſuch as we now call Purlieus, which were, till King John granted the Charter of Foreſts, as much under the Foreſt-Laws as thoſe places themſelves. And as for ſuch Woods as theſe, why the Engliſh might not then be Proprietors of them as well as the Normans, I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me any ſufficient reaſon.

BUT that many of the Engliſh Gentry in W. Rufus's Reign, had Eſtates ſufficient to enable them to hunt, not only in their own Woods, but in the King's Foreſts too, appears by a Paſſage in Eadmerus, who giving us an account of this King's harſh and cruel Nature, relates, that about Fifty of the antient Engliſh Gentry, who enjoy'd ſome of their old Eſtates, were taken and accuſed for killing the King's Deer; and having for this undergone the trial of * Fire and Water, and were clear'd, he fell into a great Rage, and uttered ſeveral blaſphemous Expreſſions, as needleſs as it would be profane here to repeat them.

Lib. 2. p. 48.

THIS is ſufficient to ſhew you, that there were at this time many Engliſh Gentlemen left, of ſufficient Eſtates, to be capacitated for Hunting, either in their own, or the King's Woods.

BUT as for the reſt of the Doctor's Authorities, they being more ſlight and trivial, need not any long deſcant upon them: And firſt for that Paſſage of Eadmerus in his Life of Archbiſhop Anſelm, who, as this Author relates, was invited over by Hugh Earl of Cheſter, and other Earls and Chief Men of the Engliſh. Now, ſays the Doctor, theſe were all Normans, and yet are here called Engliſh; but ſure he believes that no body but himſelf can diſcover the true ſenſe of theſe words, or elſe he would never go about ſo palpably to impoſe upon his Readers: for tho this Author calls theſe Noblemen Principes Anglorum, that is, Earls of England, yet he does no where call them Anglos, Engliſh-men, as the Authors above-cited ſtile thoſe Engliſh that aſſiſted William Rufus. And the ſame Sophiſtry the Doctor makes uſe of in two other Authorities in the next Page, which therefore require no particular anſwer.

BUT here alſo he takes out two Paſſages from Matthew Paris's Hiſtory of King Henry the Firſt, where that Author ſays, that before he was Crowned, he convened the Clergy and all the People, or Laity, to London, and promiſed them an amendment of the Laws, if they would receive him as their King. In ſhort, the Clergy and Great Men unanimouſly agreed to make him ſo upon thoſe Conditions; and he was then crowned by the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of London. P. 55.

NOW (ſays the Doctor) both theſe Biſhops that Crown'd him were Normans, as alſo were all the other Biſhops of England at that time (ſee Bp Godwin de Præſul.) and likewiſe all the Earls, Barons and Great men were Normans; and yet in the next page, Matt. Paris ſays, King Henry was crown'd de Communi Conſilio gentis Anglorum. I cannot here deny, that the Biſhops, Earls, and a great many of the Barons, were at this time Normans, either by Nation or Extraction; and that ſuch of them as were born here, and had ſucceeded to their Father's Earldoms and Baronies, might very well be called Engliſh-men; but neither Biſhop Godwin (whom the Doctor here cites) nor any other Author ſays (what he adds I ſuppoſe out of his own head) that all the Barons, as well of the Greater as Leſſer ſort (and whom I ſuppoſe to be preſent at this Council) were all Normans, and none of them of Engliſh extraction; for otherwiſe, had they been all Foreiners, why ſhould they ſo unanimouſly agree to make Henry King, upon condition, that he would grant them thoſe antient Liberties and Cuſtoms which were uſed in England in the time of the Holy King Edward? P. 56.

BUT this Clauſe the Doctor thought fit to conceal, becauſe it would have helped to lay open the weakneſs of the Concluſion he would fain draw from this Story.

THIS Artifice being thus diſcovered, will alſo ſhew another piece of the like Sophiſtry in wreſting another Paſſage of the ſame Author, viz. That this King Henry, fearing the Title of his Brother Robert, and the Revolt of the Engliſh Normans, called the Magnates or Great men of the Kingdom together, and in a flattering Speech beſpoke their Aſſiſtance. Now theſe Great men he ſpoke to were all Normans, and yet, becauſe moſt of them might be born in England, in that reſpect he calls them Indigenas, Homebred, or born in the ſame Country with himſelf, and Natural Engliſh. Gloſſ. p. 9. Mat. Par. p. 62.

I HERE grant indeed that King Henry might very juſtly call thoſe Young Engliſh Normans of about the ſame Age with Himſelf, Countrymen and Natural Engliſh; but that theſe were the only Magnates or Great men of England he then ſpoke to, and that none of them were Engliſh men by Extraction, as well as Birth, the Doctor has not yet proved, nor I believe ever will be able.

BUT becauſe the Prefaces of ſo many Charters of the five firſt Kings of the Norman Race lie acroſs in his way, and are againſt this Notion of the Doctor, which are directed commonly Omnibus Baronibus

nibus ſuis Francis & Anglis; or elſe Omnibus Fidelibus, Francis & Anglis, of which the Doctor himſelf has given us indeed a large Catalogue, where theſe Words are inſerted: yet notwithſtanding the words Francis & Anglis are ſo often diſtinctly made uſe of, not only in the Charters of thoſe Kings, but alſo in thoſe of their Earls and great Barons, which were ſent to their Tenants or Feudataries with the ſame directions; yet however the Doctor thinks to get over this by the like ſlight of hand, as he did the former, and will needs have this great variety of Directions in all thoſe Charters to be "mere forms and no-"thing elſe, and that they were never deſigned to diſtinguiſh the Ex-"traction or Countries of thoſe to whom they were directed, ſeeing "the Engliſh were no ways concern'd in them as to their Contents, "either in point of Intereſt, or any advantage they were to receive "by them.

Gloſſ. p. 10, 11.

ALL which is merely gratis dictum, and without any manner of proof: for can any Man that underſtands common ſenſe believe, that theſe Kings, or their Chancellors, or even thoſe Clerks that drew theſe Earls and Baron's Charters, would in an Age that ſo much abhor'd multiplying Words and unneceſſary Forms, cumber their Patents and Charters with thoſe idle Directions of Francis and Anglis, had there not been ſome real ground for them at firſt? And that there was ſo in ſome of thoſe Charters cited by the Doctor, he himſelf grants, and particularly in that of King William the Firſt to the City of London, which being in old Engliſh Saxon, he thus tranſcribes, "William King "greets William the Biſcop, and Godfrey Portrefan et calle ya Burghwaren "binnen London Frenciſſe & Engliſce; That is, King William greets William the Biſhop, and Godfrey the Port-Reve, and all the Inhabitants of the Burgh within London, French and Engliſh. Here, I ſay, the Doctor grants, that theſe words French and Engliſh are to be underſtood in their natural and proper ſignification; "For, ſays he, "at King William's firſt entrance, many Engliſh enjoy'd their Eſtates, "and Titles, as they had done before his coming; and it may be "ſome of them until he had wholly ſubdued the Nation: ſo that "by French and Engliſh in this Charter, the Saxons and Normans are "to be underſtood as diſtinct; and indeed in Burghs and Trading "Towns thoſe words may be ſo underſtood at all times.

Ib. p. 10.

SO likewiſe in that Charter of Roger Earl of Warwick, cited by the Doctor, directed Omnibus Baronibus ſuis & Burgenſibus, & Omnibus Hominibus ſuis Francis & Anglis, ſalutem. By which Charter he confirm'd divers Lands, &c. to the Churches of St. Maries and All Saints (I ſuppoſe in Warwick:) whence it is plain, that this being directed to all his Barons and Burgeſſes of Warwick, and to all his men or Tenants, both French and Engliſh, theſe laſt words muſt refer to all that goes before; and if there were Engliſh Burgeſſes in that Town, which I ſuppoſe the Doctor will not deny, I cannot ſee any reaſon why he ſhould not have had alſo Engliſh Barons or Tenants under him, as well as Frenchmen or Normans, eſpecially if the word Baron be taken in the ſenſe the Doctor himſelf allows it in his Preface to the Norman Hiſtory; when citing a Charter of King Henry the Firſt directed * Samſoni Epiſcopo, & Urſoni de Abitot, & Omnibus Baronibus Francis & Anglis de Wirceſtreſcira, Salutem: Upon which word Baronibus, the Doctor at the very bottom of this leaf has this note; "That by theſe Barones here,

" are to be underſtood Milites, ſuch as held by Military Service, or " Barones Minores, Lords of Towns or Mannors, or perhaps Free- " holders, which, if any, were then of better account, before Town- " ſhips, Mannors and Lands were parcell'd out into ſmall Diviſi- " ons.

NOW I deſire the Doctor to give me any tolerable good reaſon, why theſe Barones, the ſmaller ſort of Barons or Freeholders, might not have been Native Engliſh-men, as well as Foreigners, ſince they might ſtill have been dependent upon other Lords, whither Engliſh-men or Normans it matters not? But perhaps he will ſtill urge, " That the words in many of thoſe Kings Charters cannot be taken " in that general ſenſe, they being often directed, not only Omnibus " Baronibus, or Fidelibus in general, but Omnibus Baronibus & Fideli- " bus ſuis, by which none elſe can be underſtood but the King's own " Barons or Tenants in Capite; ſo that, ſays he, if theſe Directions " were made with intention of a diſtinctive Note, between the Old " Engliſh Saxon, and new French or Norman Barons, 'tis ſtrange " that after the Conqueror was firmly eſtabliſhed in the Throne, and " at the very time of making ſome few of theſe Charters in and to- " ward the end of his Reign, and of the others in the Reigns of " William the Second, and Henry the Firſt, &c. not one Engliſh Saxon " Baron ſhould be found or heard of: from whence he concludes 'tis " evident, if real Barons were meant or intended by the words Barones " Franci & Angli, the Engliſh Barons cover'd under thoſe Expreſſi- " ons, could be no other than ſuch as had been born in England of " Norman Parents, or ſuch as came in with the Conqueror, that had " great Eſtates given them, and made their conſtant abode in Eng- " land; and the Norman Barons no other than ſuch as had great " Eſtates and Baronies in England, as well as they had in Normandy, " where they either altogether, or for the moſt part reſided, and were " not in England but upon extraordinary Occaſions, and extraordi- " nary Summons; and differ'd not from the others by National Pa- " ternal Deſcent, or Extraction, but only by National Reſidence, or " Nativity; from whence they had their Denominations of French " and Engliſh. So far the Doctor.

THEN at laſt this whole diſpute may be reduced into this ſingle Aſſertion, That tho the Leſs Barons, or Lords of Mannors, who held of French or Norman Lords, might be Engliſh, and ſo hold their Eſtates of them; yet that under theſe words Baronibus, or Fidelibus ſuis, ſo often uſed in King William and his Succeſſors Charters, no real Barons, or Tenants in Capite could be meant, becauſe no ſuch men of the Engliſh Saxon Extraction were then to be found or heard of; and therefore only Normans, or of Norman Race, who had great Eſtates in England, muſt be here intended, under the Titles of Francis & Anglis above-mention'd. This is indeed a meer begging of the Queſtion; for I think I have already ſufficiently proved, that not only in the beginning of King William's Reign, but alſo at the very time when Doomſday-Book was made, there were a competent number of Native Engliſh Tenants in Capite in all or moſt Counties of England, ſufficient to juſtify the Direction of theſe Charters to have been ſome-what more than mere matter of Form: and therefore the Doctor's Suppoſition is altogether airy and groundleſs, when he will needs have the words Norman or French Barons mentioned as well in our Hiſtorians, as in theſe Charters, to mean only ſuch as had Eſtates, both in England and Normandy; for if this had been all the difference, it would not only have been a very confus'd, but alſo a very needleſs and impertinent way of writing; for why ſhould theſe be called Norman Barons, only becauſe they had Eſtates in Normandy as well as in England, ſince no man in the Laws, or Charters of this Kingdom, is ever called an Earl or Baron of a Foreign Country, when his chief Title and Eſtate lies in this? And I deſire the Doctor to tell me, when after King James the Firſt (who was alſo King of Scotland) became King of England, he had created the Duke of Lenox Duke of Richmond, and advanced ſome Earls and Barons of Scotland to the like Titles in England, in which (as well as in Scotland) they then had Eſtates; if that King ſhould have iſſued out a Charter or Proclamation concerning ſomething to be done or obſerved by them in England, and had directed it to all his Engliſh and Scotiſh Dukes, Earls and Barons, whither any man would at this day underſtand by theſe Titles, that the King meant only ſuch Scotiſh Noblemen as had Eſtates no where but in England, and by Scotiſh Barons only ſuch Noblemen of that Nation as had Eſtates in both Kingdoms. Now if it were abſurd to underſtand a Charter of our own Age in ſo forced a ſenſe, it is much more ſo to think it could have been ſo underſtood in Charters made above ſix hundred years ago, when they were much plainer in their own Expreſſions, and not ſo much given to needleſs Formalities and empty Tautologies, as we often find in the Charters and other Writings of later times.

I HAVE dwelt the longer upon this Head, becauſe the Doctor has taken ſo much Pains, by all the Artifices that forc'd Interpretations, and wreſting of Words could afford him, to evade the moſt plain and evident Teſtimonies which either Hiſtorians or Records can afford us, to prove, that the old Engliſh Saxon Nobility and Gentry had ſtill ſufficient Eſtates left them during the Reigns of the four or five firſt Kings of the Norman Race, as to give them the Title of Barons of the Kingdom, as well of the Superior as Inferior Order; but whither the Doctor has handled this Queſtion as becomes a Perſon of that Candour and Ingenuity he deſires to be thought Maſter of, I ſhall leave to the indifferent Reader to judg.

I COME now to the next Point in Controverſy, viz. Whither King William alter'd the moſt conſiderable part of the Old Engliſh Saxon Laws, and introduced New ones from Normandy, which he impos'd upon the Nation by his own ſole Authority: and the Doctor's Reaſons for this Aſſertion I will here examine, and ſhall begin with his Anſwer to Mr. Petit's Book, intituled, The Rights of the Commons, &c. Aſſerted; where the Doctor gives this, as a main Reaſon for
P. 14. his pretended Conqueſt, That it appears, firſt, by his (viz. King William's) bringing in a New Law, and impoſing it upon the People; and 'tis clear he did ſo: The Juſticiaries or Chief Juſtices, the Chancellors, the Lawyers, the Miniſterial Officers, and Under-Judges, Earls, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Lords of Mannors, and Hundredaries, were all Normans, and that from his firſt coming, until above a hundred years after, as he pretends to make it out by particular Inſtances, and unde-

niable Reaſons, were not the Catalogues too long to be inſerted: "If therefore, ſays he, the Officers above-mention'd, viz. all ſuch "as heard Cauſes, and gave Judgment, were Normans; if the Law-"yers and Pleaders were alſo Normans, the Pleadings and Judgments "in their ſeveral Courts muſt of neceſſity have been in that Lan-"guage, and the Law alſo, the Norman Law; otherwiſe they had "ſaid and done they knew not what, and judged they knew not "how; eſpecially when the Controverſies were determined by Mi-"litary men, Earls, Sheriffs, Lords of Mannors, &c. that under-"ſtood not the Engliſh Tongue, or Law: or when the chief Juſtici-"ary himſelf was a Military Man, as it often happen'd, and under-"ſtood only the Norman Language.

IN anſwer to theſe Arguments brought by the Learned Doctor, tho it ſhould be granted that the Chief Juſticiaries, the Chancellors, Chief Juſtices, and other Great Officers of the Crown, were all, or the greateſt part of them, Normans, during the Reigns of the four or five firſt Kings of the Norman Race; yet does it therefore follow that theſe made a change in the very Subſtance of our Laws? tho in Matters of Form, as in Pleadings, or other Judicial proceedings, they might have introduced great Alterations: For as to the Body of the Municipal Laws of this Kingdom, concerning the Deſcent and Conveyance of Eſtates, they remain'd the ſame after the coming in of the Normans; and Lands held by Military Service deſcended to the eldeſt Son before the Conqueſt, as Lands in Free Soccage, and Gavel-kind to all the Sons alike, as at this day. So likewiſe there were Eſtates in Tail, and Fee-Simple, as now: And there were alſo the like Cuſtoms of the Courteſy of England, Burrough-Engliſh, as there are at this day, which I can prove by ſeveral Paſſages out of our Engliſh-Saxon-Laws. So likewiſe for Conveyance of Eſtates, thoſe of the better ſort of People, which were called Bockland, were conveyed by Deeds, with Livery and Seiſin, either with or without Warranty, as now: But that which was called Folkland, and held by the meaner ſort, were only by Livery of Seiſin without any Writing. And admit I ſhould grant that the Cuſtom of ſealing of Deeds is derived from the Normans, yet that is an Alteration only in matter of Form; and however, it was in uſe before the pretended Conqueſt among Perſons of the beſt Rank, as Ingulph expreſly tells us, being a Cuſtom brought in by Edward the Confeſſor out of that Country.

AS for Goods and Money, they were bequeathable by a Man's laſt Will, as well before as after the Dr's Conqueſt; and if the Reader can have the opportunity to peruſe a MS. Treatiſe of Sir Roger Owen's upon this Subject, he will find it there ſufficiently proved, that Livery of Seiſin, Licenſes, or Fines for Alienation, Daughters to inherit as Copartners, Trials by Juries, Abjurations, Outlawries, Coroners, diſpoſing of Lands by Will, Eſcheats, Wrecks, Warranties, Forfeiture of Felon's Goods, and many other parts of our Common Law, were in being long before the time of King William the Firſt.

NOW if this was ſo as to the Municipal Law, let us ſee what Alterations there were made in the Criminal, or Crown-Law: Firſt, as to Treaſon and Wilful Murther, they were puniſhed with Death in the Saxon times as well as after; as were alſo Robbery and Burglary in the Night-time. And as to leſs Offences, ſuch as Batteries, Maihems, hems, Robberies, and other Breaches of the Peace, they were puniſhed by Fine, as well before the Conqueſt as after: but as for the Law of Engleſcherie, which was, that if a Man were found murthered, it ſhould be preſumed he was an Alien or French-man, and the Town where the Body was found was to be fined, unleſs Engleſcherie was made out, i. e. that the Perſon was an Engliſh-man: this Cuſtom laſted to the Reign of Edward the Third, and then it was taken away by a Statute made on purpoſe: And tho this may ſeem a Badg of the Norman Conqueſt, yet it was indeed a Law introduced by King Knute in behalf of his Danes, who being often found killed, and none could tell by whom, he got this Law to be made to prevent it, as you will ſee at large in * Bracton, and the Mirrour of Juſtices. But as for the Trial of all Offences, whatever it was, either by Juries, Fire, or Water-Ordeal, or elſe by Witneſſes or Compurgators upon Oath, as well before as after King William's Entrance; I can find nothing material touching the Alterations of the Criminal Laws as to the manner of Trials, from what they were in the Saxons time.

* Lib. 3. de Coron. c. 15.

ALL this being ſo, it may eaſily be made out how the Juſticiaries, and other Great Officers mention'd by the Doctor, might be Normans, and yet the main Body of the Laws continue Engliſh ſtill: For, firſt it is certain (and the Doctor himſelf grants it) that for four or five years in the beginning of King William's Reign, he made no great alteration in the Judges, Sheriffs, and other Officers of the Kingdom; and then thoſe whom he was afterwards pleaſed to put into the rooms of ſuch Engliſh-men as either died or were turned out, might very well be ſuppoſed to underſtand the Laws of England, as far as they differed from thoſe of Normandy, which was not in very many particulars, as the Doctor himſelf likewiſe admits, and very well obſerves, that the Saxons and Normans being both Northern People, had many of the ſame Laws and Cuſtoms common to both; ſo that the Norman Judges in three or four years time, might very well have learned Engliſh enough to have underſtood the Evidence of the Witneſſes, without any Interpreter, I mean in Inferior Courts in the Country.

BUT ſuppoſe all the Pleadings and Judgments were in French, it does not therefore follow that all the Lawyers and Pleaders muſt be French-men too; for why might not the Engliſh Lawyers have learn'd French enough, to be able to plead Cauſes in that Language in four or five years time? which muſt neceſſarily be required before ſo great an Alteration could be made, or that Pleaders enough could be brought out of Normandy, and ſufficiently inſtructed in our Laws and Cuſtoms, ſo as to be fitted for their Employments. Again, ſuppoſing the Pleadings and other Proceedings to have been in French, it does not follow that this Practice could have obtained in all the Courts of England: for tho I ſhould grant that 'twas ſo in the King's Courts at Weſtminſter, where many of the Judges were French-men or Normans; yet this could only have effect either in that Great Court, or Curia Regis, where the King often ſate in Perſon, together with his Chief Juſticiary, and other Juſtices his Aſſiſtants (for as for the Court of Common-Pleas it was not then ſeparate from the Kings-Bench) or elſe in the Court of Exchequer, where in thoſe days Matters concerning the King's Debts, Lands and Revenues, were chiefly heard and

diſpatched. But as for the Court of Chancery, it was not then uſed as a Court of Equity, nor long after, not until the Reign of Henry the Sixth: and then it aroſe by degrees, as you will find in Sir William Dugdale his Origines Juridiciales.

SO that I ſay, granting all the Proceedings in theſe Supreme Courts to have been in French, for the Reaſons already given, yet was this of no great importance in compariſon of the far greater number of Suits and Cauſes which were firſt begun, try'd and determined in the Inferior Courts in the Country, before ever they could be brought up to London by Writ of Error, or other Writs of like nature, and which could only be in Cauſes of great moment, or between the King's Tenants in Capite: for I think it can be well enough made out, that moſt Law-Suits in thoſe times were begun in the Court-Barons, or elſe in the Hundred or County-Courts, and were there diſpatched, and were very rarely (unleſs between Great and Eminent Perſons) removed to London.

THE like I may ſay of all Criminal Caſes, as Treaſons, Murthers, and Felonies, which were then commonly tried before the Sheriff at the County-Court, or elſe within the particular Juriſdictions of Biſhops, Abbots, or Great Lords; Or, laſtly, of ſuch Citys and Towns as had the Privileges of Infangthief and Outfangthief, together with foſſa and furca, that is, a Pit to drown in, and a Gallows to hang Malefactors upon, before their own Seneſchal, or other Officer; Juſtices Itinerant not being aſſigned for theſe purpoſes till long after, in the Reign of Henry the Second.

BUT Dr. Brady is either ſo ignorant, or unmindful of this, both in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt, as alſo in his Gloſſary, that he will not allow any Free-men to owe Suit or Service to the County-Court, but only Tenants in Capite, or other Tenants by Military Service: which he endeavours to prove from the 58*th* Law of King William the Firſt, whereby it is ordain'd, That all Earls, Barons, Knights, and their Servants or Eſcuyers, and all Freemen of our whole Kingdom, be always fitted with Horſe and Arms as they ought to be, and always ready to perform the whole Service to us (viz. the King) when there ſhall be need; and which they ought to do according to, and by reaſon of, their Fees and Tenures. Tit. Liberi Homines, Liberi Tenentes.

AND theſe (ſays the Doctor) were the only Legal men that named and choſe Juries, and ſerved on Juries themſelves, both in the County and Hundred-Courts, and diſpatched all Country buſineſs under the ſaid Great Officers, as will (ſays he) appear by the next Law, with his Explication upon it: Yet farther grants in the next Paragraph, that beſides the Tenants in Capite, ſome of the greateſt of their Military Under-Tenants were often Sheriffs, Hundredaries, and other Judges, and Miniſterial Officers in their ſeveral Counties; and the Judgment they were to give, and the Juſtice they were to do by this Law (beſides that in their own Courts and Juriſdictions) was principally, as they were Jurors or Recognitors upon Aſſizes, &c. As may be ſeen in Glanvil almoſt every where, but eſpecially Lib. 2. c. 10, 11. Lib. 9. c. 7. c. 13. and Lib. 13. throughout. And that this, of being Suitors to the County and Hundred-Courts, &c. was a Service incident to their Tenures.

Chief and Honeſt men, the Jurors, be whom the Doctor pleaſes, that they could have been none other but down-right Engliſh, appears from the Iſſue joyn'd between the Arch-Biſhop the Plaintiff, and Biſhop Odo the Defendant, which was, Whither the Church of Canterbury was ſeized of thoſe Lands or not at the time when King Edward was alive and dead? as appears by all the Circumſtances of the Caſe, tho the Writ it ſelf is not extant: but that all or the greateſt part of theſe Jury-men were Engliſh, is plain, by a more particular Relation of this matter in the Antient Manuſcript of the Church of Rocheſter, called Textus Roffenſis, which was written by Ernulph who was conſecrated Biſhop of that Church, A. D. 1115. not fifty years after the ſuppoſed Conqueſt, and is thought to have wrote this Hiſtory but a few years after his Conſecration; and it does not only contain a Hiſtory of this Church, but alſo many things relating to that of Canterbury, and particularly this great Trial above mention'd, in theſe words, Præcipit Rex Comitatum totum abſque morâ conſidere, & homines Comitatus omnes, Francigenas, & præcipuè Anglos in antiquis legibus & conſuetudinibus peritos, in unum convenire: i. e. the King commanded the whole County to meet, and all the men thereof, viz. the French, but chiefly the Engliſh skill'd in the antient Laws and Cuſtoms, to aſſemble together. Then this Author proceeds further to inform us of the Iſſue of this Great Cauſe which took up the whole County no leſs than Three days, in which time the Arch-Biſhop  recovered by pleading* many Lands which Biſhop Odo and his Tenants at that time held; and then concludes with telling us who were preſent beſides the Judges or Commiſſioners, viz. divers other Biſhops, Algeric Biſhop of Chicheſter a very old man, & Legum Terræ ſapientiſſimus, moſt learned or skilful in the Laws of the Land, who was carried thither in a Waggon by the King's Command, ad ipſas antiquas Leges & Legum conſuetudines diſcutiendas & edocendas; to inſtruct them, viz. the Judges, in the antient Legal Cuſtoms: and he adds farther, that there were alſo there as Auditors or Spectators, many Barons of the King and of the Arch-Biſhop, beſides divers others of ſeveral other Counties, being men of great Authority, both French and Engliſh.

NOW what can be more expreſs than that not only moſt of the Jury-men of this County were Engliſh, but that alſo the Law they judged by was the Engliſh Law? or elſe what need was there for this old Biſhop to be brought ſo far, to inſtruct them in it?

NOW that theſe French and Engliſh could be no other than Primores & Proli viri (mention'd in Eadmerus) the Suitors to this County-Court, who were ſummon'd to try this Great Cauſe, I ſuppoſe the Doctor himſelf cannot deny, tho in his Anſwer to Mr. Atwood he ſlighly paſſes over this part of the Authority, becauſe he knew it was not to be anſwered; nor do I know what he can ſay to it, but that theſe Engliſh-men might appear as Suitors to this County-Court, becauſe it being held within the firſt Four years of King William's Reign, the Engliſh-men of Kent, and thoſe other Counties mentioned by the Doctor, were not then turn'd out of their Eſtates. But this Subterfuge will not help him neither; for it is certain, that Lanfranc was not conſecrated Arch-Biſhop till An. Dom. 1070, being the Fourth year of this King's Reign; and all the reſt of that year he was taken up in the Diſpute between him and Thomas Arch-Biſhop of Tork, Anſwer to Mr. Atwood's Hiſt. of the Engl. &c. p. 193.

York, and could not then have any time to begin a Suit about thoſe Lands detain'd from this Church: and the year following he went to Rome to fetch his Pall, and ſpent moſt of it in his Journey and ſtay there; ſo that it could not be ſooner than two or three years after his Election, viz. about A. D. 1072, or 73. that he had this Trial with Biſhop Odo, which falls out as many years after the time the Doctor ſuppoſes the Engliſh to have already been turn'd out of their Eſtates by his Conqueror, and the whole Kingdom divided among his Followers.

BUT I now come to our next Authority from the Antient Manuſcript Book of Ely, which was written in the time of King Henry the Firſt, and is at preſent in the Cottonian Library; as is alſo another antient Copy in the Hands of the moſt Learned Doctor Gale, Dean of York; in the Second Book of which Hiſtory Cap. 91. that Author tells us, " That in the Second Indiction that fell in this King's Reign, " there was a Diſcuſſion of the antient Rights and Liberties of the " Abby of Ely; which thro the King's Prohibition, and the un- " juſt oppreſſion of his Miniſters, had now layn * 14 years neglected " and ſtifled; but at laſt the King being touched with the hope of " Divine Mercy, commanded by the Biſhop of Bayeux, theſe matters " to be diſcuſſed. Whereupon there was a meeting or Trial of the next adjacent Counties aſſembled at Kenetford, at which were preſent the Abbots of St. Edmonds-bury, Chertſey, Croyland and Holme (their Names I omit) who appeared together with their French and Engliſh Tenants: There were alſo the King's Commiſſioners, whoſe Names being mentioned in the following Writ, I likewiſe paſs by: There were beſides preſent the Sheriffs of four Counties, viz. Eſſex, Hereford, Huntington, and Bedford; with very many approved Knights (or Military Tenants) both French and Engliſh, who put an end to this Diſſenſion, and gave Sentence for the Abbey in theſe words; That Queen Etheldreda (the ſuppoſed Saint or Patroneſs of this Abbey) ſhould enjoy all that was Hers, according to the Privileges of the Kings, Edgar, Ethelred, and Edward, free from all Servitude.

* i.e. from the beginning of this King's Reign.

AND that this Judgment was alſo for Lands, as well as Liberties, appears by this Writ of Poſſeſſion, which the Doctor himſelf hath tranſcribed from Mr. Atwood's Janus Anglorum; Willielmus Anglorum Rex, Omnibus Fidelibus ſuis & Vicecomitibus, in quorum Vicecomitatibus Abbatia de Hely terras habet, ſalutem. Præcipio quod Abbatia de Hely habeat Omnes Conſuetudines ſuas, &c. has, inquam, habeat, ſicut habuit die qua Rex Edvardus fuit vivus & mortuus; *&, ſicut mea juſſione dirationatæ ſunt apud Keneteford, per plures ſcyras ante meos Barones, viz. Galfridum Conſtantienſem Epiſcopum, &c. with the other Commiſſioners Names needleſs here to be recited. In Engliſh thus; " William King of England, to all his Faithful Subjects and Sheriffs, " in whoſe Sheriffdoms the Abbey of Ely hath Lands, greeting. I com- " mand that the Abbey of Ely have all its Cuſtoms, &c. thoſe, I ſay, let " her have, as ſhe had them the day in which King Edward was alive " and dead; and as by my Command they were proved to belong to her, " at Kenetford by many Shires (that is, by the Suitors to the County- " Court of many Shires) before my Barons, viz. the Commiſſioners " above-mentioned. And preſently after follows in the ſame Book " another Writ of this King's, which ſeems to be a Writ of Right

* A ſmall Town in Suffolk near Newmarket.

Laws they would chuſe; and he alſo would forbid all unjuſt Taxes, and grant them their Woods and Hunting, and upon theſe terms the Engliſh faithfully helped him: which is almoſt the ſame words as the Saxon Chronicle hath given us before, from whence I ſuppoſe it was borrowed.

BUT Will. of Malmesbury relates this matter more briefly, and ſays, that this King finding moſt of the Norman Lords to have conſpired againſt him, and taken part with his Brother D. Robert, ſent by his Letters for the honeſt and ſtout Engliſh (men of Eſtates) * who yet remained, to whom he complained of the Injuries done him by the Normans; and by promiſing them good Laws, eaſe from Taxes, and free hunting in their Woods, he gained them to his party. From all which plain Authorities it appears, that the Engliſh, notwithſtanding all the Oppreſſions they had lain under in this King's Father's time, had ſtill Lands and Woods left them in which they might hunt; and that they then made a conſiderable Figure and Intereſt in the Nation.

* Qui adhuc erant reſidui.

BUT the Doctor finding himſelf gall'd by theſe ſo plain proofs, has no way left to evade them, but inſtead of untying, to cut this Gordian knot; and therfore in his Gloſſary at the end of the Introduction to his Engliſh Hiſtory, he has found out a very notable way of doing it, by confounding theſe Names, Angli, Angligenæ, Normanni, and Franci, which, notwithſtanding the plain different import of the words, muſt all (in the Doctor's ſenſe) ſignify only French-men or Normans, and not an Engliſh-man among them; ſo that theſe Engliſh and French, tho put under as diſtinguiſhing Characters in theſe our Hiſtorians, as words are able to expreſs them, yet (if the Doctor's word may be taken) they were all of them no other than ſuch Perſons as were born in Normandy, or other places beyond Sea: But by the Angli and Angligenæ, were meant only ſuch Normans and Frenchmen, as were either born here, and ſo enjoy'd their Father's Eſtates, or elſe were the very ſame who firſt came over with the Conqueror, and had Eſtates given them for their good Service and Merits.

P. 8, 9, 10.

I SHALL now fairly give you the Doctor's Reaſons and Authorities for thus ſtraining the literal Conſtruction of theſe words, beyond what our Dictionaries can teach us. However in the firſt place I cannot deny, but the Doctor has truly ſet down in his Gloſſary the very ſame Quotations in Latin out of thoſe very Authors whom I have now made uſe of; but yet to blind the eyes of the ignorant or unwary Readers, he takes care not to tranſlate them fairly, for then his impoſing upon them would be eaſily diſcovered. Thus, when he cites the paſſage above-mentioned out of Simeon of Durham, Convocari fecit Anglos, & oſtendit eis traditionem Normannorum; theſe laſt words he omits in his Tranſlation, and only renders it, The King (meaning Rufus) call'd together the Engliſh, and asked help of them, &c. and yet at the ſame time fairly tranſlates the Paſſage of Florence of Worceſter, already cited, Congregato quantum potuit ad præſens Normannorum, ſed tamen maximè Anglorum, equeſtri ac pedeſtri exercitu, tendere diſpoſuit Roucceaſtream; i.e. he gathered together as many as he could of the Normans, but chiefly of the Engliſh, and with an Army of Horſe and Foot marched toward Rocheſter. By which the Doctor allows that this Army conſiſted moſt of mere natural Engliſh-men, becauſe theſe being lookt upon as only mean mercenary Fellows, cannot do his Nation any great harm.

P. 6, 7, 8.

YET notwithſtanding this his Civility to the Common Souldiers,

however as to the Chief Men of the Engliſh, whom as the Saxon Chronicle, Simeon of Durham, and W. of Malmesbury relate, he cauſed to be aſſembled; and whom the laſt Author ſays, he ſent for by his Letters; theſe the Doctor will not allow to be really Engliſh-men; and tho he truly tranſcribes the Paſſage in Malmesbury already cited, yet he does not think fit to put theſe words into Engliſh: Rex videns Normannos pænè omnes in unâ Rabie conſpiratos, Anglos probos, & fortes viros qui adhuc Reſidui erant invitatoriis ſcriptis arceſſit. " The King ſeeing almoſt all the Normans " conſpired together in the ſame madneſs, by invitatory Letters ſends " for the honeſt and valiant Engliſh, who yet remained. Since this Author here makes ſo plain a diſtinction between the Normans that had conſpired againſt the King, and the honeſt Engliſh men whom he ſent for, therefore the Doctor takes care to leave this Paſſage untranſlated, and only gives us in ſhort what immediately follows concerning the King's drawing off from his Enemies, Roger Earl of Shrewsbury, by which he broke the Party; becauſe this Roger being a Norman, it would help to countenance his preſent Fancy, which you will ſee by and by.

FOR the Doctor finding the Engliſh Authors not at all favorable to his Notion, flys off from them to a Norman Writer, viz. Ordericus Vitalis, whoſe words he indeed fairly gives us both in Latin and Engliſh, becauſe he hopes to pick ſomething out of them that may ſerve his preſent purpoſe: the paſſage ſtands thus, That King William, ſo ſoon as he ſaw the Norman's contrivance againſt him, Lanfrancum Archiepiſcopum cum Suffraganeis Præſulibus, & Comites, Angloſque naturales convocavit, & conatus Adverſariorum & velle ſuum, expugnandi eis, indicavit; i. e. He call'd together Lanfranc the Arch-Biſhop with his Suffragan Biſhops, and the Earls and natural Engliſh, and ſhewed them the Deſigns of his Adverſaries, and his intention to fight them: but as for the next paſſage from the ſame Author (being much to the ſame purpoſe) I ſhall only give it you in Engliſh; then all the Biſhops of England, with the Engliſh faithfully aſſiſted the King; Hugh Earl of Cheſter, William Earl of Warren (in Normandy) Robert Fitz-Haimon, and others, too many to be here recited; only it is certain that they were all Normans by birth or extraction. From which two places put together, the Doctor hopes to make out, that this Author muſt here needs mean by Naturales Anglos, meer Normans and French-men, diſguiſed under the name of Engliſh, and therefore in the next page he proceeds thus with great confidence; F. 668.

" ACCORDING to the Sound of the word Angli, and a ſuper- Gloſſ. p. 8.
" ficial reading of the Authors here cited, moſt men would think
" they were only Saxon Engliſh intended, and expreſſed by that " word; but upon due obſervation of the Hiſtorians and Perſons
" who were by them call'd Angli, it cannot be ſo; for the Primates
" Angliæ on both ſides, the Chief men of England, who favour'd both
" the Duke and the King, were Nobiliores Normanni, the more Noble
" Normans; and as it is clear by the particular enumeration of the " Perſons, that they were ſo on the Duke's ſide; ſo it is evident they
" were Normans who aſſiſted King William, and kept the Crown
" upon his Head: He called together the Engliſh, ſays Malmesbury,
" and Simeon of Durham, and promiſed them the beſt Laws they
" ſhould chuſe, and eaſe in their Taxations, the enjoyment of their
" Woods or Foreſts, and the Privilege of Hunting.

" NOW certainly (ſays the Doctor) theſe were Great Men " that He called together, Engliſh Earls and Barons, and not men of " the middle or ordinary Rank; for They could never have met in ſuch " numbers, as was requiſite for them to do, to protect and defend " King William, had They not been headed by ſuch, as if they had " either Arms, or Power, or Eſtates that depended not upon the " Normans: and if any man (ſays he) can ſhew me an Engliſh Sax- " on that was either Earl or Baron, or that had any Power or Share " in the Government, or many that had conſiderable Eſtates, " that did not hold them of the Normans; or that at this time had " great Woods, Foreſts, and Privilege of Hunting in them, I will " confeſs I am miſtaken: 'Tis true, Malmesbury ſays, Rufus called to- " gether Anglos probos, & fortes viros qui adhuc Reſidui erant, &c. " But by theſe were meant none but the legitimi, & maturi Barones, " ſuch as Ordericus tells us of, that came in with his Father, ran many " hazards with him, and firſt ſetled themſelves here after the Con- " queſt; ſuch as petition'd King William for favour toward their " Country-men ſhut up in Rocheſter Caſtle; as many of theſe (that " were alive) as he could, he fixed to his Intereſt by the Promiſes be- " fore mention'd, &c.

I HAVE here given you the Doctor's own words, tho ſomewhat prolix, becauſe I would not be thought to curtail or miſrepreſent ſuch doughty Arguments; to confute which there ſcarce needs any more than the bare repeating them, ſince all their force lies either in wreſting or miſapplying the words of the Authors he makes uſe of: for if the Doctor allow that they, viz. the Engliſh, of mean or ordinary Rank, could meet in ſuch numbers as to protect and defend King William; he is to prove that thoſe Engliſh the King then alſo wrote to, or ſummon'd to come to his Aſſiſtance, were of another Nation from thoſe that made up this Army, fought for him, and kept the Crown upon his Head; and for this I appeal to the Authors themſelves already cited.

FOR can any one believe that the Writer of this part of the Saxon Chronicle (who was himſelf an Engliſh Monk) ſhould in all this Relation concerning his Country-men's aſſiſting King William, mean no other than meer Normans, for whom he always expreſſes a great averſion? The like I may ſay for the reſt of thoſe Hiſtorians, which both the Doctor and I have made uſe of; for ſure no men that ever underſtood Senſe or Grammar, would all agree to relate this Story after ſuch a rate, as that no body without the Doctor's learned Notes could underſtand, whither they meant Engliſh or French-men when they ſpeak of them.

NOW I leave it to any unprejudiced Reader to judge, whither when William of Malmesbury ſays, Rufus called together Anglos probos, qui adhuc Reſidui erant, &c. Theſe here meant were only ſuch loyal and grave Norman Barons as Ordericus tells us came in with his Father, and ſtill remain'd alive? &c. And as for this laſt Writer, on whoſe Authority the Doctor moſt relyes, I might juſtly except againſt him, (tho an Engliſh man by Birth) for he was a Norman by Affection, and alſo lived and wrote near eighty years after this Action; yet for all this, any man that conſiders the Paſſages the Doctor cites from him, may ſee, that he plainly diſtinguiſhes the Natural Engliſh from thoſe Biſhops and Norman Lords who then alſo adhered to the King.

* BUT

BUT I am ſenſible the Doctor may have one ſhift ſtill left to evade the plain words of this Author, viz. That theſe natural Engliſh were no other than young Norman Noblemen born in England ſince the Conqueſt, and might by this time be about twenty years old. But yet this Interpretation will do him little or no good, for had this Author meant only Engliſh Normans, he would never have called them Natural Engliſh, but rather Indigenas; in the ſame ſenſe, as I grant Henry the Firſt is ſuppoſed by Matthew Paris to have made a Speech to the Nobility of England of both Nations: neither could ſuch Young men be properly called the Maturi Barones, who the Doctor ſays came in with the Conqueror. P. 62.

BUT there is ſtill another greater Difficulty, if theſe words are to be taken in this ſenſe; for how could a few young Norman Engliſh Gentlemen (moſt of whom were little better than Boys) give the King ſuch an Aſſiſtance, as to make him able to reſiſt and overcome a far greater Number of Normans, who then took part with Duke Robert? But indeed the Doctor himſelf has ſufficiently ſettled this Matter, by his own relation of this Affair, in his Compleat Hiſtory, from Ordericus Vitalis; for he ſays, that K. William, reſolving to ſuppreſs their Inſurrections (viz. of the Normans) to that purpoſe convoked ABp Lanfranc, and all the Biſhops, Earls, and Natural Engliſh, ſhewing them his Intentions, &c. Now I would fain know if any Man, without the help of the Doctor's forced Paraphraſe, could ever find out that here by Natural Engliſh were meant Engliſh Normans; and immediately after in the ſame Page, could convert all theſe Normans into an Army of Engliſh, only from Florence of Worceſter's words already cited. But he ſhould have done well to have added a Marginal Note from his own Gloſſary, to have ſhewn his Readers, that tho the Army might be for the moſt part Engliſh, yet that their Leaders muſt be all Engliſh-Norman Lords and Gentlemen. But if we examine the Doctor's Reaſons for this forced Interpretation, they conſiſt, as you will obſerve, either in the falſe repreſenting or wreſting the words of his Authors, who, becauſe they all agree in ſaying, That King William promiſed the Engliſh better Laws, eaſe from Taxes, and injoyment of their Woods or Foreſts, with privilege of Hunting; therefore theſe muſt certainly be Great men that he called together, Engliſh Earls and Barons, and not men of ordinary Rank. Now I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me which of his Authors calls theſe Engliſh, who then aſſiſted King William, either Earls or Barons, but only plain, honeſt, brave Engliſh men? and why might not theſe have met in ſuch numbers as was requiſite to protect and defend the King, without being headed by any of his Engliſh-Norman Earls or Barons? But the Doctor indeed begs the Queſtion that is to be proved, viz. that the Engliſh had neither Arms, Power nor Eſtates left, but what depended upon the Normans: for he ſhould firſt have proved that they had no Arms, and conſequently no Power; and ſecondly, that tho many of their Eſtates might depend upon ſuch Normans as were then againſt the King, yet their Engliſh Military Tenants could never have taken Arms againſt their own Lords in hopes of better Terms, and an eaſier Government. And the Doctor muſt grant, that the Engliſh then met in ſuch Numbers, as ſerved to defend this King, or elſe he muſt contradict Florence of Worceſter whom he has cited to that purpoſe.

THEREFORE as to the Doctor's Challenge, wherein he defies any man to ſhew him any Engliſh-Saxon, that was either Earl or Baron, or that had any Power or Share in the Government, or many that had conſiderable Eſtates (it then ſeems however there were ſome) who did not hold them of the Normans. To this I anſwer, That I hope he will one day be ſo ingenuous as to perform his Promiſe, and confeſs himſelf miſtaken; for moſt of theſe Queries he here makes, are either falſe or impertinent: for the Queſtion is not, Whether there were any Engliſh men Earls or Great Peers of the Realm at this time, or whether they were Privy Counſellors? But that divers of them were Tenants in Capite, and conſequently Barons of leſs Degree, if not of the Superior, at the end of the Reign of William the Firſt, I have already in part proved from Doomſday-Book, and ſhall prove it farther anon; and if they were Barons, they had alſo a Voice in the Common Council of the Kingdom, and as ſuch had a ſhare in the Government.

BUT the Doctor makes it a great Buſineſs, that this King granted the Engliſh their Woods and Foreſts, and Hunting in them, and deſires to know what great Woods or Foreſts the Engliſh then had: and I ask him how he can prove that his Normans had then any Foreſts? for he is but meanly skill'd in our Foreſt-Law, that does not know that a Foreſt can only belong to the King; and if any ſuch be granted to a Subject, it loſes both its Name and Privileges, and becomes a Chaſe. But indeed the Doctor impoſes upon himſelf as well as his Readers, by tranſlating the words ſuas Sylvas, in our Authors, their Foreſts; whereas by thoſe words there is no more meant, than ſuch Woods adjoining to Foreſts that then belonged to Engliſh Subjects, ſuch as we now call Purlieus, which were, till King John granted the Charter of Foreſts, as much under the Foreſt-Laws as thoſe places themſelves. And as for ſuch Woods as theſe, why the Engliſh might not then be Proprietors of them as well as the Normans, I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me any ſufficient reaſon.

BUT that many of the Engliſh Gentry in W. Rufus's Reign, had Eſtates ſufficient to enable them to hunt, not only in their own Woods, but in the King's Foreſts too, appears by a Paſſage in Eadmerus, who
Lib. 2. p. 48. giving us an account of this King's harſh and cruel Nature, relates, that about Fifty of the antient Engliſh Gentry, who enjoy'd ſome of their old Eſtates, were taken and accuſed for killing the King's Deer; and
* i. e. Ordeal. having for this undergone the trial of * Fire and Water, and were clear'd, he fell into a great Rage, and uttered ſeveral blaſphemous Expreſſions, as needleſs as it would be profane here to repeat them.

THIS is ſufficient to ſhew you, that there were at this time many Engliſh Gentlemen left, of ſufficient Eſtates, to be capacitated for Hunting, either in their own, or the King's Woods.

Gloſſ. p. 89. BUT as for the reſt of the Doctor's Authorities, they being more ſlight and trivial, need not any long deſcant upon them: And firſt for that Paſſage of Eadmerus in his Life of Archbiſhop Anſelm, who, as this Author relates, was invited over by Hugh Earl of Cheſter, and other Earls and Chief Men of the Engliſh. Now, ſays the Doctor, theſe were all Normans, and yet are here called Engliſh; but ſure he believes that no body but himſelf can diſcover the true ſenſe of theſe words, or elſe he would never go about ſo palpably to impoſe upon his Readers: for tho this Author calls theſe Noblemen Principes Anglorum, that is, Earls of England, yet he does no where call them Anglos, Engliſh-men, as the Authors above-cited ſtile thoſe Engliſh that aſſiſted William Rufus. And the ſame Sophiſtry the Doctor makes uſe of in two other Authorities in the next Page, which therefore require no particular anſwer.

BUT here alſo he takes out two Paſſages from Matthew Paris's Hiſtory of King Henry the Firſt, where that Author ſays, that before he was Crowned, he convened the Clergy and all the People, or Laity, to London, and promiſed them an amendment of the Laws, if they would receive him as their King. In ſhort, the Clergy and Great Men unanimouſly agreed to make him ſo upon thoſe Conditions; and he was then crowned by the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of London. P. 55.

NOW (ſays the Doctor) both theſe Biſhops that Crown'd him were Normans, as alſo were all the other Biſhops of England at that time (ſee Bp Godwin de Præſul.) and likewiſe all the Earls, Barons and Great men were Normans; and yet in the next page, Matt. Paris ſays, King Henry was crown'd de Communi Conſilio gentis Anglorum. I cannot here deny, that the Biſhops, Earls, and a great many of the Barons, were at this time Normans, either by Nation or Extraction; and that ſuch of them as were born here, and had ſucceeded to their Father's Earldoms and Baronies, might very well be called Engliſh-men; but neither Biſhop Godwin (whom the Doctor here cites) nor any other Author ſays (what he adds I ſuppoſe out of his own head) that all the Barons, as well of the Greater as Leſſer ſort (and whom I ſuppoſe to be preſent at this Council) were all Normans, and none of them of Engliſh extraction; for otherwiſe, had they been all Foreiners, why ſhould they ſo unanimouſly agree to make Henry King, upon condition, that he would grant them thoſe antient Liberties and Cuſtoms which were uſed in England in the time of the Holy King Edward? P. 56.

BUT this Clauſe the Doctor thought fit to conceal, becauſe it would have helped to lay open the weakneſs of the Concluſion he would fain draw from this Story.

THIS Artifice being thus diſcovered, will alſo ſhew another piece of the like Sophiſtry in wreſting another Paſſage of the ſame Author, viz. That this King Henry, fearing the Title of his Brother Robert, and the Revolt of the Engliſh Normans, called the Magnates or Great men of the Kingdom together, and in a flattering Speech beſpoke their Aſſiſtance. Now theſe Great men he ſpoke to were all Normans, and yet, becauſe moſt of them might be born in England, in that reſpect he calls them Indigenas, Homebred, or born in the ſame Country with himſelf, and Natural Engliſh. Gloſſ. p. 9. Mat. Par. p. 62.

I HERE grant indeed that King Henry might very juſtly call thoſe Young Engliſh Normans of about the ſame Age with Himſelf, Countrymen and Natural Engliſh; but that theſe were the only Magnates or Great men of England he then ſpoke to, and that none of them were Engliſh men by Extraction, as well as Birth, the Doctor has not yet proved, nor I believe ever will be able.

BUT becauſe the Prefaces of ſo many Charters of the five firſt Kings of the Norman Race lie acroſs in his way, and are againſt this Notion of the Doctor, which are directed commonly Omnibus Baronibus

nibus ſuis Francis & Anglis; or elſe Omnibus Fidelibus, Francis & Anglis, of which the Doctor himſelf has given us indeed a large Catalogue, where theſe Words are inſerted: yet notwithſtanding the words Francis & Anglis are ſo often diſtinctly made uſe of, not only in the Charters of thoſe Kings, but alſo in thoſe of their Earls and great Barons, which were ſent to their Tenants or Feudataries with the ſame directions; yet however the Doctor thinks to get over this by the like ſlight of hand, as he did the former, and will needs have this great variety of Directions in all thoſe Charters to be "mere forms and no-"thing elſe, and that they were never deſigned to diſtinguiſh the Ex-"traction or Countries of thoſe to whom they were directed, ſeeing "the Engliſh were no ways concern'd in them as to their Contents, "either in point of Intereſt, or any advantage they were to receive "by them.

Gloſſ. p. 10, 11.

ALL which is merely gratis dictum, and without any manner of proof: for can any Man that underſtands common ſenſe believe, that theſe Kings, or their Chancellors, or even thoſe Clerks that drew theſe Earls and Baron's Charters, would in an Age that ſo much abhor'd multiplying Words and unneceſſary Forms, cumber their Patents and Charters with thoſe idle Directions of Francis and Anglis, had there not been ſome real ground for them at firſt? And that there was ſo in ſome of thoſe Charters cited by the Doctor, he himſelf grants, and particularly in that of King William the Firſt to the City of London, which being in old Engliſh Saxon, he thus tranſcribes, "William King "greets William the Biſcop, and Godfrey Portrefan et calle ya Burghwaren "binnen London Frenciſſe & Engliſce; That is, King William greets William the Biſhop, and Godfrey the Port-Reve, and all the Inhabitants of the Burgh within London, French and Engliſh. Here, I ſay, the Doctor grants, that theſe words French and Engliſh are to be underſtood in their natural and proper ſignification; "For, ſays he, "at King William's firſt entrance, many Engliſh enjoy'd their Eſtates, "and Titles, as they had done before his coming; and it may be "ſome of them until he had wholly ſubdued the Nation: ſo that "by French and Engliſh in this Charter, the Saxons and Normans are "to be underſtood as diſtinct; and indeed in Burghs and Trading "Towns thoſe words may be ſo underſtood at all times.

Ib. p. 10.

Ib. p. 15.

SO likewiſe in that Charter of Roger Earl of Warwick, cited by the Doctor, directed Omnibus Baronibus ſuis & Burgenſibus, & Omnibus Hominibus ſuis Francis & Anglis, ſalutem. By which Charter he confirm'd divers Lands, &c. to the Churches of St. Maries and All Saints (I ſuppoſe in Warwick:) whence it is plain, that this being directed to all his Barons and Burgeſſes of Warwick, and to all his men or Tenants, both French and Engliſh, theſe laſt words muſt refer to all that goes before; and if there were Engliſh Burgeſſes in that Town, which I ſuppoſe the Doctor will not deny, I cannot ſee any reaſon why he ſhould not have had alſo Engliſh Barons or Tenants under him, as well as Frenchmen or Normans, eſpecially if the word Baron be taken in the ſenſe the Doctor himſelf allows it in his Preface to the Norman Hiſtory; when citing a Charter of King Henry the Firſt directed * Samſoni Epiſcopo, & Urſoni de Abitot, & Omnibus Baronibus Francis & Anglis de Wirceſtreſcira, Salutem: Upon which word Baronibus, the Doctor at the very bottom of this leaf has this note; "That by theſe Barones here,

P. 143.

* i.e. Biſhop of Worceſter.

" are to be underſtood Milites, ſuch as held by Military Service, or " Barones Minores, Lords of Towns or Mannors, or perhaps Free- " holders, which, if any, were then of better account, before Town- " ſhips, Mannors and Lands were parcell'd out into ſmall Diviſi- " ons.

NOW I deſire the Doctor to give me any tolerable good reaſon, why theſe Barones, the ſmaller ſort of Barons or Freeholders, might not have been Native Engliſh-men, as well as Foreigners, ſince they might ſtill have been dependent upon other Lords, whither Engliſh-men or Normans it matters not? But perhaps he will ſtill urge, " That the words in many of thoſe Kings Charters cannot be taken " in that general ſenſe, they being often directed, not only Omnibus " Baronibus, or Fidelibus in general, but Omnibus Baronibus & Fideli- " bus ſuis, by which none elſe can be underſtood but the King's own " Barons or Tenants in Capite; ſo that, ſays he, if theſe Directions " were made with intention of a diſtinctive Note, between the Old " Engliſh Saxon, and new French or Norman Barons, 'tis ſtrange " that after the Conqueror was firmly eſtabliſhed in the Throne, and " at the very time of making ſome few of theſe Charters in and to- " ward the end of his Reign, and of the others in the Reigns of " William the Second, and Henry the Firſt, &c. not one Engliſh Saxon " Baron ſhould be found or heard of: from whence he concludes 'tis " evident, if real Barons were meant or intended by the words Barones " Franci & Angli, the Engliſh Barons cover'd under thoſe Expreſſi- " ons, could be no other than ſuch as had been born in England of " Norman Parents, or ſuch as came in with the Conqueror, that had " great Eſtates given them, and made their conſtant abode in Eng- " land; and the Norman Barons no other than ſuch as had great " Eſtates and Baronies in England, as well as they had in Normandy, " where they either altogether, or for the moſt part reſided, and were " not in England but upon extraordinary Occaſions, and extraordi- " nary Summons; and differ'd not from the others by National Pa- " ternal Deſcent, or Extraction, but only by National Reſidence, or " Nativity; from whence they had their Denominations of French " and Engliſh. So far the Doctor.

THEN at laſt this whole diſpute may be reduced into this ſingle Aſſertion, That tho the Leſs Barons, or Lords of Mannors, who held of French or Norman Lords, might be Engliſh, and ſo hold their Eſtates of them; yet that under theſe words Baronibus, or Fidelibus ſuis, ſo often uſed in King William and his Succeſſors Charters, no real Barons, or Tenants in Capite could be meant, becauſe no ſuch men of the Engliſh Saxon Extraction were then to be found or heard of; and therefore only Normans, or of Norman Race, who had great Eſtates in England, muſt be here intended, under the Titles of Francis & Anglis above-mention'd. This is indeed a meer begging of the Queſtion; for I think I have already ſufficiently proved, that not only in the beginning of King William's Reign, but alſo at the very time when Doomſday-Book was made, there were a competent number of Native Engliſh Tenants in Capite in all or moſt Counties of England, ſufficient to juſtify the Direction of theſe Charters to have been ſome- what more than mere matter of Form: and therefore the Doctor's Suppoſition is altogether airy and groundleſs, when he will needs have the words Norman or French Barons mentioned as well in our Hiſtorians, as in theſe Charters, to mean only ſuch as had Eſtates, both in England and Normandy; for if this had been all the difference, it would not only have been a very confus'd, but alſo a very needleſs and impertinent way of writing; for why ſhould theſe be called Norman Barons, only becauſe they had Eſtates in Normandy as well as in England, ſince no man in the Laws, or Charters of this Kingdom, is ever called an Earl or Baron of a Foreign Country, when his chief Title and Eſtate lies in this? And I deſire the Doctor to tell me, when after King James the Firſt (who was alſo King of Scotland) became King of England, he had created the Duke of Lenox Duke of Richmond, and advanced ſome Earls and Barons of Scotland to the like Titles in England, in which (as well as in Scotland) they then had Eſtates; if that King ſhould have iſſued out a Charter or Proclamation concerning ſomething to be done or obſerved by them in England, and had directed it to all his Engliſh and Scotiſh Dukes, Earls and Barons, whither any man would at this day underſtand by theſe Titles, that the King meant only ſuch Scotiſh Noblemen as had Eſtates no where but in England, and by Scotiſh Barons only ſuch Noblemen of that Nation as had Eſtates in both Kingdoms. Now if it were abſurd to underſtand a Charter of our own Age in ſo forced a ſenſe, it is much more ſo to think it could have been ſo underſtood in Charters made above ſix hundred years ago, when they were much plainer in their own Expreſſions, and not ſo much given to needleſs Formalities and empty Tautologies, as we often find in the Charters and other Writings of later times.

I HAVE dwelt the longer upon this Head, becauſe the Doctor has taken ſo much Pains, by all the Artifices that forc'd Interpretations, and wreſting of Words could afford him, to evade the moſt plain and evident Teſtimonies which either Hiſtorians or Records can afford us, to prove, that the old Engliſh Saxon Nobility and Gentry had ſtill ſufficient Eſtates left them during the Reigns of the four or five firſt Kings of the Norman Race, as to give them the Title of Barons of the Kingdom, as well of the Superior as Inferior Order; but whither the Doctor has handled this Queſtion as becomes a Perſon of that Candour and Ingenuity he deſires to be thought Maſter of, I ſhall leave to the indifferent Reader to judg.

I COME now to the next Point in Controverſy, viz. Whither King William alter'd the moſt conſiderable part of the Old Engliſh Saxon Laws, and introduced New ones from Normandy, which he impos'd upon the Nation by his own ſole Authority: and the Doctor's Reaſons for this Aſſertion I will here examine, and ſhall begin with his Anſwer to Mr. Petit's Book, intituled, The Rights of the Commons, &c. Aſſerted; where the Doctor gives this, as a main Reaſon for
P. 14. his pretended Conqueſt, That it appears, firſt, by his (viz. King William's) bringing in a New Law, and impoſing it upon the People; and 'tis clear he did ſo: The Juſticiaries or Chief Juſtices, the Chancellors, the Lawyers, the Miniſterial Officers, and Under-Judges, Earls, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Lords of Mannors, and Hundredaries, were all Normans, and that from his firſt coming, until above a hundred years after, as he pretends to make it out by particular Inſtances, and undeniable

niable Reaſons, were not the Catalogues too long to be inſerted: "If therefore, ſays he, the Officers above-mention'd, viz. all ſuch "as heard Cauſes, and gave Judgment, were Normans; if the Law-"yers and Pleaders were alſo Normans, the Pleadings and Judgments "in their ſeveral Courts muſt of neceſſity have been in that Lan-"guage, and the Law alſo, the Norman Law; otherwiſe they had "ſaid and done they knew not what, and judged they knew not "how; eſpecially when the Controverſies were determined by Mi-"litary men, Earls, Sheriffs, Lords of Mannors, &c. that under-"ſtood not the Engliſh Tongue, or Law: or when the chief Juſtici-"ary himſelf was a Military Man, as it often happen'd, and under-"ſtood only the Norman Language.

IN anſwer to theſe Arguments brought by the Learned Doctor, tho it ſhould be granted that the Chief Juſticiaries, the Chancellors, Chief Juſtices, and other Great Officers of the Crown, were all, or the greateſt part of them, Normans, during the Reigns of the four or five firſt Kings of the Norman Race; yet does it therefore follow that theſe made a change in the very Subſtance of our Laws? tho in Matters of Form, as in Pleadings, or other Judicial proceedings, they might have introduced great Alterations: For as to the Body of the Municipal Laws of this Kingdom, concerning the Deſcent and Conveyance of Eſtates, they remain'd the ſame after the coming in of the Normans; and Lands held by Military Service deſcended to the eldeſt Son before the Conqueſt, as Lands in Free Soccage, and Gavel-kind to all the Sons alike, as at this day. So likewiſe there were Eſtates in Tail, and Fee-Simple, as now: And there were alſo the like Cuſtoms of the Courteſy of England, Burraugh-Engliſh, as there are at this day, which I can prove by ſeveral Paſſages out of our Engliſh-Saxon-Laws. So likewiſe for Conveyance of Eſtates, thoſe of the better ſort of People, which were called Bockland, were conveyed by Deeds, with Livery and Seiſin, either with or without Warranty, as now: But that which was called Folkland, and held by the meaner ſort, were only by Livery of Seiſin without any Writing. And admit I ſhould grant that the Cuſtom of ſealing of Deeds is derived from the Normans, yet that is an Alteration only in matter of Form; and however, it was in uſe before the pretended Conqueſt among Perſons of the beſt Rank, as Ingulph expreſly tells us, being a Cuſtom brought in by Edward the Confeſſor out of that Country.

AS for Goods and Money, they were bequeathable by a Man's laſt Will, as well before as after the Dr's Conqueſt; and if the Reader can have the opportunity to peruſe a MS. Treatiſe of Sir Roger Owen's upon this Subject, he will find it there ſufficiently proved, that Livery of Seiſin, Licenſes, or Fines for Alienation, Daughters to inherit as Copartners, Trials by Juries, Abjurations, Outlawries, Coroners, diſpoſing of Lands by Will, Eſcheats, Wrecks, Warrantjes, Forfeiture of Felon's Goods, and many other parts of our Common Law, were in being long before the time of King William the Firſt.

NOW if this was ſo as to the Municipal Law, let us ſee what Alterations there were made in the Criminal, or Crown-Law: Firſt, as to Treaſon and Wilful Murther, they were puniſhed with Death in the Saxon times as well as after; as were alſo Robbery and Burglary in the Night-time. And as to leſs Offences, ſuch as Batteries, Maihems, hems, Robberies, and other Breaches of the Peace, they were puniſhed by Fine, as well before the Conqueſt as after: but as for the Law of Engleſcherie, which was, that if a Man were found murthered, it ſhould be preſumed he was an Alien or French-man, and the Town where the Body was found was to be fined, unleſs Engleſcherie was made out, i. e. that the Perſon was an Engliſh-man: this Cuſtom laſted to the Reign of Edward the Third, and then it was taken away by a Statute made on purpoſe: And tho this may ſeem a Badg of the Norman Conqueſt, yet it was indeed a Law introduced by King Knute in behalf of his Danes, who being often found killed, and none could tell by whom, he got this Law to be made to prevent it, as you will ſee at large in * Bracton, and the Mirrour of Juſtices. But as for the Trial of all Offences, whatever it was, either by Juries, Fire, or Water-Ordeal, or elſe by Witneſſes or Compurgators upon Oath, as well before as after King William's Entrance; I can find nothing material touching the Alterations of the Criminal Laws as to the manner of Trials, from what they were in the Saxons time.

* Lib. 3. de Coron. c. 15.

ALL this being ſo, it may eaſily be made out how the Juſticiaries, and other Great Officers mention'd by the Doctor, might be Normans, and yet the main Body of the Laws continue Engliſh ſtill: For, firſt it is certain (and the Doctor himſelf grants it) that for four or five years in the beginning of King William's Reign, he made no great alteration in the Judges, Sheriffs, and other Officers of the Kingdom; and then thoſe whom he was afterwards pleaſed to put into the rooms of ſuch Engliſh-men as either died or were turned out, might very well be ſuppoſed to underſtand the Laws of England, as far as they differed from thoſe of Normandy, which was not in very many particulars, as the Doctor himſelf likewiſe admits, and very well obſerves, that the Saxons and Normans being both Northern People, had many of the ſame Laws and Cuſtoms common to both; ſo that the Norman Judges in three or four years time, might very well have learned Engliſh enough to have underſtood the Evidence of the Witneſſes, without any Interpreter, I mean in Inferior Courts in the Country.

BUT ſuppoſe all the Pleadings and Judgments were in French, it does not therefore follow that all the Lawyers and Pleaders muſt be French-men too; for why might not the Engliſh Lawyers have learn'd French enough, to be able to plead Cauſes in that Language in four or five years time? which muſt neceſſarily be required before ſo great an Alteration could be made, or that Pleaders enough could be brought out of Normandy, and ſufficiently inſtructed in our Laws and Cuſtoms, ſo as to be fitted for their Employments. Again, ſuppoſing the Pleadings and other Proceedings to have been in French, it does not follow that this Practice could have obtained in all the Courts of England: for tho I ſhould grant that 'twas ſo in the King's Courts at Weſtminſter, where many of the Judges were French-men or Normans; yet this could only have effect either in that Great Court, or Curia Regis, where the King often ſate in Perſon, together with his Chief Juſticiary, and other Juſtices his Aſſiſtants (for as for the Court of Common-Pleas it was not then ſeparate from the Kings-Bench) or elſe in the Court of Exchequer, where in thoſe days Matters concerning the King's Debts, Lands and Revenues, were chiefly heard and

diſpatched. But as for the Court of Chancery, it was not then uſed as a Court of Equity, nor long after, not until the Reign of Henry the Sixth: and then it aroſe by degrees, as you will find in Sir William Dugdale his Origines Juridiciales.

SO that I ſay, granting all the Proceedings in theſe Supreme Courts to have been in French, for the Reaſons already given, yet was this of no great importance in compariſon of the far greater number of Suits and Cauſes which were firſt begun, try'd and determined in the Inferior Courts in the Country, before ever they could be brought up to London by Writ of Error, or other Writs of like nature, and which could only be in Cauſes of great moment, or between the King's Tenants in Capite: for I think it can be well enough made out, that moſt Law-Suits in thoſe times were begun in the Court-Barons, or elſe in the Hundred or County-Courts, and were there diſpatched, and were very rarely (unleſs between Great and Eminent Perſons) removed to London.

THE like I may ſay of all Criminal Caſes, as Treaſons, Murthers, and Felonies, which were then commonly tried before the Sheriff at the County-Court, or elſe within the particular Juriſdictions of Biſhops, Abbots, or Great Lords; Or, laſtly, of ſuch Citys and Towns as had the Privileges of Infangthief and Outfangthief, together with foſſa and furca, that is, a Pit to drown in, and a Gallows to hang Malefactors upon, before their own Seneſchal, or other Officer; Juſtices Itinerant not being aſſigned for theſe purpoſes till long after, in the Reign of Henry the Second.

BUT Dr. Brady is either ſo ignorant, or unmindful of this, both in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt, as alſo in his Gloſſary, that he will not allow any Free-men to owe Suit or Service to the County-Court, but only Tenants in Capite, or other Tenants by Military Service: which he endeavours to prove from the 58*th* Law of King William the Firſt, whereby it is ordain'd, That all Earls, Barons, Knights, and their Servants or Eſcuyers, and all Freemen of our whole Kingdom, be always fitted with Horſe and Arms as they ought to be, and always ready to perform the whole Service to us (viz. the King) when there ſhall be need; and which they ought to do according to, and by reaſon of, their Fees and Tenures. Tit. Liberi Homines, Liberi Tenentes.

AND theſe (ſays the Doctor) were the only Legal men that named and choſe Juries, and ſerved on Juries themſelves, both in the County and Hundred-Courts, and diſpatched all Country buſineſs under the ſaid Great Officers, as will (ſays he) appear by the next Law, with his Explication upon it: Yet farther grants in the next Paragraph, that beſides the Tenants in Capite, ſome of the greateſt of their Military Under-Tenants, were often Sheriffs, Hundredaries, and other Judges, and Miniſterial Officers in their ſeveral Counties; and the Judgment they were to give, and the Juſtice they were to do by this Law (beſides that in their own Courts and Juriſdictions) was principally, as they were Jurors or Recognitors upon Aſſizes, &c. As may be ſeen in Glanvil almoſt every where, but eſpecially Lib. 2. c. 10, 11. Lib. 9. c. 7. c. 13. and Lib. 13. throughout. And that this, of being Suitors to the County and Hundred-Courts, &c. was a Service incident to their Tenures.

Ib. P. 20. AND in the next Page but one, the Doctor ſays, "The truth is, "the greateſt part of the Antient Law under our firſt Kings after the "Conqueſt, was the Feudal Law, brought hither by the Normans, "under whom it was more rigidly exacted and obſerved than in the "Saxon times, and that by, and only upon the Normans themſelves; "for the Engliſh had neither Eſtates nor Fortunes left, and therefore "it could be no great matter to them by what Law, Right or Pro-"perty other men held their Eſtates.

IN anſwer to which I ſay, that tho the Doctor is ſo far in the right, that none but Freemen, or Freeholders, then ow'd Suit and Service to the County-Court, or could judg Cauſes therein; yet he is under a very great miſtake, when he will confine thoſe Freemen who owed this Service, to none but the Tenants in Capite, or their Under-Tenants by Knight's-Service; ſince even Tenants in Free Soccage, albeit they poſſeſſed but a ſmall quantity of Land, were likewiſe obliged to appear at the County-Court, as is eaſy to be proved, ſince the very ſame Perſons who were Suitors or Judges in the Court of the Hundred, were alſo Suitors or Judges in that of the County. And this I prove from * Sir Hen. Spelman's Gloſſary, Eſt autem Hundredus portio Comitatus, qua olim degebant Centum pacis regiæ Fide-Juſſores, alii Decuria, qua decem; complexus eſt igitur Hundredus decem Decurias, at Centenarius numerus, Decies denarium. Now that the County-Court conſiſted of the ſame ſort of Perſons with that of the Hundred, is alſo as certain, ſince all England was then, as now, divided into Counties, Hundreds and Tythings: ſo that as the Hundred-Court conſiſted of a hundred Perſons, who had all given Pledges to the King; ſo did the County-Court conſiſt of all the Freeholders or Freemen of the ſeveral Hundreds of the County, who all owed Suit and Service to it; and as ſuch were returnable upon Juries on Aſſizes or Trials, until the Statute of Weſt. II. which limited them in Aſſizes or Trials, to Perſons that could diſpend no leſs than twenty Shillings yearly, unleſs ſuch Aſſizes and Juries were taken out of the Shire, and then they muſt be of ſuch as were able to diſpend forty Shillings per Annum at the leaſt, which was in thoſe days as much in proportion as forty Pounds at this day.

* Tit. Hundredus.

Cap. 37.

BUT to come more cloſely to the Queſtion in hand; I ſhall now proceed to prove, from Dr. Brady's own words, that thoſe who ſerved upon Juries in William the Conqueror, and his Son's Reigns, were for the moſt part Engliſh-men, and not Normans or French-men; and for this end I ſhall here tranſcribe them verbatim from his Treatiſe intituled, Animadverſions upon Mr. Atwood's Book, called, Jani Anglorum Facies Nova. The Doctor's words are theſe;

P. 192.

"IN Trials of Novel Diſſeiſins, and for the Poſſeſſions of Lands, "Cuſtoms, Services, &c. the Juries at the time of the Conqueſt, and "in ſeveral of the Kings Reigns next ſucceeding, were impanel'd out "of the ſame Town and Neighbourhood, of ſuch as did know the "Land, and things in Queſtion, and who had been poſſeſſed of it, "and for what time; and to this purpoſe in an Aſſize, if none of the "Jurors knew the Right it ſelf, or Truth of the matter, and did "teſtify ſo much to the Court upon Oath, Recourſe was then had to "others, until ſuch were found who did know the Truth; but if "ſome did know the Truth, and others not, thoſe that knew it not Grand Cuſtom. f. 93. a. c. 69. de Jure. f. 113. b. c. 93. de brief de Novelle Diſſaiſine. Glanv. l. 2. c. 17.

" were put by, and others called into the Court, until Twelve at leaſt " ſhould be found to agree therein. And for this Purpoſe it was, that " all Suitors to the Hundred, and County-Court, were bound to ap- " pear there under great Penalties, that there might be a Jury of " ſuch as knew whoſe the Land was.

NOW that thoſe Jury-men who ſerved upon Trials of the greateſt moment during King William's Reign, muſt have been for the moſt part Engliſh, appears from this very Authority. For if any Diſpute about a Title to Lands did ariſe, as for example, who was Owner of it in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, how could any but Natural Engliſh-men, or ſuch Normans who were ſettled here before the Doctor's Conqueſt, know, or be able to teſtify, who was then Owner of the Land in queſtion? For certainly the Normans lately come over could know little or nothing of the matter; and of this the Doctor alſo has given us another undeniable Teſtimony, from Doomſday-Book, where it is thus found, Teſtatur Hundredus, Teſte Hundreda, i. e. the Hundred witneſſeth, that ſuch Lands were in ſuch a Man's poſſeſſion; or by witneſs of the Hundred, ſuch Lands were in ſuch a Man's Poſſeſſion; and bids us ſee the Claims in Yorkſhire, Lincolnſhire and Suffolk, at the end of that Book: which places if any one pleaſe to conſult, he will find, that moſt of the Claims there mentioned were concerning who were the true Owners of the Lands in queſtion in Edward the Confeſſor's time: and therefore the Hundred, that is, the Juries, or Teſtes impannell'd from thence, muſt have been ſuch Native Engliſh-men as very well knew the Matter of Fact.

AND this I ſhall be able to prove from ſeveral Inſtances made uſe of by the Doctor himſelf, and particularly that famous Tryal mention'd in Eadmerus*'s Hiſtory, between Arch-Biſhop Odo and Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, concerning divers Manors and Lands in Kent and other Counties, which this Author thus relates: The King commanded all the Chief and honeſt Men, not only of the County of Kent, but of divers other Counties in England, to be aſſembled; and then that the Complaints of Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc ſhould be produced, heard, and determin'd by them at Pinnedene Heath; whereupon Geoffrey Biſhop of Conſtance, ſupplying the * King's Abſence, did the Arch-Biſhop Juſtice upon theſe his Complaints? * P. 9. Primores & probi viri. * Vice-Regis.

THAT is, He was then the King's Juſticiary, and ſate as Chief Commiſſioner; and that it was a plain County-Court, held before Extraordinary Commiſſioners, conſtituted by King William, as alſo who were the Witneſſes, or Jurors, the Doctor tells us in the ſame place, viz. That they were the Suitors to the County-Court, being the Primores & Probi viri above-mention'd, not only of the County of Kent, but of other Counties of England, where theſe Lands then lay: " But, ſays he, it can be no way probable that the ordinary " Freemen who made the greateſt number, and were all bound to " their Good-behaviour, could be the Probi & Legales homines that " then ſerved upon Juries. P. 193.

ALL which I ſhall for the preſent allow him, tho that Inferior Military Tenants were alſo called Barons as well as the Tenants in Capite, is apparent from thoſe many Charters of Great Lords, and Tenants in Capite in thoſe times, directed (as hath been already obſerved) Omnibus Baronibus ſuis, Francis & Anglis: But let theſe Chief

Chief and Honeſt men, the Jurors, be whom the Doctor pleaſes, that they could have been none other but down-right Engliſh, appears from the Iſſue joyn'd between the Arch-Biſhop the Plaintiff, and Biſhop Odo the Defendant, which was, Whither the Church of Canterbury was ſeized of thoſe Lands or not at the time when King Edward was alive and dead? as appears by all the Circumſtances of the Caſe, tho the Writ it ſelf is not extant: but that all or the greateſt part of theſe Jury-men were Engliſh, is plain, by a more particular Relation of this matter in the Antient Manuſcript of the Church of Rocheſter, called Textus Roffenſis, which was written by Ernulph who was conſecrated Biſhop of that Church, A. D. 1115. not fifty years after the ſuppoſed Conqueſt, and is thought to have wrote this Hiſtory but a few years after his Conſecration; and it does not only contain a Hiſtory of this Church, but alſo many things relating to that of Canterbury, and particularly this great Trial above mention'd, in theſe words, Præcipit Rex Comitatum totum abſque morâ conſidere, & homines Comitatus omnes, Francigenas, & præcipuè Anglos in antiquis legibus & conſuetudinibus peritos, in unum convenire: i. e. the King commanded the whole County to meet, and all the men thereof, viz. the French, but chiefly the Engliſh skill'd in the antient Laws and Cuſtoms, to aſſemble together. Then this Author proceeds further to inform us of the Iſſue of this Great Cauſe which took up the whole County no leſs than Three days, in which time the Arch-Biſhop * recovered by pleading many Lands which Biſhop Odo and his Tenants at that time held; and then concludes with telling us who were preſent beſides the Judges or Commiſſioners, viz. divers other Biſhops, Algeric Biſhop of Chicheſter a very old man, & Legum Terræ ſapientiſſimus, moſt learned or skilful in the Laws of the Land, who was carried thither in a Waggon by the King's Command, ad ipſas antiquas Leges & Legum conſuetudines diſcutiendas & edocendas; to inſtruct them, viz. the Judges, in the antient Legal Cuſtoms: and he adds farther, that there were alſo there as Auditors or Spectators, many Barons of the King and of the Arch-Biſhop, beſides divers others of ſeveral other Counties, being men of great Authority, both French and Engliſh.

NOW what can be more expreſs than that not only moſt of the Jury-men of this County were Engliſh, but that alſo the Law they judged by was the Engliſh Law? or elſe what need was there for this old Biſhop to be brought ſo far, to inſtruct them in it?

NOW that theſe French and Engliſh could be no other than Primores & Probi viri (mention'd in Eadmerus) the Suitors to this County-Court, who were ſummon'd to try this Great Cauſe, I ſuppoſe the Doctor himſelf cannot deny, tho in his Anſwer to Mr. Atwood he ſlightly paſſes over this part of the Authority, becauſe he knew it was not to be anſwered; nor do I know what he can ſay to it, but that theſe Engliſh-men might appear as Suitors to this County-Court, becauſe it being held within the firſt Four years of King William's Reign, the Engliſh-men of Kent, and thoſe other Counties mentioned by the Doctor, were not then turn'd out of their Eſtates. But this Subterfuge will not help him neither; for it is certain, that Lanfranc was not conſecrated Arch-Biſhop till An. Dom. 1070, being the Fourth year of this King's Reign; and all the reſt of that year he was taken up in the Diſpute between him and Thomas Arch-Biſhop of Tork, Animad. on Jo n. Angl. &c. 193.

York, and could not then have any time to begin a Suit about thoſe Lands detain'd from this Church: and the year following he went to Rome to fetch his Pall, and ſpent moſt of it in his Journey and ſtay there; ſo that it could not be ſooner than two or three years after his Election, viz. about A. D. 1072, or 73. that he had this Trial with Biſhop Odo, which falls out as many years after the time the Doctor ſuppoſes the Engliſh to have already been turn'd out of their Eſtates by his Conqueror, and the whole Kingdom divided among his Followers.

BUT I now come to our next Authority from the Antient Manuſcript Book of Ely, which was written in the time of King Henry the Firſt, and is at preſent in the Cottonian Library; as is alſo another antient Copy in the Hands of the moſt Learned Doctor Gale, Dean of York; in the Second Book of which Hiſtory Cap. 91. that Author tells us, " That in the Second Indiction that fell in this King's Reign, " there was a Diſcuſſion of the antient Rights and Liberties of the " Abby of Ely; which thro the King's Prohibition, and the un- " juſt oppreſſion of his Miniſters, had now layn * 14 years neglected " and ſtifled; but at laſt the King being touched with the hope of " Divine Mercy, commanded by the Biſhop of Bayeux, theſe matters " to be diſcuſſed. Whereupon there was a meeting or Trial of the next adjacent Counties aſſembled at Kenetford, at which were preſent the Abbots of St. Edmonds-bury, Chertſey, Croyland and Holme (their Names I omit) who appeared together with their French and Engliſh Tenants: There were alſo the King's Commiſſioners, whoſe Names being mentioned in the following Writ, I likewiſe paſs by: There were beſides preſent the Sheriffs of four Counties, viz. Eſſex, Hereford, Huntington, and Bedford; with very many approved Knights (or Military Tenants) both French and Engliſh, who put an end to this Diſſenſion, and gave Sentence for the Abbey in theſe words; That Queen Etheldreda (the ſuppoſed Saint or Patroneſs of this Abbey) ſhould enjoy all that was Hers, according to the Privileges of the Kings, Edgar, Ethelred, and Edward, free from all Servitude.

* i.e. from the beginning of this King's Reign.

AND that this Judgment was alſo for Lands, as well as Liberties, appears by this Writ of Poſſeſſion, which the Doctor himſelf hath tranſcribed from Mr. Atwood's Janus Anglorum; Willielmus Anglorum Rex, Omnibus Fidelibus ſuis & Vicecomitibus, in quorum Vicecomitatibus Abbatia de Hely terras habet, ſalutem. Præcipio quod Abbatia de Hely habeat Omnes Conſuetudines ſuas, &c. has, inquam, habeat, ſicut habuit die qua Rex Edvardus fuit vivus & mortuus; &, ſicut mea juſſione dirationatæ ſunt apud *Keneteford, per plures ſcyras ante meos Barones, viz. Galfridum Conſtantienſem Epiſcopum, &c. with the other Commiſſioners Names needleſs here to be recited. In Engliſh thus; " William King of England, to all his Faithful Subjects and Sheriffs, " in whoſe Sheriffdoms the Abbey of Ely hath Lands, greeting. I com- " mand that the Abbey of Ely have all its Cuſtoms, &c. thoſe, I ſay, let " her have, as ſhe had them the day in which King Edward was alive " and dead; and as by my Command they were proved to belong to her, " at Kenetford by many Shires (that is, by the Suitors to the County- " Court of many Shires) before my Barons, viz. the Commiſſioners " above-mentioned. And preſently after follows in the ſame Book " another Writ of this King's, which ſeems to be a Writ of Right

" and Poſſeſſion joyned in one, which is directed to Archbiſhop Lan-
" franc, Roger Earl of Moreton, and Geoffrey Biſhop of Conſtance, " commanding them to cauſe to be aſſembled all the Shires which " were preſent at the Plea held concerning the Lands of the Church
" of Ely, before my Wife (i.e. the Queen) laſt came into Normandy;
" with whom alſo may be preſent as many of my Barons as there can " well, that were preſent at the ſaid Plea, and do hold the Land of the " ſaid Church: Who being aſſembled, may chuſe as many of ſuch
" Engliſh, as know how the Lands belonged to the ſaid Church on the " day of King Edward's death. And then follows a Clauſe of Reſtitution.

FROM all which Teſtimonies we may draw theſe Concluſions:

FIRST, That theſe Proceedings were agreed before a County-Court.

SECONDLY, That the Suitors or Jury-men were partly French and partly Engliſh-men, all Freeholders, or men of Eſtates, who knew the Matter of Fact, and were able to try this Iſſue, viz. to whom thoſe Lands belonged when King Edward was alive and dead.

THIRDLY, That theſe Engliſh Gentlemen were poſſeſſed of their Eſtates at the time of this laſt County-Court: For tho the Writ be without Date, and that it is difficult to find out the exact time of this meeting, by the Queen's laſt going into Normandy; yet it is certain, by the Relation of theſe Proceedings above-mentioned, that the beginning of this Suit was firſt commenced in the ſecond Indiction, which falls out in the Fourteenth year of this King's Reign, viz. 1079. tho it is very likely that this Writ of Poſſeſſion was not executed till the year following, which is near nine years after the time
* Compl. Hiſt. Ib. the * Doctor aſſigns for his Conqueror's ouſting the Engliſh of their Eſtates. And if ſo be that many Engliſh held their Eſtates ſo near the end of his Reign, why they ſhould not do ſo likewiſe to the very time that Doomſday-Book was made, I deſire the Doctor to give us a good and ſufficient Reaſon; as alſo why thoſe Engliſh Jurors in the preſent Caſe of the Iſle of Ely, ſhould not be the Primores & Probi viri, the Chief and the honeſt Men in the four Counties laſt mentioned, as they were out of ſeven Counties at the other Trial at Pinnedene, concerning the Lands belonging to the Church of Canterbury.

THE Concluſion which I ſhall draw from theſe laſt Precedents, is this, That as great part of the old Tenants of the Land were not chang'd after this pretended Conqueſt, ſo neither were the Laws, and manner of Pleading in the County, and other Inferior Courts, from
P. 9. what they were before, as plainly appears by a Paſſage in Eadmerus, which immediatly follows after that already cited, and is to this effect; " Alſo another time Biſhop Odo, by the King's Permiſſion, be" gan a new Plea or Suit againſt the aforeſaid Church, and Lanfranc
" its Patron and Defender: And he (viz. Odo) produced all thoſe
" he knew moſt skilful in the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom of " England. The Iſſue of which was, That when the Cauſe came to be tried, thoſe who appeared in defence of the Church, were at the firſt onſet baffled, and loſt all the Cauſes that were then tried, tho indeed Lanfranc afterward producing ſome better Evidences which had not appeared before, the firſt judgment at Pinnedene was affirm'd; yet however it ſhews, that even Biſhop Odo himſelf (as great a Favorite as he was) could not hope (without ſomething of pure Norman Law) to prevail againſt the old Engliſh Laws and Cuſtoms, which cauſed him to make uſe of thoſe Engliſh-men who beſt underſtood them; and that the Engliſh Monks were great Pleaders of Cauſes in thoſe times, appears from the Antient Manuſcript-Hiſtory of the Abbey of Abbingdon in the ſame Cottonian Library, where the Author mentions Sacolus and Godric two Monks, who had pleaded a Cauſe of theirs with that great Skill and Eloquence, that thoſe who heard them became of their Opinion; and ſays, there were at that time many other Engliſh Lawyers in that Abbey whoſe Pleadings no body could gainſay: and therefore the Doctor is very much miſtaken in inferring from one ſingle place in Malmesbury, which ſays, that there was in his Time no Clerk but what was a Pleader; that therefore all Pleaders in the County, and other Inferior Courts were Normans, or French-men, unleſs he could alſo prove, that all the Judges in thoſe Courts were of that Country; the contrary to which I have already proved.

Claudius B. 6. L. 2. p. 134. Ib. p. 154.

BUT the Doctor may ſay, if he pleaſes, that they pleaded all in French; which is altogether improbable, ſince the Suit mention'd in that Book was commenced in the County-Court, where I have already made it out, that Engliſh-men were not only Suitors, but Judges alſo of the Matter of Fact, and conſequently muſt have heard thoſe that open'd the Evidence ſpeak in the ſame Language.

I SHALL conclude this Head with another Precedent out of the ſame Book of Rocheſter (which I ſhall here contract) in the relation of a Suit between Gundulph Biſhop of that Church, and Picot Sheriff of Cambridg-ſhire, for certain Lands which belonged to Fracenham, which the Sheriff ſaid belonged to the King, and the Biſhop affirm'd to belong to his Church: and thereupon the King commanded that all the men of that County ſhould be aſſembled, and that the Cauſe ſhould be determin'd by their Judgment to whom the Land of Right belonged: But they being all met (for fear of the Sheriff) adjudged that it belonged to the King, and not to that Church. The reſt of this Relation being long, I ſhall thus contract.

Vid. Text. Roffenſ. printed in Angl. Sacra, Part 1. p. 339.

BUT their Perjury being ſometime after diſcovered, the Biſhop of Bayeux (who was then the King's Juſticiary in his abſence) commanded the Sheriff to ſend to him to London others of the beſt men of the County, who had confirm'd what the former had ſworn before; and thither he alſo caus'd to be aſſembled many of the beſt Barons of England, who being all met together, it was judged, as well by all the French as Engliſh, that thoſe firſt Jurors were all perjur'd; and being condemned by this Judgment, the Biſhop recovered his Land, as it was juſt and right he ſhould.

FROM whence we may obſerve, that either theſe French and Engliſh here mentioned muſt refer to the Barons of England, or elſe to thoſe French and Engliſh Jury-men, who might give in their Verdict before them: for I confeſs the place is obſcure, but be it which way it will, the Doctor's old evaſion of turning French-men into Engliſh, will not here ſerve his turn; ſince, let whom he pleaſes be the Judges, it muſt certainly be determined by the Teſtimony of thoſe Engliſh-Freeholders, who knew the Church's Title to thoſe Lands in queſtion, which the new-come Normans or French-men could not then do.

AND

AND that this Trial happened long after the time the Doctor ſuppoſes the Engliſh-men to have loſt their Eſtates, appears from the time of this Biſhop Gundulph's Election, he not ſucceeding in that See till the year of our Lord 1077, being the Eleventh year of King William's
Id. p. 342. Reign, as is evident by the Annals of the Church of Rocheſter, printed in the ſame Volume.

I HAVE been more large and particular in theſe Authorities, becauſe they prove at once that there was no ſuch great Change in the Laws, Cuſtoms, Pleadings, and Eſtates of the Engliſh, as the Doctor ſuppoſes to have been at this time: nor do I know what he can object againſt theſe plain Authorities, but that they only concern the Lands of Monaſteries; and that the Engliſh here mentioned to have appeared and acted as Jurors at theſe County-Courts in all the Tryals above-mention'd, were the Tenants of thoſe Churches and Abbies in whoſe Lands he muſt grant King William made no great Alteration; it farther appearing from the Abby-Books here cited, that divers Abbots came to theſe Tryals, attended cum Hominibus ſuis, with their Tenants, who were the Engliſh that ſerved as Jurymen at theſe County-Courts.

TO which I anſwer, That it does not appear by the Relations of theſe Tryals abovemention'd, that none but thoſe that held of the Church, were Suitors at theſe County-Courts; and the Relations of theſe Tryals do not limit it to any particular ſort of Tenants, but ſpeak of all the Men of the County, as well French as Engliſh in general, to have aſſembled at theſe County-Courts; and the Manuſcript-Hiſtories of Abbingdon and Ely above-cited do mention the Names of ſeveral Engliſh Noblemen, or Gentlemen, who were at theſe Trials; as alſo of ſeveral others who were either Benefactors, or Tenants to their Church during this King's Reign, and that of his ſon Rufus: and particularly that of Abbingdon acquaints us, that one Turkill an Engliſh Nobleman, gave certain Lands to this Monaſtery, which he would not have done had they belonged to it before; and then preſently afterwards it tells us of another Engliſh Nobleman called Leowin, who bought out-right of the Abbot for ready money the Town of Newham (now Newenham) being a part of his Patrimony, and lying on the other ſide of the Thames. It alſo informs us of one Anskill, a Knight of this Church, and one of the Optimates of this place (I ſuppoſe he means the Country about Abbingdon) for he ſays, he was then Owner of Suvercurd, Speſholt, and Baierde, beſides other Lands. This Gentleman falling into King William Rufus's diſpleaſure upon certain falſe Accuſations, was clap'd up in Priſon, where he ſoon after died; and then the King ſeized the Mannor of Speſholt, and gave it to one Thurſtan his Steward; but however it is plain, that tho he were an Engliſh-man, he till then kept this Eſtate (which was not all held of the Abbey) during the time of this King's Father.

I MIGHT alſo add many Charters of Great Norman Lords which are thus directed, Omnibus Baronibus ſuis, Francis & Anglis; which words, that they were not meer matter of Form, I have already ſufficiently proved; and which is a plain Evidence to me, at leaſt, that all the Military Tenants at that time did not hold only of Monaſteries; but that there were alſo divers of the Engliſh-men Tenants in Capite, the Doctor himſelf muſt allow, ſince in the Great

Tryal

Tryal at Pinneden, he grants, that the Primores & Probi viri, not only of the County of Kent, but of other Counties of England, appear'd as Jurors; the Former being the Great Military Tenants that were not Barons, and the leſs who were the Probi viri: by which it ſeems the Doctor means by the Former, the Tenants in Capite, and by the Latter the Inferior Tenants by Knight's Service; and that great part of theſe were Engliſh-men has been already proved.

IT may be alſo further objected, That theſe Writs of Reſtitution by King William, were only of the Church-Lands; but that it cannot be ſhewn, that any Engliſh-men, when once diſſeized of their Eſtates by the Normans, were ever reſtored to them again.

I GRANT indeed, That no private Families could have the Tenures of their Eſtates ſo preſerved, as Cathedral Churches and Monaſteries, the Monks whereof kept Leiger-Books of all their Manors and Lands; and how they accrued to them, and were either leas'd for Lives, or ſold out-right: whereas the antient Evidences of private Noblemen and Gentlemen's Eſtates were ſeldom carefully kept, at leaſt for many Generations, but were often loſt, or paſs'd away to Heirs Female, or Executors; or elſe to the purchaſers of their Eſtates, who minded no other Writings than what would ſerve to ſecure their preſent Title. Yet I doubt not, but there are divers Families in England, who can at this day by antient Evidences, make out their poſſeſſion of the ſame Lands in their Names from the time of Edward the Confeſſor.

BUT tho I will not inſtance in the known Story of Sharnebune, ſince I own there are juſt Exceptions to be made againſt it, yet I think it may be plainly proved from Doomſday-Book it ſelf, that divers Engliſh-men held the ſame Lands under William the Conqueror, which they or their Anceſtors were poſſeſſed of in his Predeceſſor's time, as Mr. Atwood has proved by many Inſtances, in his Reply to Doctor Brady's Book, entituled, Jus Anglorum ab Antiquo; and that divers old Engliſh Proprietors had their Claims allowed at the making of Doomſday-Book before the King's Commiſſioners, appears by the Book it ſelf in many Places, as particularly under Title;

TO which I reply, That it does not follow, that becauſe he held the firſt parcel of Land, as being the King's Thane or Servant, therefore he held the other by the ſame Tenure, which lay in another Mannor; ſince the Title of the Land mentions no ſuch thing: or if he had, that therefore it was not as his own Inheritance, but held only at the Will of the King (as the Doctor here ſuggeſts) ſince I find nothing to the contrary, but that ſuch Thane-Lands were hereditary even in the Confeſſor's Time, as well as the Offices to which they belonged, and I deſire the Doctor to prove the contrary.

‖ Vid. Sir William Dugdale's Preface to his Hiſt. of Warwickſhire.

I COULD give many more Examples of ſeveral of theſe Thanes, who held the ſame Lands as either they or their Fathers held them in the time of King Edward, which I will not farther inſiſt on, only ſhall ſpeak ſomewhat to his Exceptions againſt theſe Titles; which the Doctor ſays being only of ſuch Lands as were held of the King, not by Knight's Service but Petit-Serjeanty, as for being his Huntſmen, Falconers, and the like; and that for ſmall Eſtates or parcels of Land, they were mere Tenants at Will; and the Conqueror's permitting them to hold ſuch ſmall Eſtates, does not prove but that he might lawfully have taken them away if he had ſo pleaſed.

TO which I reply, That Firſt, the matter of Fact is not true as the Doctor has laid it: for in the firſt place many of theſe Thanes held not only ſmall parcels of Land, but whole Mannors in the time of this King: and in the next place it does not appear, that theſe Thane-lands were only Tenants at the Will of the King; ſince not only the ſame Perſons, but their Fathers, or other Anceſtors, are here ſaid to have enjoy'd the very ſame Lands in Edward the Confeſſor's Time: for that they were held by Right of Inheritance in the time of William the Firſt, the Doctor cannot deny, ſince ſeveral of their Deſcendants held the ſame Eſtates of his Succeſſors by the very ſame Service of Petit-Serjeanty as their Anceſtors had done before, from the very time of the Conqueſt, as I could make out by divers Inſtances, were it worth while to inſiſt upon them, and if the Bounds of this Diſcourſe would permit it.

BUT I have ſet down theſe Examples only as a Taſt, and to ſhew that the Doctor's Exceptions againſt Mr. Atwood's Inſtances, are neither juſt nor true; but I ſhall leave this Subject to that Learned Gentleman, who will defend his own Cauſe againſt the Doctor in a Treatiſe, which, as far as concerns the Queſtion of the Conqueſt, and the Effects of it, has for ſeveral years been ready for the Preſs, and is likely ſoon to be publiſh'd; and therefore ſhall ſay no more upon this Head.

BUT I now come to the main Arguments made uſe of by the Doctor, to prove that King William never ſwore to, or confirm'd King Edward's Laws, tho that body which Ingulphus has given us of them has this Title, Ces ſount les Leys, et les Cuſtumes, que le Reys Williem grentat a tut le Peuple de Engleterre apres le Conqueſt de la Terre: Ice les meſmes, que li Reys Edward ſun Coſin tint devant lui, co eſt a Savoir: i. e. Theſe are the Laws and Cuſtoms which King William granted to all the People of England after the Conqueſt of the Land, being the ſame which King Edward his Couſin obſerved before him; that is to ſay, thoſe that there follow, and which you may find tranſlated into Engliſh in the enſuing Volume at the end of this King's Reign.

THE Doctor having nothing to ſay againſt the Validity of theſe Laws, would fain take away all the Benefit of them to the Engliſh Nation, by alledging they were in number fifty, moſt of them penal Laws, (as appears by Ingulph) and ſuch as he received much profit and advantage from, by the many and great Mulcts impoſed upon the People

Ib. p. 253.

People for the various Tranſgreſſions of them; and the other Laws are of ſmall moment, and no ways inconſiſtent with King William's Eſtabliſhment, moſt of which were taken out of the Saxon, ſome out of the Daniſh and Norman Feudal Law.

BUT in anſwer to this, whoever will compare theſe Laws with thoſe of King Edward and the other Saxon Kings, will find, that being made for the Puniſhment of Robberies, Maihems, Murthers, and other Crimes againſt the publick Peace, they were as much for the benefit of the Engliſh as the Saxon Laws were before, ſince they were equally intended for the Common Peace and Safety of the Kingdom; and to the obſervation of which, the French or Normans were obliged under the ſame Penalties with the Engliſh. And the Doctor ſhews either his want of Judgment, or fondneſs for Tyranny, to alledg the Pecuniary Mulcts that were to be paid to the King by the Tranſgreſſors of them, as an Argument that they were intended more for his own than the Peoples Benefit; ſince if that were a juſt Exception, it would likewiſe hold the ſame againſt all the Engliſh-Saxon Penal Laws, which were almoſt all Pecuniary.

NOR were the Penalties very much increas'd from what they were before by the old Engliſh Laws, as any one may ſee that will take the pains to compare thoſe in the former Volume with theſe in this: and as for the Feudal part of theſe Laws, they are in many things more favourable than thoſe of King Knute; for by the former, beſides the Horſes and Arms that the Heir of every Earl, Chief or Inferior Thane rendred to the King upon the death of his Father, there were alſo to be paid to the King ſo many Ounces of Gold, all which are there called Heriots; whereas by the 21ſt, 22d, 23d, and 24th Laws of K. William, the Relief of a Count, Baron, and Vavaſour, are only ſo many Horſes, and ſuch a quantity of Arms, without the paiment of any Mony either in Gold or Silver: and tho there may be ſome Norman Laws added to theſe Laws of King Edward, yet they ſtill remain'd, for the moſt part, the old Laws of England; and
Ib. p. 252. therefore I ſhall not contradict the Doctor's Teſtimony out of his real or ſuppoſed Author, Gervaſe of Tilbury, That the Engliſh Laws being propounded, according to their Threefold Diſtinction, that is, the Mercian-Law, Daniſh-Law, and Weſt-Saxon Law, he (viz. King William) rejected ſome, and approved others, and added ſuch Tranſmarine Norman Laws as ſeemed moſt efficacious to defend the Peace of the Kingdom.

BUT the Doctor there appeals to matter of Fact, and the Reader is referred to his Preface of the Norman Hiſtory, where he ſays you will find it fully proved, that the Law uſed in this Nation after the Conqueſt, eſpecially as to the Method and Practice of it, was the Norman-Law, and that ſo it remains to this Day in very many things; all which may be granted, and yet notwithſtanding the main Body of the Laws of England did remain the ſame as they were before his Conqueror's coming over.

BUT ſince the Doctor thinks that the next Set of this King's
P. p. 255. Laws may prove more to his purpoſe, he proceeds to thoſe that are publiſhed by Mr. Lambert, and Sir Roger Twiſden, the beſt Copy of which are to be ſeen in the Red-Book of the Exchequer, and which the Reader may likewiſe find tranſlated at the end of this King's Reign after thoſe Laws from Ingulphus.

BUT

BUT the Doctor, becauſe he loves to cavil, and wreſt even Laws themſelves to a contrary ſenſe than for what they were intended, will needs pick out ſomething, whereby he would prove that in moſt of theſe Laws the Engliſh were not at all concerned, or had thereby any Intereſt or Benefit. But ſeeing it would be long and needleſs to tranſcribe all the Laws verbatim, which the Doctor here inſtances in, which are the 52*d* Law, concerning Faith and Obedience toward the King; the 55*th*, Of the Feudal Law, and Immunity of Freemen; the 56*th*, Of Night-watches and Guards; the 58*th*, Of the Præſtations, or Services of Feudataries or Vaſſals; the 59*th*, That the Freemen muſt endeavour, with all their Power, to preſerve the Royal Rights from Injury; the 64*th*, The Borh-Law, or Law of Pledges or Sureties; I therefore deſire the Reader to conſult theſe Laws under their reſpective Titles, and then he will be the better able to judg whither the Doctor's Exceptions againſt them be juſt or not, which I ſhall here tranſcribe: The firſt of which is from the Oath of Allegiance to King William; the Fifth there cited is nothing but a further and more clear Explanation and Confirmation of the Firſt, that all Freemen of the whole Kingdom ſhould be Sworn-Brothers to defend King William's Monarchy, and his Kingdom, according to their Power, Abilities or Fortunes, againſt his Enemies, and to keep entire the Peace and Dignity of his Crown, &c. Ib. p. 258.

NOW, ſays he, let us ſee who they were that did here ſwear and oblige themſelves to do this; they were Earls, Barons, Knights, Eſquires, and all the Freemen of the whole Kingdom, who were always to be ready fitted and prepared with Horſe and Arms, according to their Fees and Tenements, which were given them to that purpoſe by the Conqueror, and by the Conſent of the Common Council of his whole Kingdom, in Fee, by Hereditary Right, as appears by the Fourth Law here alſo mention'd. " Now, ſays the Doctor, when " the Author of Argumentum Antinormannicum can make it appear " that King William erected new Earldoms, Baronies, Knights-Fees and " Services here, and, by the advice and conſent of the Common Council of " the Kingdom, granted Lands of Inheritance to ſupport them, and at " the ſame time gave them to the Engliſh-Saxons, I ſhall then agree " that theſe three Laws laſt mention'd were made for their Profit.

IN anſwer to the Firſt and Second Paragraphs, I would deſire the Doctor to tell us, whither theſe Freemen, that were to ſwear Allegiance to King William, were not Engliſh-men as well as Normans: for he may remember, if he pleaſes, that all who owed Suit and Service to the County-Court and Sheriff's-Tourn, were there bound to take the Oath of Fidelity to the King; ſo that it is certain all Freemen (by whatſoever Tenure) being bound to take that Oath, the name of Freemen was not confin'd to the Earls, Barons, and Tenants in capite alone, but alſo took in other inferior Military Tenants, as alſo thoſe in Free Socage. And I think I have already prov'd that ſeveral Engliſh-Saxon Noblemen and Gentlemen during this King's Reign, were Barons, and Tenants in Capite, or elſe Vavaſours, i. e. Inferior Tenants to Lords, Biſhops, or Abbots; and as ſuch, either by election of the County, or elſe in their own Perſons, might very well have Places or Votes in the Common-Council of the Kingdom: ſo that there is no need to ſuppoſe (as the Doctor would captiouſly have it) that the King ſhould create new Earldoms and new Baronies, &c. on purpoſe to give them to the Engliſh-Saxons.

NOW all this only proceeds from the Doctor's willful wreſting of the Words and Senſe of the 55*th*, and 58*th* Laws of King William; in neither of which it is ſaid, that all their Fees and Tenements were given them by the Conqueror, but that the Services which they were to perform for ſuch their Fees and Tenures, were granted or appointed them in Fee, by Hereditary Right, and that by the Common Council of the whole Kingdom; and notwithſtanding all that the Doctor has here ſaid, this Magna Charta of King William (as Mr. Petyt has rightly called it) may as very well extend to the old Engliſh-Saxons, as to the new French or Norman Proprietors: for to turn the Doctor's Argument in the following Paragraph upon himſelf; if all the Freemen of the whole Kingdom mentioned in the 55*th* Law, and all the Earls, Barons, Knights and Freemen of the Kingdom, were then as well Engliſh as Normans at the time of the making of theſe Laws (the contrary to which the Doctor hath no where proved) then they were granted to the one as well as to the other, and they had both an equal benefit in them; and then the Concluſion or Confirmation of theſe Laws will be alſo literally true, which I ſhall give you in Latin: Hoc quóque præcipimus, ut Omnes habeant & teneant Legem Edwardi Regis in omnibus Rebus, adauctis His, quas conſtituimus ad Utilitatem Anglorum: That is, we alſo command that all ſhall have and enjoy the Law of King Edward in all things, with thoſe Additions which we (viz. the King) have ordained for the benefit of the Engliſh: by which he muſt certainly be underſtood to mean all the Subjects of England; for that by the word [Anglorum] only Normans are to be underſtood, is ſuch an extravagant flight of fancy, as none but the Author of this Chymerical Gloſſary could ever have attained to.

I HAVE indeed omitted two other ſmall Cavils of the Doctor's againſt the Engliſh-men's having any Benefit by theſe Laws, which are ſo mean and trivial, that, might it not be thought an omiſſion in me, I ſhould have paſſed them by: the one is a Remark upon the Watches and Guards, which by theſe Laws were ſet and placed in Cities, Burghs, Caſtles, Hundreds, and Wapentachs; as alſo that the Sheriffs, Aldermen, Provoſts and Bayliffs, &c. of thoſe Places were to ſet them; which he deſires his Adverſary to prove to have then conſiſted of Engliſh-Saxons. Ib. p. 258.

NOW that they might be Officers in the Cities and Towns, the Doctor himſelf has granted, when in his Gloſſary he ſays, that in all Charters to Cities and Towns directed to French and Engliſh Townſmen, both Saxons and Normans are to be underſtood; and then the Conſequence will be againſt the Doctor, that if they had all alike Privileges, they were then alſo alike capable of being Aldermen, Provoſts, or Bailiffs, and much more capable of the leſſer Offices, both of appointing the Night Watches, and ſerving as Watchmen. Nor was it poſſible it could be otherwiſe, if any man will but conſult Doomſday-Book, and obſerve what a ſmall proportion the Norman or French Burgeſſes bore (in compariſon of the Engliſh) in Norwich, Exeter, or any other City or Trading-Town, where the Numbers of both ſorts are ſet down; and then much more in the Country

Country Villages: for ſince there could not then be above Fifty or Sixty thouſand French-men or Normans in England at the moſt, it was impoſſible for them alone to execute all the inferior Offices of Conſtables, Headboroughs, &c. and alſo to keep Watch and Ward, the Natives being wholly excluded from thoſe Duties.

BUT his Exception againſt the Law concerning Pledges or Sureties, by which every man, from the greateſt to the leaſt, was in thoſe days bound to find Sureties for himſelf and his Servants, is more trivial than the former: for the Doctor here falſly ſuppoſes that none but the loweſt and moſt ordinary ſort of Freemen were thus bound to their Good-Behaviour; whereas the words are general, Omnis homo qui voluerit ſe teneri pro Libero, ſit in plegio; i. e. every man who will be taken as a Freeman, ought to be under a Pledg: yet tho the Doctor grants it to have been an old Saxon Law, he would have it, that in the Circumſtances the Engliſh were in at that time, under hard Maſters, it could be no advantageous or profitable Law to them. But it ſeems he has either forgot, or not well conſidered this Law as it ſtood in King Edward the Confeſſor's time; for he might there have found, "That by the Laws of King Edward, all Arch-Biſhops, Earls, "Thanes, and their Knights, and Servants, who are there particular- "ly named, were to have them all in their Frithborh, (or under "their Surety) who if they ſhall forfeit to any one, and complaint "be made againſt them, their Lord ſhall be obliged to do them "Right in his Court. And to the ſame purpoſe is the 49*th* Law of King William in French, Chaſcun ſeniour eit ſoun Serjant, * en ſun plege, que ſi nele rete, que ait a dreit el Hundred. That is, let every Lord have his Servant in or under his Pledg (that is, to be bound for him) that ſo if he be † accuſed, he may be brought to Right (i. e. Juſtice) in the Hundred-Court: from whence it is plain, that every Lord or Maſter of a Family, tho never ſo Great, was tied ſo far to be anſwerable for his Servants, as to deliver them up to Juſtice if they offended, or elſe to pay a Mulct or Fine if they eſcaped. So that this Law concerning Pledges or Sureties did as much oblige the French and Normans, as it did the Engliſh, unleſs the Doctor can prove (which I ſuppoſe he will never be able to do) that all his Normans were Great Lords, whilſt the Engliſh Nobility and Gentry became meer Slaves and Vaſſals; or elſe this Law muſt be equally advantageous or burdenſom to thoſe of the one as well as of the other Nation.

BUT the Doctor finding himſelf gravell'd by his Adverſary with the Authority of R. Hoveden, and the Book of* Litchfeild, that King William in the fourth year of his Reign at the earneſt interceſſion of the Engliſh Natives or † Commons granted and confirm'd that Body of Laws which are found in thoſe Authors, and contain divers things concerning the Duty and Office of the King, as alſo many others concerning the Rights and Liberties of the Subject. Now the Doctor has no way to avoid the Force of this ſo evident a Teſtimony, but by making ſome trivial Exceptions againſt theſe Laws. And firſt, as for the Litchfeild Story, antecedent to the Laws themſelves (viz. how King William came to be prevail'd upon to grant them) ſince it is ſet down at large in the following Hiſtory, I refer the Reader thither; but the Doctor's Remarks (as far as they are to my purpoſe) are theſe.

* Cited by Lambard Archaionom. p. 148, 149.

FIRST,

P Anſ. to A.A. 260. * " FIRST, That theſe Laws are indeed to be found in Hoveden, " but not entire, part being in Pag. 343, and part in Pag. 346, b. n. " 50, and Pag. 347, a. n. 10, 20. alſo in Edward the Confeſſor's Laws " in Lambard's Copy, Pag. 138, c. 1. and in Pag. 149. Tit. Lex Noricorum, it is to be found in two parts, which put together do entirely make up that Preface.

" SECONDLY, That Author hath omitted the date of, or time " when King William granted theſe Laws, which Hoveden, and the " Litchfield Book, and Edward the Confeſſor's Laws, ſay, was Anno " quarto Regni ſui.

" THIRDLY, That Ingulph ſays they were the Laws which " he brought with him from London in the twentieth year of King " William, and which he had by Proclamation cauſed to be obſerved. Yet,

" FOURTHLY, That theſe were not the Laws contain'd in the
* Not. ad Eadm. p. 171. " Book of Litchfield, which * Mr. Selden ſays were only part of theſe ‡ Col. 1. 234. " Laws publiſhed in Hoveden, and that this part is to be found in || Fol. 343. " † Hen. Knighton; and who ever will take the pains to compare them " with thoſe in || Hoveden, will find they contain but the firſt fifteen Titles or Chapters, which are the very ſame with the firſt fifteen Chapters of thoſe Laws printed in Lambard, under the Name " and Title of King Edward's Laws; yet both in Hoveden and Lambard theſe Laws are near thrice the number of thoſe in Knighton. " Nor are they, and the Laws in Crowland-Copy, ſcarce in any Points " or Chapters alike.

" FIFTHLY, And that therefore this Teſtimony of Ingulph can-
* Viz. of Arg. Antinorm. " not be brought by our * Author, or any Man elſe, to prove the " Grant or Confirmation of King Edward's Laws, as they are to be " found in the Books above-mention'd, it having not the leaſt Reference to them; nor is it probable that Ingulph ever heard of them, or " that King William ever cauſed any Proclamation to be made that " thoſe Laws ſhould be obſerv'd.

NOW what are all theſe ſmall Objections to the purpoſe? might there not have been ſeveral Manuſcript-Copies of theſe Laws, whereof ſome might be more perfect and entire than others? And ſuppoſe thoſe ſet down in the Book of Litchfield are the ſame with thoſe in Henry de Knighton, and are not ſo many by half as are found in Hoveden; will this ſerve to render all of them, or at leaſt his Copy to be falſe or ſuſpicious? For why may not King William have confirm'd this Body of Laws ſet down by Hoveden at the beginning of his Reign, and alſo have enacted others at other times, and particularly made that Set of Laws found in Ingulph at the latter end of his Reign, which relate chiefly to the Prerogatives and Pleas of the Crown? All which indeed is no more an Argument againſt the Validity of theſe Laws, than it would be againſt the Statute of Merton, which was made about the middle of Henry the Third's Reign, becauſe it is different from that of Marlbridg, which was made in the latter end thereof.

Id. p. 261. AS for the Doctor's laſt Exception, it is this, " That Mr. Selden not " only tells us what were the Laws in the Litchfield Manuſcript, but " writes very ſuſpiciouſly of all the Laws that are attributed to King " Edward, except the Crowland-Copy; and ſays, their Credit is much " to be doubted, that would obtrude upon us other Laws than thoſe

" for King Edward's; and that 'tis very likely there was made but one " Review and Confirmation of the Laws of King William: and if " there were any more than one, yet the laſt was only to be allowed " and eſteemed Authentick, which was the Croyland Copy.

I HAVE a great Honour for the Memory of Mr. Selden: but as the Doctor values his Authority as nothing, when he finds it makes againſt his Opinion, ſo, I hope, I may have ſometimes the liberty to decline it, when I think it not agreeable to Reaſon and Truth. For if all other Copies of King William's Laws muſt be falſe, or at leaſt ſuſpicious, that agree not with his Croyland Copy, then what will become of thoſe Laws that were publiſh'd by Mr. Lambard, and have been again reprinted by Sir Roger Twiſden, from an Antient Copy in the Red Book of the Exchequer; and out of which the Doctor himſelf hath cited ſo many Laws againſt the Gentleman he there oppoſes? And if thoſe are Authentick, I deſire to know of the Doctor why theſe that are extant in Hoveden, ſhould not be of as good Authority as the former? for beſides that this his Collection is found in all the Manuſcript Copies of his Hiſtory, there are alſo many other Manuſcript Copies of them to be met with in divers private as well as publick Libraries; for I have ſeen and peruſed one very Antient Copy of them in the Arch-Biſhop's Library at Lambeth, and another in Bennet-College in Cambridg, and a third in the Cottonian-Library; beſides what may be found in other places without thoſe Interpolations, which, I confeſs, have render'd theſe Laws ſomewhat ſuſpicious. Id. ib. p. 255, 256, 257.

BUT the Doctor has the leaſt reaſon of any man to doubt their Authority; for if Gervaſe of Tilbury be an unexceptionable Witneſs for what was done in William the Conqueror's Time, and yet lived and wrote that Treatiſe (if it be really his) in the latter end of the Reign of King Henry the Second; I cannot ſee why the Authority of a much greater Lawyer, ſhould not be of equal, if not more Authority (to wit) that of Ranulph de Glanvil, Juſticiary of England, and who (as R. Hoveden tells us) lived and wrote about the ſame time, and compil'd into one Body thoſe Engliſh Laws which there follow, viz. thoſe of King Edward, confirm'd by King William. And certainly if Gervaſe above-mention'd could know from Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter what was done in King William's Time, why could not ſo Great a Man as Glanvil find out by Antient Copies, as well as Authentick Tradition, what were the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, which (as our Author tells us) King William his Couſin not only confirm'd, but alſo commanded to be obſerved, with ſuch Additions as were by him added, tho of no great moment?

HAVING, I hope, ſufficiently proved that King William not only made Laws for the benefit of his Engliſh, as well as his Norman Subjects, but alſo confirm'd the Antient Laws of King Edward, I ſhall not much concern my ſelf whither he ſtrictly kept or broke them, ſince (as I have already ſaid) it was not his breach of theſe Laws, or of the Oath he ſo often and ſolemnly took to obſerve, that could confer upon him the Right or Title of a Conqueror.

I SHALL now come to the Doctor's next Arguments, in his Preface to his Norman Hiſtory, whereby he would prove, that the Laws of this Nation, except ſuch as have been alter'd, or introduced by our Kings, or Great Councils, or by Act of Parliament, were for the greateſt P. 155.

greateſt and chiefeſt part of them the Norman Laws, and brought in or inſtituted by William his Conqueror, the Subject next to be treated of.

I SHALL not here go about to diſpute with the Doctor, Whither England, which has born two great Shocks or Impreſſions from thoſe two powerful Nations, the Danes and Normans, hath not received great Changes, not only in the Manners and Cuſtoms, but alſo in its very Laws, tho (I confeſs) much more from the latter than the former; ſince the Danes govern'd here but a few years, whereas the Norman Princes have eſtabliſhed their Empire for many Generations even down to this very day. But ſeeing the Doctor himſelf a
Id. ib. little lower grants, "That this Nation doth ſtill retain ſome of the "Saxon and Daniſh Cuſtoms, which do not much differ from the "Normans, for they were Neighbours by ſituation, and had much "the ſame Language, only differing in Dialect, and communicated in "many Rites and Uſages; nay, joyntly conquer'd both this Country "and Neuſtria in France, afterwards called Normandy: and he ſays "(truly enough) they were not intirely Saxons, Danes, or Norwegians, or of one Nation that made theſe Conqueſts, altho their chief "Leaders, and the greateſt number of any Nation might be ſuch; but "a mixture of all theſe, and ſeveral other People of the Northern parts "of Germany.

IF the Doctor would go no farther than this, I would quickly agree with him; for then notwithſtanding his pretended Conqueſt, the greateſt part of our Laws would have ſtill continued the ſame and unalter'd from what they were before. But this will not content him,
Ib. for he immediately after affirms, "That the whole Bulk and Main of "our Laws, or at leaſt very different Uſages of them, were brought hither from Normandy by the Conqueror, viz. ſuch as were in uſe "and practice here for ſome Ages after the Conqueſt, is, ſays he, "without queſtion; for from whence we received our Tenures, and
P. 156. "the manner of holding Eſtates in every reſpect, from thence we alſo received the Cuſtoms incident to thoſe Eſtates, as Reliefs, Aids, "Fines, Rents, or Cens, Services, &c. and likewiſe the quality of "them, being moſt of them Feudal, and injoyn'd under ſeveral Military Conditions and Services; and of neceſſary Conſequence from "thence we muſt always receive the Laws by which theſe Tenures, "and the Cuſtoms incident to them, were regulated, and by which "every Man's Right in ſuch Eſtates was ſecured, according to the nature of them: But that from Normandy (brought in by the Conqueror) we receiv'd moſt, if not all our Antient Tenures, and manner of holding and enjoying our Lands and Eſtates, will appear, by "comparing our Antient Tenures with theirs.

TO return an Anſwer to the Doctor's Arguments and Inſtances as he goes along: I muſt here in the firſt place diſtinguiſh thoſe Services and Cuſtoms, which were incident to Eſtates before his Conqueſt, from thoſe which might have been introduced after that time. As to Reliefs, which either the King's Tenants, or elſe thoſe of other Lords, were to pay before they could enter upon their Eſtates, there will be found no more than a difference in Words, between the Heregates mention'd in the 69th Law of King Knute to be paid by an Earl, a Thane next to the King, and an Inferior or Middling Thane, and thoſe Reliefs which the ſame ſort of Perſons under the Title of Count, Baron, and Vavaſor, were to pay either to the King, or their Superior Lord, by the 22*d*, 23*d*, and 24*th* Laws of King William the Firſt. For that the Heriot was a Military Service, appears from its being deriv'd from the word Here, which in the Engliſh-Saxon Tongue ſignifies an Army; as alſo that both theſe Heriots of King Knute, and the Reliefs appointed by King William, when compar'd, conſiſted of a like number of Horſes and Arms; only by this latter Law there was no Mony to be paid, as there was by the former.

THEREFORE I muſt make bold to differ from the Learned Sir H. Spelman, who in his late * Poſthumous Treatiſe of Feuds and Tenures by Knight's Service, will by no means allow thoſe Heriots and theſe Reliefs to be the ſame; but his Reaſons to the contrary are not in my Opinion ſufficient, and I could give ſeveral Anſwers to each of them, would the brevity I endeavour in this Introduction allow it; only I ſhall here take notice, that by the Diſtinctions made uſe of in this Law of King Knute, above-cited, between the Thane next to the King, and the Inferior or Middling Thane under him, it appears, that there was then divers Tenures one under another; and that as the King's Thane held of him, ſo did the Inferior Thane hold his Land of him who was next above him: which fully anſwers the difference after the Conqueſt between the Superior Lord, or Tenant in Capite, and the Meſne Tenant that held his Eſtate under him.

* Publiſh'd at Oxon. Cap. 18.

BUT another proof of the Diſtinction between the Superior and Inferior or under Thane, is alſo to be found in that old Manuſcript Saxon Law cited by * Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour in Latin, and by † Mr. Lambard in his Itinerary of Kent, to this effect.

* Ch. 5. p. 515.

" THAT if a Thane ita profeciſſet, i. e. had ſo advanced himſelf, as to have ſerved the King, and rid on his Meſſage, and if " ſuch a one had under him another Thane, who had got five Hydes of " Land, and had waited on his Lord in the King's Court, he was to " be deemed a Thane's Right Worthy, i. e. in all reſpects equal to a " Thane. I am ſenſible Sir Henry Spelman, in his Treatiſe above-mention'd, will not allow this Land thus poſſeſſed by the Head Thane, to be Feodal Land, tho it be expreſly mention'd to be held ad Expeditionem Regis, becauſe a Man might before the Conqueſt have been tied to perform this Military Expedition for his Perſonal Eſtate, and of which he there gives an Inſtance: yet I confeſs it does not ſatisfy me, ſince it may be ſtill urged, To what purpoſe is this Clauſe here inſerted, viz. who held or had five Hydes for the King's Expedition, if the Lands, without any conſideration of the Perſon, had not been liable to this Military Service? Or how could this Inferior Thane who had theſe Hydes, be ſaid to be under the Superior or King's Thane, unleſs it had been by way of Tenure or Military Service? ſince it cannot be ſuppos'd that ſuch a Thane, who had five Hydes of Land, would condeſcend to ſerve the other as his Menial Servant or Dependant. And therefore Sir Henry Spelman is reſolved, that rather than he will allow any Military Feodal Tenures before the Conqueſt, he will not only make King William's Law above-cited, but alſo Doomſday-Book, to ſpeak improperly; where under Title, Wallingford in Barocſcire, the ſame Law is recited in theſe words; Tainus, vel Miles Regis Dominicus moriens, pro Relevamento demittebat Regi omnia Arma ſua, Equum ſuum,

oum Sella, & alium ſine Sella; & ſi eſſent Canes vel Accipitres, præſentabantur Regi, ſi velit accipere: i. e. The King's Thane, or Knight holding of him, ſhall at his death leave all his Arms to the King for a Relief, and one Horſe with a Saddle, and another without a Saddle; and if there be any Dogs or Hawks, they ſhall be alſo preſented to the King, if he will accept them. And which is moſt in the right, Sir Henry Spelman, or the Penners of Doomſday-Book, and King William's Laws, I leave to the unprejudiced Reader to judg. And tho Sir Henry ſuppoſes that Bracton made a great difference between Heriots and Reliefs, yet I think the place there cited, if duly conſidered, makes little or none at all to the purpoſe, as you may ſee by the words themſelves; Fit quædam præſtatio, quæ non dicitur Relevium, ſed quaſi, ſicut Heriotum, quaſi loco Relevii, & quod dari debet aliquando ante Sacramentum fidelitatis, aliquando poſt: i.e. There is a certain Payment, which is not called a Relief, but as it were ſo, as a Heriot inſtead of a Relief, and ought ſometimes to be paid before the Oath of Fealty, and ſometimes after.

Bract. p. 84. a. Num. 1.

I HAVE dwelt the longer upon this Head, becauſe from a due compariſon between the Laws of King Knute and King William, it plainly appears, that Military Tenures and Services belonging to them were in uſe before the Normans came into England; tho Sir Henry Spelman (from whom the Doctor has borrowed that Notion) has been pleas'd to aſſert the contrary: but vvhither they vvere Hereditary before the coming in of the Danes I vvill not affirm; yet that they might very vvell be ſo in King Knute's and his Son's Reigns, and ſo on till the Conqueſt, is very probable: for if the King's Thane had held his Land only for his own or two more Lives, how could he enfeoff another Thane of part of that Land, and he again a third under him of another part of the ſame Eſtate, unleſs they had had ſome larger holding in them than only for Term of Life?

I SHALL now but ſlightly touch the reſt of the Doctor's Inſtances from the Cuſtoms incident to Eſtates; for as to Aids in the ſenſe he takes them, I ſhall not diſpute that Point with him: But as for Rents, that ſeveral Tenants paid ſmall Quit-rents in Mony to their chief Lords before the Conqueſt, may be proved from ſeveral Inſtances in our Antient Abbey Leiger-Books; and that the payment of the King's Rents in Mony, and not in Proviſions, was not introduced by King William, but many years after, I deſire the Doctor to conſult his own Author Gervaſe of Tilbury in his Treatiſe above-mentioned; for there he tells us, "That long after the Conqueſt the Kings of England "had their Payments made to them out of their Lands, not in Sums of "Gold or Silver, but only in Victuals or Proviſions; out of which the "King's Houſe was ſupplied with Neceſſaries for daily uſe; and they "who were deputed to this Service (viz. the Purveyors) knew what "quantity aroſe from each ſeveral Land: Tho as to Souldiers Pay or "Donatives, and for other neceſſaries concerning the Pleas of the "Kingdom, or Conventions, as alſo from Cities and Caſtles, where "they did not exerciſe Husbandry or Tillage; in ſuch Inſtances Pay-"ments were made in ready Mony. Wherefore this Inſtitution laſted "all the time of William the Firſt, to the time of King Henry his "Son; ſo that I my ſelf (ſays Gervaſe, who flouriſhed in the Reign "of Henry the Second) have ſeen ſome People who at ſet-times carry "from

" from the King's Lands, Victuals or Proviſions of Food to Court. " And the Officers alſo of the King's Houſe knew very well (having it " upon account) which Counties were to ſend in Wheat, which ſeveral " ſorts of Fleſh, and Provender for the Horſes. The reſt of this Story being ſomewhat long, I ſhall contract: " That the King, viz. Hen- " ry the Second, wanting ready Mony very much to carry on his War " beyond Sea, and being alſo mightily importun'd by the Husband- " men, who were put to a world of trouble in carrying their Provi- " ſions from their own Lands to the King's Court; and moved with " their Complaints about it, did, by the Advice of his Lords, ap- " point throughout the Kingdom, ſuch Perſons as he knew were for " their Service: Theſe Perſons going about, and taking a view of the " ſeveral Lands, having made an Eſtimate of the Proviſions which " were paid out of them, they reduc'd it into a Sum of * ready Mo- " ny. But if the King's Rents were thus paid, it was not to be ima- " gined that the Rents of his Tenants in Capite, and their Inferior " Tenants, were paid any otherwiſe.

*Denariorum.

AS for the Doctor's laſt Inſtances of Services in general, that there were divers ſuch, as well Military as Prædial, paid by the Engliſh-Saxon Tenants to their Lords long before the Conqueſt, may appear from ſeveral Inſtances in our Antient Abbey and Cathedral-Books, as alſo from the Charters of the Saxon Kings. As for example, That Charter of King Kenulph (cited by Sir Edward Coke in his fourth Inſtitutes, Ch. 35. p. 192. dated Anno Dom. 821.) which granted to the Abbot and Monks of Abingdon many Mannors and Lands, on condition, quod Expeditionem duodecim virorum, cum tantis ſcutis exerceant, antiquos pontes & arces renovent: which is the more remarkable, becauſe ſometime after this, King Ethelwulph, by his memorable Charter of Privileges (ratified by the Great Council of Wincheſter in the year 835.) did by expreſs words ſet free Sanctam Eccleſiam, that is, all the Churches and Monaſteries of his Kingdom, ab Expeditione, & Pontis extructione, & Arcis munitione; that is, from the threefold Neceſſity, to which all the Lands of the Kingdom were then liable, viz. of Expedition or going to War againſt Enemies, and the building or repairing of Bridges, and Caſtles: yet that this Service payable by this Monaſtery, was ſomewhat more than what was appointed by the Common Law of the Land, appears by this Clauſe in the Charter it ſelf, ſince it particularly limits this Military Service to twelve Men; which need not have been done, if by Law this Abbey could have been obliged to have found as many Men without any ſuch proviſion.

THE ſame Author has there cited a like Charter of King Ethelred to a Knight called Athelwig, dated Anno Dom. 995. ſo that not only Abbeys, but Knights or Military-men then held Lands of the King by the Service of ſo many Men: which how it differ'd from Knight's Service I cannot diſtinguiſh; and Dr. Brady himſelf allows Tenancy in Capite to have been in uſe long before his Conqueſt, when he tranſlates this Paſſage out of Arch-Biſhop Parker's Britiſh Antiquities, Anno Dom. 905. Plegmundus, Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopus, una cum Rege magnifico cognominato Edwardo Seniore, Concilium magnum Epiſcoporum, Abbatum, Fidelium, Procerum, Populorum in Provincia Gewiſſorum convocant, &c. That is, in the year of our Lord 905. Plegmund Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, together with the magnificent King Edward, Anſw. to Mr. Petit, p. 9. Fol. 75.

Edward, Sirnamed the Elder, called a Great Council of the Biſhops, Abbots, Tenants in Capite or Military Service, Noblemen and People in the Province of the Weſt-Saxons.

SO that if there were Tenants in Capite, or Military Service, before the Doctor's Conqueſt, he contradicts himſelf in affirming afterwards in the ſame Book, as alſo in his Preface to the Norman Hiſtory, "That vve received all our Tenures, and manner of holding Eſtates, "in every reſpect, from Normandy. And now let him chuſe vvhich ſide he pleaſes, and maintain Tenure by Knights, or Military Service to have been introduced either before or after his Conqueſt, he vvill gain nothing by it; for if he will maintain the former Opinion, then it is certain that theſe Tenures were in England long before the time he ſuppoſes; or if he will ſtick to this latter Aſſertion, it is alſo untrue, that all our Military Tenures were derived from the Normans, as I think has been ſufficiently proved.

Anſw. to M.P. p. 14. P. 155.

BUT perhaps the Doctor may ſay, That by Tenures and holding of Eſtates, he means no more than Military Fees according to the French and Norman-Feudal Laws. And concerning Fees, the Doctor ſays, "The Learned Sir Henry Spelman's Gloſſary tells us, that William the "Conqueror brought over the Servitude of them into England, who "divided it all amongſt his Great Men and Chief Commanders; and "this, he ſays, appears from Doomſday-Book; and after that the "Bondage of Fees was known in all parts of the Kingdom, not heard "of before in the Saxon times: Tho indeed he adds, that the word "Beneficium, or Prædium, was antiently uſed for Feodum, which was "not uſed in any Nation or Country until about the beginning of the "Tenth Century from our Saviour's Incarnation. And then he cites a Paſſage from Dudo of St. Quintin's Hiſtory, how Charles King of France added to the Donation of Normandy, which he had before beſtowed upon Duke Rollo, the Province of Bretaign, that alſo by this * Benefice he might oblige him to be the more faithful Vaſſal to him. Hottoman alſo ſays thus, Beneficium datur propter Officium, quo verbo demonſtratur, Feudale Officium non niſi Militare & Bellicum fuiſſe; i. e. A Benefice is given for the ſake of an Office, by which word it is declared, that a Feudal Office was at firſt only Military and Warlike.

Ib. p. 156. Gloſſ. Fol. 218. Tit. Feudum.

Somner's Gavel. p. 102.

* Beneficium.

Lib. de Feud. c. 5.

SO that it is plain from theſe Authors, that the ſame thing which was at firſt called Prædium and Beneficium, was afterwards called by a German or old French word, a Feud, or in Latin Feodum.

NOW I deſire no more than what the Doctor has here granted; for from hence it is evident, that the Thing was in uſe long before the Word; therefore if we can ſhew the ſame words, viz. Beneficium and Prædium, in ſeveral old Charters before the Conqueſt, I ſee no reaſon why they ſhould not have been much the ſame with the Feuds or Feoda, which words I admit were brought from France, tho the thing was here long before. But that which at length began the difference between Feuda and Beneficia, was, that when the latter began to be uſed in a reſtrain'd ſenſe, and to ſignify no more than an Eſtate for Life, then the word Feudum grew to be in faſhion, and was underſtood only of ſuch Grants of Lands as were Perpetual and Hereditary, whilſt Beneficium ſignified thoſe that were held only for one or more Lives. From whence it is alſo evident, that Military Tenures or

Fees

Fees were more antient than the word by which they were afterwards expreſſed: and ſuppoſing the Normans brought theſe ſort of Tenures with them out of their own Country, as divers Authors aſſert, I know not why the Danes and Norwegians who were the ſame People, and ſpoke the ſame Language with the Normans, ſhould not, when they came to ſettle in England under King Knute and his Sons, bring in the ſame kind of Tenures, not only for Lives or Years, but alſo to Heirs Male in Fee-tail; or elſe there could have been no reaſon why by that Law of King Knute already cited, the Heirs of Earls, and both ſorts of Thanes, were to pay Heriots, as well as thoſe of a Count, Baron, or Vavaſour after the Conqueſt, ſince the ſame things are ſignified by King Knute's as well as King William's Laws: For it is certain, that in the Kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, the Nobility hold their Lands of the King by Military Tenures, much after the ſame manner as the Earl, King's Thane, and leſſer Thane, held theirs under Knute, who was King of England and Norway; and who (by what I can find) was the Firſt that made theſe Feudal Eſtates inheritable in England, which were before commonly granted for one or more Lives.

SO that at laſt the vvhole Queſtion between Dr. Brady and thoſe of the contrary Opinion, is, "Whither all the Burdens and Services be-"longing to Military Tenures, ſuch as Wardſhips, Mariage, Ho-"mage, Fealty, Aids, Eſcuage, Reliefs and Eſcheats, both according "to their firſt rigorous Inſtitution, and afterwards more qualified "Condition; vvhither, I ſay, they were all derived from Norman-"dy, or not? Which Queſtion thoſe two Learned Lord Chief Juſtices, Sir Edward Coke, and * Sir Matthew Hale, do both hold in the Negative: yet ſince I confeſs, that (unleſs it be as to Reliefs and Eſcheats) I can ſee no Footſteps of thoſe Incidents to Military Service before the coming in of the Normans; and muſt own my ſelf convinced by the cogent Arguments of Sir Henry Spelman, not only in his Gloſſary, but his late Learned Poſthumous Treatiſe concerning Feuds and Tenures, that the greateſt part of thoſe Burdens and Services, which we find annexed to Military Fees, were introduced by King William from his own Country.

* In his MS. Hiſtory of the Laws of England.

BUT ſuppoſing this to be ſo, yet I doubt Dr. Brady will have little cauſe to triumph upon this Conceſſion, as if he had thereby gain'd an entire Victory; ſince if he pleaſe to look over Littleton's Tenures, he may there ſee how ſmall a part thoſe Sections concerning Tenures make, in reſpect of the reſt of the whole Book; and conſequently how little a Branch of the Common Law they were when in being, and before they were taken away in our times by the Statute of 12° of King Charles the Second.

BUT as for the other executive parts of the Law, which the Doctor likewiſe ſuppoſes to have been brought from Normandy, I ſhall treat of that by and by: In the mean time I hope I may ſtill ſafely affirm, that even the abovemention'd Incidents or Burdens upon Military Tenures were no Badges of Norman Conqueſt, nor brought in and impos'd by the Conqueror's ſole Will and Pleaſure, as may eaſily be proved from theſe Conſiderations and Authorities.

FIRST, That this Service was impos'd upon all Biſhopricks and great Abbeys that were Royal Foundations, and which held in pura Eleemoſyna, Eleemoſyna, before the Conqueſt; which tho our Monkiſh Writers, and particularly Matthew Paris, exclaim againſt as a great Oppreſſion on the Church, yet is it not at all likely that it was done without the Conſent of thoſe Biſhops and Abbots at that time, as Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour very probably ſuppoſes: for that this King within the firſt Four years of his Government would have preſumed to have impos'd ſo great a Burden upon the Biſhops, Abbots and Priors without their own conſent, I cannot eaſily believe; becauſe they might have appeal'd to the Pope againſt it, who thereupon would have made the King deſiſt from ſuch an Encroachment; and if he had done it by his own Authority alone, why ſhould it not have been alſo impos'd upon many other Monaſteries beſides thoſe of Royal Foundation? ſince many of them, tho founded by Noblemen, or other private Perſons, were as well endowed as the other; and even ſome of the greater of theſe were afterwards by their own conſent made to hold their Lands by Barony, or Knight's Service, and on that account their Abbots and Priors ſat in the Great Council or Parliament as Barons.

MY next Conſideration is, that Tenure in Capite, with all the Burdens and Services annexed to it, was laid as well upon the Normans (who were the Conqueror's) as upon the ſuppos'd conquer'd Engliſh; yet this was done, not by the King alone, but by and with the conſent of the Great or Common Council of the Kingdom, as appears by the 55*th* and 58*th* of King William's Laws cited by the Doctor. And if this Council then conſiſted only of Normans, as he (tho falſly) ſuppoſes, then theſe Laws will make more ſtrongly for vvhat I now aſſert.

LASTLY, The receiving of this Tenure with all the Services annexed to it, was no Badg of Conqueſt: for the like were received in Scotland about the ſame time, being introduced by King Malcolm the Third, ſirnamed Canmore, in imitation of what had been not long before done in England.

BUT I confeſs the greateſt part of the Scotiſh Writers make it above Thirty years antienter, and that it was introduced by King Malcolm the Second, as is related by * John Fourdon their moſt Antient Hiſtorian, who ſpeaking of this Malcolm, ſays, That he was ſo Liberal, or rather Prodigal in his Gifts, that when after the old cuſtom and manner, he till then held all the Regions and Provinces of the Kingdom in his own Dominion, he then left nothing to himſelf beſides the little Hill on which the Palace of Scone was built; where the Kings, ſitting on their Royal Thrones, were uſed to promulgate Laws and Judgments to their Subjects.

* Lib. 3. cap. 43. Edit. Oxon.

BUT tho theſe Military Fees themſelves might be thus given to this King, yet that the Services annex'd to them were not ſo granted, is alſo related by Johannes Major, and Hector Boethius, who both agree in this Story, that when King Malcolm gave well-nigh all his Lands unto his Nobility in reward of their Services, that they in thankfulneſs to ſupport his Dignity, regranted unto him, Vardam, Deſponſationem, & Releviam, i. e. Wardſhip, and Mariage of their Heirs within Age, and Relief of thoſe of full Age. The ſame thing is alſo aſſerted by the Laws of this King Malcolm, printed in Skene's Regiam Majeſtatem Scotiæ, where it is ſaid, That * ad Montem Placiti in Villa de Scona, Omnes Barones conceſſerunt ſibi Wardam & Releviam de Harede cujuſ- cujuſcunque Baronis defuncti ad ſuſtentationem Domini Regis. But yet for all theſe ſplendid Authorities, it muſt needs be a great Miſtake in moſt of theſe Scotiſh Hiſtorians, and alſo in the Prologue to thoſe Laws, which ſays, That this King then had all the Lands of Scotland in his own hands: For this is more than Fordon himſelf affirms, who Id. ib. expreſly tells us, " That antiently the Scotiſh Kings were wont to be-" ſtow upon their Knights or Military Tenants, ſome more or leſs of " their Lands, being a part or portion of a County or Thaneſhip in " Fee-farm; for at that time the whole Kingdom was divided into " Thaneſhips, of which the King gave to every man as he pleaſed: as " to Husbandmen only for term of Years, or elſe for one or more Lives: " to Gentlemen and Freemen, and to ſome few of the Chief of theſe for " ever; yet not ſo freely, but that they all paid a certain yearly Rent " to the King. All which is very probable, and much the like Cuſtoms " and Tenures were uſed in England before the Conqueſt, at leaſt before " the time of King Knute, when I ſuppoſe they firſt became Here-" ditary. Yet for all this, not only I, but ſeveral Learned Antiquaries and Lawyers do juſtly doubt, whither there is not a great miſtake in theſe Scotiſh Hiſtorians, as alſo in Skene, the Collector and Publiſher of the Antient Scotiſh Laws, who attribute this great Alteratidn to King Malcolm the Second, that reign'd above thirty years before our King William the Firſt; whereas it ſhould have been indeed Malcolm the Third, ſirnamed Cammore, who govern'd Scotland many years before this King's Entrance, and reign'd till ſome years after his deceaſe. And for this there need no plainer Teſtimonies than the many Norman Words or Phraſes that are intermixt amongſt thoſe Laws, and which could not have been in uſe there till they had been firſt brought in hither by that Nation: as alſo by the frequent mention of the King's Great Seal; whereas Edward the Confeſſor, who reign'd at the ſame time, had no Great Seal till toward the latter end of his Reign, and then he borrowed that Cuſtom from Normandy where he had ſo long ſojourn'd. The like I may ſay concerning the large Fees of the Chancellor, for paſſing of Charts and other Writings, when Mony was a very ſcarce Commodity in Scotland as well as here: As alſo the other Fees there ſet down for the Juſtitiary and his Clerks and Coroner, when as yet there were none of theſe Offices in England. And likewiſe the words, Amercement, Eſcheats, Feoda, all of Norman Original, and not known here till after the time of our Conqueſt; which could never have been of that Antiquity, as is there pretended.

* The Mount of the Plea in Scotiſh, the Mute Hill of Scone.

AND indeed I never met with any Learned or Ingenious Gentleman of that Nation, who has not freely own'd the ſpuriouſneſs of the Firſt, Second, and Third Books of theſe pretended Scotiſh Laws, which in the Prologue to the Firſt Book are ſaid to have been made by King Edward, whom Skene in his Annotation will have to be David the Firſt. But whoever will maintain, that the Incidents to Knight's Service, ſuch as Wardſhips, Marriage, &c. were brought into Scotland by the free Conſent of the Scotiſh Nobility, without any Force, may as well likewiſe grant that it was alſo introduced after the ſame manner in England; and I deſire the Doctor, or any one elſe, to aſſign ſufficient reaſon to the contrary.

I SHALL now conclude this Queſtion with ſome other Inſtances produced by the Doctor in this matter, whereby he would prove that all our Tenures and Services are derived from the Normans, in which he is not in all places conſiſtent with himſelf. For tho he Introd. p. 157. " has granted that the word Mannor was derived from the Normans, " and what the Saxons called a Prædium, or Villa, being an Eſtate in " Land, with the enjoyment of Soc, Sac, Tol, Team, and other Pri" vileges, the Normans called Mannors, à Manendo, becauſe ſuch Poſ-
" ſeſſions were ordinarily the Seats of the Lords; yet in the very next P. 158. Page he makes a manifeſt diſtinction between them: " For (ſays he)
" the Saxon Juriſdictions had their Origin from the Grants of their " Kings, but Mannors had their beginning from Feudal Law or " Right; for whoever could diſpoſe of Fees, might juſtly give Laws
" to their Vaſſals, erect Courts for paſſing of Eſtates, and take upon " them all other Privileges merely pertaining to a Noble Fee.

BUT here the Doctor is much miſtaken in the Matter of Fact; for many great Lords and other Tenants held whole Mannors of the King by Right of Inheritance before the Conqueſt, as has been prov'd in part already, and might be further made out if there were occaſion, ſince ſuch Inferior Tenants had Court-Barons belonging to their Townſhips or Mannors, as well before as after the Conqueſt; and conſequently there was no occaſion for this Fancy of the Doctor's, " That " it was only from the Feudal or Norman Law that men could diſpoſe
" of Fees to their Tenants, give Laws to their Vaſſals, and erect new " Courts for paſſing Eſtates. Which is all to no purpoſe, if the Engliſh Lords had as much Power over their Vaſſals before the Conqueſt as after it, and that Court-Barons wherein men paſſed Eſtates, were alſo in being before that time.

BUT here I deſire the Reader further to take notice, that the Doctor grants that Fees were then Eſtates of Inheritance, preſently after his ſuppoſed Conqueſt, elſe how could the Lords then diſpoſe of them? Yet notwithſtanding this, in the very next Leaf he recites
P. 159. " how his Conqueror gave to ſome of his Followers whole Counties,
" to others ſome part of a County, as Hundreds, and ſeveral Man-
" nors and Towns in them; and that theſe ſometimes parcell'd them " out to their Dependents and Friends, and they again to theirs, till
" at laſt Souldiers and ordinary Men had ſome proportionable Shares
" for their Services, tho upon hard Conditions, poſſeſſing them for " the moſt part as Feudataries, and according to the Rules of the " Feudal Law: which as it was the Law for the moſt part in Nor- " mandy as to Poſſeſſion and Tenure, ſo was it here in England, until
" by the Indulgence of Uſurpers to the Great Men, and of them a" gain to the People, their Tenants and Followers, their Tenures be" came more eaſy, and were changed into Inheritances, both Free
" and Bond; as they did in France, upon the Uſurpation of Hugh
" Capet, from whom the Doctor dates the Original of Hereditary Fees
" and Baronies in that Kingdom. From which Example, as alſo from " the Hiſtories of Henry the Firſt, King Stephen and K. John, the Doc" tor infers, that the Nobility of thoſe times never loſt by advancing
" Uſurpers if they proſper'd; for they always bargained with them
" for ſome Flowers of their Crown, and for the bettering their own " Condition: And that theſe Kings above-mention'd, for their own
" ſecurity,

" ſecurity, were forced to comply with the Demands of Holy Church, " and of the Barons that were called in to her Aſſiſtance (tho to their " own Diſadvantage); and beſides this way, without doubt many " Lords became Free and Hereditary, or their Services made cer- " tain by Compact or Agreement between Tenants and Indigent " Lords, &c.

FROM all which the Doctor endeavours to prove that Military Feuds were only for Life, and not Inheritable by the Heir all William the Firſt and his Son Ruſus's Reigns; but that they were owing to ſome or all of his Uſurpers above-mention'd. Yet, with the Doctor's good leave, I think nothing is more falſe and precarious than this Aſſertion, for which he gives no manner of proof: For firſt it is certain, that as in France, ſo likewiſe in Normandy, Feuds were become Hereditary long before Duke William's coming over hither; and however precarious they might be at firſt, yet it is as certain that they were now become Hereditary in Normandy: and this may appear by the Grand Cuſtumier which the Doctor ſo much inſiſts upon; and in Doomſday-Book under Title Glouceſter, there is this Entry: In eodem Feudo de W. habet Williel. de Ome de Comite Radulph de Limes, 50 Carucat. Terræ ſicut ſit in Normannia. From whence it is plain, that ſuppoſing (as the Doctor does) Military Fees to be derived from Normandy, yet they were ſtill held here after the ſame manner as there; and if they were then Hereditary in that Province, they were ſo likewiſe in England; ſince if they were held by Normans, for having aſſiſted King William in this pretended Conqueſt, ſure they would not take Eſtates upon worſe Terms than what were then in uſe in Normandy. Nor can the Doctor prove, that theſe Great Followers of King William parcell'd out their Eſtates to their Dependents and Tenants, whether Normans or Engliſh, provided they held by Knights-Service, upon other Conditions than what they themſelves held by.

AND that all ſuch Eſtates did after the death of the Tenant deſcend to his Heir Male, I ſhall prove from the firſt Clauſe of King Henry the Firſt's Charter; which is thus in Latin.

SI quis Baronum meorum, Comitum, vel aliorum, qui de me Tenent, Mat. Paris. mortuus fuerit, Hæres ſuus non redimet Terram ſuam ſicut faciebat tempore P. 55. fratris mei, ſed juſtâ & legitimâ Relevatione relevabit eam; ſimiliter & homines Baronum meorum legitimâ & juſtâ Relevatione relevabunt terras ſuas de Dominis ſuis.

FROM whence it plainly appears, that the Lands held by Knight's Service, and which were to be redeemed as by a reaſonable Relief, as well from the King as other Meſne Lords, are here called Terras ſuas (viz.) the Tenant's own Land, and not the King's, or their Lords.

AS for King Stephen's Charter, it only grants and confirms the Rights and Liberties of the Church, which had been much invaded in the times of his Predeceſſors, unleſs it be the redreſs of ſome unjuſt Exactions, and Oppreſſions committed by Sheriffs, and the Encroachments of Foreſts; but ſays nothing concerning the Rights and Privileges of Laymen, nor has one word concerning Feudal Eſtates, or any Relaxation of the rigour of them.

BUT whither King John were an Uſurper or not, is not my buſineſs now to inquire; only this is certain, that he had one of the Doctor's Doctor's Signs of a Lawful Succeſſor; for upon his firſt Acceſſion to the Throne, he granted away none of thoſe things which the Doctor calls Flowers of the Crown: and if in the Fifteenth year of his Reign he granted the Great Charter of Liberties, it was not till the Barons took up Arms againſt him, being no longer able to endure the Oppreſſions they then lay under. Nor is this Charter any more than a Confir-

P. 254. mation of that of King Henry the Firſt. And Matthew Paris tells us, that the Schedule or Draught of the Charter, which the Barons tender'd to King John, contain'd for the greateſt part the Antient Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom; and therefore it could not be by this way that ſo many Lands became Free and Hereditary, ſince there is no Clauſe to be found in all King John's Charter that mentions any ſuch thing, or that releaſes or remits any thing of thoſe Antient Services and Incidents that were formerly due from Lands held by Knight's-Service; but only aſcertains that Reliefs ſhould be paid by the Heirs of the King's Tenants in Capite, or their Inferior Tenants upon the death of their Anceſtors.

'TIS true, this Charter takes away alſo ſeveral Abuſes and Oppreſſions which were introduced by the King upon his Tenants in Capite, and by them (after the King's Example) upon their Under-Tenants and Vaſſals: So that this Clauſe in King John's Charter, whereby if any Freeman died Inteſtate, his Goods are to be diſtributed by his Kindred and Friends, with the overſight of the Church, is but a more particular affirmation of the like Clauſe in King Henry the Firſt's Charter, which provides, that if any of his Barons died Inteſtate, his Wife, Children, or next Kindred, ſhould divide his Mony, or other Moveables for the good of his Soul.

NOR is the Doctor's Gloſs upon this Law at all true, when he
* Lib. 1. Feud. Tit. 8. would infer from this Clauſe in * Hottoman, De Feudo Teſtamenti nulla eſt Factio; i. e. There is no making a Teſtament concerning a Feud; that therefore a Feudal Tenant could make no Will at all, ſince it is plain this Law extends only to the Feud it ſelf, which could not be diſpos'd by Teſtament. But what is this to Goods or Mony? And I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me how either of theſe could be held by Knight's-Service: and therefore tho I do not diſpute, but that in Hen-
† Vid. lib. 7. c. 16. ry the Second's time, when † Glanvil wrote, the practice might be that when any Tenant died Inteſtate, the King or Lord ſeized his Goods and Chattels; yet certainly this was but an Abuſe, and could not be juſtified by Law or Equity; and therefore was, among other Grievances, juſtly redreſſed by King John's Charter.

BUT as for the reſt of the Baſe Tenures here mention'd by the Doctor, ſuch as Burgage, i. e. Lands held in Burroughs according to the Cuſtom thereof, tho it be true we have had them here ever ſince the Conqueſt, yet that they were here before too is alſo as certain, as may appear from Doomſday-Book, and other Antient Treatiſes of later date. And the like I may ſay concerning the Tenures of Sotcage and Burdage; which laſt was (ſays the Doctor) a drudging ſervile Tenure of carrying Burdens, and Sacks of Corn, &c. which for ought I know had a different ſignification: and tho the Lands ſo held could neither be ſold nor mortgaged, and that the like Tenures were alſo in Normandy, yet nothing is more certain, than that they were alſo here before the Conqueſt: and it may be proved by ſeveral Paſſages in the Saxon Laws; for ſuch Ceorls or Husbandmen, were the Lords Sockmen, i. e. Ploughmen, and held their Lands at the Will of their Lord, by doing ſervile Works about his own Demeans.

* Saxon

BUT as for ſuch as held in Free-Soccage, as the Tenants by Gavelkind in Kent, tho the like Tenure might be found in ſeveral Vicounties in Normandy, eſpecially that of Bayeux, where Odo, made Earl of Kent by the Conqueror, was Biſhop, and whence (as the Doctor ſuppoſes) it might be brought by him into Kent; yet this is a mere Fancy, for Sir Henry Spelman calls it, Priſca Anglorum conſuetudo Germania delata. And Mr. Somner, as well as other Authors who have written on this Subject, do allow that it was here long before the Conqueſt, and is an evident proof that King William did not diſpoſe of all the Land in England, ſince ſo large a County as this did for the moſt part retain its Antient Tenure by Soccage, which was alſo before the Conqueſt the general Law or Cuſtom of all Lands that were not held by Military Service.

FOR Glanvil tells us, That where the Inheritance is divideable among the Sons, it is Soccage, &c. Lib. 7. c. 3.

I HAVE now diſpatched this Great Queſtion about Tenures, and the Incidents belonging to them. I ſhall in the next place ſay ſomething concerning ſuch Inſtances as the Doctor brings from his ſure Author * Gervaſe of Tilbury ſo often cited by him, who relates, "That "the Court of Exchequer was erected by K. William, in imitation of "one of the ſame Name and Kind, which was inſtituted in Nor-"mandy by Duke Rollo; and that the Authority of this Court was "at firſt ſo Great, that no man might contradict any Sentence pro-"nounced therein: and not only the Law and Affairs concerning all the "Great Baronies of England, and all ſuch Eſtates as held in Capite, "were tranſacted there, but many other Laws or Rights were diſ-"cuſſed, and Doubts determined: for, ſays Gervaſe, the excellent "knowledg of the Exchequer conſiſts, not in Accounts only, but in "multiplicity of Judgments. And the Doctor adds, That Common-"Pleas were uſually held in this Court until the Eight and twentieth "of Edward the Firſt, * when it was enacted that no Common-Plea "ſhould be henceforth held in the Exchequer, contrary to the Form of "the Great Charter. * Lib. 1. c. 14.

* Vid. Artic. ſuper Chart. c. 4. 2. Inſtit. P. 550.

"IN this Court ſate the Capital Juſticiary, the Chancellor, Trea-"ſurer, and as many of the moſt diſcreet, greateſt and knowing "Men (real Barons) whither of the Clergy or Laiety, as the King "pleaſed to direct.

"SO that the Buſineſs of this Court was not only Accounts, and "what belonged to them, but to decree Right, and determine doubt-"ful Matters which aroſe upon incident Queſtions; to hold Common-"Pleas, and to judg what chiefly concern'd all Capite Lands, and the "Great Baronies of England.

"THE Great Officers and other Great Men that ſate here, were "all Normans, or of Norman Extraction, which probably neither "well underſtood or ſpake the Engliſh Tongue; much leſs had they "time to learn, know, or underſtand the Common Law of England, "being then, and ever ſince the Conqueſt, Lex non Scripta, but di-"vinely caſt into the Heart of Man, as Sir Edward Coke affirms: for

" unleſs they received it this way by Inſpiration, how could Judg" ments be made, and Sentence given in this Court by any other " than the Norman Law?

I HAVE tranſcribed verbatim all that the Doctor has ſaid conſiderable on this Head, becauſe I confeſs it is one of the beſt and ſtrongeſt Inſtances he has to prove the great Uſe of the Norman Laws in England. Therefore, in the firſt place, I ſhall not deny that the Court of Exchequer was of a Norman Original; and I have already acknowledged, that all Pleadings there, as well as in the King's own Court, were then, and for divers Ages after, in the French Tongue; yet does it not follow that this Court of Exchequer was erected by King William's ſole Authority, tho perhaps the firſt Judges and Barons that ſate there might have been Normans. But as concerning thoſe Incidents and Burdens that then lay upon the Tenants by Military Service, viz. Wardſhip, Mariage of the Heir, &c. tho they might have been derived from Normandy, yet how ſmall a Member they were of that Great Body of the Law of England, I have already obſerved.

AND tho I grant Common-Pleas were often tryed in this Court of Exchequer, between other Perſons than the King's own Tenants in Capite, yet that this was an Incroachment upon the Antient Law of England, appears by the 25th Law of Henry the Firſt, which expreſly provides, That if there ariſe a Plea between the Tenants of any of the Barons that have Socna (that is, Suit of Court) the Plea was to be determin'd in the Court of their own Lord of Common Right; and if it were between the Tenants of two Lords, having ſuch a Socna, then the Defendant was to anſwer in the Court of his own Lord only.

THUS it was in all Suits ariſing between the Tenants of ſeveral Lords; but if any Difference aroſe between two Barons or Tenants in Capite, or betwen the Vavaſors, or Meſne-Tenants of ſuch Barons, this King has alſo determin'd that Queſtion in his Charter directed to Sampſon Biſhop of Worceſter, and Urſo, or Urſe the Sheriff of that Shire, which you will find in * Sir H. Spelman's Gloſſary, and which is alſo cited by Dr. B. in his † Preface to his Hiſtory, wherein the King commands, That all County and Hundred-Courts ſhould ſit and be held as in the time of King Edward. And then after ſome other Clauſes follows this, Et ſi quando exurgat Placitum de diviſione Terrarum, ſi intereſt Barones meos Dominicos, tractetur Placitum in Curia mea; & ſi inter Vavaſores duorum Dominorum, tractetur in Comitatu, &c.

WHENCE it is evident, that all Suits or Pleas between Inferior Lords and their Tenants, were to be tryed either in the Courts Baron, or elſe in thoſe of the Counties, and were not to be brought up into the King's Court, unleſs the Plea or Suit was between the King's own Barons or Tenants in Capite.

SO that all this being conſider'd, the Judges of the King's own Courts, whither of the King's-Bench or Exchequer, needed not to have then underſtood the Common Law of England, any further than the ordinary Grounds or Principles of it, in which a Norman Nobleman or Lawyer, who did not underſtand the Engliſh Tongue, might be as eaſily inſtructed by Tradition, or word of Mouth, as if the Laws had been then written in Engliſh-Saxon.

AND tho I do not approve of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke's pedantick Expreſſion, of his Lex non Scripta, being divinely caſt into the Heart of Man, which the Doctor deſervedly ridicules; yet for all this, ſure it had been as eaſy for theſe Norman Judges to have learn'd the Laws of England by the Tradition of others, as it was for the ſame Perſons to have come to the knowledg of the Laws and Cuſtoms of Normandy, which were then likewiſe unwritten Laws, and ſo continued for near one hundred and fifty years after, till the beginning of our King Henry the Third's Reign, when they were collected into one Body by order of King Philip Auguſtus, after he had united Normandy to the Crown of France.

THEREFORE I cannot ſee how the Doctor makes good his Concluſion, that tho the Engliſh and Norman Laws were in great part the ſame before the Conqueſt, yet that the bulk or main of them were brought over hither from Normandy by the Conqueror.

BUT as for the reſt of his Inſtances which he pretends to bring from the Country laſt mention'd; and to prove which he runs over the whole Book called the Grand Cuſtumier, which he compares with the Firſt Treatiſe of our Engliſh Laws, written by that Learned Juſtitiary Glanvil, and would thence infer, that becauſe the Cuſtoms and Law-proceedings uſed in England when that Author wrote, appear in many particulars to be the ſame, eſpecially in the Form or executive Part concerning Writs; yet is this no proof that all theſe Laws and Cuſtoms muſt have been derived from Normandy, ſince they might have been as well tranſmitted from hence thither, as I ſhall prove from Arguments that ſhall be given you by and by.

BUT in the firſt place I ſhall not, with * Sir Edward Coke, make uſe of the Authority of William de Roüil, who in his Preface to his Comment to the Grand Cuſtumier, ſays, from the Hiſtory called Chronica Chronicorum, that our Edward the Confeſſor was the Maker or Author of theſe Cuſtoms to Normandy: for I ſhall ſo far agree with the Doctor, as to allow all that Story for mere Fable or Romance; only I ſhall make this Inference from it, that when this Author (who was himſelf a Norman) wrote, it was ſo far from being known or believed in Normandy, that their Laws were firſt brought over into England by the Conqueror, that to the contrary they thought them to have been appointed by Edward the Confeſſor, when he ſojourned within that Province.

* Vid. his 31 Report.

BUT to come more cloſely to the Matter in diſpute; it is no ſufficient Argument to alledg, as the Doctor does, from a Parity of our Law-proceedings in forcible Entries, Hue-and-Crys, Appeals, or Suits of Robbery, Laws of Sanctuary Simple and Perſonal, Plaints, Briefs or Writs of Novel-Diſſeiſin, and Mort-D'anceſtor; with other Writs and Proceſs, being the ſame with thoſe in Normandy; that therefore they were all borrowed from thence.

I GRANT the Doctor has made a very laborious Compariſon between the Grand Cuſtumier and our Antient Law-Books, Glanvil and Bracton, in theſe Particulars; yet can he not for all this pains aſſure us, that the Norman Body of Laws or Cuſtoms, is as antient as the time of the Conqueror, or his Son Rufus, without which ſuppoſition all the Doctor's Inſtances will prove inſignificant: for I think it may be ſhewn that even theſe Norman Cuſtoms and Writs received great Alterations and Additions from thoſe of England between his Conqueſt and the loſs of Normandy, in the Reign of King John; and this I ſhall endeavour to prove from theſe Conſiderations.

FIRST, That after the Conqueſt Normandy remain'd a Feudal Dutchy, and was but a ſmall Province in compariſon of England, and became as it were an Appendix to it, being an Independent Kingdom: and the Kings of England having the Seat of their Government here while they continued Dukes of Normandy, by this means that Province muſt receive a greater influence as to its Laws and Government from England, than Normandy could have upon it; inſomuch that there iſſued oftentimes Precepts into Normandy to ſummon Perſons to anſwer in Civil Cauſes here in England; and that even for Lands and Poſſeſſions in Normandy: as to inſtance in a * Precept to the Seneſchal of Normandy, to ſummon one Robert a Norman to anſwer John Mareſchal in a Plea of Land, giving him Forty days warning; to which the Tenant appear'd, and pleaded a Recovery had in Normandy. The like we find in the Caſe of William de Boſco againſt Geoffery Ruſſun for Land in Corbeſpin in Normandy; which plainly proves a dependance of that Province upon England, whilſt it continued annexed to this Crown.

* Vid. Placita MSS. 11 R. Johan. in Bib. Hoſpit. Lincoln.

SECONDLY, That a much greater conformity of Laws aroſe after the ſuppoſed Conqueſt; and that not ſo much by an aſſimulation of the Laws of England to thoſe of Normandy, as by thoſe to ours, which gradually encreas'd to a greater height of Perfection, between the beginning of the Reign of King Henry the Firſt, and the latter end of Henry the Second, during all which time Normandy was appendant to England; ſo that many Writs and Law-proceedings might be ſent from hence and tranſmitted thither, and be afterwards inſerted into their Grand Cnſtumier: Which will yet more plainly appear, if we compare that Treatiſe of Glanvil (cited by the Doctor) with that Book laſt mention'd; in which you will find many Words and Law-Terms the very ſame with thoſe in our Antient Engliſh Laws; ſuch as are Namps for a Diſtreſs, in the firſt Book of this Cuſtumier. There is a whole * Chapter concerning the manner of taking theſe Namps or Diſtreſſes; which word being wholy of an Engliſh-Saxon Original (as Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary allows) ſhews that it could never have been borrowed from Normandy.

* Vid. cap. 7.

SO that it ſeems more probable, that by their ſtudy or imitation of our Engliſh Law-Proceedings, or rather by the Authority of our Kings, the Norman Laws might arrive to the ſame Form and Perfection there, as they did in England in the ſame Period of Time, viz. in the Reign of Henry the Firſt and Second, Richard the Firſt, and K. John, eſpecially in this laſt King's Reign: For if any man do but compare the Cuſtumier of Normandy with that Treatiſe of Glanvil, he will moſt plainly find the Tract of the Norman Laws to have followed that Pattern, and to have been written long after it, when the Engliſh Laws were yet more refin'd and perfected: For it is certain, beyond all contradiction, that the Collection of the Cuſtoms and Laws of Normandy was long after the time of Richard I. for it mentions his Coronation, and appoints that Period for a limitation of Actions Anceſtral; nay, that it was after the actual Settlement of the Dutchy of Normandy in the Crown of France; for it appears that this appointing the Coronation of King Richard the Firſt for the limitation of real Actions, was ſettled by Philip Auguſtus King of France, after his full poſſeſſion of the Dutchy of Normandy. And Renault in his Preface to the French Notes to the Reformed Cuſtumier of Normandy, printed at Roüen 1660. ſays expreſly, That theſe Cuſtoms were not put in writing till the beginning of the Reign of St. Lewis, when it was drawn into the Form we now have it, by a certain Advocate or Practitioner in the Laws, whom he either does not, or elſe cannot name.

Crown

TO conclude: if the Laws, Cuſtoms, and Legal Proceedings of that Province (inſtanced in by the Doctor) could be proved to have been a Collection of the Antient Laws uſed there before the coming of Duke William into England; it might have been a plain proof indeed, that their Laws being ſo like ours, were tranſlated from them to us. But the Caſe is quite otherwiſe, the Grand Cuſtumier is but a Collection of the Laws and Cuſtoms of Normandy, after the Reigns of King Henry the Second, Richard the Firſt, and King John; and indeed in Henry the Third's time, when it had received ſeveral Additions and Emendations, under the Kings above-mentioned, who were moſt of them aſſiſted with a Council of ſuch as well knew the Engliſh Laws. And as in part of this time, the Law-Proceedings in England had received a great Advance and Perfection, as appears by that excellent Collection of Glanvil above-mentioned, when yet there were above Twenty years more to come, wherein they might have acquired a farther improvement, before Normandy was loſt; ſo from theſe Engliſh Laws thus modell'd, poliſhed and perfected, the ſame Draught was copied upon the Norman Laws and Cuſtoms, which received their faireſt Lines from thoſe of England, as they ſtood in the beginning of King John's time, and ſo were in a great meaſure but a ſcanty Collection of the Engliſh Laws, and indeed a Tranſcript of them, eſpecially as to the Forms relating to Legal Proceſs, tho mingled with their own Norman particular Laws and Cuſtoms, which alter'd the Features of the Original in many places.

THIS, with a great deal more to the ſame effect, the Reader may find in a Manuſcript Treatiſe of the late moſt Learned Lord Chief Juſtice Hale, intituled, The Hiſtory and Analyſis of the Laws of England; from which I have borrowed the Senſe (tho not the very words) of all that is conſiderable upon this Head concerning the Original of our Engliſh Laws, and for their Vindication againſt the ſuppoſition of their being wholly of a Norman Extraction.

NOW who the Reader thinks moſt to be relyed upon for the Antiquity and Original of our Engliſh Laws, thoſe Learned Judges, Sir Edward Coke and Sir Matthew Hale, who had made it great part of their Buſineſs to inquire into and underſtand them; or a Doctor who coming late to the ſtudy of theſe Matters, and only tantum Tranſfuga from another Profeſſion, hath ſlightly run over ſome few Books belonging to this; I ſhall leave to his Judgment to determine.

BUT I ſhall now conclude with ſomething of my own, in anſwer to the reſt of the Doctor's ſmall Cavils, from what * Sir Edward Coke hath ſaid upon this Subject; who becauſe he calls Original Writs the Foundation on which our Law dependeth, the Doctor thereupon falſly falſly concludes, that then certainly the Foundations and Principles of Ours and the Norman Laws are very little, if any thing at all different; and then he proceeds to triumph over Sir Edward, for being too credulous of the Authority of Will. de Rovil, who falſly ſuppoſes that King Edward the Confeſſor was the maker or giver of theſe Cuſtoms to the Normans.

BUT the Doctor himſelf is ſtill to prove, that theſe very Writs and Laws were fram'd in Normandy in the ſame manner as they are found in the Grand Cuſtumier above-cited, as alſo in our Antient Law-Books, Glanvil, Bracton, &c. and that before the time of his Conqueſt. And I would ask him how he can be ſure that Mr. Lambard is in the right, when he ſays in his * Archaion. that the Saxons Judicial Proceedings were de Plano, without any Form or Solemnity; and that therefore, ſo far as he could obſerve, they did not uſe to call the Parties by any Writ or Writing, but to ſend for them by certain Meſſengers whom they termed Theies (or perhaps rather Theows, or Thegens, that is, Miniſters or Servants, as the Doctor obſerves.) Yet this ſeems only to be gratis dictum; for it is very hard for any body to ſuppoſe, how theſe Meſſengers could tell the Party that was to be ſummon'd, what was the ground of the Suit, or for what Cauſe he was to appear, it being almoſt next to impoſſible, for the Defendant to have been able to make his Defence without ſome Writing briefly ſetting forth the Cauſe of the Complaint.

* P. 64, 65.

NOR is the Doctor's Reaſon to the contrary very material, viz. "That if there had been the ſame Forms of Writs, and the ſame formality in Law-proceedings before the Conqueſt as after, and at this "day, they would have been found in Books ſomewhere reſerved, in "one Monaſtery or other; or they would have been delivered from "one to another, and preſerved by Tradition, as well as the very "Common Laws and Cuſtoms themſelves, which were Jus non "Scriptum, as all the Patrons of the Antiquity of our Law affirm. But this I think may be eaſily anſwered; for tho I grant the ſame formality of Law-Proceedings might not be in uſe under the Saxon Kings as afterward, yet that they had no Forms of Writs, or other written Legal Proceſs before the Conqueſt, I cannot believe: Nor does it follow from the Doctor's Reaſons that they had none, becauſe then they would have been found in ſome of our Abbey-Books; ſince they might have been either loſt at the diſſolution of the Abbeys, or elſe might never have been preſerved by the Monks themſelves, who not being the Clerks, or makers out of ſuch Legal Proceſs, it was not their buſineſs to tranſcribe them: and as for their being preſerved by Tradition, becauſe the Common Laws themſelves were ſo, that is a very forced Inference, ſince every one that underſtands any thing of our Laws, knows very well, that tho the Rules and Maxims of Law, which depend either upon its own, or elſe the general Reaſon of Mankind, may be eaſily enough remembred and delivered by Tradition; yet Writs and Pleadings (being matters of Form) could not be ſo, and therefore we have had a Regiſter of Writs, beyond all time of Memory. And the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke reports, that he had ſeen a Copy of it as antient as the Reign of Henry the Second. And as for the Writ of Withernam, i. e. to have ſatisfaction for a Diſtreſs, carried into a Caſtle or other incloſed place, Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſ- ſury (under that word) tells us, that it appears by the name to have been an Antient Writ of a Saxon Original; and if ſo, the Engliſh-Saxons had then written Forms of Proceſs before the Conqueſt, quod erat demonſtrandum.

I SHALL paſs by ſeveral other of the Doctor's leſs Errors and Miſtakes, as when he will needs have Tenancy by the Courteſy of England, to be one of the Cuſtoms derived from Normandy; and he might make uſe of the ſame Argument for Scotland too, ſince the like Cuſtom is there alſo, without owing its Original to France. So likewiſe becauſe he finds the Law-Terms and Vacations to have been much the ſame here as in Normandy, therefore theſe alſo muſt have been derived from thence. But how far the Doctor is miſtaken in this Aſſertion, I refer him to Sir H. Spelman's Learned Diſcourſe of the Original of the Four Terms, lately printed at Oxford in the Reliquiæ Spelmanniana, wherein he may ſee that theſe Terms, appointed for Law-Proceedings and the following Vacations, tho they were in great part derived from the Canon-Law, yet received their Sanction here from the Laws of King Ethelred, Knute, and * Edward the Confeſſor, and confirmed by King William the Firſt: Which laſt particularly ſets out the time of the Vacations from Law-buſineſs, and conſequently the reſt of the Year was appointed for Terms. Nor do the Laws of King Henry the Firſt make any alteration in this matter; and Henry the Second expreſly ratified the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, and William the Conqueror, as Hoveden tells us, ſaying, That he did it by the Advice of Ranulph Glanvil, then newly made Juſticiary of England. And this ſeems to be true, for Glanvil doth accordingly make ſome of his Writs returnable in Octabis, or clauſo Paſchæ, where the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor appoint the end of Lent Vacation: and ſo it continued for divers Ages, till ſuch time as theſe Terms came by degrees to be ſhortned by divers Acts of Parliament, to what they are at this day.

* Vid. Leges Ed. Conf. c. 9. Sect. 2.

I HAVE now diſpatched the Doctor's Arguments on this Subject: I come next to his Authorities, great part of which have been anſwered already; yet I confeſs there is one conſiderable one, that requires ſomewhat to be ſaid to it; and it is from * Eadmerus, who writes, "That King William deſigning to eſtabliſh in England thoſe Uſages "and Laws which his Anceſtors and he had obſerved in Normandy, "cauſed ſuch Perſons to be made Biſhops, Abbots, and other Princi- "pal men through the whole Nation, who could not be thought ſo un- "worthy as to be guilty of any Reluctancy or Diſobedience to them, "knowing by whom and to what they were raiſed: All divine and "humane Things he ordered at his pleaſure. Then after the Hiſtorian "hath recounted, in what things he even diſallowed the Authority of "the Pope and the Arch-Biſhop, he concludes thus; But what he did "in Secular Matters, I forbear to write, becauſe it is not to my purpoſe, "and alſo becauſe any one may, from what hath been delivered in "Divine Matters, eaſily gueſs what he did in Secular.

* Hiſt. Novor. fol. 6. n. 10, 20, 30.

THO I cannot deny the Teſtimony of ſo grave an Author, and alſo muſt own that the Government of this King was very Abſolute and Arbitrary, eſpecially towards the latter end of his Reign; yet does not Eadmerus here ſay, that King William eſtabliſhed in England all thoſe Laws and Cuſtoms which were obſerved in Normandy, only that he deſign'd or intended to do ſo; and to that end made thoſe Biſhops Biſhops and Abbots above-mention'd: but it is not what he deſign'd to do, but what he actually did that can determine this Matter; for * Ingulph alſo tells us, "He likewiſe deſign'd to deſtroy the Engliſh "Tongue, and to that end commanded that the Laws of the Land, "and Statutes of our Engliſh Kings ſhould be handled or pleaded in "French; and that Boys ſhould be taught at School their firſt Rudi- "ments of Grammar in French, and not in Engliſh, and yet he could "never compaſs that Deſign. And the Engliſh Tongue continued ſtill the ſame, with very little mixture of French words, till the Reigns of Edward the Firſt, and Richard the Second, as any one may obſerve by that Writ or Proclamation in old Engliſh, of the 43*d* of Henry the Third at the end of this Volume; and which is alſo printed in Mr. Somner's Saxon Dictionary, Title, Unnam dare vel concedere. Or if he will but take the pains to compare the old Manuſcript Hiſtory of Robert of Glouceſter in Verſe, he will ſee by what degrees the French Tongue came to be intermix'd with our Modern Engliſh.

* Edit. Oxon. p. 71.

Vid. Append. n. 9.

BUT ſince the Doctor has given us one Authority for his Opinion, I ſhall give him another for mine; which is from an Author of undoubted Credit, who wrote within 80 years after this ſuppos'd Alteration of the Engliſh Laws, and therefore might very well underſtand the truth of Matters of Fact, either from his own knowledg, or the relation of others; and it is Henry of Huntingdon, who in his Prologue to the 5*th* Book of his Hiſtory, after he has related the ſeveral Plagues that had fallen upon Britain by the Invaſion of Strangers, makes this difference between the Conqueſt of the Saxons, and that of the Normans over England. Of the former he ſays thus, That the Saxons gaining the Country by War, kept what they had obtain'd, built upon it, and govern'd it by Laws: And alſo the Normans quickly ſubduing the Land, granted to the Vanquiſhed, Life, Liberty, and the Antient Laws of the Kingdom, as of * Right, of which things he had already ſpoken: And then goes on to compare how far the Danes exceeded all thoſe that had gone before or follow'd after them in Cruelty and Barbarity, which Parallel being nothing to our purpoſe, I ſhall here paſs by; only I think there can be nothing more expreſs than this Teſtimony, that the greateſt part of the Laws of England remain'd unaltered, notwithſtanding this pretended Conqueſt.

* De jure.

BUT this leads me to anſwer another conſiderable Objection, that there cannot be a greater Evidence of the real Conqueſt of any Nation than this, viz. "That the Laws (and particularly thoſe of King "William) in Ingulph; as alſo all Proceedings and Pleadings in the Su- "perior Courts, were from this time in the French and Norman "Tongue, till the 36*th* of K. Edward the Third, when it was alter'd by "a Statute; as alſo that moſt of our Antient Law-Books and Reports "are in that Language. Now the ſame Power that inſtituted ſo great "an Alteration, either did, or elſe might have changed all the Laws "themſelves, if they had pleaſed.

IN anſwer to which, I muſt in the firſt place obſerve (as I have done before) that it is not what this King might, or would have done, but what he actually perſormed, that ought to be the Subject of this Diſpute: for tho I cannot deny that King William acted in many things like a Conqueror, yet it being done contrary to his own Stipulation and Oath, it could never juſtly give him that Title, according to the right acceptation of that word. But to anſwer the Matter of Fact, I grant, that the laſt Body of Laws of this King's are in old Norman-French; and it ſeems neceſſary that they ſhould be ſo, or elſe how could the Normans (ſo many of whom were then in England) well underſtand them? Yet without doubt they were alſo proclaimed in the County-Courts, where the Laws were then uſually publiſh'd in the Engliſh-Saxon Tongue, or elſe how could the Engliſh have been obliged to obſerve them? Nor indeed is this ſingle Inſtance of any conſiderable force, if you pleaſe to remember, that the Laws of King Edward, confirm'd by King William (as I have already mention'd) were written in Latin, and not in French; as were alſo that Body of Laws of this King granted by way of a * Charter. The like I may ſay concerning thoſe of his Succeſſor's: for all our Antient Laws and Statutes, from the Reign of King Henry the Firſt to the Statute of Weſtminſter I. which was made in the third year of King Edward the Firſt, are drawn up in Latin, and none of them in French; as are alſo all their Charters, except ſome few of the three Firſt Norman Kings, which are either written in Engliſh-Saxon alone, or in Latin with the Engliſh Verſion under them: Of both which ſorts there are ſeveral yet remaining in the Cottonian Library, as alſo in that at Lambeth; beſides what belonged to ſeveral Cathedrals, and to the City of London and other Antient Cities; none of which are in the old French, as moſt certainly they would have been, had thoſe Kings intended to deſtroy the Engliſh Tongue, and introduce the Norman in the room of it.

* It is at the end of his Reign in Engliſh, and in the Appendix in Latin, N. 1.

I COME now to the next Inſtance of our Pleadings, viz. Law-Books and Law-Reports, being moſt of them written in old French. As to the Firſt, viz. the Pleadings, I have ſaid enough already, and proved they were only in uſe in the King's own Court (now called the Kings-Bench) or elſe in the Exchequer; but that in Inferior Courts in the Country, where far the greater part of the Law-buſineſs of the Kingdom was diſpatched, it was otherwiſe.

BUT to ſay ſomewhat of our Antient Law-Books being written in Norman-French, it is a great miſtake; for the Antienteſt we have, viz. Glanvil, Bracton, and Fleta, are in Latin: the Firſt that we can find in French being Breton, and Horn's Mirror of Juſtices, both which were written in the time of Edward the Firſt, when I grant it became very much the faſhion to write, not only our Laws in French, but our very Parliament Rolls of Edward the Third, and great part of Richard the Second's Reign in that Language. But this could not be the Effect of the Norman Conqueſt, ſince our Writers did not make uſe of it till above a hundred and fifty years after that time; and beſides, Normandy had long ſince loſt its Dependance upon England; therefore this muſt be aſcribed to ſome other Cauſe, and not to that: nor is the French, in which our Laws and Law-Books were written, the Norman Dialect, (* for that was very rude and unpoliſhed) but pure French, ſuch as was then ſpoke in thoſe parts of Aquitain and Poictou, which were at that time under the Engliſh Dominion; and with which Countries, not only our Kings, but many of our Nobility and Gentry then had a great Intereſt and Correſpondence, both by reaſon of their attending our Kings ſo often thither in their Warlike Expeditions, as alſo by their Great Eſtates in thoſe Parts. So that French was the common Language of the Court of England; not only in King William and his Son's Reigns, but alſo in thoſe of all his Succeſſors down to King Henry the Sixth, when the French conquer'd all the Territories that were remaining to our Kings in France.

FOR the proof of which, as alſo to divert the Reader after ſo much dry Matter, I ſhall give you theſe following Verſes from * Robert of Glouceſter's Manuſcript Hiſtory in old Engliſh, where ſpeaking of the Normans not long after the Conqueſt, he has this Paſſage.

* In Bib. Cotton.

Normans ne cowde than ſpeek, but their own Speech,
But Franche as thei did at Hoom here Children teche:
So that heir men of this Londe, that of here blood come
Holden all thilk Speech, that thei of them nome:
For if a man con no Franche men telle of them right lite,
But Lowe men holden Engliſche here kind Speche zite.
I wene in the world ne is Londe, neither Countrey none
That ne holdeth his kind Speche but Englande alone.
But men wote well to conne both good Lyt is,
For the more men conne, the more they bin worthy I wis.

AND this alſo was one main reaſon why the Pleadings in the Courts at Weſtminſter continued ſo long in the Freneh Tongue, ſince it was then generally underſtood not only by Lawyers, but by all People of any Quality; inſomuch that in the Reign of Edward the Firſt it was a ſufficient Exception againſt a Juryman return'd to appear at Weſtminſter, that he did not underſtand French: and therefore if the Pleadings in the Courts above were in that Language, it muſt follow that the Reports of the Caſes there pleaded, and adjudged, ſhould be ſo too; ſo that indeed that Language became (as I may ſay) ſo appropriated to our Laws, that long after the Pleadings began to be in Engliſh, yet our Books of Reports of the Arguments uſed in all Cauſes and Trials at Weſtminſter were ſtill written in French till the time of our late Civil Wars. Which being a true Hiſtory of this Matter, it plainly ſhews, that the writing of ſo many of our Law-Books and Reports in French, is not owing to the pretended Conqueſt, but to divers other Cauſes.

SO that I think we may ſafely conclude with what the Sages of our Law generally maintain, that the Common Law of England being Jus non Scriptum, was a Law before it was reduced to writing, and conſequently might be learn'd by Tradition and Experience, as well as by Reading, and cannot be properly ſaid to be learn'd from any one Language; ſince our Judges are not tied up to the bare Words or Expreſſions of any Law-Caſe or Precedent, but ought to take the Principles and Reaſons of the Law as their only Rule and Guide in all their Sentences and Judgments.

AND that the Laws of England were antiently look'd upon as Traditional, I have the Authority of the firſt Writer in that Profeſſion, viz. Glanvil, who in his Preface to his Book ſays thus, Leges namque Anglicanas, licet non ſcriptas, Leges appellari, non videtur abſurdum, &c.

AND now having diſpatched the moſt difficult part of my Task concerning the Original of our Common Laws, I ſhall next proceed to inſtance in ſome Statutes, or Penal Laws enacted by King William the Firſt: which being more ſevere than thoſe of his Predeceſſors, may ſeem to ſpeak him a Conqueror.

THE Firſt is recorded by * Henry of Huntington, That if any one had kill'd another for any Cauſe whatſoever, he was liable to Sentence of Death. But in this our Author is miſtaken, for this Law was only extended againſt Wilful-murder, not to other Manſlaughters, as any Man may ſee that will conſult the 8th Law of this King in the French Tongue, where he will find the Were, or Price of a Man's Life, was there ſet at much the ſame rate as under the Engliſh-Saxon Kings. * L. 6. f. 212.

THE Second is found among the Laws of King William, as alſo in the ſame Author, That he that raviſhed † any Woman, ſhould be deprived of his Genitals. † aliquem falſly printed for aliquam.

THE Third is in the Saxon Chronicle, and Matthew Paris, That whoever kill'd a Deer of any kind, within the King's Foreſt, ſhould loſe his Eyes. Moſt of which Penalties, tho I grant that they were made more ſevere than they were under the Engliſh-Saxon Government, yet might for ſeveral good Reaſons (now unknown to us) be increaſed ſo. But this Penalty concerning killing of Deer being found too cruel, was afterwards by his Succeſſors turn'd into a Pecuniary Mulct.

THERE is likewiſe another Law of this King's related by * Polydore Virgil, called the Law of Coverfeu, viz. That at the ringing of a Bell at Night, all Light and Fire in every Houſe ſhould be put out, or at leaſt ſo concealed as not to be ſeen. Which Law, tho we do not find it expreſly in any other Author, as I will not diſpute the truth of it, ſo neither will this, nor the reſt of the Laws abovemention'd, make him a Conqueror; ſince it cannot be proved that he enacted thoſe Laws by his own ſole Authority, without the conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, and they did as well extend to the victorious Normans, as to the conquer'd Engliſh. And as for the laſt Law of Coverfeu, I look upon it only as a temporary Edict, which continued no longer at the moſt, than during this King's and his Son Rufus's Reigns: For William of Malmesbury tells us, That * as ſoon as King Henry the Firſt came to the Crown, one of the firſt Reformations he made, was the reſtoring the uſe of Lights in the night-time in his Court, which had been intermitted in the time of his Brother: Which ſhews, that if this was any Badg of Conqueſt, it was worn as well by the Normans of his own Family, as by the vanquiſh'd Engliſh. * Lib. 9. * P. 156.

BUT the greateſt Inſtance of this King's Arbitrary Power, ſeems to have been the reviving of that Tax, called Danegeld, which Ingulph ſays was remitted by King Edward the Confeſſor. But as I will not deny the Authority of a Writer who lived in that very Time; ſo neither will its being revived by King William, make him a Conqueror, ſince it might be regranted by ſome Law now loſt; or if he did it otherwiſe, will this prove him a Conqueror any more than ſeveral of our Kings their raiſing Mony contrary to Law, when they thought they had any neceſſity for it, and found their Parliaments would not grant them the Taxes they demanded. Nor can we find that he ever impoſed this, but when he thought the Nation was in danger by Foreign Invaſions, or that his Wars with France required it. And this Tax was continued during the Reigns of all his Succeſſors, as far as King Stephen: which may ſerve to interpret a Paſſage in William of Malmesbury, whereby it ſeems, as if William Rufus had by his own ſole Authority impos'd a Tax upon the Nation; when this Author ſpeaking of Ranulph the King's Clerk (who was afterwards by him made Biſhop of Durham) ſays thus: Is ſi quando Edictum Regium proceſſiſſet ut nominatum Tributum Angliæ penderet, duplum adjiciebat; i. e. When the King's Edict went forth, that England ſhould pay the Tribute aſſeſs'd upon it, he (this Ranulph) added twice as much more; that is, (if this Author may be credited in a thing ſo unlikely) Ranulph having the drawing up of the King's Edict, or Proclamation for raiſing this Tax of Danegeld, made the Sum firſt agreed on twice as much, there being at that time no ſtated Rule appointed how much ſhould be paid for every Hyde of Land in England, it being ſometimes after the rate of one Shilling, ſometimes two Shillings, and ſometimes ſix Shillings per Hyde, which is the higheſt Sum I can find; it being mention'd in an additional Clauſe in Hoveden's Copy of Edward the Confeſſor's Laws, to have been once raiſed by William Rufus to ſix Shillings, when the Barons of England aſſiſted him with a great Sum of Mony to purchaſe the Dutchy of Normandy of his Brother Duke Robert. And it was afterwards levyed during the Reign of his Brother Henry the Firſt; tho not annually, as Dr. Brady would have it, for it was never ſo in his Father's time, but only occaſionally, when the fear of Invaſions or Foreign Wars required it; and for this I refer him to his own Author * Gervaſe of Tilbury.

King

* Cap. 23.

I SHALL but ſlightly mention ſome other Cuſtoms rather than Laws, which tho they might have been derived from Normandy, yet does it not therefore prove they were any Badges of Conqueſt, ſuch as were Tryal by Duel or Combat, which in Criminal Caſes an Engliſh man (if he were Defendant) might refuſe, and be tried by the old Engliſh way of Ordeal, as may appear by the 70 and 71 Laws of King William the Firſt, as they are found in the Cambridg Edition. To which I may alſo add the uſe of ſeal'd Deeds or Charters, and without which they ſhould not be good; as alſo the uſe of the French as well as the Saxon Character in Books and Writings, which, as Ingulph tells us, are derived from the Normans. And I may further add the making of Soccage Land inheritable by the eldeſt Son only, whereas before, as well as ſome time after the Conqueſt, they were to be divided among all the Sons alike; and that it continued ſo to the end of Henry the Second's Reign, appears by Glanvil in his 7*th* Book, cap. 3. Nor were the Soccage Lands of England ſo ſmall and inconſiderable in quantity, in reſpect of that which was held by Knight's-Service, as Dr. Brady repreſents it; ſince beſides the King's own Demeſnes, a great part of the Lands belonging to Cathedral Churches, Abbeys and Temporal Lords, were held by the Tenure of Free as well as Baſe Soccage, or mere Service of the Plough. And of theſe Lands the Doctor does not diſown the Engliſh to have held a ſufficient ſhare after the Conqueſt, as well as the Normans.

I COME now to treat of the laſt Argument, whereby thoſe of the contrary Opinion would prove, that King William the Firſt held this Kingdom by the Right of Conqueſt, viz. his diſpoſing of the Crown of England to his younger Son William Rufus by his laſt Will and Teſtament, in prejudice of Robert his Eldeſt.

I CONFESS that Dr. Brady does no where make uſe of this Argument to prove King William's Right by Conqueſt, becauſe in his exact * Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Crown, he all along ſuppoſes that the Engliſh-Saxon Kings had an abſolute inherent Right to diſpoſe of the Crown by their Teſtaments to whom they pleas'd; and that William Duke of Normandy, by the Will or Donation of King Edward the Confeſſor, was thereby lawful Heir and Succeſſor to the Crown of England; and that thereupon the People of England were ſo bound and limited by this Nomination, that there was no need of any further Election or Confirmation of it: and where the word Election is uſed in reſpect of any of our Kings, he will have it to ſignify only a Recognition of their Title, unleſs in the caſe of ſome Uſurpers.

* Introduct. to old Engl. Hiſt. P. 365.

IN anſwer to which I ſhall not repeat what I have already ſaid in my Introduction to the laſt Volume, wherein I think I have ſufficiently confuted this Aſſertion of the Doctor's, and made out by unqueſtionable Authorities, that tho the Engliſh-Saxon Kings did often take upon them to nominate their Succeſſors, either by their laſt Will, or other Charters of Donation; yet that they were not looked upon as valid or ſufficient alone, without the ſubſequent Election or Confirmation of the Witena Gemot, or Great Council of the Nation: and for this we need go no further than that Quotation out of * William of Malmesbury, wherein he repeats the Meſſage Harold ſent to Duke William, when he urged him with the Oath that he had made to aſſiſt him in obtaining the Kingdom after the Confeſſor's Death, and thereupon received this Anſwer from him, That concerning the Kingdom, it was a preſumptuous thing in him to ſwear to give his Aſſiſtance to obtain another Man's Inheritance * without a General Convention, and Edict of the Senate and People; and therefore a fooliſh Oath was to be broken. From whence it is plain, that in the Opinion of King Harold himſelf, the Crown of England could not be diſpos'd of to a Stranger, without a General Aſſembly and Decree of the Senate and People of England. But what our Author here means by the Senate and People, ſhall be further conſidered, when we treat concerning the Antiquity of the Commons of England; and that this was a received Notion in the Reign of King Henry the Third, appears by this Paſſage in Matthew Paris, who ſpeaking of the Duke of Normandy as the Chiefeſt and moſt Worthy of the Lay-Peers of France, ſays thus, The King of England is Duke of Normandy by Right of Blood, but King by Conqueſt; for it is ſaid, that St. Edward, becauſe he wanted an Heir, left the Kingdom to William the Baſtard, Duke of Normandy: But this is ſaid to have had no Force, becauſe he did it on his Death-bed, without the common Conſent of his Baronage: That is, the Nobility of the higher and lower Order; under which Title the Commons were alſo comprehended in this Author's time.

* P. 56.

* Abſque generali Senatus & Populi Conventu, & Edicto.

P. 941.

BUT to return to the Doctor; If ſo be the Kings of England had then ſuch an Abſolute Power as to diſpoſe of the Kingdom, and that to Strangers as they pleas'd, without the Conſent of the Great or Common Council of the Nation, the Doctor had beſt conſider how this Tenet can agree with his following Aſſertion, that the Crown ought always to go in a Right-Line, according to proximity of Blood: And then why might not Richard the Second's declaring King Henry the Fourth for his Lawful Succeſſor; and King Edward the Sixth's diſinheriting his two Siſters, Mary and Elizabeth, and bequeathing the Crown to the Lady Jane Gray his Couſin, be as well juſtified as K. Edward the Confeſſor's beſtowing the Crown of England upon Duke William; or his diſinheriting his eldeſt Son Robert, and bequeathing the Crown to William Rufus; or King Richard the Firſt's paſſing by his Nephew Arthur, Son to Duke Geoffery his next Brother, and bequeathing it to Earl John? So that if the Doctor's Law for the Succeſſion were ever valid, I deſire he would tell us when and how it came to be alter'd, whither by Cuſtom, or by any poſitive Law? And if he be ſtill of the ſame mind, that it was once a Royal Prerogative to diſpoſe of the Crown without any conſent of the Eſtates of the Kingdom, I deſire him (when he writes next upon this Subject) that he would be pleaſed to give us ſome ſubſtantial Reaſons, why our Kings may not do ſo now, as well as they did five hundred years ago?

SO that to ſay the truth, thoſe Gentlemen ſpeak and write much more coherently upon this Subject, who reſolve King William's beſtowing of his Crown upon his Younger Son in prejudice to his Elder, into the Abſolute Power he gain'd over this Kingdom by the Sword; ſince Grotius and other Writers on this Subject allow, that Kingdoms ſo acquired may be diſpos'd of as the Conqueror ſhall think fit. But, that the Doctor and theſe Gentlemen are both miſtaken, he in ſuppoſing that the Engliſh-Saxon and firſt Norman Kings might bequeath their Crowns to whom they pleas'd without the Conſent of the Eſtates of the Kingdom; and theſe other Gentlemen (who do not look ſo far back) in wholly reſolving it into King William's Power to
Gen. 48. 22. diſpoſe of the Crown by the like Right as Jacob had to beſtow upon Joſeph his Youngeſt Son but one, that portion above his Brethren, which he took out of the hand of the Amorite with his Sword, and with his Bow. Therefore before this Queſtion can be rightly underſtood and ſettled, it is fit we give you a brief Relation of the Matter of Fact, as alſo a brief Hiſtory of the Succeſſion to King Henry the Third; and thereby it will appear, that neither in the caſe of King William the Firſt, nor of his Son William Rufus, there was any thing practiſed or done in relation to their coming to the Crown, but what was according to the Antient Law and Cuſtom of Succeſſion, that had been practiſed for divers Ages before.

IN order to which I deſire the Reader, who may not yet have read the Introduction to my former Volume, to take notice, that I have there clearly made out, that tho the Engliſh-Saxon Kings did often nominate their Succeſſors by their Teſtaments, yet was not ſuch a Bequeſt or Nomination looked upon as of any force, till it had been confirm'd and ratified by the Approbation and Conſent of the Witena-Gemot or Great Council of the Kingdom; and that this Confirmation was called an Election, and ſo was ſomewhat more than a bare Recognition or Acknowledgment of a Precedent Right, as Dr. Brady would needs have it.

SECONDLY, That when the next Heir, or Son of the laſt King was an Infant or a Minor, or elſe was abſent beyond the Seas, they paſſed him by, and choſe his Uncle for their King, as it is evidently proved by the Election of King Edward the Confeſſor before Edward ſirnamed the Out-Law, (eldeſt Son to King Edmund Iron-ſide) being then in Hungary.

BUT I ſhall now apply what has been already ſaid to the queſtion before us, and ſhew you, that, excepting the Victory over Harold, Duke William aſcended the Throne by the ſame ſteps, as many of the

Engliſh-

Engliſh-Saxon Kings his Predeceſſors had done before; for that he was nominated Heir or Succeſſor to the Crown the Doctor does not deny: but this was not all, for there was ſomething elſe required to make him a lawful Engliſh King, viz. the Election or Confirmation of the Clergy and Nobility of the Kingdom; which I have already proved from Authors, that lived either in or very near that time, as the Reader may ſee in the following Hiſtory.

BUT ſince Dr. Brady has either wholly paſſed by, or elſe falſly tranſlated all theſe Paſſages relating to King William's Election and Coronation, I ſhall therefore give you them at large.

FIRST then, that thoſe very Normans and Frenchmen that came over with King William, did not look upon him as King of England immediately after his Victory over Harold, and until his Election and Coronation, which was not perform'd till the Chriſtmas-day after his Victory, may appear from this Paſſage in Will. Pictavienſis who then lived, and gives this Account of this great Tranſaction. "K. William be- " ing now (ſays he) arived at London, the Biſhops and other Chief Men " of the Kingdom beſeeched him, ut Coronam ſumeret; and pray obſerve the Reaſon, Se quidem ſolitos eſſe Regi ſervire, Regem dominum habere velle, i.e. " becauſe truly they were wont to be ſubject to a King, and " to have a King for their Lord: Then the Duke conſulting thoſe that " accompanied him out of Normandy, whoſe Prudence he moſt rely'd " on, declar'd to them that which diſſwaded him from agreeing to " what the Engliſh now deſired; that things being yet unſettled, Se " potius Regni Quietem quam Coronam cupere, he rather deſired the " Peace of the Kingdom than its Crown: (which certainly this Author would never have made him ſay, had he believed him to have been a King already.) But to proceed, " all his familiar Friends were " of another mind, and perſwaded him to what they knew was the " unanimous deſire of the whole Army. The Reaſons theſe Great men gave him for his ſpeedy Coronation I paſs by, only ſhall obſerve to you, that the Duke having conſidered all their Reaſons, at laſt yielded to their Deſires, eſpecially hoping (ſays our Author) that when * he once began to reign, the Rebels would dare to do leſs againſt him, and that they would be more eaſily ſubdued.

* Ubi regnare cœperit.

AND that his Coronation was always looked upon as ſomewhat more than a bare Ceremony, may appear from what this Author proceeds to relate to this effect: " The Aſſembly being met in the Abbey " Church at Weſtminſter, the Arch-Biſhop of York, in a handſome " Speech which he made to the Engliſh, asked them whither they " would conſent, eum (ſcil. Ducem) ſibi Dominum Coronari; i.e. " that he (the Duke) ſhould be crowned King; who all giving their " Conſents, with one Mind and Voice, the Normans alſo joyn'd with " the Engliſh, the Biſhop of Conſtance having alſo ſpoke to them, and " asked their Conſents. And then he concludes thus; Sic electum conſecravit Idem Archiepiſcopus, & impoſuit ei Regium Diadema; i. e. being thus elected, the Biſhop conſecrated him, and put the Crown upon his Head. But as for his Coronation Oath, becauſe this Author ſays nothing of it, I paſs it by, ſince I have ſufficiently proved it from other Writers.

WITH Pictavienſis agrees the next Norman Writer, Will. Gemeticenſis, in his Hiſtory concerning King William's Election, as appears by theſe words, * Deinde in die Natalis Domini ab Omnibus tàm Nor- * Ib. 248.

manorum, quàm Anglorum proceribus, Rex eſt Electus, & ſacro Oleo ab Epiſcopis Regni delibutus, atque Regali Diademate Coronatus; i.e. Then on Chriſtmaſs-day, he was choſen King by all the Great Men, both of the Normans and Engliſh, and was anointed with the Holy Oil, and crown'd with the Royal Diadem. And that the Doctor's admired Author * Ordericus Vitalis, did alſo ſuppoſe the Engliſh and Normans did then believe, that before the Coronation D. William was not King, may appear by this Paſſage which I ſhall here tranſcribe from him; Cunctiq; Præſules, Regnique Proceres cum Guilielmo concordiam fecerunt, ac ut Diadema Regium ſumeret (ſicut mos Anglici Principatus exigit) oraverunt. Hoc ſummoperè flagitabant Normanni, qui pro Faſce Regali nanciſcendo ſuo Principi ſubierunt ingens diſcrimen Maris & Prelii. Hoc etiam Divino nutu ſubacti optabant indigenæ Regni, qui non niſi coronato Regi ſervire hactenùs erant ſoliti. This Quotation being long, I ſhall not trouble you with a literal Tranſlation of it, but ſhall only obſerve from it, that both the Engliſh and Normans equally deſired that he ſhould be crown'd; and the reaſon is remarkable, becauſe the cuſtom of the Engliſh Monarchy required it, for that the Natives of the Kingdom were not wont to ſerve or obey a King unleſs he were crown'd.

* Id. p. 503.

I SHALL now conclude with an Author of our own Country, and it is Bromton, who in confirmation of what Ordericus has already related, ſays thus, Cúmque Willielmus Dux Normanniæ Conqueſtor Angliæ, Tyranni nomen exhorreſceret, & nomen legitimi principis induere vellet, à Stigando Cantuar. Archiepiſcopo in Regem petiit conſecrari. From whence it plainly appears, that if this Author may be believed, Duke William did not look upon himſelf as a lawful King, till his Coronation.

Chron. p. 962.

NOW I ſhall leave it to the Judgment of the Ingenuous Reader, whither if Dr. Brady had been as candid as my ſelf in fairly citing theſe Paſſages, either in his Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Crown, or in his Complete Hiſtory of England, he could ever have hoped to make the World believe, that this King's Coronation was a mere Ceremony, and only as a Recognition of his former Right to the Crown, either by Donation or Conqueſt?

NOW theſe Omiſſions are the leſs to be excuſed in our Learned Doctor, becauſe he has ſo ſeverely fallen upon his Antagoniſt, the judicious Author of Argumentum Antinormannicum, in the anſwer to its Appendix, for the like (as he ſuppoſes) wilful Omiſſions.

Vid. p. 315. ubiq; ad fin.

I COME now to the Succeſſion of William Rufus, whoſe Right the Doctor wholly founds on his Father's laſt Will and Teſtament, whereby he ſuppoſes him to have bequeathed him the Kingdom: and for this he cites † Ordericus Vitalis in theſe words; Metuens Rex nè in Regno tàm diffuſo repentina oriretur turbatio, Epiſtolam de conſtituendo Rege fecit Lanfranco Archiepiſcopo, ſuóque ſigillo ſignatam tradidit Gulielmo Rufo Filio ſuo, jubens ut in Angliam transfretaret continuò. I confeſs the Doctor has cited the Latin fairly, but did not think fit to tranſlate it, becauſe of an unlucky word in it that would have ſpoiled all; and therefore that the Reader may not be impoſed upon, I will put them into Engliſh for him. King William (who was now upon his Death-bed) fearing leſt ſome ſudden trouble might ariſe in ſo large a Kingdom, wrote an Epiſtle to Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc, concerning the making or ordaining a King, and delivered it under his Seal to his Son William Rufus, commanding him that he ſhould preſently go over into England, land; where I must observe that the word constituendo is a Participle of the future Tense, and cannot signify the present making or appointing of a King, or that he was thereby constituted so as the Doctor falsly renders it, but only signifies, that he was yet to be made or constituted; and if the Doctor would have been but pleas'd to have given us this Author's words, that stand but a little higher in the same Page, we might have seen they could have had no other meaning, unless he should downright contradict himself; the words are these, in the long Death-bed Speech which this Author relates King William to have made. Neminem Anglici Regni Hæredem constituo, sed Æterno Conditori, cujus sum, & in cujus manu sunt Omnia, illud commendo; non enim tantum Decus Jure Hæreditario possedi, sed Diro conflictu, & maltâ effusione cruoris, perjuro Regi Haraldo abstuli: i. e. "I do not appoint any "Body Heir of the Kingdom of England, but I commend it to the "Eternal Creator, whose I am, and in whose hand are all things; for "I did not obtain so great a Dignity by any Hereditary Right, but I "snatched it from that Perjur'd King Harold by a cruel Fight, and a "vast effusion of Human Blood. From whence you may observe, that tho this Author represents this King as not to have thought he gain'd the Kingdom only by the Right above-mention'd, yet neither does he found it upon his Conquest of the Nation, but upon his Victory over Harold. Id. Ib.

I COULD wish that this above-mention'd Epistle which the King wrote to Arch-Bishop Lanfranc were now extant; for then we might have judged whither he had bequeathed the Kingdom by an Absolute Right, or else did only recommend his Son to the Estates of the Kingdom, to be by them elected in persuance of his Testamentary Designation. I confess, William of Malmesbury informs us that he was, à Patre, ultimâ valetudine decumbente, in Successorem adoptatus; but he also adds, that he was much helped by the favour of Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, by whose endeavours he was crown'd, and that he was likewise received by the general good Wills of all the * Subjects: but Bromton's Chronicle expressly tells us that he was Crown'd, Convocatis Terræ Magnatibus, that is, in or by a Great Council of the Kingdom; and Polydore Virgil, I suppose from some Manuscript History now lost, says more fully, Optimates frequentes ad Westmonasterium in Concilium convenere, ubi post longam Consultationem Gulielmum Rufum Regem fecere, i. e. The Great men of the Kingdom met in great numbers at Westminster, and there after a long consultation they made William Rufus King. And that this was a down-right Election, I have a much more antient and expres Authority, viz. a Manuscript History of the Abbey of Colchester, written by a Monk of that Place in the Reign of King Henry the First, in which this Author tells us, that Eudo, the King's Dapifer or Sewer, (who was the Founder of this Monastery) was immediately, upon the Death of King William, sent over by his Son Rufus, to secure the Castles of Dover and some others in Kent for him; and accordingly he made those who had the Custody of them to take an Oath of Fidelity to him; by which means, whilst the Lords in Normandy were debating about the Succession, Rufus by the help of this Eudo, was * elected, consecrated, and confirm'd in the Throne. * Provincial-lium. * In Bib. Cott. sub Nerone, D. 8. Vid. Mon. Anglic. Vol. 2. p. 889. * Eligitur.

NOW I desire the impartial Reader to consider whither † Dr. Brady deals ingenuously here or not, when he will only have Rufus to † Ib. p. 357, 358.

be recognized as a Teſtamentary Heir, and ſays, that whoever rightly conſiders this Story, cannot call it an Election?

BUT as for K. Henry the Firſt, I need not uſe many words to prove his Title to be wholly owing to the Election of the Great Council of the Kingdom; for M. Paris expreſly tells us, that they agreed he ſhould be crown'd, upon condition he would reſtore and confirm the Antient Laws of King Edward, as he afterwards did: and that this King was not aſhamed to own his Title, he declares it in the very beginning of his Charter of Liberties. Sciatis me (ſays he) miſericordiâ Dei, & Communi Concilio Baronum Regni Angliæ, ejuſdem Regni Regem Coronatum eſſe, &c.

Ib. p. 365. BUT to theſe ſo direct Authorities the Doctor has nothing to object but this, "That K. Henry was a plain downright Uſurper; he had "no pretence of Donation, no Teſtamentary Right from his Father; "and therefore, as Malmesbury ſhews us more particularly, he was "advanced by a Faction; there being only five Great Men, (viz. Ro-"bert Fitz Haymon, Richard de Redvers, Roger Bigot, Henry Earl of "Warwick, and Robert Earl of Mellent his Brother) all Normans that "favoured him, and that chiefly by the Contrivance of Henry Earl of "Warwick he was elected King; for all the reſt ſent privately to Duke "Robert to come and be their King, and openly reproached Henry. "This was an excellent Election made by a Faction and an Army, and "perhaps with a bawling Multitude after them: and indeed there could "be no other Election, than ſuch an one as this; for Rufus was ſlain "in New-Foreſt on the ſecond of Auguſt, being Thurſday, and * Henry "was Crown'd on the 5*th* of Auguſt following, being Sunday: ſo "that it was impoſſible for all that were, or ought to be concern'd in "ſuch an Election, all the Kingdom over, to have notice, meet, and "diſpatch that Buſineſs in two days time.

* Flor. Wigorn. f. 649.

NOW I deſire to argue this matter a little calmly with the Doctor, and would fain know of him how this Right of the Nobility and People of England, which they enjoyed before the Conqueſt, came to be loſt, whereby they often elected, not the next Heir by Blood, but him whom they thought moſt fit for the Throne, during the Minority or the Inevitable Abſence of the next Heir by Blood, and that even when there was no Teſtament of the Predeceſſor to juſtify ſuch an Election, as in the Caſe of Edward the Confeſſor above-mentioned? for as to his being left Heir by Harde-Cnute his half Brother, it is mentioned by no other Author but Guliel. Gemeticenſis, who being a Foreiner, and living many years after, deſerves no credit, when he contradicts the Saxon Chronicle, and all the reſt of our Hiſtorians who lived neareſt that time. And indeed it is highly improbable that this King ſhould be able to make any ſuch Bequeſt of the Crown, ſince he died ſuddenly of a Debauch at Lambeth in the Flower of his Youth, when no body expected it; and therefore I would fain be ſatisfied, why the Nobility and People of England had not as good a Right to elect Henry to be their King, in the abſence of his Brother Duke Robert in the Holy Land, as they had before to chuſe Edward the Confeſſor, when Edward his Brother's Son remain'd an Exile in Hungary, and whom they might as well have ſent for thither, as the Nation could have been without a King till the return of Duke Robert from where he was?

AND

AND as to what the Doctor ſays of Henry's being elected King by a Faction of Five Great Men, I deſire him to tell me why the ſame Objection might not be made againſt that of King Edward, ſince he was advanced to the Throne by the Favour and Intereſt of Earl Godwin and thoſe of his Faction? Nor can I ſee, when there was no Law to the contrary, that it was more a Faction of thoſe Noblemen (who were much the greater and ſtronger party) to chuſe Henry, than it would have been in the others, who would have made Duke Robert King.

BUT the Doctor does not love to follow his Authors farther than he thinks they make to his purpoſe; for if he had, we ſhould have alſo ſeen in * William of Malmesbury, that Henry was elected King, not by any Faction, but by the major Votes of the Common Council of the Kingdom there preſent; and that after ſome debate, tho chiefly by the Reaſons and Perſwaſion of the Earl of Warwick, an honeſt and pious Man (as our Author calls him:) nor does he any where ſay, that none but the five Great Men above-mention'd favoured Henry, but that it was done with the general Applauſe and Good-will of the People, who now began to revive after ſo many Oppreſſions: nor does this Author here name one Perſon who either reproached Henry, or then ſent to his Brother to come and be their King, as the Doctor there ſuggeſts without any juſt grounds. For what happen'd of this kind, was not till ſome time after the Coronation of K. Henry, when Duke Robert was return'd from the Holy Land; then indeed moſt of the Norman Noblemen grew diſcontented, upon ſlight Cauſes, but chiefly becauſe the King refuſed to grant them the Lands they would have begged from him, as the ſame Author acquaints us; and for that reaſon it was that they ſent privately over to Duke Robert into Normandy to come over and be made their King.

* P. 88.

BUT to conceal none of the * Doctor's Evidence, I grant indeed that in his Hiſtory † he tells us a Story from Ordericus Vitalis (whom he commonly follows rather than our Engliſh Writers) that upon King William's Death, Henry poſted to Wincheſter, where the Royal Treaſure was, and demanded the Keys of William de Breteul a Norman Baron, who followed him in great haſte intending to prevent his Deſign, and ſaid thus to him, We ought legally to remember the Faith we have ingaged to your Brother Duke Robert, who is the firſt-born Son of King William; and I, and You my Lord Henry have done him Homage, and therefore we are in all things to keep our Faith to him, as well abſent as preſent. But Henry's Power increaſing, he drew his Sword, and ſwore, he would not permit any Stranger, by frivolous delays, to ſeize upon his Father's Scepter; ſo that at laſt, through the Mediation of Friends, and ſome wiſe Counſellors that were then met together, by their ſound Advice, leſt there might be made a greater Diviſion, the Caſtle and the Royal Treaſure were delivered to Henry; and ſo he went to London, and was Crown'd as has been already related.

† P. 782.

BUT if we examin this Story throughly, we ſhall find the moſt conſiderable Circumſtances of it will prove falſe, or elſe make rather againſt than for the Doctor's partial repreſentation of this matter. For in the firſt place, I believe the Baron above-named did never make any ſuch diſſwaſive Speech to Henry, ſince it is mention'd by no other Author of that time: and Ordericus is often found too apt to magnify the Rights and Grandeur of the Norman Dukes, for a Reaſon I have already mention'd. But if William de Breteul did ever give Henry ſuch a Memento, it was certainly falſe and impertinent; for if Henry had ever done his Brother Duke Robert Homage, it could only be for ſome Lands and Territories he held of him in Normandy, and which the Duke his Brother had either mortgaged or ſold out-right to him; and which he afterwards diſſeizing him of by Force, that Obligation was wholly cancel'd, as all Writers concerning Feudal Tenures agree. But that Henry never did him Homage for the Kingdom of England is certain, for Robert was never at any time declared either Heir or Succeſſor of it by his Father; and till this was done, there was no Homage ever due, or to be perform'd by any Subjects of England, to the King's eldeſt Son. And for this I appeal to the Doctor's own Hiſtory, concerning the Homages that were done to Prince William, eldeſt Son to Henry the Firſt, and afterwards to his Daughter Maude the Empreſs, as alſo to Duke Henry upon his Agreement with King Stephen, and his being by him adopted for his Son, and declared his Lawful Succeſſor in a Great Council of the whole Kingdom: But as for the reſt of this Author's Relation, had the Doctor been ſo juſt as to have tranſlated it truly, it would then plainly appear, that the delivering up of the Treaſure to Henry (as is above reported) as it was done by the beſt Advice of all the Counſellors and Great Men there preſent for the Peace of the Kingdom, ſo it was alſo upon the Challenge or Demand of the preſent Heir, whoſe Power now encreaſing, he clapt his hand upon his Sword, &c. for Ordericus in the Latin ſays thus, Multitudine verò circumfluente hæredis præſentis qui jus ſuum calumniabatur, virtus excrevit; Henricus manum ad Capulam miſit, &c. Which words of Henry's challenging the preſent Heir, the Doctor (according to his laudable cuſtom in things of this nature) thought fit to omit.

NEITHER is the Doctor's laſt Objection material againſt the manner of this Election, that it was only done by a Faction, and an Army, or perhaps a bawling Multitude after them (as the civility of his Phraſe is) which he endeavours to prove by the ſhortneſs of the time (viz. two days) between Rufus's Death and Henry's Coronation. As to the Faction I have ſufficiently ſpoken, but as for the Army and the bawling Multitude's having any thing to do in this Election, it is purely owing to the Doctor's fertile Invention, and for which he has no Author to warrant him.

'TIS true indeed, the above-cited Ordericus relates, That at the time when King William was kill'd, he was preparing for a Great Expedition into France, * that he might hinder his Brother Robert's return into Normandy, and alſo take poſſeſſion of Aquitain, and extend the Bounds of his Empire as far as the River Garonne; and to this end had (at the time of his Death) a great Army and Fleet (which I ſuppoſe lay at Portſmouth) ready to ſail.

* Ib. 780.

BUT tho no Author ſays, that this Army did at all concern it ſelf, or influence Henry's Election, yet it may very well ſhew us the reaſon why there was ſo great a Confluence of the Nobility then at Wincheſter, and who were preſent at K. William's Funeral there; for the greateſt part of the Earls, Barons and Tenants in Capite, might be then ſummon'd to go over with the King into France; and being now met accordingly, did alſo alſo attend Henry to London in order to his intended Election and Coronation: and this being ſuppos'd (as it may very well) it will be no ſuch great wonder or impoſſibility (as the Doctor makes it) for a great number of the moſt conſiderable Perſons of England, not only to have had notice, but to have alſo been preſent at the King's Coronation. And this may ſerve for a ſufficient Anſwer to all that the Doctor hath ſaid againſt the Legality of this Election, by reaſon of the ſmall numbers that could be preſent at it through the ſhortneſs of the warning.

BUT admit it were as the Doctor would have it, and that not the one half of thoſe who ought to have appear'd, were preſent at it: yet ſince it was looked upon as a ſufficient Council of the Kingdom at that time, it is no more an Objection againſt King Henry's being then elected by a Great Council of the Kingdom, than it would be againſt a Modern Hiſtorian's relating, that Richard Cromwel was choſen or recognized Protector by an Aſſembly which then call'd it ſelf the Parliament of England (as it was then conſtituted) tho there were indeed few Citizens and no Burgeſſes ſummoned to it, as alſo few or none of the Antient Nobility.

BUT the Doctor ought firſt to prove, that there was at this time a certain courſe of Succeſſion eſtabliſhed in England, before he can aſſert this Election of Henry to be an Uſurpation.

BUT the Doctor being at laſt convinced, from the general Conſent of all our Hiſtorians, that King Henry was thus elected, produces a notable Authority from Henry de Knighton's Hiſtory, why Robert was rejected and Henry choſen: "For, ſays he, this Robert was al- "ways ſo averſe and harſh to the Barons of England, that by full "Conſent and Advice they voted him Illegitimate, becauſe he was "not begotten lawfully by William the Conqueror; and for that Rea- "ſon, by unanimous Aſſent, they refuſed him, and ſet up Henry his "Brother to be their King. And from this Paſſage of Knighton the Doctor concludes, that the Baronage of all England fixed the Right of Succeſſion in the Legitimate Right of Blood: the reſt being nothing to the purpoſe, I omit. P. 370.

NOW I cannot but here obſerve, that the Doctor is willing to lay hold of a Paſſage in this Modern Author (who often writes things either fabulous or falſe) to prove that the Engliſh Barons might very well be juſtified in thus preferring Henry before Robert, which Relation is certainly falſe; for if King William had believed that this eldeſt Son had been none of his by his Queen, who was known to be Robert's Mother, the King would have been ſo far from leaving him any part of his Dominions, that it is moſt likely he would not only have excluded him from the Succeſſion in England, but Normandy alſo. And this Story of Duke Robert's Illegitimacy, is alſo a great Reflection upon the Chaſtity of Queen Mathylda, to whom all Writers give the Character of a chaſte and vertuous Princeſs; and indeed there is no Hiſtorian that I know of, who relates this idle and improbable Tale, except this Author from whom it is borrowed by the Doctor, who does not value how much he detracts from the Reputation of the beſt of Princes, provided he can thereby any way ſupport his own Hypotheſis.

BUT I believe (if the truth were known) the main Reaſon why the Doctor is ſo great an Enemy to the Title of King Henry, is, not becauſe he thinks him an Uſurper, but rather in that he redreſſed the Grievances of the Subjects, and granted that Charter of Liberty to the Clergy and Laity upon which the Doctor has made ſo long a Comment: for * he tells us, that Henry made what haſte he could to get himſelf King; and therefore before it ſhould be known to the Nobility that his Brother was returning home, as a means to accompliſh his Purpoſe, immediately upon the death of his Brother William Rufus he ſent his Edict throughout England, and prohibited the unjuſt Inſtitutions of him and Ranulph Biſhop of Durham, the great Oppreſſor of the People under him.

* Argumen. Antinormannicum, p. 265.

THEN the Doctor proceeds to give us the Hiſtory how the Charter above-mentioned came to be granted, and which he will needs inſinuate to have been done only as an Indulgence and Abatement of the rigour of the Common Feudal Law, granted to the Norman-Engliſh, viz. ſuch of them as lived in England, rather than to the Antient Natives or Saxon-Engliſh.

BUT before I anſwer this, I cannot but here obſerve the * Doctor's great over-ſight, who makes this firſt Reformation of the Abuſes committed by Rufus, to have been done by Henry only in order to his being made King; whereas any one who reads this Story in William of Malmesbury (whom the Doctor himſelf cites) may ſee that it was perform'd immediately after his Coronation, and therefore could not be done to curry favour with the Nobility, in order to obtain the Crown, as the Doctor falſly repreſents this Tranſaction.

* Ib. p. 265.

THEREFORE as for the Aſſertion, that the Native or Saxon-Engliſh had little or no benefit by this Charter, but only his Engliſh-Normans; the truth of this will appear, when the Doctor can make out, that no Engliſh-man then held any Eſtate in Capite of the King, and in that ſenſe could not be called one of his Barons in this Charter; neither yet was a Tenant by Knight's-Service, nor was concern'd in the Duty of * Moneage; nor was concern'd in any Pleas or Debts to the Crown; nor were any of them guilty of any Murders or Manſlaughters, for which the Mulcts or Fines were due to the King; nor had any Intereſt in the Laws of King Edward, which he now confirm'd and reſtored to them: I ſay, when the Doctor can prove that no Engliſh-man had any ſhare or concern in all or any of thoſe Liberties, Pardons and Privileges granted by this Charter, then, and not before, ſhall I come over to his fanciful Opinion, that all theſe things concerned none but the Norman-Engliſh, but that the Engliſh-Saxons had little or nothing.

Ib. p. 269.

* The Latin is Monetagium. See for this Grand Cuſtumier, C. 15. and Dr. Brady's Comment on this Charter, Ib. p. 266.

I HAVE dwelt the longer upon the manner of this Prince's Acceſſion to the Throne, as well to vindicate his Right to it, as the Power he had to relieve the Engliſh Nation from ſo many Oppreſſions they had lain under, and to reſtore the Nobility and People to ſome of thoſe Privileges they enjoy'd in the times of their Engliſh-Saxon Kings, and were not (as the * Doctor would have them) the Grants of an Uſurper who could deny nothing.

* Ib. p. 266.

HAVING now done with the Reign of King Henry the Firſt, I come next to that of King Stephen; the manner of whoſe obtaining the Crown (as the Doctor cannot deny) was by the Election of a great Party of the Biſhops and Lay-Nobility; and as he himſelf recites in his † Charter, he was elected King by the Aſſent of the Clergy and People of England, and crowned by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Which Act I will not defend to have been juſtly done, as being contrary to the Oaths and Homages which the Clergy and People of England had before taken to Maud the Empreſs, as Heireſs to her Father Henry the Firſt: Yet the Doctor himſelf has found out a very good excuſe for their thus electing Earl Stephen, which is a Story related by * Radulph de Diceto, who ſays, "that Hugh Bigot Steward of "the late King's Houſhold, came quickly out of Normandy (where "the King died) into England, and made Oath before the Arch-"Biſhop of Canterbury, that King Henry on his Deathbed, upon ſome "differences which had happened between him and his Daughter the "Empreſs, did diſinherit her, and made Stephen Earl of Boloign his "Heir: Whereupon William ABp of Canterbury, giving too much "credit to the words of the Steward, conſecrated this Stephen King "at Weſtminſter. From whence the Doctor would infer, that if this Story was true, Earl Stephen had a Legal Right as Teſtamentary Heir, and by that Right was made King; yet ſince he cannot deny but that there was an Election of Stephen precedent to his Coronation, it ſufficiently confirms my Aſſertion, that notwithſtanding this pretended Will of the deceaſed King, an Election of the Great Council of the Kingdom was then thought neceſſary.

* the

* Col. 50.

BUT the Doctor thinks he has got ſome advantage by the Clergy and People of England their ſwearing Fealty to the Empreſs Maud, "To whom as his only Child King Henry had bequeath'd all his Do-"minions, as well on this, as on the other ſide the Sea; and in purſu-"ance of which, when the Biſhops had fallen out with King Stephen, "and would unking him, Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter his Brother, "being then the Pope's Legate, called a Council of the Clergy at that "City, to conſult of the Peace of the Kingdom; where at laſt they "concluded, That the Right of chuſing and ordaining Kings chiefly be-"longed to them; and therefore having firſt called upon God, they choſe "Maud the Empreſs, Queen. Here the Doctor indeed has alſo given us the Latin, which is ſufficient to ſhew us the unfairneſs of his Tranſlation; the Clergy's Declaration runs thus, Invocatâ itaque in auxilium Divinitate, Filiam Regis in Angliæ, Normanniæque Dominam eligimus, &c. Now I will leave it to any one to judg, whither Eligimus in Dominam can ſignify grammatically, we Elect her Queen: For if theſe two Titles had been all one, then there would have been no difference between Rex Angliæ, & Dominus Hyberniæ, as our Kings had it engraven upon their Seals, until the middle of King Henry the Eighth's Reign; and it would have been very needleſs for the Empreſs Maud to have ſtiled her ſelf in her * Seals Regina Romanorum, & Domina Anglorum, had ſhe looked upon her ſelf as equally Queen of both Nations: but ſhe very well knew the difference between thoſe two Titles, for at this time, and as far as Henry the Third, none of our Kings took upon them that Title till after their Coronations; and that Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter did not believe her to be Queen for all this Election that he and the reſt of the Biſhops had made, appears by the Speech of this Biſhop at the next Council at Weſtminſter, which which he called not long after, when he was now reconciled to his Brother King Stephen; where he tells all there preſent, That all thoſe who favoured the Counteſs of Anjou (i. e. the Empreſs Maud) ſhould be Excommunicated; and he immediately after calls her Andigavorum Dominam, which Title (according to the Doctor's Tranſlation) ſhould be render'd Queen of the Anjovins, which (I think) was never heard of.

* See the Draught of them in Speeds Chron. and in Sandford's Genealogical History of the Kings of England.

I COME now to the Doctor's next Proof for the Antient Hereditary Right of the Crown of England by Blood, and it is from the Agreement that was afterwards made between King Stephen and Henry Duke of Normandy, Son to the ſaid Empreſs, whoſe Title was now quite laid aſide, notwithſtanding her being her Father's Heir, and late elected Queen of the Engliſh; and indeed the * Doctor has here begun to give us a very juſt account of this Tranſaction from one who lived very near that time, viz. † Gervaſe of Canterbury who relates that the Arch-Biſhop of that Place and Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, and all the Biſhops mediated a Peace beween Stephen, and Henry Duke of Anjou, Son to the Empreſs; by which it was agreed, that Stephen ſhould adopt Henry for his Son, and after his death ſhould enjoy the Crown, but Stephen ſhould quietly wear it during his Life, &c. Yet if the Doctor had been pleaſed to have tranſcribed but a little further out of this Author, he would have found theſe words, and he (viz. the Duke) at that ſame time gave him (the King) Reverence in the preſence of them all, and acknowledged him as his Father and Lord. But this is more fully expreſt in the Charter of Agreement, between the King and the Duke, which you may find at large in * Bromton's Chronicle, wherein King Stephen appoints Henry Duke of Normandy his Succeſſor by Hereditary Right, and grants and confirms the Kingdom of England to him and his Heirs; in conſideration of which Honour, it is there recited, that the Duke pay'd the King Homage, and promiſed upon Oath to be faithful to him, and to preſerve his Perſon, and obſerve all the Agreements contain'd in this Charter.

* Col. 1037.

NOW it is plain that Duke Henry could never ſuccced King Stephen by any Hereditary Right, any otherwiſe than by this Adoption, or Declaration above-mention'd; which was agreed to, and ratified by the Great Council of the Kingdom, as appears by what immediately follows in * Gervaſe in the leaf above-cited; viz. After all theſe things were ſolemnly perform'd, and ratified by the mutual Oaths and conſents of the King, and all the Biſhops and Temporal Lords there preſent, a firm Peace, which had been baniſhed England for many years, was at length happily reſtored: with whom agrees Henry of Huntington, an Author who then lived, and not long after wrote the Hiſtory of this Tranſaction; his words are theſe, Ipſum (ſcilicet Ducem) ſiquidem Rex in Filium ſuſcepit adoptivum, & Hæredem Regni conſtituit, i. e. The King adopted the Duke for his Son, and appointed him Heir of the Kingdom. Now our Author muſt certainly here mean as Heir to the King himſelf, and not to the Empreſs his Mother, who was then alive; for it is an old Rule of the Civil as well as of our Common Law, non eſt Hæres Viventis, i. e. There can be no Heir to a Perſon ſo long as he is alive.

* Id. ib.

BUT the Doctor wiſely conceals all this, as being directly againſt his Hypotheſis; and therefore ſlighting the Writers of that time, he rather chuſes to make uſe of more Modern Authors, and would needs have this Agreement to be more fully and clearly related by Matt. Weſtminſter; which Paſſage I ſhall give you in Engliſh according to the Doctor's Tranſlation (which I grant is always very true when it makes for him) the Paſſage is this: "King Stephen not having any Heir, "except only Duke Henry, did acknowledg in an Aſſembly (or "Council) before the Biſhops and other Chief Men of the Kingdom, "that Duke Henry had the Hereditary Right to the Kingdom of Eng-"land; and the Duke kindly granted, that King Stephen ſhould, dur-"ing his Life, peaceably enjoy his Kingdom. The reſt concerning the Confirmation of the ſaid Agreement of the King, and all the Biſhops and Lords there preſent, that Duke Henry ſhould ſucceed after the King's death, I paſs by, as being no more than what others have ſaid before.

BUT in anſwer to this Paſſage, which is found in no other Author but Matthew Paris, from whom Matth. Weſtminſter borrowed it, this muſt needs be a Miſtake; for how could Duke Henry be any ways Heir to King Stephen? for tho his eldeſt Son Euſtace was dead, yet he had another Legitimate Son named William, who was then Earl of Warren, as may appear by King Stephen's * Charter above-mentioned: and what Hereditary Right could the Duke then have to the Crown, whilſt his Mother (by whom it came) was ſtill living, and who never made any Grant or Ceſſion of it to her Son, as I can any where find, tho I have looked diligently for it in all the printed and Manuſcript Authors that I could meet with? Now I leave it to the Reader's Judgment to determine, whoſe Teſtimony is moſt likely to be true, that of thoſe Authors who either lived in or neareſt to thoſe times, or Matthew Paris who lived and wrote above eighty years after, and from whom Matth. Weſtminſter tranſcribed it in the Reign of Edward the Third, above 160 years after King Henry's coming to the Crown?

* See alſo Speed's Chronicle, & Sandford's Genealogical Hiſtory.

TO whoſe Reign we are now arrived, and who tho he were thus declared Heir and Succeſſor to the Kingdom (as you have already heard) yet is called by no other Title in Matth. Paris and other Authors before his Coronation, than Henry Duke of Normandy; and that he was not looked upon as complete King before that, the Author laſt mentioned ſhews us by this Paſſage, viz. "That after the death of "King Stephen, there was notwithſtanding a firm Peace, for Fear "and Love of Duke Henry, Quem omnes venturum, & Regem futu-"rum, ſperabant; whom all hoped would come over, and be made "King. Which were a very impertinent way of ſpeaking, had he then been looked upon as King already. And tho few of our printed Authors do either mention his Election or Coronation, yet I find both expreſly mentioned by Radulphus de Diceto, as well in the printed as Manuſcript Copies, where in the very beginning of this King's Reign, he ſays, 14° Kal. Jan. die Dominica ante Nativitatem Domini, apud Weſtmonaſterium ab omnibus electus, & in Regem conſecratus eſt à Theobaldo Archiepiſcopo Cantuarienſi; that is, Henry the Second, on the 14*th* of the Kalends of January, the Sunday before the Nativity of our Lord, was elected at Weſtminſter by all the People, and was crown'd King by Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. Cel. 529.

WHERE the Reader may obſerve, that his Election and Coronation are here mention'd as two diſtinct Actions, tho he had already been declared Heir and Succeſſor of the Kingdom: but as for the Empreſs his Mother, ſhe was not only then alive in France, but lived there for ſome years after, viz. till the 14*th* of this King's Reign, and then died; after whoſe deceaſe his eldeſt Son Richard is likewiſe call'd by no other Title in all our Antient * Hiſtorians, than Duke of Normandy, as appears by this Paſſage in Hoveden which the Doctor has thus tranſlated: "The Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and a copious multitude "of Knights met him (viz. the Duke) by whoſe Advice and Aſ- "ſent the Duke was crowned King of England by Baldwin Arch- "Biſhop of Canterbury, many other Biſhops there named aſſiſting. Now I deſire the Doctor to tell me why it is here ſaid the Duke was crown'd King, if this Author had ſuppos'd he was ſo before his Coronation?

* V. R. Hoveden, M. Paris, &c. ſub hoc anno.

BUT the Doctor lays moſt ſtreſs on the Teſtimony of * Ralph de Diceto, then Dean of St. Paul's, who in the vacancy of that Church, ſupply'd the Office of the Biſhop of London at King Richard's Coronation; and he writes thus: Comes itáque Pictavorum Richardus, Hæreditario Jure promovendus in Regem, poſt tàm Cleri, quàm Populi ſolemnem & debitam Electionem, involutus eſt triplici Sacramento, &c. "Therefore Richard Earl of Poictou, being by Hereditary Right to "be made King, after the ſolemn and due Election, as well of the "Clergy as of the Laiety, ſwore to three things, &c. Which being the ſubſtance of his Coronation-Oath, I omit; but tho the * Doctor hath put theſe words, Hæreditario Jure promovendus, in Capital Letters, yet he does not like to do ſo by the words in Regem, &c. that immediately follow; for from hence it would plainly appear, that notwithſtanding all this Hereditary Right, he was ſtill to be promoted to be King.

* Ib. p. 373.

BUT that which will beſt explain this Author's meaning, is, that part of the Charge which the Arch-Biſhop gave Duke Richard when he was juſt about to crown him, and is ſet down in † R. Hoveden, who has given us the moſt particular account of this King's Coronation: the words are theſe, Deindè ductus eſt (ſcilicet Dux) ad Altare, & ibi prædictus Archiepiſcopus prohibuit ei, ex parte Omnipotentis Dei, ne hunc Honorem ſibi aſſumeret, niſi in mente haberet ſupradicta Sacramenta & Vota quæ fecerat inviolabiter ſervare; & ipſe reſpondit, ſe per auxilium Dei omnia ſupradicta ſervaturum ſine fraude: i. e. "The Duke "was led up to the Altar, where the ſaid Arch-Biſhop forbad him on "God's behalf not to aſſume to himſelf that Honour, unleſs he fully "reſolved inviolably to keep the Oath and Vow he had now made; "whereupon he anſwered, That he would, by the help of God, "obſerve all the afore-ſaid Particulars without any deceit.

Ibid.

Dr. BRADY, being aware of the Cogency of this Proof, would fain leſſen, if not take away the Authority of it, becauſe * Rad. de Diceto (then Dean of St. Pauls) and who in the Vacancy of the See of London (as I have already ſaid) perform'd the Office of that Biſhop at that Coronation, ſays nothing of any ſuch Charge given by the Arch-Biſhop: but this is only a Negative Argument at the beſt, and proves little; ſince not only R. Hoveden, but Matt. Paris and Bromton's Chronicle do both expreſly relate it, as the Doctor himſelf allows.

* Col. 647.

BUT

BUT before I leave Richard the First, I only desire the Reader to take notice, that the Great Assembly of the Clergy and Nobility above-mention'd was indeed a Great Council or Parliament, as Polydore Virgil thus describes it; Richardus in Angliam profectus—Londinum properat, convocatóque Concilio, Rex creatur, & à Baldvino Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo, more Majorum inunctus sacratur: i. e. "Richard "being arrived in England, makes hast to London; and a Council (or "Parliament as we stile it) being called, he is made King; and ac- "cording to the Custom of his Ancestors is anointed and consecrated "by Baldwin Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

HOWEVER I will not conceal one main Authority, whereby the Doctor would prove, that this King was looked upon, and esteemed a full and complete King before his Coronation; for it is true what * Hoveden says, that whilst he was in Normandy, and before his arrival in England, every Freeman of the whole Kingdom, by the Command of his Mother Eleanor, † swore Fidelity to Richard King of England, Son of King Henry, as to their Leige Lord, against all men: I confess this would be a very material Authority, could we be assured that these were Hoveden's own words, without any alteration of the Copier's; for tho I grant that the words Regi Angliæ are in several Manuscripts, as well as in all the printed Books, yet I doubt not but there is a mistake in the writing of this Oath, for in the most antient Manuscript Copy of this Author that I have seen, and which formerly was the Lord Howard's of Naworth, but is now in the * Library of the Royal Society at Gresham College, the Oath we now treat of is thus, † Quod fidem portant Domino Ricardo Filio Regis Henrici, without the words Regi Angliæ, as in the printed Copies.

* Nº. 150.

† P. 94.

AND that this seems to have been the antient reading, will farther appear from the next Reign of King John (whom the Doctor also allows to have claim'd by Hereditary Right as well as his Brother) wherein we find the like Oath recited to have been taken to him; as that before Earl John arrived in England, Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and William the Mareschal, caus'd all the men of the Kingdom, both of Cities and Boroughs, with the Earls, Barons, and Free Tenants, to swear Fidelity to John Duke of Normandy, Son of King Henry and the Empress Mathilda, against all men. Where you see he is not stiled King of England, but only Duke, &c. and I see no reason, why this Title of Rex should have been omitted in the one Oath more than in the other, had he been then looked upon as King of England; which does not prove him to be King in a legal sense, any more than the like Oath, as also the Homage which was made to Prince Lewis Son to Philip King of France, after his being Elected King by the Barons in opposition to King John, when upon his arrival at London, (as Matt. Paris relates) he received the Homages and * Fealties of all the Barons and Citizens, who there expected his coming; and yet I suppose neither the Doctor nor any body else will affirm, that Lewis was ever for all his Election above-mention'd called or reputed King of England: nor will it avail him to aver, that this was only because Lewis was an Usurper, and had no Right to the Crown by Blood; for then the same Objection may also hold good against King John, (upon the Doctor's Principles) for Duke Arthur was then alive, and claim'd the Crown as Heir to Earl Geofrey his Father, and was so according to the Rules of Succession at this day.

* Note, This Fealty was ever made by Oath, either to the King or to the Lord of the Fee.

BUT

BUT notwithſtanding all this, the Doctor in his Exact Hiſtory of
P. 374. the Succeſſion to the Crown, takes no notice of this Uſurpation of Earl John till afterwards, as you ſhall ſee by and by; but founds all his Right to the Kingdom (as he had done William Rufus's before) upon the laſt Will of his Predeceſſor; and for this cites this paſſage out of
* P. 449. b. * Hoveden, "That when the King (viz. Richard) deſpaired of Life, "he deviſed to his Brother John the Kingdom of England, and all o-"ther his Territories, and made all there preſent to ſwear Fealty to him, "and commanded that his Caſtles, and three parts of his Treaſure ſhould "be delivered to him; and then he goes on to tell us, how all Orders of men ſwore Fealty to him, as has been already ſaid. Here the
* Ibid. * Doctor takes no notice of the Right of Duke Arthur, till he comes † P. 156. to obſerve, that † Matt. Paris relates this matter ſomewhat differently from Hoveden, viz. that when Arch-Biſhop Hubert, William the Mareſchal, and Geofrey Fitz-Peter, and other Great Men of the Kingdom, called before them at Northampton all the Chief Nobility, whom they ſuſpected or moſt doubted of; Fecerunt illis Fidem quod Comes Johannes Jura ſua redderet Univerſis: They promiſed Earl John ſhould reſtore to every one their Rights: and then Sub tali igitur Conventione Comites & Barones Comiti memorato Fidelitatem contra Omnes Homines juraverunt. So that it was upon ſuch Condition or Agreement, that the Earls and Barons ſwore Fidelity to the before-mention'd Earl againſt all men.

BUT I deſire the Reader to obſerve from the Doctor, that ſo ſoon as this promiſe of reſtoring every body their Rights was made, from that very moment Earl John commences an Uſurper, and now he
* P. 375. has no Right at all to the Crown: for in the * next Page he tells us, "That theſe Rights (if the Hiſtorian had noted them) in all pro-"bability were no other than theirs (i. e. the Nobilities) large De-"mands, which they called ſo; and whatever they were, Earl John "was forced to grant them, for at that time he was an Uſurper; and "the Barons, or major part of them, always bargained and made "Terms with Uſurpers to their own Advantage, tho to the Diſadvan-"tage of the Crown, as the Conſtitution of the Government was "then, as they had done with Henry the Firſt, and King Stephen.

NOW I deſire to ask the Doctor this one Queſtion, viz. how it comes to paſs that King John, notwithſtanding the Crown was bequeathed to him by his Brother King Richard, is ſtill a downright Uſurper, whereas he gives no ſuch Character of William Rufus who reign'd not a hundred years before, and had no better Title? And I would fain alſo have him tell us, how the Law of Succeſſion came to be alter'd within this time? ſince I could never find any Law or Statute for it; and therefore till the Doctor gives us a better Reaſon, I ſhall be very apt to believe, that his great Spight againſt him, is, that he now by theſe Great Men made this gracious Promiſe above-mentioned; but eſpecially for his granting this Charter, which the Doctor would needs have to be gain'd from this Uſurper (as he calls him) by mere Force and Rebellion: but he might, if he had pleas'd, have remember'd, that it was not as yet ſettled in England by any Law who ſhould ſucceed to the Crown, the Uncle, or the Nephew whoſe Father was deceaſed; ſince it is very certain, that before the Conqueſt the Uncles were always prefer'd to the Throne before the Sons of the Elder Brother, ther, as I have ſufficiently made out in my Introduction to the former Volume; and which is alſo granted by the Doctor in his Hiſtory of the Succeſſion now before us: nor was this Point ſettled in the Caſe of private Subjects in the Reign of Henry the Second, when Glanvil wrote his Treatiſe of the Laws of England, where in the Seventh Book and Third Chapter, after giving us the Arguments on both ſides, as well for the Nephew whoſe Father was dead, the Grandfather being alive, as alſo for the ſurviving younger Brother, Uncle to the Nephew, he after all leaves it a Moot-point undecided, unleſs in ſome few Caſes which he there puts. And that the Laws of ſeveral Countries in France were different about this Matter, appears by what all our Hiſtorians relate (and which the Doctor himſelf here alſo agrees to) that Earl John was inveſted with the Sword of the Dutchy of Normandy as Lawful Heir to his Brother without any Contradiction; * whereas at the ſame time the Great Men of Anjou, Tourain and Maine, adhered to Arthur as their Liege Lord, ſaying, It was the Law and Cuſtom of thoſe Countries that the Son of the Elder Brother ſhould ſucceed before his Uncle in the Patrimony and Inheritance due to him, and which his Father Earl Geofrey ſhould have enjoyed if he had out-lived King Richard; where it is plain, that theſe Countries held a different Courſe of Succeſſion from that of Normandy. Therefore * Grotius, in his Learned Work de Jure Belli & Pacis, leaves this as a Queſtion not to be decided by the Law of Nature or Nations, but only by the particular Laws and Cuſtoms of ſeveral Kingdoms and Principalities, as you may ſee by the Examples in his Annotations to this Section; and where you will alſo find the various Opinions of Authors about this matter; only (he ſays) that among the Germans the Law of Repreſentation, i. e. that of the Eldeſt Son's Son inheriting before the Uncle, was not obſerved: and for the ſame reaſon, I ſuppoſe, the Saxons here being derived from the antient Goths, this manner of Succeſſion to the Crown took place in England; and therefore (notwithſtanding what modern Hiſtorians have written to the contrary) I am not ſatisfied that King John was an Uſurper of his Nephew Arthur's Right, either according to the Laws of England or Normandy; neither ought the Doctor to ſtile him ſo upon his own Principles: for certainly King Richard had as much Right to appoint his Brother Heir of that Dutchy, as Duke Robert had to declare William his Baſtard Heir thereof, to the prejudice of the next Heirs by Blood, which the * Doctor falſly repreſents, as if it had been done by that Duke's ſole Authority; whereas both Gulielmus Pictavienſis & Gemeticenſis expreſly ſay, it was done in an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of that Country; and the latter has theſe words: They (viz. the Great Men) Elected William Succeſſor to his Father, upon his earneſt requeſt to them. But the † Doctor not liking this word Election, ſliely paſſes by this Paſſage untranſlated, tho he has ſet down the Latin at large, which yet can deceive no others, than only ſuch as do not underſtand that Language. So likewiſe he would fain top upon them a Paſſage in R. Hoveden, who affirms it to have been the Cuſtom in Norway (from whence the Normans came) for Baſtards to inherit, and that in his time it was ſo. But what is this to Normandy, where at this time the Law was otherwiſe, when D. William ſucceeded to his Father? Otherwiſe what need had there been for Duke Robert to have aſſembled the Eſtates of the

* R. Hoveden, ib.

* Lib. 3. Cap. 7. Sect. 30.

* Ib. p. 886.

† Hiſt. Succeſſ. p. 367.

Dutchy to declare his Baſtard Succeſſor, when his own Teſtament had been ſufficient? Neither will the Paſſage he has cited out of Hoveden make out what he alledges; for * he only ſays, that it was the Cuſtom in Norway even to this day (viz. the time when he wrote) that he who is own'd to be the Son of the late King, tho a Baſtard and begotten of a Concubine, challenges as much Right unto the Kingdom of Norway, as the King's Son born in Wedlock; and therefore upon the death of the King, there are conſtant Battles between them (the Brothers) till one of them is kill'd, and the other overcomes.

* P. 425. a.

NOW this is not to give a Baſtard a Right to the Throne, but only that he might be one of the Competitors to fight for it, which is not to ſettle any Right of Succeſſion at all, but to leave it ſtill in diſpute. To avoid which, Duke Robert wiſely ſettled the Succeſſion of his Dutchy by the Conſent of the Eſtates; and therefore it is falſly concluded by the * Doctor, that from the force of this Norwegian Law, the like contention happened in Normandy between the Curators of Duke William in his Nonage, and the other Pretenders, as Heirs to his Grandfather of that Dutchy.

* Ib.

AND certainly thoſe next Heirs by Blood had been very much in the right, ſince the Eccleſiaſtical or Canon Law was at that time received in Normandy, by which Baſtards are expreſly prohibited to ſucceed as Heirs to their Fathers, unleſs they had alſo married their Mothers; which Arlotte Mother to this William, never was to Duke Robert above-mention'd.

BUT to return to the manner of Earl John's Succeſſion to the Engliſh Throne, from which (to diſcover the Doctor's unfair dealing) I have made ſome Digreſſion; * Bromton's Chronicle expreſly tells us, that in a Great Aſſembly of Earls, Barons, and other Noblemen, Earl John was anointed and * crowned King: and † Matt. Paris gives us the Speech that Hubert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury then made before his Election and Coronation, wherein he deſires them all to take no- " tice, that no one ought to ſucceed another in the Kingdom for any " previous Reaſon, or Conſideration, unleſs he were ab Univerſitate " Regni unanimitèr electus, i. e. elected by the General Body of the " Kingdom (right old Engliſh-Saxon Doctrin) and which King John himſelf acknowledges in his * Charter, wherein he expreſly declares he came to the Crown, (Jure Hæreditario, & mediante tàm Cleri quàm Populi unanimi Conſenſu & Favore) not only by Hereditary Right, but by the unanimous Conſent and Favour, as well of the Clergy as Laiety.

* Col. 1281.

* In Regem Coronatur.

† P. 197.

* Vid. Chart. moderationis feodi magni Sigilli an. 1. Johan. ex vet. Reg. in Archivis Archiep. Cant.

I SHALL now anſwer the * Doctor's Objections againſt theſe Authorities: I confeſs he has given us Arch-Biſhop Hubert's Speech at large, as alſo the Relation how it was received by thoſe that heard it, who durſt not doubt of what he had ſaid, knowing the Arch-Biſhop had not thus decreed this matter without cauſe. But Earl John and all there acquieſced in what he had ſaid, ipſúmque Comitem in Regem eligentes & aſſumentes, exclamant, dicentes, vivat Rex, i. e. " chuſing and receiv- " ing the Earl for their King, ſhouted, ſaying, Let the King live. Where I cannot but obſerve the Doctor's wonted Artifice, who here tranſlates the word Aſſumentes, without any warrant from his Dictionaries, they chuſing or acknowledging him for their King: Now I deſire him to tell me, whither he thinks chuſing and acknowledging are one and the ſame thing?

* Ib.

* BUT

BUT to come to the Doctor's main Objection againſt this Authority, which is from the words immediately following in this Author: But Arch-Biſhop Hubert being asked afterward, why he ſaid theſe things? anſwered, That he gueſſed, and was taught and aſcertained by certain Oracles (or Prophecies) that John would bring the Kingdom and Crown into great Confuſion, and therefore leſt he might take too much Liberty in doing it, he affirm'd, he ought to come in by Election, and not by Hereditary Succeſſion: and ſo he was crown'd, as before is rehearſed.

FROM whence the * Doctor draws this Concluſion, that this learned Doctrin and Preachment of the Arch-Biſhop aſſerts not any Right of Election in the Convention of Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and others required to be at the Coronation; but that his own Anſwer, when he was asked why he ſaid theſe things, clearly diſcovers only a Deſign and Artifice in the Arch-Biſhop to cauſe them to ſet up, and make John King; by which alſo he denies any ſuch Right of Election: Hoveden (ſays he) hath none of (nor doth he mention) this Harangue, and therefore it rather ſeems to be an Invention of Matt. Paris, than a Sermon of the Arch-Biſhop's: Hiſtorians commonly make Speeches for other men they write of; Bromton's Chronicle takes no notice of it. Here then the Doctor gives us his words concerning the Oath of Fidelity ſworn to him before his Coronation; which, ſince I have already made uſe of, I paſs by, only muſt take notice, that the Latin words are much more Emphatical than the Engliſh, they being thus; Ab Huberto Cantuarienſi Archiepiſcopo inungitur, & in Regem Angliæ coronatur; where the words being in the Accuſative Caſe, do plainly infer, that it was the Anointing and Crowning that made him King. But as for Hoveden's omitting this Harangue, to argue from thence that it was never made, is a very fallacious way of proof, ſince one Hiſtorian often ſets down what another omits; nor could this Speech be Matt. Paris's Invention, for the Doctor might alſo have found it in the Manuſcript Hiſtory of Roger of Wendover in the Cottonian Library, which he might have ſeen if he had pleaſed. And tho I grant it is ſometimes the Cuſtom of Hiſtorians to make Speeches for thoſe they write of, yet is it not likely this Author did ſo now, ſince all the Circumſtances of it look too exact and particular to be invented; and the Doctor himſelf has put a Bar to this Objection, by admitting the Speech to be real, but that the Arch-Biſhop made uſe of it only as an Artifice to cauſe them to ſet up Earl John to be King. Which Inference is certainly falſe, for either the Arch-Biſhop then believed that Earl John had an Hereditary Right, or elſe that he had none: if he were perſwaded of the Former, and if all the Aſſembly were of his mind, it had been ridiculous for him to have preached up this Doctrin of an Election; and if neither he, nor they were ſatisfied of his Hereditary Right, nor of that by his Brother's Teſtament (which is not here mention'd) then the Arch-Biſhop's Speech was very proper at that time, ſince he could have no other Title but their Election (beſides his near Relation to the late King) to recommend him to their Favour. But as for that place the Doctor has cited from Gervaſe of Canterbury, from whence he would prove that neither Henry I. nor any other King came in by Election, for that it was manifeſt and known almoſt to all men, that the Kings of England were only obliged and bound to God for

for the obtaining of the Kingdom, and to the Church of Canterbury for their Coronation; this is certainly either a Miſtake, or a manifeſt Contradiction of himſelf in this Author, who expreſly allows King Stephen to have been elected King by all there preſent: but indeed the words do rather make againſt the Doctor's Opinion; for if God is here excepted, ſo likewiſe is the Church or Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; and ſo the King is by this Doctrin as much obliged for his obtaining or poſſeſſion of the Throne (as the Doctor tranſlates it) to the latter, as to the former; and if that be once admitted, then ſee what he will gain by it, unleſs perhaps he had rather, that Kings ſhould own their Crowns to God and the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury, than to God and the Election of the People. But indeed this Authority does not deſerve any ſerious Confutation, for this Monk lays down this Aſſertion from a falſe Prejudice and ſuperſtitious Perſwaſion (then current among them) that it was a Prerogative of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, not only to crown, but to make Kings; as may be ſeen by ſome Paſſages in the Letters and Speeches of Thomas Becket Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury in the enſuing Hiſtory.

BUT to conclude, the Doctor puts a very falſe Gloſs upon the words of King John's Charter above-mention'd, where by the words, unanimous Conſent of the Clergy and Laiety, he would needs have no more to be meant than their acknowledgment and ſubmiſſion to him; for (ſays the Doctor) according to Hoveden's Relation of his coming to the Crown (which is the moſt exact we now have) they ſubmitted and ſwore Fealty to him againſt all men ſome time before his Coronation. But to this I need ſay no more than what I have already noted, that this Oath was not taken to him as preſent King, but only as ſuch in Deſignation; for otherwiſe it had been a much eaſier matter for the Arch-Biſhop and others above-mention'd to have made this Oath to be taken to him as King of England in direct Terms, without calling him only Duke of Normandy, &c. as is expreſſed in that Oath in Hoveden above-mention'd. But the Doctor ſlubbers over this Oath, by expreſſing it only in the general Terms of Him, without ſaying who was meant by it, whither the Earl or the King.

I AM come now to the laſt King of this Period, of which I have written (viz. Henry the Third) who if his Father King John was an Uſurper, ſo was alſo his Son; for Eleanor, Siſter to his Couſin Arthur, was living five and twenty years after he came to the Crown. But the Doctor being aware of this Objection, grants as much as I can deſire; for * he ſays, that at this time, viz. at his Father's Death, King Henry had no good Hereditary Title; and therefore † Matthew Paris relates, that King John, when he departed this Life, appointed his Son Henry to be his Heir: And this Donation of his Father, or his making him his Heir, was his beſt Title; for until Eleanor (the Daughter of his Uncle Geofrey) died, in the 25*th* year of his Reign (as before has been ſaid) he was not true Heir by Right of Blood.

† P. 288.

A VERY ingenuous Acknowledgment I muſt confeſs; and then I would fain know of the Doctor, whither this Teſtamentary Right ſignified any thing, or not? If it ſignified nothing, why does he mention it? But if any thing, why ſhall not the like Pretence of Teſtamentary Right ſtill hold good at this day? But tho the Doctor is very loth to own it, yet it will appear, that notwithſtanding King John's Teſtament, this young Prince's beſt Friends did not think fit to rely upon that alone, but rather upon the Conſent and Election of the Great Council of the Kingdom, who met at Glouceſter (as Matthew Paris tells us) ut Henricum Filium Johannis in Regem exaltarent, that they might advance Henry Son to King John to be their King. But another Author of good Credit and Authority, viz. * Walter Hemingford, in his Chronicle relates, that William the Mareſchal, Earl of Pembroke, who was at that time a Man of great Authority and Wiſdom, made a Speech to the Great Council of the Biſhops and Nobility then preſent at Glouceſter, on the behalf of the young Prince (not yet ten years old) whom he now deſign'd to advance to the Throne, to this effect; "Tho we "have proſecuted the Father for his evil Deeds, and that juſtly, yet "this young Infant is pure and innocent from thoſe his Actions: you "know what the Scripture ſaith, The Child ſhall not bear the Iniquity of "the Father; therefore we ought to have compaſſion on his tender "Age, and becauſe he is the King's Son, and to be our Lord, let us "make him King, and caſt out the French King's Son and his Peo-"ple, &c. Then after ſome Objections of the Earl of Glouceſter againſt it, at laſt the whole Council, as if they had been inſpired from Heaven, cried out with one Voice, Fiat ſic, fiat Rex, fiat Rex, let it be ſo, let him be made King: Whereupon they appointed St. Simon and Jude's day for his Coronation, when, as Matth. Paris and * Thomas Wikes both agree, he was encircled with a Chaplet of Gold for want of a Crown; from which day (being the 28*th* of October) William of Riſhanger (Matt. Paris's Continuator) reckons the years of this King's Reign, and not from the Death of his Father King John; the Author's words are theſe, Regnavit (i. e. Henricus Tertius) 56 annos, & amplius, quantum diſtat à feſto Sanctorum Simonis & Judæ uſque ad feſtum Sancti Edmundi Pontificis, id eſt, viginti duebus; King Henry the Third reigned 56 years, and as much more as is from the Feaſt of St. Simon and Jude to that of St. Edmund the Arch-Biſhop; that is juſt twenty days. And that this is to be underſtood not only in an Hiſtorical, but a Legal Account, appears by what the above-cited Thomas Wikes ſays in the ſame place in theſe words; From which day (viz. of his Coronation) the date of this King's Reign begins in all Writs and publick Writings. But Matthew Paris is more conciſe; who in the very Title to this King's Reign, which he begins at his firſt Coronation with a Golden Chaplet, adds thus, A qua Coronatione ſupputantur anni Coronationis ejus. From all which Teſtimonies put together, nothing can be more clear, than that Henry the Third was not looked upon as a Legal King before the time of his Coronation.

* In his Chron. under this year.

NOW let us look back to his Father K. John, who you'll find was crown'd the 27*th* of May 1199, and deceaſed on the 17*th* of October, Anno Dom. 1216. being St. Luke's Eve; according to which Account he reigned (ſays * Thomas Walſingham) 17 Years, five Months, and four Days; which account being reckon'd from the 27*th* of May to the 17*th* of October, makes juſt five Calendar Months of 28 days apiece. But his Reign can by no means commence from the day of his Brother King Richard's death, for that fell out on the 6*th* of April, juſt ſeven weeks and three days before his Coronation; which if computed into his Reign, would make up not five, but ſix compleat months, beſides three weeks and three odd days, which are never counted into his Reign.

TO proceed higher yet to his Brother K. Richard, who had the moſt indiſputable Hereditary Right of any King ſince the Conqueſt, tho his elder Brother the young King Henry died without Iſſue; yet you will find that his Reign is alſo computed by all our Hiſtorians, not from the death of King Henry his Father, which fell out on the ſixth of July 1189. but from his own Coronation which was on the third of September following: from which time if you count to the 26th of April, A. D. 1199. being the day of his Death, you will find he reigned juſt nine years, ſeven months, and four days; for ſo it ſhould be, and not ſix months, as in the printed Copies of Rad. de Diceto. But if we ſhould reckon his Reign from his Father's Death, which was three months before his Coronation, wanting but three days, then he muſt have reigned nine years and nine months wanting but three days, which is more than any Hiſtorian aſſigns him.

SO likewiſe if we compute the years of King Henry the Second's Reign from his Coronation, (which happen'd on the nineteenth of December, A. D. 1184.) to the day of his Death, which was on the Octave of St. Peter and Paul, or ſixth of July (as hath been already ſaid) you will find it makes thirty four years, ſeven months and four odd days, which is the longeſt time that any of our Hiſtorians allow him to have reigned; but if you ſhould reckon his Reign from the Death of King Stephen his Predeceſſor, inſtead of ſeven months and four days, it would make eight Kalendar months and ſix days, beyond what any of our Hiſtorians acknowledged him to have reigned.

HAVING thus calculated the years of the Reigns of theſe four laſt Kings of this Period, contained in the following Hiſtory, and finding every one of them to have begun at their Coronations, and not from the Death of their Father or next immediate Predeceſſor, it will be needleſs to look higher back into the Reigns of the four other Kings, ſince it is owned on all hands, that they having no Titles by Right of Blood, could not date their Reigns ſooner than from their Coronations; not but that I grant that even ſuch Princes did, by virtue of their bare Election, and the Homage and Fealty that had been ſworn to them as Supreme Lords of all the Lands of England, exerciſe ſeveral Regal Prerogatives even before their Coronations. Thus you will find in the Reign of King Stephen, that in about a month's time which paſſed between his Election and Coronation, he quell'd an Inſurrection of certain Rebels or Lawleſs Men, who had taken the opportunity of an Inter-Regnum to raiſe a Diſturbance in the Kingdom.

See the following Hiſtory.

SO likewiſe the Empreſs Mathilda, being declar'd Heir to her Father in his Life-time, and having received by virtue thereof the Homage and Fealty of all the Freeholders of England; and being alſo again elected Lady of the Engliſh by the Biſhops and Clergy at the Council of Wincheſter, tho not by the Title of Queen, yet took upon her to create Milo her Favorite Earl of Hereford, and to confirm her half-Brother Reginald in the Earldom of Cornwal, which had been before conferred upon him by King Stephen; and alſo diſpoſed of ſeveral Caſtles and Crown-Lands to thoſe Great Men that took her part: yet I do not find ſhe ever proceeded to any other higher Acts of Sovereign Power, as either to coin Money, or make Laws; for King Stephen phen was all this while looked upon as King-in-Law, even by his Enemies, and that too whilſt he was in Priſon; for you will find that Theobald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury refuſed during that confinement to ſwear Fealty to the Empreſs without that King's Conſent, to whom he then applyed for it; and he is by William of Malmesbury (who on all occaſions ſhews himſelf his Enemy) ſtiled King, notwithſtanding his Impriſonment, and the former Election of the Empreſs, which this Author would never have done, had he not believed that this King's Election and Coronation had conferred upon him, not only a bare Title, but Regal Power and Authority.

THE like I may ſay of Prince Lewis of France, who after he was elected King, and called into England by the Barons againſt King John, did, by virtue of that, and the Homage and Fealty which all the Barons and Tenants by Knight's-Service then made him, exerciſe many Acts or Prerogatives of Regal Power, as to confer the Honours, Offices and Eſtates of thoſe that held with King John, upon ſuch as had ſided with him; yet he never took upon him the Title of King of England, becauſe he was never crown'd, and upon that account there was no Renuntiation of his Right to the Crown required of him upon the Pacification that was made between him and King Henry the Third, as you may ſee in the beginning of his Reign, where all the Conditions are ſet down at large So that I can compare the Authority of ſuch Elect Kings to nothing better, than to the Power that Biſhops Elect exerciſed in thoſe times; for after their Election by the Chapter or Convent, and that they had been confirmed by the Pope, and had done their Homage to the King for their Temporalities, they could let Leaſes of the Eſtates belonging to their Biſhopricks, but had no place in the Choir, nor in Eccleſiaſtical Synods, till after their Conſecration and Inſtallation in their Sees.

I SHALL now ſay no more concerning this Point of the Succeſſion to the Crown, but ſhall before I conclude, run over the other main Conſtituent Parts of the Government, and inquire how far it was alter'd after the Conqueſt.

AND firſt as to the Repreſentatives of the Nation in their Great or Common Council of the Kingdom, from what it was during the Government of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings: as I have already proved in my laſt Volume that the Aldermen or Earls of Counties, as alſo the Superior and Inferior Thanes, together with the Repreſentatives or Deputies of Cities and Boroughs had places in them; ſo all the Alteration I can find to have been introduced in the Great Council, or Parliament, after the Conqueſt, was, that Earldoms became now Hereditary, whereas before they were generally for life only.

BUT as for the Thanes or Barons by Tenure, whither of the higher or lower Degree, as alſo of thoſe who held of them by like Military Service, and likewiſe as to the Cities and Boroughs, whither there was any Alteration as to their appearing and voting in the Great Council of the Nation from the Conqueſt till the 49*th* of King Henry the Third, when Sr. Henry Spelman and Mr. Pryn, (whom Dr. Brady likewiſe follows) do aſſign the Commons as repreſented by Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, to have been firſt ſummon'd to Parliament; I will not at this time take upon me to treat of it, tho I at firſt intended it, ſince this Introduction has already ſwell'd beyond its bounds; and there-therefore I ſhall reſerve what I have to ſay on that Subject to the Introduction before my next Volume, when (God willing if I live) I will fairly repreſent all the Arguments and Authorities that have been made uſe of, either on the one ſide or the other, in this great Queſtion, eſpecially ſince many of the moſt material of them ariſe from a Claim of Preſcription of the Cities and Boroughs made in the Reigns of the three firſt Edwards; which falling beyond the Period that this Volume extends to, may more properly ſerve for the ſucceeding.

I SHALL therefore conclude, with giving the Reader ſome Account of the moſt material Alterations that were made in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, either relating to Things or Perſons, after the Conqueſt. And the greateſt Change I can find, as to the latter, was, that of the Tenures of the Biſhops and greater Abbots, in the beginning of King William the Firſt's Reign, when they were brought under the Yoke of Knight's Service; and as Barons or Tenants in Capite they had from that time a place in the Publick Councils of the Kingdom, whereas under the Engliſh-Saxon Kings they ſat there only in their Spiritual Capacities, and as a ſeparate Eſtate, that held their Lands only by Frank-Almoign: not but that many of thoſe who did not hold by Barony, were often ſummon'd to the greateſt or moſt General Councils of the Nation, upon extraordinary Occaſions, either to contribute Money, or to give Advice in the moſt difficult and arduous Affairs; as appears by that great Summons to Parliament in the 49*th* of Henry the Third, when it ſtill remains upon Record, that not only the Abbots, and Priors who held in Capite, were then ſummon'd to Parliament, but alſo moſt of that Order in England, as Dr. Brady in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt ſets forth; which (notwithſtanding the Doctor's Aſſertion of the contrary) I do not believe was a new Inſtitution, ſince, if it had, the Hiſtorians and Annaliſts of thoſe times would moſt likely have taken notice of it as an Innovation, eſpecially when the Service of Abbots and Priors in Parliament was then look'd upon as a Burthen to their Houſe, and an Avocation from their Spiritual Functions. And hence it was, that ſo many of them excuſed their appearance in ſucceeding Times, by pleading they did not hold of the King in Capite, nor by Barony, of which you will find many Inſtances in Mr. Selden's Titles of Honour.

BUT the moſt conſiderable Change that I can find to have happen'd in the County and other Inferior Courts after the Conqueſt, was, the ſeparation of the Eccleſiaſtical from the Civil Juriſdiction; "For "* whereas under the Saxon Kings the Biſhops, and the Earl, or the "Sheriff as his Deputy, ſate together in the County-Court, Hundred, "and Sheriff's Courts and there promiſcuouſly determined both Eccle- "ſiaſtical and ſecular Cauſes; and thus it continued for ſome time after "the Conqueſt, till the year 1085. † Then King William ordained, "That no Biſhop nor Arch-Deacon, ſhould for the future hold Pleas "in the County, Hundred, or other Inferior Courts, concerning Epiſ- "copal Laws, or Canons, nor ſhould bring any Cauſe pertaining to "the Government of Souls before a Secular Judicature; but that every "one who had tranſgreſſed the Epiſcopal Laws ſhould be judged in "ſuch place as the Biſhop ſhould appoint, according to the ſame "Laws and Canons; and that if any was ſo obſtinate as not to ap- "pear at the third Summons, he was to be excommunicated, and if "need were, the King's or Sheriff's Power was to be added; and "further † Id. Vol. 2. p. 14, 15.

" further commanded, that no Sheriff, or Lay-Officer, ſhould inter-" meddle with Epiſcopal Laws.

THIS is the ſum of this King's Writ directed to R. Bainard and G. de Mandevil, P. de Valoines, and all his faithful Subjects of Eſſex, as alſo of another like Writ of this King's inrolled by Inſpeximus in the Tower, and cited by Sir William Dugdale in his Preface to his Antiquities of Warwickſhire. Cart. Rich. 2. per Inſpex. m. 13. n. 5.

AND from this Time we are to date the beginning of Eccleſiaſtical or Biſhop's Courts, which the King hereby gave them authority to hold in their own Names, as they do at this day.

SO likewiſe in the Wittena Gemot, or great Council of the Kingdom, the Clergy and Laiety, till now, ſate and acted together as one Body, as they did under the Saxon Government; and the ſame Synod made both the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Laws, as I have already proved at large in my former Introduction: but ſome time after King William's coming in, the Biſhops and Clergy began to hold their Synods or Councils apart, eſpecially whenever the Pope ſent over his Legate into England; the firſt Example of which I find A. D. 1070. being the fourteenth year of this King's Reign; when, as Hoveden tells us, there was a great Synod, or Council of the Clergy at Wincheſter, in which the Pope's Legate, Hermanfred Biſhop of Sedun, and others preſided, and where Arch-Biſhop Stigand was deprived for ſeveral Crimes and Irregularities; as were alſo his Brother Agelmar Bp of Helmham, and ſeveral Abbots. This is the firſt Synod or Council that ever took upon them to deprive an Arch-Biſhop by their ſole Authority, without the Conſent of the Lay-Part of the great Council; but was indeed a Papal Uſurpation, the Clergy only being ſummon'd by his Legate without any Lay-men there, as I can find: But before this, that Biſhops were often both elected and deprived by the whole Wittena Gemot, or great Council of the Kingdom, conſiſting both of the Clergy and Laiety, I have already made out in my ſaid Introduction, from ſeveral Authorities of the Hiſtorians of thoſe times.

BUT that the Great Council of the Kingdom had not yet wholly loſt their Antient Rights of electing and confirming the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, even in this King's time, appears by the manner of Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc's Election to that See; Indeed William of Malmesbury ſays, he was elected by the King; but the Antient Latin Copy of the Saxon Annals, that is in Bennet-College Library, ſets it forth more particularly, how that this Year Lanfranc Abbot of Caën being ſent for by the King, came into England, and took upon him the Primacy of the Church of Canterbury (the reſt I ſhall give you in the Latin Original) Eligentibus eum Senioribus ejuſdem Eccleſiæ, cum Epiſcopis, & Principibus, Clero, & Populo Angliæ in Curia Regis: i. e. The Senior Monks of the ſaid Church electing him, together with the Biſhops and Chief Men, viz. the Clergy and Laiety of England, in the King's Court, or Great Council: with which likewiſe agrees almoſt verbatim, that ſhort Account of this King's Reign, which you will find printed at the end of Taylor's Hiſtory of Gavelkind from an antient Manuſcript in the Bodleian Library.

BUT tho the Laiety ſoon loſt their Voices in the Election of Biſhops, yet the Suffragan Biſhops of the Province of Canterbury long after maintained their Right of joining with the Monks in the Election of the Arch-Biſhop, as you will find by divers Inſtances in the enſuing Hiſtory; till at length the latter being ſupported by the Pope, took upon them alone to elect the Arch-Biſhop. But the firſt I can find ſo choſen by the Monks, without any precedent or ſubſequent Conſent of the Suffragan Biſhops, was Stephen Langton, A. D. 1205. for after the Death of Arch-Biſhop Hubert, Pope Innocent wrote to the Biſhops of that Province, not to intermeddle or moleſt the Monks of Canterbury in their choice of an Arch-Biſhop: A Copy of which Letter or Bull you may read at large in * Matt. Paris; and the King at the ſame time hoping to make his advantage of the Monks, by cauſing them to elect the Biſhop of Norwich (whom he then much deſired to prefer to that See) gave them alſo the ſole Power of chuſing one: but the Pope declaring his Election void, Stephen Langton was thereupon choſen Arch-Biſhop by a few of the Monks, who had been a little before ſent to Rome upon the clandeſtine Election of their Sub-Prior, as I ſhall ſhew hereafter. And tho the Suffragan Biſhops then likewiſe ſent their Proctors to Rome to proteſt againſt this Election of an Arch-Biſhop without their Conſents, yet it ſignified nothing; for the Pope made this ſmall Committee to elect Cardinal Langton to that See, as hath been already ſaid. From which time, during the Reigns of King John, and Henry the Third, the Pope, under the pretence of confirming or approving the Election of Biſhops, vacated them at his pleaſure, whenever he did not like the Man they had choſen, or had a mind to prefer a Creature of his own; ſo that the Election of the Convents and Chapters of Churches, then ſignified little or nothing.

* P. 212.

BUT I cannot here omit another very notable Incroachment the Pope now made on the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction of the Church of Canterbury: for whereas till the coming in of William the Conqueror, the Popes ſent Legates but very rarely into England, and that only upon great and extraordinary Occaſions; ſo after that time they came not hither but when they were particularly deſired by the King; for the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury were the Pope's conſtant and cuſtomary Legates in this Kingdom: But in the latter end of the Reign of Henry the Firſt, it is obſerved by William of Malmesbury, in his * de Geſtis Pontificum, that now began the frequent coming over of Legates into England, the Pope prevailing upon the weakneſs of Arch-Biſhop Radulph to admit him to ſend them when he pleaſed. But the King by his Prudence put a check to this Innovation, and would not after that Arch-Biſhop's deceaſe, own any Legate in England beſides the Metropolitan of Canterbury; which you alſo find more particularly ſet forth in Eadmerus. But this Abuſe was again renew'd in the Reign of King Stephen, who ſuffered the Pope to do what he pleaſed here; and was continued, and daily increaſed in the Reigns of his Succeſſors; and at laſt in that of King Henry the Third came to be an intolerable Grievance.

* L. 1. p. 231.

BUT ſince I am now entred upon this Subject, I ſhall briefly ſhew by what degrees the Popes ſo far advanced their Temporal Power here in England, under the ſpecious colour of Spiritual Juriſdiction.

YOU

YOU have already heard how Pope Alexander the Second ſent Duke William a conſecrated Banner, with his Bleſſing and Approbation of his Enterprize againſt King Harold: In return to which Favour, Pope Gregory the Seventh (Alexander's immediate Succeſſor) by his Epiſtle to William being now made King, demanded that he ſhould ſwear Fealty, and be wholly obedient to him; a Copy of which Leter you may find among that * Pope's Epiſtles.

* Vid. Epiſt. Greg. VII. l. 7. Ep. 25.

BUT the King was of too haughty a Spirit to yield to ſo mean a Subjection, and therefore return'd this reſolute Anſwer (which is alſo printed among Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc's Epiſtles) that † for the Oath of Fealty he had not taken it, neither would, becauſe he never promiſed it, neither did he find that ever his Predeceſſors had ſo done to Gregory's Predeceſſors. Bnt tho the Pope was much diſpleas'd at this, and chid Arch-Biſhop Lanfranc in another Letter for not perſwading the King to do it; yet for all this the Arch-Biſhop could never prevail upon him, and ſo he kept his Point, nor would permit any Pope to be acknowledged here but whom he pleaſed; and alſo retained the old Prerogative of inveſting Biſhops and Abbots, per Baculum & Annulum, notwithſtanding the late Decrees of the Lateran Council againſt it. Thus it continued during all this King's Reign, as alſo that of William Rufus his Son and Succeſſor, for all that the Pope and Anſelm Arch-Biſhop could do to the contrary.

Eadm. p. 6.

BUT when King Henry the Firſt came to the Crown, and Anſelm was again returned into England from his voluntary Exile, the King demanded of him the accuſtomed Homage, which the Arch-Biſhop refuſed to pay him, alledging the Decrees of the late Council at Rome. But tho the King was very loth to loſe the Inveſtiture and Homage of the Biſhops, yet being afraid of the Pope's Excommunication, and that he ſhould ſet up his Brother Robert's Title againſt him, he was at laſt forced to be reconciled to the Arch-Biſhop, and give him leave to come home, he having been before baniſhed by this King, who now quitted his Prerogative of Inveſtiture, only reſerving the Ceremony of Homage of the Biſhops in reſpect of their Temporalities; which was alſo allowed by Pope Paſcal upon his Agreement with King Henry, and by him confirmed in a great Council at London. To this alſo Arch-Biſhop Anſelm conſented, provided it were done before their Conſecration; and ſo this Cuſtom continues to this day, only it is now done upon every Election or Tranſlation of Biſhops. Yet the ſame Pope having yielded this Right of Inveſtiture to the Emperor Henry the Fifth (as Florence and William of Malmesbury relate) Anſelm thereupon wrote to the Pope, that the King was reſolved to reaſſume the ſame Right too, and that they both actually did ſo. And Matt. Paris and Matt. Weſtminſter expreſly ſay, That this King inveſted Richard (the very next Arch-Biſhop) with the Staff and Ring after the Antient Cuſtom; tho it ſeems this did not hold long, for upon the Emperor's quitting that Right, I ſuppoſe this King quitted it too.

BUT the King did not then part with this Right of Inveſtiture alone, but in the ſame Council laſt mention'd, he granted the free Elections of all Biſhops, and Abbots; whereas in the Reigns of his Predeceſſors, Canonical Elections were but rare, the King himſelf very often in the Common Council of the Kingdom, nominating the Perſons whom he would have to ſucceed, and their Conſents were given, as it were, were, by way of Confirmation, to ſuch precedent nominations. And tho after this way was diſuſed, they were choſen by the Deans and Chapter, or the Priors and Convents, according to the cuſtom of their ſeveral Churches; yet notwithſtanding the King ſtill retained his Antient Prerogative, not only in recommending the Perſon he thought moſt fit to be choſen Arch-Biſhop or Biſhop, but alſo, the better to ſecure and influence the Election, often ſent for the Dean and Chapter, or ſome part of them, who ſhould be impower'd by the reſt to come to Court: And ſo likewiſe the Abbey or Convent ſent up their Prior, with ſome of the Senior Monks, fully commiſſion'd for that purpoſe; who meeting in the Royal Chappel, or ſome Church near it, there choſe ſuch Perſons as the King had before recommended to them, as you will ſee in this Hiſtory concerning the manner of Thomas Becket's Election to the Arch-Biſhoprick of Canterbury, as well as of his Succeſſors; and the like was alſo done in other Sees.

Vid. Will. of Malmeſ. BUT 'tis true, that in King Stephen's Reign this Prerogative received ſome Interruption; for that King, having a powerful Competitor in the Empreſs Mathilda, was obliged, for obtaining the Pope's Favour, to put all Eccleſiaſtical Matters under the Power and Juriſdiction of his Legate and the Biſhops: And therefore the King's own Brother, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, then the Pope's Legate, told him, That if the Biſhops did any thing amiſs, the King had nothing to do to judg them, but they muſt be left to the Canons; yet that the King was bound to give them an account of his late Actions.

Id. p. 101.

THUS we ſee how much this King advanced the Papal Authority, by allowing his Legate ſo large a Power, as had never been heard of before in England: And now Appeals to Rome grew very troubleſome and frequent (as our Hiſtorians complain) and the King ſo far loſt his Prerogative of nominating, or ſo much as recommending any one to a Biſhoprick, * that William Arch-Biſhop of York (tho a very good Man) was depoſed by the Pope, merely becauſe he was nominated by the King, and Henry Murdack choſen in his ſtead, without the King's Conſent or Approbation; and about this time the Right of Inveſtitures was again condemned in a Council or Synod held at Weſtminſter, A. D. 1143. by which alſo no ſecular Perſon was to lay violent hands, or impriſon any one in Holy Orders.

Chron. Gervaſ. Col. 1363.

C. Rich. Hag. Col. 327.

SUCH was the ſtate of things here, when King Henry the Second came to the Crown; and upon this Impunity of the Clergy, great Inſolences and Villanies were committed by Men in Orders under the colour of Eccleſiaſtical Liberty, or the unaccountableneſs of Clergymen for their Actions to any Civil Tribunal: Which when the King went about to reform, he was openly oppoſed by Arch-Biſhop Becket, who would not ſuffer any ſuch Perſon to be delivered to Juſtice, tho after Degradation; nay, he retracted his own Conſent to the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, wherein he had owned that Power in the Temporal Courts; for all which I refer you to the following Hiſtory.

BUT the Arch-Biſhop being afterwards murther'd, the King, to make his Peace with the Pope, was not only forced to renounce all intermeddling in the Elections of Biſhops and Abbots, but alſo to leave the Perſons of Eccleſiaſticks to be puniſh'd only by their own Ordinaries, or Abbots; ſo much did Holy Church (as they called it) then domineer over the Civil Power.

IN

IN the next Reign of King Richard the Firſt, the great Affairs of the Nation were almoſt wholly manag'd by the Pope's Legats, during his abſence in the Holy Land; and in the latter end of his time, the Pope began to take upon him to diſpoſe of the beſt Eccleſiaſtical Preferments in England, either by Tranſlations, Proviſions, or Collations.

BUT this was carried much higher after King John's Reſignation of his Crown to the Pope's Legat, to whom he did Homage, and ſwore Fealty for his Kingdoms, under a certain Tribute of a thouſand Marks per Annum: * After which Pope Innocent the Third by his Bull, not only accepted of this Reſignation, but declared, That "whereas "before theſe Kingdoms were ſubject to the Roman See in Spirituals, "they were now become ſubject in Temporals too; and from thence- "forth required an Oath of Fealty from the King himſelf, and all his "Succeſſors. But tho the King and Parliament did, in the fortieth Year of King Edward the Third, deny to pay the Pope any more Tribute, becauſe of the Invalidity of King John's Charter, as being granted without any conſent of the Great Council or Parliament; yet we muſt remember what Pope Gregory the Sixth had before wrote to the Princes of Spain, That a Kingdom once belonging to the See of Rome, can never be alienated from it; and altho the Uſe be diſcontinued, yet the Right ſtill remains.

* Vid. Odor. Reynald. A.D. 1213. n. 83. Regiſt. P. Innocent. L. 16. Ep. 131.

Greg. Ep. lib. 1. Ep. 131.

AND it is alſo certain, that King Henry the Third did Homage, and ſwore Fealty to the Pope at his Coronation; and promiſed to pay the above-mention'd Tribute, as he did ſeveral times during his Reign. However the * whole Body of the People proteſted againſt it in the "Council of Lyons, as a Grievance, which was extorted by the Roman "Court unjuſtly in a time of War, and to which the Nobles of the "Kingdom had never given their conſents, nor ever would. But whatever opinion the Nobles were of, the Pope had the Biſhops ſure to him, for upon his Meſſage to them ſome time after, they all ſet their Hands to a Manuſcript of King John's Charter, becauſe the Original was then loſt or burnt: which ſo highly provoked the King, that he ſolemnly ſwore, he would ſtand up for the Liberty of the Kingdom, and never pay the Tribute more whilſt he breathed. But he had not Courage enough to keep his word: For notwithſtanding all the late Complaints made by the Engliſh Deputies in the Council of Lyons, of the infinite number of Italians who were then beneficed among them, and that more Money went out of England into Italy every year, than the King's Revenues amounted to; and that the Pope's Legates grew every day more intolerable, and by their Reſervations and Proviſions, and one Trick or other, the Patrons were defrauded of their reaſonable Penſions; and whoever would not preſently ſubmit, his Soul was immediately put into the Devils Cuſtody by Excommunication: Notwithſtanding, I ſay, all theſe Complaints, the Pope goes on in the ſame way with them, and reſolved to try how much the Aſſe's back would bear without kicking. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors go away highly incenſed from the Council, and reſolved to defend their own Rights; but they yet wanted a Prince of Spirit enough to head them. Before this time the Inſolence of the Roman Clergy was grown ſo intolerable to the Nation, that the Nobility and Commonalty joyned together in a Reſolution to free themſelves from this Yoke, and threatned the Biſhops to burn their Goods if they went about to defend them; they ſent abroad their Letters to ſeveral places, with a Seal with two Swords; between which were written Ecce duo Gladii, in abuſe of the Roman-Court; and it ſeems they deſtroyed the Goods of ſeveral Roman Clergymen; but Matt. Paris ſaith, they were all excommunicated by the Biſhop of London and ten Biſhops more: although Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, the Biſhop of London was cited to Rome, for favouring them, and having his Purſe well emptied was ſent home again.

Mat. Weſtminſter, A.D. 1232.

IT ſeems the Pope was ſo nettled at the Remonſtrance of the Engliſh Nobility at the Council of Lyons, that he entred into a ſecret conſultation with the King of France, either to depoſe the King of England, or to bring him wholy to his will, ſo that neither he nor his People ſhould ſo much as dare to mutter againſt the Oppreſſions of the Roman Court: and the Pope offered the utmoſt aſſiſtance of his Power for it, but the King of France declined the employment. However the Pope goes on with his Work, and grants a Bull for raiſing ten thouſand Marks out of vacant Benefices in the Province of Canterbury; which ſo incenſed the King, * that he iſſued out a Proclamation, that whoſoever brought any Bulls of Proviſion from Rome, ſhould be taken and impriſoned: but this did little good, ſaith Matt. Paris, becauſe of the fickle and uncertain humour of this King. The † ſame year a Parliament was called about the intolerable Grievances of the Roman Court; which yet had no effect, becauſe many of the Biſhops favoured the Pope's Party: But at the Parliaments next meeting at Wincheſter, the Ambaſſadors were newly returned from the Pope, who gave a lamentable account of their Ambaſſy, viz. that inſtead of any redreſs, the Pope plainly told them, the King of England kicks and plays the Frederick (whom he had lately depoſed from the Empire in the Council of Lyons) the King hath his Council, and I have mine, which I will follow; and withal * they ſay'd, they were ſcorned and deſpiſed as a company of Schiſmaticks for daring ſo much as to complain. Upon this the King iſſues out another Proclamation, that no Money ſhould be ſent out of England to the Pope: At which his Holineſs was ſo enraged, that he ſent a ſevere Meſſage to the Biſhops of England under the pain of Excommunication and Suſpenſion, to ſee his Money punctually paid to his Nuntio, by ſuch a day in London; and at laſt the King by the perſwaſion of the Biſhop of Worceſter and ſome others, fairly yields, and gives up the Cauſe to the Pope.

AFTER this the Pope ſends for a third part of the Profits of all Benefices from Reſidents, and half from Non-Reſidents throughout England, with an Italian Gentleman called a non obſtante, that almoſt undid the Nation: the Clergy meet at London about it, and make a grievous Remonſtrance of their ſad condition, declaring, that the whole Kingdom could not ſatisfy the Pope's Demands; but it ſeems the Biſhops brought the Inferior Clergy to their Beck againſt the conſent of the King and Parliament.

Id. p. 719.

THE next Year the Parliament made another Remonſtrance of the Grievances of the Clergy and People of England, which they ſent to the Pope and Cardinals; wherein they declare, that it was impoſſible for them to bear the Burdens laid upon them; that the King's neceſſities could not be ſupplied, nor the Kingdom preſerved, if ſuch vaſt Payments were made; that the Goods of all the Clergy of England could could not make up the Sum demanded: but all the effect of this, was only a Promiſe, that for the future the King's leave ſhould be firſt deſired; which, ſaith Matthew Paris, came to as much as nothing. By which we may judg of the miſerable condition of this Nation under the intolerable Uſurpations of the Court of Rome, during the long and uncertain Government of this Pious but Weak Prince, with whoſe Reign I conclude this Volume.

THE General Hiſtory OF ENGLAND BOTH Eccleſiaſtical and Civil.

VOL. II. BOOK I.

The Reign of King William I. commonly called the Conqueror.

SINCE we are now arrived at a Period, in which the violent Entrance of a Foreign Prince, and the coming over, and ſetling of ſo many Strangers in this Kingdom, produced ſo great a Change in the Laws, Cuſtoms, and Manners of the Engliſh Nation: It will not be amiſs in the firſt place to give you William of Malmeſbury's Account of the difference between the Engliſh and Norman way of Living, that ſo you may be able to make a better Judgment of the Change which was introduced by the Latter. * Hiſt. Lib. 3. p. 10.

An Account of the old Engliſh way of living.

It was the manner, ſays he, of the Engliſh Nobility and Gentry of thoſe Times to live in mean Houſes, and to ſpend the greateſt part of their Revenues on good Chear and Drink, in both which they were Intemperate: As for their Habits, they uſed ſhort Coats reaching but to their Knees, wearing their Hair cropt, loading their Arms with gold Bracelets, and ſtaining their Skins with various marks, though in what manner it was done he does not inform us.

The manners of the Normans.

As for the Normans, he deſcribes them to have been very curious in their Cloaths, choice in their Diet, but without Exceſs; being a People uſed to War, and ſcarce knowing how to live without it; quick in aſſaulting their Enemy, and if open force could not prevail, they would either over-reach them by Trick and Stratagem, or corrupt them with Money; they built large Edifices, though they lived in them at a moderate Expence; they were apt to envy their Equals, and desired to surpass their Superiors, yet defended those that were Subject to them from the violence of Strangers; they were, whilst pleas'd, faithful to their Lord, yet would easily renounce their Fidelity on a slight occasion, judging of their Perfidy according to Success, and changing Sides for Advantage; yet being very Humane, they treated Strangers with the same Civility and Respect as they did themselves, nor did they disdain to marry with those that were Subject to them; and this must be own'd for their Honour, that by their coming hither they revived the Discipline of the Christian Religion, then almost extinct in England: Whence (as our Author observes) you might see Churches new built in the Towns and Cities, and Monasteries erected after a nobler way of Architecture, insomuch that the whole Country began to flourish in a better manner.

The Advantages of the English Nation by the coming in of the Normans.

These were the Advantages the Nation reapt in general by this Change, though it proved destructive to several Noble Families; to which we may also add, That the English Nation had before been but little known abroad for Atchievements either of Peace or War, their Princes seldom or never making Invasions upon their Neighbours; nor do we read of any Foreign Expedition by the English, unless when King Cnute made use of their Assistance in his Wars against the Swedes, as has been already related in the former Volume. But you will find in this, that the English Nation under the Conduct of their Princes of the Norman Race made a greater Figure abroad, and in a short time conquer'd that Country by which they had been before subdued.

But since the coming in of the Normans was the cause of so many and such great Alterations, it is fit we should say something more of their Nation, of which (as we have hinted somewhat already, so) we shall from Cambden's Introduction to his Britannia go on to give you a short Account of the Original of this Nation, and how they came to be first settled in Normandy.

Their Original.

As in former Ages the Franks first, and afterwards the Saxons, that came out of the North-East parts of Germany, for many years plagu'd Gaul and Britain with their Piracies, and Invasions; so in succeeding Times the Danes first, and then the Normans following the same method, came from the same Coasts; and had the like Success over the Franks and English-Saxons; as if Providence had so order'd it, that those Countries should constantly produce, and send forth a Race of men to Conquer a great part of France and England, and to establish new Kingdoms in them.

The Normans whence deriv'd.

These Normans took their names from the Northern Parts from whence they came, (for Normandy signifies no more than the Country of Northern men) in which Sense they are likewise term'd in * Saxon, Nordleudi, i. e. Northern People, as being a mixt multitude of Norwegians, Swedes and Danes, that in the time of Charles the Great carried on their Piracies after such a barbarous manner, both in Friseland, England, Holland and France, as made that † Prince, when he saw their Vessels in the Mediterranean, to cry out with a deep sigh, and with tears in his Eyes: How am I troubled that they should venture upon this Coast, even while I am living? And I foresee what a plague they are like to prove to my Successors, and therefore in the publick Prayers and Litanies of the Church there was afterwards inserted this Clause; From the fury of the Normans, Good Lord deliver us: * And at last they brought the the French to ſuch extremities, that Charles, Sirnamed the Bald, was forced to buy a Peace of Haſting, the Chief Commander of theſe Norman Pirates, with the Gift of the County of Chartres; and Charles the Groſſe gave Godfrid the Norman part of Neuſtria with his Daughter in Marriage; ſo that by force of Arms they fixed themſelves near the mouth of Seine, in thoſe parts which formerly (by corruption) had been called Neuſtria, as being part of Weſtraſia, (for ſo the Writers of the middle Age term it) by the Germans ſtil'd Weſtenrich (i. e. the Weſtern Kingdom) containing all that lies between the Loire and the Seine, to the Seaward. Whence you may obſerve that the Normans had ſeized great part of Neuſtria, before its laſt Invaſion and total Conqueſt, by Rollo the Norman or Norwegian, Anno Dom. 910, and Charles the Simple, King of France, being at laſt forced to make Peace with him, granted him this Country in Fee, together with his Daughter in Marriage, and then it firſt began to be called Normandy.

Anno Dom. MXXXI.

Rollo firſt Duke of Normandy.

This Rollo, who at his Baptiſm was named Robert, is by ſome thought to have turn'd Chriſtian out of deſign only, but by others, not without Deliberation and Piety; theſe latter add, that he was moved to it by God in a Dream, which ſounding ſo like a Legend, I ſhall not trouble my Reader with it; only this much is certain, that Rollo then became a Chriſtian, and all his Followers with him.

Anno Dom. MXXXII.

This Prince had a Son named William, who ſucceeded him, and was called Longa Spata, from a Long Sword he us'd to wear, and this William's Son was Richard, the firſt of that name, who was ſucceeded by his Son, and Grand-child both likewiſe Richards; but Richard the Third dying without Iſſue, (and by Poiſon as was ſuppos'd) his Brother Robert ſucceeded to the Dukedom: This Prince, after about eight years Reign, being touched in Conſcience for the death of his Brother, (of which it ſeems he thought himſelf guilty) reſolved to expiate that offence by a Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem; but before he undertook it, he ſummon'd the Eſtates of Normandy to Feſcamp, and acquainted them with his deſign; and to ſecure the Succeſſion in his Family, he ſhewed them a young baſe Son of his, called William, whom he had begot upon one Arlotta, the Daughter of a Skinner of Falaiſe; (whom he had for ſome time kept inſtead of a Wife) this Child he earneſtly * intreated them to own for his Succeſſor, telling them, that tho' he was yet in his tender years, he doubted not but they ſhould have great cauſe to rejoice in him; whereupon the Eſtates freely agreed to elect him for their Prince, immediately ſwearing fealty to him, as Succeſſor to his Father.

The Succeſſors of Rollo.

Anno Dom. MXXXIII

* Guil. Pictav.

William, ſirnamed the Baſtard, declar'd Succeſſor to his Father Duke Robert.

Duke Robert, having thus obtain'd his deſires, committed his Son to careful Tutors, and having ſettled the Government of the Country during his Abſence, as well as he could, immediately began his Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, and performed it; but in his Return home he died at Nice in Bythinia, being (as were alſo the reſt of his Predeceſſors) a Prince of great Valour and Perſonal worth, ſo that out of that love and reſpect his Subjects bore him, all things continued in Peace and Tranquillity, ſo long as they thought him alive; yet no ſooner did they receive the news of his death, but they fell into great tumult and diſorder, by reaſon of the contending Factions of the Nobility, ſome of whom being nearly related to the late Duke, thought themſelves to have a better Title to the Dutchy than this Boy, whom they looked upon as a Baſtard.

Who then went to the Holy Land, but died in his Return.

Anno Dom. MXXXIV

Anno Dom. MXXXIV

But ſince he proved afterwards ſo great a Prince, it will not be amiſs to give you a ſhort view from Will. of Malmesbury, and Tho. Walſingham's Ypodigma Neuſtriæ, and other Writers, of the principal Actions of his Life, before he obtained the Crown of England.

* Now Eu in Normandy.

Gilbert Count of * Ou, who had been appointed Tutor to this young Prince by the Duke his Father, (tho' under the protection of Henry King of France) performed his Truſt with great Fidelity; but upon the news of the Duke's death (as you have heard) the People's Love and Dutiful Affection, quickly changed; ſo that all the Noblemen began to fortify their Towns and Caſtles, and to ſeek all occaſions of quitting their Allegiance to the young Prince; by which means Count Gilbert had much ado to defend his Right againſt them; and at laſt he being ſlain by one Ralph his Couſin, the whole Country became broken and divided; Civil Diſſentions, Robberies, Murders, and Burning of Towns were every where practiſed, inſomuch that Solomon's ſaying was remarkably made good, Wo be to that Land whoſe King is a Child.

* Will. Gemet.

The firſt that preſumed openly to queſtion his Title, was * Roger de Tony, Standard-bearer of Normandy, who was deſcended from Malehulein Unkle to Rollo the firſt Duke, and an Adventurer with him in the Conqueſt. This Roger being newly return'd out of Spain, (where he had performed great things againſt the Saracens) and finding Duke William then but a Child, to have lately ſucceeded Robert his Father, was much diſpleaſed at it, and ſcorned to obey him, ſaying, that a Baſtard ought not to rule over the Normans: Whereupon confederating with divers other Conſpirators againſt the young Duke, he entred the Territory of Humphry de Vetulis, deſtroying it with Fire and Sword. But Roger de Beaumont, Humphry's Son, encountred Roger de Tony with what Forces he could raiſe, and with ſuch good ſucceſs, that he routed his Army, and ſlew both him and his two Sons, Helbert and Elinant.

Who was firſt oppoſed by Roger de Tony.

As alſo by Guy Count de Vernon, and others.

The reſt, who after him gave Duke William any diſturbance, were Guy, Count de Vernon, and Brion a Burgundian by Nation, Grand-ſon to Duke Richard the Second by his Daughter, who, (though bred up with Duke William, and obliged to him for many favours, yet) unmindful of theſe benefits, combined with Nigel, Viſcount of Conſtantine *, Radulph, Viſcount of Tembray, and other Noblemen of that Country, and raiſed a dangerous Rebellion againſt the young Duke, in which War the ſeveral Towns and Caſtles that were taken and retaken on either ſide are too tedious to relate. But in ſhort, the King of France, not being unmindful of the Duke his Father's Kindneſſes (who had contributed very much to the making him King) and finding it now abſolutely neceſſary to aſſiſt his Pupil, raiſed an Army, and fell upon the Rebels at a place called Waleſdune, where many thouſands of them were ſlain and drowned, in paſſing over the adjoining River Olne; Count Guy himſelf narrowly eſcaping, ſaved himſelf in the Caſtle of Bryon, but was at laſt forced to ſeek for Peace, and within a ſhort time after quitting the Country came to an untimely End.

* Now call'd Cotantin.

Anno Dom. MXLVII.

The Battel of Waleſdune, wherein the Rebels were routed. Ypodig. Neuſtriæ, 434.

Sometime after this Geoffrie, Sirnamed Martel, Earl of Anjou, Invaded Normandy, and took the Caſtle of Damfront, which Duke William Beſieging, and finding it too ſtrong for him, blocked up, and went his way; for being told by certain Spies, that the Caſtle of Alençon might be eaſily taken, he marched towards it; but finding in a certain Fort, not far from it, ſome Soldiers in Gariſon, and having taken it by Storm, he not only only burnt it, but commanded the hands and feet of thoſe who held it, to be cut off, becauſe they had cried out when he came before it, La Pel, La Pel, (i.e. the Skin, the Skin) reproaching the Duke with the baſeneſs of his Birth, which Severity (when thoſe in the Caſtle heard of it) ſo terrified them, that they preſently ſurrendred to him: From thence he returned to Damfront, where the Beſieged hearing how he had already treated thoſe of their Party, ſtreight deliver'd up the Caſtle to him, notwithſtanding Count Geoffry had marched to its Relief with a numerous Army, and alſo made great brags in a meſſage to Duke William what feats he would do when he arrived; yet for all this he was forced to Retreat out of the Country, for the Duke not only took that place, but removing thence, ſurpriſed Hambrieres a Frontier Town belonging to Count Geoffrie, where the Duke built a Caſtle on the Bank of the River, and having ſtrengthened it with a Gariſon and ſtore of Proviſions, he returned to Rouen in Triumph.

Anno Dom. MXLVII. His Victories.

Theſe Aſſaults abroad, and Conſpiracies at home, he had paſſed over before he was full Twenty two years of Age: But now to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt future Attempts, he Summon'd an Aſſembly, or great Council of his Prelates, Barons, and Noblemen, cauſing them to renew their Oath of Fealty, and Raze their Caſtles; which being done, and all things ſettled, he Married Matilde, the Daughter of Baldwin, the Fifth Earl of Flanders, though not without great trouble; for his Unkle Mauger, Archbiſhop of Rouen ſoon after Excommunicated him for Matching within the forbidden Degrees of Conſanguinity, ſhe being the Daughter of Eleanor, who was Daughter to Duke Richard the Second, and ſo his Father's Siſter's Daughter; to expiate which Offence (upon a Diſpenſation obtained from Pope Victor) they were enjoined the Building of certain Hoſpitals for Blind People; and Two Monaſteries, the One for Men, the Other for Women, which were both Erected at Caën.

He cauſes the Eſtates of Normandy to renew their Fealty to him.

Marries the Daughter of the Earl of Flanders.

Sometime after this, William, Count of Arque, the Duke's Unkle (but baſe born) who had been always changeable and unfaithful, raiſing another Rebellion, Fortified the Caſtle of Arque againſt him, having corrupted thoſe to whoſe charge the Duke had committed it; but he quickly marching thither, Beſieged his Enemy therein, and blocking it up by raiſing a ſtrong Fort before it, preſently marched off to more important Undertakings; for he knew that Henry King of France being now jealous of his ſucceſs, was about to bring Relief to the Beſieged; and though the Duke declin'd meeting with him in open Field, yet the King at length (things going ill on his ſide) was forced to return into France; whereupon the Count d' Arque being cloſely Beſieged, and almoſt Famiſhed, was forced to ſurrender the Caſtle, his Life only being granted him.

Is aſſiſted by Henry I. King of France.

But King Henry did not indulge his eaſe, for being vexed that Duke William had thus gained the better of him, he raiſed a great Army, and with it Invaded Normandy in Two Bodies, which obliged Duke William alſo to divide his Forces in like manner, and marching gently toward the King's Camp, that then lay in the County of Eureux, ſo ſtreightned him, that he gave him neither leave to fight, nor yet to waſte the Country before him; whilſt the Duke's Commanders, Robert Count d' Eu, and Hugh de Montfort, with others, ſate down before before Mortimer Caſtle, to ſtop the progreſs of Count Odo the King's Brother, who engaging in a Fight, and making ſmall Reſiſtance, for the Number of his Forces (as not being able to bear the ſhock of the Normans) firſt turn'd his back and fled, whilſt Guy Earl of Pontieu was there taken Priſoner, together with many others of great quality.

* W. M. p. 97.

* So ſoon as Duke William received this news, he immediately cauſed it to be proclaimed near the King's Tent; which when he had heard, after ſome days ſtay in Normandy, he retired into France; and not long after, Ambaſſadors paſſing between them, a Peace was concluded upon theſe Conditions, "That the Priſoners taken by the Duke ſhould be "diſcharged, and that he ſhould alſo reſtore to Count Geoffrie what-"ever had been taken from him.

Idem. ib.

It would be tedious and unneceſſary to relate how great the Quarrels were between theſe Two Princes, and how Duke William ſtill got the better of him, and that with ſuch a wonderful preſumption of ſucceſs, that he ſcorned to ſet upon his Enemies by ſurprize, and before he had ſent word what day he would give them Battle; the greatneſs of his Courage contemning the more cautious, though ſafer method of Fighting uſed in our times.

Duke William's Generoſity towards his Enemies.

I ſhall paſs by the particular Relation of the next War between that King and the Duke, and how the former breaking the League he had lately made, again Invaded Normandy, and came as far as the River Deive, bragging, that only the Ocean ſhould ſtop the progreſs of his Arms. Duke William, who found himſelf (by reaſon of this late diſſembled Peace) extremely ſurprized, was forced to retire for a while; but watching his Advantage, he ſoon ſet upon one part of the King's Forces as they were going over the River, whilſt the other part of them who were already got over, were not able to aſſiſt them; and he gave him ſuch a terrible Defeat, that moſt of the French Forces were either cut off, or taken Priſoners; whereupon the King was obliged with all ſpeed to retire out of Normandy; and after this France ſtood in dread of nothing more than to provoke the Norman Courage; but the haſty death of King Henry, as alſo of Count Martel not long after, put an end to theſe quarrels. I ſhould have been more exact in ſetting down the particular years when theſe great Actions were done, had Guil. Gemet. Ordericus Vitalis, and Walſingham in his Ypodigma Neuſt. thought fit to Note them.

† Claims the Earldom and City of Mans as his Inheritance, and takes the City of Mans.

† But I cannot here omit the War which the Duke made ſome years after upon the Earldom and City of Mans, to which he laid claim by the Teſtament of Hugh the laſt Earl thereof: When the City rather inclining to take Walter Earl of Medant for their Prince, were made dearly to repent of their Error, the Town being taken, and all the Caſtles throughout the whole Country ſubdued, in which the Duke placed ſufficient Gariſons to reſtrain their Inſolence for the future; ſo having taken the Oath of Fidelity from the Subjects of that Country, he returned home with Honour. This was the laſt Expedition the Duke made before his coming over into England, being about the time that Earl Harold was driven into the Country of Pontieu, as you have already heard; and though Duke William made another Expedition into Britain, Earl Alan, then but in the prime of his Youth, was ſo afraid of him, that coming to him of his own accord, he yeilded himſelf and his Country to his Diſcretion.

Some

Some years before the death of King Edward the Confeſſor, [1.] Ingulph relates, that Duke William found leiſure to come over to viſit his Coſin King Edward with a great Retinue, and that the King received him very Honourably, and entertaining him here for ſome time, carried him on Progreſs to ſhew him the principal Cities and Caſtles of the Kingdom; ſo that in all probability he came upon ſome more important Affair than a meer Viſit; but yet for all this, the ſame Author tells us, That though the Duke had ſome hopes of his Succeſſion to the Crown, yet there was then no mention made of it: So that the time when the King declared the Duke to be his Succeſſor is very uncertain; for as for his aſſuring him of it about a year before his Death, by Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, it muſt needs be a miſtake, That Archbiſhop being deprived and dead long before, as has been already ſhewn in the former Volume; only this we may depend on for Truth, That King Edward did ſometime before his Deceaſe really nominate Duke William for his Succeſſor, or elſe he could never have had the confidence to have pretended it. Anno Dom. MLIV. [1.] P. 510.

For this year King Edward deceaſing, Duke William demanded the Crown from Harold, and being refuſed ſuch his reaſonable demand, he Invaded England, and meeting with Harold near Haſtings, fought that bloody Battel ſo fatal to the Engliſh, in which that King was ſlain, as has been already related; ſo that beginning to continue the thread of our Hiſtory, and report from Guil. Pictavienſis, (who was then one of Duke William's Domeſtick Clerks, or Chaplains) what was perform'd by the Duke in purſuance of his Victory. Anno Dom. MLXVI.

The day after the Battel above-mentioned, he commanded the dead Bodies to be buried, which being performed, he purpoſed to make the beſt advantage he could of his ſucceſs, and therefore like a wiſe General, before he proceeded any further, reſolved not to leave any ſtrong place untaken behind him; ſo having left a ſufficient Gariſon in the late built Fort at Haſtings, he marched from thence to Romney, and revenged himſelf upon the inhoſpitable Inhabitants of that place, for the ſlaughter of ſome of his Men, who by a miſtake had landed there. Will. Pictav. p. 204. His Actions after the Victory.

[2.] He continued his march along the Coaſt as far as Dover, whither a great multitude of People of thoſe parts had fled for Refuge, as to a place, which, by reaſon of the ſtrength of its Caſtle, was then eſteemed impregnable; yet all theſe upon the firſt approach of the Conqueror without making any Defence, tamely yielded to mercy; after which beſtowing about Eight days in the further Fortification of the Caſtle, and leaving there his Sick Men, who had many of them been taken with the Bloody Flux, by reaſon of the too much freſh Meat they had eaten; he marched from Dover towards London, when not far off the Kentiſhmen came in to him of their own accord, Swearing Fealty, and giving Hoſtages for the performance; whereupon the City of Canterbury preſented him with her Submiſſion by certain Deputies ſent for that purpoſe: This Relation being made by ſo faithful an [3.] Author and Eye Witneſs of theſe Tranſactions, may ſerve ſufficiently to confute that plauſible (but fictitious) Story related by Thomas Spot, Monk of the Abby of St. Auguſtine's in Canterbury, in his Manuſcript Hiſtory of the Abbots of that Abby, and which is alſo from him repeated by William Thorne in his [4.] Hiſtory of the ſame Abbots, [2.] Id. ib. Dover Caſtle and Canterbury ſurrendred to him. [3.] Guil. Pictav. [4.] Vid. Decem Scriptor. Col. 1786.

Anno. Dom. MLXVI.

Abbots, who both ſay, that after the Battel of Haſtings, Stigand the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Egelſin the Abbot of St. Auguſtine's, being the chief Perſons of Kent, and ſenſible that (though as yet there were no Villains in England) they ſhould all be now in Bondage to the Normans, they ſummon'd the whole Country, and ſhewed them their imminent danger, the inſolence of the Normans, and the ſad condition of the Slavery they were like to be put under; whereupon they unanimouſly reſolved, rather to die fighting than loſe their Country's Liberties, and ſo they choſe the Archbiſhop and the Abbot for their Leaders, and at a ſtated day they all met at Swaneſcomb, and there hiding themſelves in the neighbouring Woods, with their Boughs in their hands, they beſet the way, carrying every one of them a green Bough in his hand.

[5.] Id. ib.

The next day as the Duke was Marching near Swaneſcomb, he ſeemed amazed to behold a [5.] moving Wood, as he thought, approaching towards him; and at the ſame time the Kentiſhmen betook themſelves to their Arms, whilſt the Archbiſhop and Abbot went directly to the Duke, and ſaluted him with theſe or the like Expreſſions, viz. "Behold, "Sir, the Kentiſhmen are here come out to meet you, being willing to "receive you as their Leige Lord upon this condition, That they "may for ever enjoy their ancient Laws and Liberties; which if de-"nied, they denounce War againſt you, and are here ready to defend "them. The Norman Duke perceiving himſelf in this ſtreight, wiſely complied with their Requeſt, and Hoſtages being given on both ſides, the Kentiſhmen directed the Normans the way to Rocheſter, and delivered up the whole County to him, with the Caſtle of Dover. And it is to this Action that Authors aſcribe the cuſtom of Gavelkind, and the reaſon why there were no Villains in Kent in their times.

Gavelkind in uſe before Duke William's coming here.

But the learned Mr. Somner in his Treatiſe of Gavelkind has, one would think, ſufficiently confuted this Relation, not only proving that there were Villains in Kent long before Duke William's coming over, but alſo that Gavelkind was in uſe there before that time; and we have already ſhewed from the Authors abovementioned, that the Duke did not immediately march towards London before he had taken Dover, which was not ſurrendred to him by Compoſition as theſe Monks report; not to mention the improbability of Green Boughs in the beginning of November when Duke William marched that way. So that though this Story has been made uſe of by divers Writers, yet it is certainly no better than a Monkiſh Fiction, to magnify the Valour of their Abbot and the Kentiſhmen. So that we may now return again to our Hiſtory, which the ſame [1.] Author thus continues.

The Story examined and diſproved.

[1.] Guil. Pictav. p. 205.

The Duke being now come as far as a place called Fracta Turris, the Broken Tower, (where it was we know not now) he received Intelligence, that Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with the Earls Godwin and Morchar, and they backed by the City of London and its Mariners, intended to ſet up Edgar Atheling for their King, whereupon the Duke reſolved to make what haſt he could to prevent them, and ſo marching towards London, encamped not far from thence; but ſome Troops ſallying out upon the Duke's Forces, he detatched Five hundred Norman Horſe, who ſoon drove them back over the Bridge into the City, with the Slaughter of a great number of them.

Received Intelligence that the Engliſh were about to make Edgar Atheling King.

Marches towards London but finding himſelf unable to take it,

[2.] But

But the Duke, not being able as yet to enter the Town, was reſolved, firſt to ſubdue the Countries lying South-Weſt on the other ſide of the Thames; ſo having fired all the Buildings (which we now call Southwark) lying on that ſide the River, he marched towards Wallingford, whither Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and divers of the Engliſh Nobility followed him, and, renouncing Prince Edgar, made their Peace with the Norman, and received him for their Sovereign. And thus far theſe Foreign Writers and Ours agree. Anno Dom. MLXVI.

[2.] Id. Ib. Marches into Berkſhire. Archbiſhop Stigand and the Engliſh Nobility come to Wallingford, and there ſubmit to him.

But Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden, more at large relate, that Duke William marching clean through Suſſex, Kent, Hampſhire, Middleſex, and Hertfordſhire, abſolutely reduced thoſe Counties to his Obedience; nor ceaſed he burning of Towns, and killing the Inhabitants, until he came to a place called Beorcham (being that which we now call Berkhamſtead) where Aldred Archbiſhop of York, Wulſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, with Edgar Atheling himſelf, and other Noblemen, finding it in vain any longer to reſiſt, quitted London, and ſubmitting themſelves, Swore Fealty to the Duke, and upon their giving Hoſtages, he made a firm * League, or Contract with them; nevertheleſs he ſtill permitted his Men to Burn and Plunder all the way they marched.

Now this muſt be underſtood of ſuch places as had not yet ſubmitted to him, otherwiſe it had not only been unjuſt, but alſo impolitick to deſtroy thoſe who had already yielded. Note.

The Feaſt of Chriſtmas now approaching, Duke William with all his Army marched up towards London, that ſo he might be there acknowledged King, the Chief Men of the City going out to meet him; at which time all the Biſhops and Lay Nobility requeſted, That he would accept the Crown, ſaying, That they had been always accuſtomed to Obey Kings, and therefore they would accept him for their Lord and King; whereupon the Duke adviſing with thoſe who had accompanied him in this Expedition, and of whoſe Prudence, as well as Courage he had had long experience, he communicated to them the main Obſtacles that moved him to deny their Requeſt; for he alledged, that at preſent his Affairs were diſturbed and unquiet, and that many continued ſtill in Arms, therefore he rather deſired to ſee the Kingdom better ſettled before he accepted of ſo great a Dignity, and (which if God thought fit he ſhould attain to) he deſired his Wife might be Crown'd with him.

[3.] Guil. Pict. p. 205. Brompton's Chron.

[4.] Id. Ib. He is deſired by all Parties to be Crowned King.

[4.]But his intimate Counſellors diſſuaded him by all means from theſe delays, becauſe they very well knew the Army deſired nothing more than his Coronation; and Haimar of Aquitain, One of his Chief Commanders, who was both Eloquent and Valiant, farther told him, that the common Soldiers were never conſulted in ſuch Debates, nor was there need of any long deliberation about that which every one deſired might be ſpeedily performed: So the Duke having well weighed all theſe matters within his own Breaſt, conſented at laſt to the requeſt of ſo many ſeveral Parties, who at once unanimouſly deſired the ſame thing, hoping that as ſoon as he ſhould have taken upon him the Title of King, he could the more eaſily cruſh all thoſe who might preſume to Rebel againſt him; yet e're he would enter London, he ſent ſome of his Men before, to build a Fortreſs that ſhould ſecure the City, and others were diſpatched to prepare all things befitting a Royal Coronation.

Anno Dom. MLXVI. tion. So that all danger being now over, he for ſome time took his pleaſure in Hunting and Hawking, and did not return to Town untill a little before Chriſtmaſs.

He abhors the Name of a Tyrant.

Brompton's Chronicle farther informs us, That the Duke abhorring the Name of a Tyrant, much rather deſired the Title of a Lawful Prince, and therefore at firſt ſeem'd willing to be Crown'd by Archbiſhop Stigand, but he (as ſome relate) refuſing to lay his hands on a Cruel Man, and the Invader of another's Right, could by no means be perſuaded to do it; wherefore William, when he came to be King, though he ſeem'd to pay him great Reſpect, yet could never afterwards endure him; but this ſounds like the invention of ſome Engliſh Monk that loved not King William's Memory; for what Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham both affirm, is much more probable, viz. That Archbiſhop Stigand then ſtanding accuſed to the Pope for not having obtained his Pall Canonically, Duke William therefore refuſed to be Crown'd by him.

Anno Dom. MLXVII. But leaving theſe Circumſtances, all [5.] Writers agree, That on the day of Chriſt's Nativity he was ſolemnly Crown'd King in the Abby-Church at Weſtminſter, the manner of which I ſhall here give you at large from the abovementioned Guil. Pictavienſis: The day of his Coronation being now come, Aldred, Archbiſhop of York, who was to perform this Ceremony (for being a Wiſe Man he thought it beſt to yield to the times, and ſubmit to Divine Providence) in a handſome but ſhort Speech, firſt asked all the Engliſh there preſent, whether they did Conſent to have the Duke Crown'd King, who all chearfully, and with one voice, gave their Aſſents; in the mean time the Biſhop of Conſtans, making a ſpeech in French to the Normans to the ſame effect, asked likewiſe their conſent.

The Duke is Elected.

William being thus * Elected King, Archbiſhop Aldred ſet the Crown upon his Head, and placed him on the Throne in the preſence of all the Biſhops, Abbots, and Lay Nobility; and the old Book of † Ely, as alſo Florence of Worceſter, gives us the Form of the Coronation-Oath which was then taken by him (‖ being the ſame in effect with that of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings) Swearing at the High Altar before all the Clergy and Laity, "That he would Protect the Holy Church and "its Governors (i. e. the Biſhops) That he would Govern all the "People Subject to him prudently and juſtly; That he would ordain "and keep right Law, and wholly forbid all Rapines and unjuſt Judg-"ments; to which [1.] William of Malmesbury alſo adds, "That he "would behave himſelf mercifully towards his Subjects, and would "Govern both the Engliſh and French by the ſame equal Law.

* Electus in Regem. And then Crown'd King.

From whence we may obſerve, That this Prince was ſo far from claiming as a Conqueror, that he accepted the Crown upon the ſame conditions, and took the like Oath which the Saxon Kings, his Predeceſſors, had done before.

Nor can I here omit one Circumſtance which is likewiſe related by the [2.] ſame Norman Hiſtorian, that during the Coronation, thoſe Guards of Horſe and Foot which were placed about the Church to ſecure the ſolemnity, miſtaking the great noiſe of the People's Approbation within, for ſome ſudden Tumult, raſhly ſet Fire on the City; though what the event of it was, this Author does not tell us, but only thus purſues this Relation; that after the Coronation was over, the

the new King [3.] did not act like many Princes, who indulge their Pleaſures upon their firſt Acceſſion to the Throne, but immediately began to perform Acts worthy of a King; ſo that this Prince ſeemed inflamed with a new zeal of performing great and worthy Atchievements, uſing his utmoſt endeavours, both in Divine and Secular Affairs; for in the firſt place he diſtributed a great deal of that Treaſure which had been hoarded up in King Harold's Exchequer, amongſt his faithful Friends and Followers; as alſo a great many rich Gifts which he beſtowed on the Monaſteries, and the ſeveral Alms he gave to the Poor; in the doing of which he was very much aſſiſted by the Benevolence of all the Cities, and of divers great and wealthy Men, to obtain the favour of their new Lord; he likewiſe preſented the Pope with a great Sum both in Gold and Silver, beſides that memorable Standard of King Harold, which hath been already deſcribed.

[3.] His Actions after his Coronation.

[4.] In the mean time moſt of the Monaſteries of France ſang Te Deum for his late Succeſs, to whom in gratitude he ſent Guilt Croſſes, or other rich Preſents; but Normandy was ſo tranſported with Joy, that all its Cities, Towns, and chief Monaſteries, ſent Deputies to Congratulate his Acceſſion to the Throne.

[4.] Id. Ib. Te Deum is Sung in France for King William's Succeſs.

[5.] Then after a great Eulogy given to this Prince, as if England had not been enough ſenſible of its happineſs, the ſame Author proceeds to acquaint us what the King perform'd before he left London, where he ordered all things, Juſtly, Wiſely, and Mercifully, ſome of which tended to the particular Honour and Advantage of that City, whilſt others proved highly Beneficial to the whole Nation; and in all other matters he cheifly conſulted the good of the Church and Kingdom; ſo that whatever Laws he conſtituted, it was ſtill upon the beſt and moſt prudent conſiderations, nor did any one in vain appeal to his Juſtice, though a domineering Injuſtice under a ſpecious pretence of puniſhing the Guilty, too often condemned the Innocent to get his Eſtate; yet this King (at firſt) condemned none, unleſs it were ſuch whom it had been greater injuſtice not to have puniſhed: Then he farther tells us, "How he enjoined all his Great Men to obſerve Equity "in all their Actions, and ever to regard that Eternal Monarch by "whoſe Aſſiſtance they had overcome; and that though they were "Victors, yet they ought not to Oppreſs the Conquer'd, who were likewiſe Chriſtians as well as themſelves, leſt they might by their Injuries provoke thoſe to riſe up againſt them whom they had already "ſubdued.

[5.] Id. p. 207.

The new King perform'd many things for the good of the Nation.

In the next place he reſtrain'd the common Soldiers by ſevere Edicts from violating the Chaſtity of the Women, or ſo much as frequenting common Stews and Taverns, ſince Drunkenneſs too often produces quarrels, and frequent Murthers; he alſo ſtrictly forbad all Murthers, Robberies, and Tumults; thus as he bridled the People by Arms, ſo thoſe very Arms were reſtrained by juſt Laws, appointing Judges to inflict ſevere Puniſhments upon thoſe common Soldiers who ſhould dare to tranſgreſs his Orders; and he was no more partial to his Normans, than to any other Nation at that time in his Service.

Id. Ib. Reſtrains the Inſolence of the common Soldiers.

[1.] And tho he did not approve of Stigand's continuing Archbiſhop, becauſe he judged it not to be Canonical, yet he thought it better to expect the Judgment of the Pope, than too precipitately to depoſe him himſelf; beſides he had other reaſons inducing him to comply with the

[1.] Id. p. 208. How he dealt with Archbiſhop Stigand.

Anno Dom. MLXVII. times, and therefore rising up to him, and also giving him the chief place in all solemn Processions, he still treated him with much outward respect, and the more so, because his Authority was then very great among the English; though at the same time the King was thinking with himself how he might advance to the Metropolitan See some worthy Person of a holy Life and unspotted Reputation, who might not only set a good Example to his suffragan Bishops, but be also highly Beneficial to the Church by his vigilant care over his Flock.

These were the happy beginnings of this King's Reign, but he not staying long in London, soon after his Coronation retired to a place not far off, called Berking, where he spent his time in Rural Sports, until the Fortress that had been begun at London was finished; for he saw it was absolutely necessary to Curb the fickle Humours of that great and stubborn People.

Retires out of London for some time to Berking.

[2.] [1.] W. P. ib. The Earls Edwin, Morchar, and Coxo, with many other Noblemen submit to him.

At [1.] this time also, as the same Author (with greater probability, than the other Historians) relates, That the Earls Edwin and Morchar being the greatest Men in England, both for Nobility and Power, submitted themselves to the King's Mercy, begging his Pardon for having offended him; in which they were followed by many other Noblemen of great Estates, among whom was that stout and honest Earl Coxo; to all whom (trusting to his Clemency) he restored their Estates, and having taken their voluntary Oaths of Fidelity, he received them into his Favour.

[2.] Id. ib. Goes on Progress through divers Parts of the Kingdom.

After this, [2.] he made a Progress into divers Parts of the Kingdom, every where ordering such things as were not only profitable for himself, but for his People in general; and now where-ever he went he found none to oppose him, nor the Roads any ways obstructed, all Men willingly submitting themselves to him, whilst he lookt upon the Common People with a benign Aspect, commiserating their Condition, and ordering his Men to treat them with Mercy, especially when he observed poor Widows with their little Children on their Knees imploring his Clemency.

[3.] Id. P. 208. How the King advanced Edgar Atheling.

As [3.] for Edgar Atheling, whom the English, after the fall of Harold, would have made King; to alleviate the Regret he might receive by so great a loss, he conferr'd upon him very large Possessions; and likewise gave Lands to many of the English, as a Token of his Royal Bounty, and as an Addition to the Estates they had already received, either from their Ancestors, or former Kings; he also distributed great Rewards to many of those who had been hitherto Partners of his former Dangers and Labours: Yet (says my [4.] Author) nothing was bestowed on any Frenchman, which had been unjustly taken away from any Englishman; which must be understood in the beginning of this King's Reign, for, before the middle of it, I grant it was much otherwise.

And also Rewarded his own Soldiers.

[4.] Id. ib.

Lastly, He placed strong Garisons of Frenchmen in his principal Castles, and particularly at Winchester, which our Author calls a strong and noble City, whose Citizens, as well as the Inhabitants of the adjoyning Country, were rich and daring, but unfaithful, and who could easily call in the Danes to their Assistance: Here therefore he built a strong Citadel within the Walls of it, and therein placed William Fitz-Osborn, one of the chief Commanders of his Army, and

The strong Places garison'd with Frenchmen, and divers new Castles built.

and in whose Fidelity, as having been bred up with him, he had an intire Confidence, that he might govern (under himself) the Northern Parts of the Kingdom; but as for the Castle of Dover, he committed that, together with the adjoyning Coasts and County of Kent, to Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, his half-brother by the Mother, who was one of known sufficiency both for Ecclesiastical and Secular Affairs: And here our Author runs out into mighty Eulogies upon this Prelate's great Parts and Merit; for the History was written about the beginning of this King's Reign, when as yet this Bishop stood very high in his Prince's Favour, which how he afterwards lost, you will hear in due time. Anno Dom. MLXVII.

I have been the more exact in this Account of King William's Access to the Throne, and how he carried himself when he first came to it, which I have fairly given you from Guil. Pictav. abovementioned, that so the Reader may the better Judge whither this Author (who then served him as his Chaplain) took King William for an Absolute Conqueror, or that he at that time treated the English as Slaves and Vassals; for in respect to the French Garisons, which he placed in the Castles, it was no more then what the Exigence of his Affairs then required; and if this King did afterwards behave himself more severely towards the English Nobility, they might in great part thank themselves for it, since they so highly provoked him by their frequent Rebellions. Whither King William then pretended any Claim by Conquest.

Nor can I here omit that King William, before his Return into Normandy, gave Orders for the building of that noble Monastery, called Battle-Abby, near Hastings, in Memory of that great Battle, which was there fought between himself and King Harold, and to pray for the Souls of those that were there Slain; the [4.] High-Altar of the Church being set upon that very Spot of Ground, where King Harold's Standard was taken up; others say where his Body was found. This Monastery was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Martin, and was filled with Benedictine Monks from the greater Monastery of Winchester; and it was by the King's Charter not only discharged from all dependance on that Abby, but was also thereby exempted from all Episcopal Jurisdiction whatsoever, as appears by the Charter at large, which you may see in Monasticon Angl. and though without any date, yet it could not be seal'd till above four Years after its Foundation, as appears by Archbishop Lanfranck's Subscription to it. He gives Orders for the building of Battel-Abby. [4.] Vid. Hist. MS. hujus Abbatiæ in Bib. Cot. Domitian. A 2. Printed in Monast. Angl. Vol. I. P. 311, 312. Id. ib.

I have nothing more to add concerning this Abby, but that there was here kept an ancient List of all the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Families, that came over with King William; this was called Battle-Abby-Roll, of which Stow and Hollinshed have each of them given us Copies, though with some difference as to the Names therein contained; but whither it proceeded from the difference of Copies, or mistakes of the Writers, I cannot decide. Of the List of those Noblemen and Gentlemen, that came in with King William, call'd Battel-Abby-Roll.

There is also another Catalogue of the chiefest of those Noblemen and Gentlemen, which you will find in Mr.* Foxe's Acts and Monuments, and was taken out of William Tayleur, a Norman Chronicler of good Credit; but whither right, or no, I will not affirm; since the Names of a great many Families, which were certainly French, or Norman, are not there to be found; and divers Earls and Great Men are there set down, tho we do not find that they ever came over with King Divers Copies of it, scarce any of good Authority. * Vol. 1. But [1.] the King having now ſettled his Affairs in England, as well as it was poſſible in ſo ſhort a time, reſolved to return into Normandy; and therefore having committed the Government of the Kingdom to Biſhop Odo, and Willian Fitz-Osborn abovementioned, he took his Journey to Pevenſie, where he had firſt landed, and where his Fleet then lay ready to receive him, being attended thither by moſt of the chief Men of England, as well of the Clergy as Laity; ſome of the Principal of whom he reſolved to carry over with him, being thoſe, of whoſe Power and Fidelity he was moſt Jealous; ſuch as were Archbiſhop Stigand, Edgar Atheling, with the Earls Siward, Morcar, and Waltheof, and ſeveral others of the firſt Nobility, whom he deſigned to keep as Hoſtages till his Return; ſince he very well knew, that a whole Nation is never able to Rebel, when the Perſons moſt fit and able to Head them are abſent.

And takes divers of the Engliſh Nobility over with him as Hoſtages.

[2.] Id. ib. 211. He is received at Roüen with great Solemnity. King [2.] William being happily arrived in Normandy in the beginning of March, made his Entry into Roüen in great Triumph, the whole City going out to meet him; what he did in particular, whilſt he ſtayed in Normandy, is not my Province to relate, only that in general he beſtowed great Gifts upon the principal Churches there, eſpecially that of St. Stephen's in Caën, which he himſelf had founded; he kept his Eaſter at the Abby of Feſcamp, together with a great number of Biſhops and Abbots, the new Church being then conſecrated, where alſo met him, Rodolph, the Potent Father-in-Law to the King of France, with many of the French Nobility, the handſomeſt of whoſe Youth envied the Beauty of the young Engliſh Gentlemen, whilſt others admired the richneſs and magnificence of the King's Habit, as well as thoſe of his Attendants, as alſo the number of his Silver and Gold Plate, which (according to our Author) would be incredible to relate; ſo that when theſe Noblemen returned home, they did nothing as it were but extol their magnificence, more eſpecially the Generoſity of their Maſter, who paſſed all that Summer, and the beginning of the Winter following, in his own Country.

The French Nobility come to Congratulate him.

[3.] Wil. Pictav. p. 212. How his Lieutenants uſed their Power in his Abſence. Whilſt the King thus remained in Normandy, it is fit we relate what happen'd in England during his abſence, [3.] where William Fitz-Osborn and Biſhop Odo, whom he had left here as his Lieutenants, (according to this Author) govern'd the Provinces committed to their charge with great Prudence and Juſtice, ſometimes acting ſeparately, and ſometimes joyntly, aſſiſting each other as occaſion required; but the Engliſh could neither by Fear, nor Favour, be kept in quiet, yet Ordericus Vitalis gives us another different, and (I believe) truer Account of the behaviour of theſe two Lieutenants, and the Normans, who were left in England; as that the Engliſh were extreamly treamly harraſſed and abuſed by their Inſolencies, and that the leſſer Governors of Caſtles and Places of Strength did alſo oppreſs and vex the noble as well as the middle ſort of People with great Exactions and many Contumelies; and eſpecially Biſhop Odo and William Fitz-Osborn; who being too much tranſported by Succeſs, refuſed to hearken to the Complaints of the Engliſh, ſo as to do them right; but rather countenancing their Soldiers in their Robberies and Rapines, and deflowring their Women. Anno Dom. MLXVII.

But which of theſe Reports is moſt in the right, I will not preſume to determine; but however it ſeems, as if theſe Abuſes were chiefly (if not only) in Kent, and the Countries adjacent, which were under the Government of Biſhop Odo, and thoſe were ſo great, that he thereby cauſed the Engliſh of thoſe Parts to Rebel: And ſome of the Chief of the Kentiſhmen ſent privately to Euſtace, Earl of Boloign, (a skilful Warrior) and told him, That if he would come over into England, and beſiege the Caſtle of Dover, they would joyn with him. [3.] The Earl therefore paſſing over by Night, was very like to have ſurprized the Caſtle; Biſhop Odo, and Hugh de Montfort, (who had the next Command under him) being then both abſent on the other ſide of the Thames; but the Gariſon ſallying out, and making a vigorous Defence, the Earl was forced to betake himſelf to his Ships with but a few Men, for moſt of the reſt in their Flight towards the Sea, were driven down the Rocks and Precipices, and there broke their Necks; as for the Earl himſelf, he was, for all this, not only ſome time after reconciled to the King, but alſo highly honoured and entruſted by him.

Biſhop Odo provokes the Engliſh by his Severity.

Whereupon the Kentiſhmen invited over Euſtace, Earl of Boloign.

[3.] Guil. Gemet. L. 7. C. 39.

There [4.] was alſo at this time a certain Potent Nobleman in the Borders of Wales, called Edric, (Sirnamed the Wildman or Foreſter) whoſe Lands (becauſe he refuſed to ſubmit himſelf unto the King) the Gariſon of Hereford, and Richard Fitz-Scrope, frequently waſted; but as often as they made Incurſions upon him, they were forced to retire with the loſs of a great many of their Men; therefore the better to ſecure himſelf againſt the Normans for the future, he called into his Aſſiſtance, Blethyn and Rywalhon, the two Princes of Wales; and about the Feaſt of the Aſſumption of our Lady, the ſaid Edric, together with the Welſh Forces invaded and ſpoiled the County of Hereford, as far as the Bridge over Lucge.

[4.] F. W. Edric, Sirnamed the Foreſter, holds out in the Borders of Wales.

About this time likewiſe, that Noble Earl Coxo was Slain by his own People, for continuing firm to King William, and not taking up Arms againſt him, with the reſt of his Countrymen.

About [5.] the beginning of Winter, the King having now ſettled his Affairs in Normandy, and left the Government of it to the Queen his Wife, and his Eldeſt Son Robert, (who was then in the prime of his Youth) returned into England, to prevent the Deſigns of the Engliſh and Danes; and having landed at Winchelſea went to London, where he was received with a Solemn Proceſſion, and all other tokens of Reſpect: he then treated the Engliſh Biſhops and Nobility with great Affability and outward Kindneſs, granting them whatſoever they asked, and readily hearing what they offer'd to him; he alſo cajoled the Welſh, who then made him their Addreſſes; yet he privately forewarned the Engliſh to be prepared to prevent their Treacheries; ſo that all Countries where the King had been, and where he he had placed Garisons, readily obeyed; only the Western and Northern Parts gave him some Disturbance; the occasion of which was thus.

[1.] F. W. Some Rebellions after his Return, by reason of his imposing a great Tax.

The [1.] King, not long after his Return from Normandy, laid a heavy Tax upon the English Nation, though indeed it was no other then that of Daneguelt, which had been remitted by King Edward the Confessor, as you have already heard in the former Volume; yet this being again set on foot by the Power of the King's Prerogative, without the Consent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, seems to have been the occasion of a fresh Rebellion; for first, the City of Exeter refused to swear Fealty to him, or admit of a Garison there, although they offer'd to pay him Tribute; but not being at all satisfied with this, he sent them word, That he was not used to such Subjects; therefore, though it was now Winter, he marched in Person with an Army against them, still placing the English in the Front: when he drew near the City, divers of the principal Citizens went out to meet him to Treat of Peace; and in order thereunto promised to do whatever he Commanded, and presently gave such Hostages for their performance, as the King thought fit to accept; but in the mean time, the ordinary sort of Townsmen refused to deliver up the City, whereupon he commanded his Army to make their Approaches to it; then bringing one of the Hostages before the Gate, there put out his Eyes, and beginning to batter and undermine the Walls, they within at last implored his Mercy, which he readily granted, by the Mediation of those that at first came out to him, as also of the Clegy, who all submitted themselves, confessing and excusing the Folly and Obstinacy of the Common People; so that all things were forgiven them, and they had their Goods secured from the Violence of the Soldiers, by placing Guards at the Gates to keep them out: Thus was this stubborn City after a short Siege reduced to Obedience.

The City of Exeter refuse to swear Fealty to him, or admit of a Garison.

But at last was brought to Obedience.

But Githa, Mother to King Harold, with divers others, (who had for their greater Security retired hither) fled out of the Town upon the King's first approach, and with great Riches passed over into Flanders: Then the King, having chosen a place within the Walls fit to build a Castle on, left Baldwin the Son of Earl Gilbert to see it performed, with many Soldiers, to be made a Garison; and marched into Cornwal, and having settled all things in those Parts to his satisfaction, he dismissed his Army, and returned to Winchester, there to recreate and refresh himself after so great a Fatigue.

[2.] H. H. The King then divides the forfeited Lands among his Soldiers.

The [2.] same year also, not long after the late Western Expedition, (as Henry Huntington relates) the King divided the Lands among his Norman Commanders, as well as those of other Nations; which is yet to be understood, only of the Lands of those who had been slain fighting with King Harold in the Battel of Hastings, or else had escaped out of it; as also of those who had been engaged in the late Insurrections against him; but Mat. Paris indeed says, That the King now turn'd many of the English Nobility out of their Estates, and bestowed them upon his Commanders and Soldiers; and that which was left to the Natives was clog'd with the burthen of perpetual Servitude; by which I suppose he means, that of Knight Service, which about this time began to be imposed upon all Lands held of the Crown Imposes Knight-Service upon all Lands held by Gentlemen.

Crown: And though it was in uſe among the Engliſh for ſome Lands held by the chief Nobility and Gentry before this time, yet did it not till now become the general Tenure of moſt Eſtates of Men of Quality. Anno Dom. MXLVII.

The Spring after the King's Return out of Normandy, [3.] William Gemeticenſis informs us, That he diſcovered a dangerous Conſpiracy of certain Engliſh (whom this Author calls) Robbers, and ſeem moſt likely to have been ſuch as the King had lately turn'd out of their Eſtates; their deſign was to deſtroy the King himſelf, and all his Followers, as they were to go to Church bareſoot on Aſh-Wedneſday; but theſe Conſpirators being diſcovered, fled into certain inacceſſible Places in the North Parts, and there fortified themſelves within a ſtrong Fort at the City of Durham; but however true the former part of this Relation may be, the latter cannot fall out now, (as he lays it) ſince Durham was not ſeized by the Northumbers till the year following, as you will find by and by; though it is very probable that divers of the Engliſh Nobility, who had lately loſt their Eſtates, fled into the Northern Parts, which were not then fully ſubdued, or elſe took Refuge in Scotland, and others in Denmark, where they ſollicited King Sweyn to invade England. Anno Dom. MLXVIII. [3.] Lib. 7. Cap. 40. A dangerous Conſpiracy of certain Engliſhmen diſcovered.

About [4.] Eaſter following, Mathilda, Wife to King William, arrived in England, being ſent for over by the King, her Husband, and ſoon after ſhe was Crowned Queen with the uſual Solemnities, by Aldred, Archbiſhop of York; and before the end of the Year, ſhe was brought to bed of a Son, named Henry, who was afterwards King; her two other Sons being born in Normandy before her coming over hither. [4.] F. W. The Queen ſent for over to be Crowned.

And much about this time [5.] (as Ordericus Vitalis relates, for it is found in no other Author) happen'd the firſt Rebellion of the Earls, Edwin and Morchar, the occaſion of which was thus; Earl Edwin had been promiſed by the King one of his Daughters in Marriage; but through the envious Perſuaſions of ſome of his Normans, he had not kept his Word with him, which double dealing with this young Nobleman, (who had for ſome time expected his Miſtriſs) and the late Affront he put upon him, in carrying him beyond Sea againſt his will, to be ſhewn as it were in Triumph, provoked him and his Brother Morchar now to take up Arms; and they being both very popular, many in the Northern Parts, where their Governments lay, came into their Aſſiſtance, eſpecially their Nephew Blethyn, Prince of North Wales, with a good number of Welſhmen. [5.] Page 511. The Earls Edwin and Morchar Rebel, and on what occaſion.

Upon this, King William inquired into all places of Strength, which he thought might be of Service to them for a Retreat; and to prevent their ſeizing them, fortified ſuch as he found moſt advangeous; as the Caſtle of Warwick, which he now built, and committed to the Cuſtody of Henry de Beaumont, (or de Newburgh, a Place in Normandy, where he was born) afterwards made firſt Earl of Warwick. The King at the ſame time, likewiſe, built Nottingham Caſtle, and gave the Cuſtody of it to William Pendel, a Norman, which ſo diſcouraged the Earls abovementioned, that doubting of their Succeſs, they ſoon craved the King's Mercy, and ſubmitted themſelves, and were thereupon (in outward ſhew at leaſt) received again into favour; then thoſe Engliſh at York, as ſoon as they heard this News, *Id. delivered up the Keys of the City (which they had hitherto kept for their Earl) to the King, who was then marched down on purpoſe to take it; but he ſuſpecting their Fidelity, immediately raiſed a Fortreſs in the City, placing there a Gariſon of choice Soldiers. Hereupon one Archil, a Potent Nobleman of Northumberland made his Peace with the King, and delivered his Son as an Hoſtage to him; likewiſe Egelwin, Biſhop of Durham, was now received into Favour, and by his Mediation, Conditions of Peace were offer'd to Malcolme, King of Scots, which being by him accepted, he then ſwore to a faithful Obſervance of this Peace with King William; who in his Return from this Expedition, built Caſtles or ſtrong Forts at Lincoln, Huntington, and Cambridge, placing in each of them Valiant Commanders.

The King of Scots accepts Conditions of Peace.

[1.] Saxon Chron. Sim. Dunelm. Flor. Wig. Earl Goſpatric, Edgar Atheling, and others, fly into Scotland, and are there received.

[1.] But this Peace with the Scotiſh King did not laſt long, for about Autumn following, the Earl Goſpatric, and another Northern Nobleman, called Marleſweyn, with ſeveral of the Northumbrian Nobility, (fearing they ſhould be clapped up in Priſon, as many others at that time were) taking along with them Edgar Atheling, (whom they had drawn into their Party) together with his Mother Agatha, and his Siſters, Margaret and Chriſtina; they all paſſed by Sea out of the North of England into Scotland, where being kindly received by King Malcolme, they remained all that Winter in peace.

Many Noble Scotiſh Families derive their Original from thence.

And it is to this coming in of the Northumbrian Nobility, that the Scotiſh Hiſtorians attribute the Original of ſeveral of the moſt Ancient and Noble Families in Scotland (needleſs to be here particularly recited) who having had Eſtates conferr'd upon them there, have continued in that Country ever ſince.

[2.] O. V. p. 512. Divers Norman Gentlemen return home, with the Reaſon of it.

[2.] About this time Ordericus Vitalis relates, That divers Norman Gentlemen, either being weary of England, or elſe having a mind to retire to their own Eſtates and Wives, (who it ſeems could not live longer without them) took their leaves of the King, and returned into Normandy; ſuch as were Hugh de Grentmeſnel, and Humphry de Teliol; the former, Governor of the Caſtle of Wincheſter; the latter, of the Fort of Haſtings; with many others, whom he does not name. And beſides theſe Commanders, very many Common Soldiers tired out with the perpetual Deſolations of the Country, where they ſaw nothing but Rapines and daily Slaughters committed, not only by themſelves, but by the Natives, iſſuing out of the Woods and other Retreats, and killing the Normans at unawares, deſired now to be Disbanded, that ſo they might return into their own Countries, there to live in Peace and Quiet; which requeſt was readily granted by the King, who kindly diſmiſſed them, having firſt well paid and rewarded them for their late Services. This I take notice of, to let the Reader ſee, that all Foreign Officers and Soldiers had not Lands given them in England, as ſome have (without juſt grounds) ſuppoſed.

N. B.

A great miſtake in the Chronology of the Saxon Annals.

Nor can I here omit taking notice of a great miſtake in the Saxon Annals under this Year, in which they are followed by Matt. Paris, who both make Edgar Atheling to have come with the Normans to York, and that King William marching down thither with all his Army, deſtroyed that City: which was not ſo, for neither did Edgar Atheling then invade England, nor did King William deſtroy York, which which was not burnt till the Year following, as you will ſee by and by. Anno Dom. MLXVIII

But whilſt [3.] theſe things were tranſacting, Godwin, Edmund, and Magnus, Sons of the late King Harold, coming out of Ireland, landed in Somerſetſhire, whom Eadnoth, that had been formerly Maſter of the Horſe to King Harold, being ſent to oppoſe with an Army, and joyning Battel with them, was Slain, beſides a great many others: Theſe young Princes thus obtaining the Victory, carried away a great deal of Plunder out of Devonſhire and Cornwal, and ſo returned into Ireland. [3.] F. W. The Sons of the late King Harold invade England.

And to this Invaſion, I refer that Paſſage of [4.] William of Malmesbury, when he ſays, That in the Third Year of this King's Reign, the Engliſh that had before fled into Ireland and Denmark, now invaded England, againſt whom the King ſent as General, one Ednoth (for ſo is his Name in the Margin) with an Army all of the ſame Nation; in which (ſays he) the King imitated the Policy of Cæſar, who when he had ſubdued the Gauls, made uſe of their own Arms againſt each other, whenever they rebell'd. [4.] Page 58. b.

[3.] As to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs nothing happen'd worth our notice, only that there was this Year a great Schiſm at Rome, two Popes being choſen at once, (viz.) Alexander, Biſhop of Lucca; and Cadolus, Biſhop of Parma; the former of whom clearing himſelf of Simony, which (it ſeems) was laid to his Charge, was within ſome time after generally own'd for Pope, and the latter quite laid aſide. [5.] F. W. A great Schiſm at Rome.

[4.] The King having reſolved to ſettle and reduce that Part of Northumberland, lying North of Tine, entirely to his Obedience, by ſetting a new Governor over it; to that end created Robert Cumin, a Norman, Earl of that Country, who preſently marched into the North with a ſmall Force, and came as far as Durham; near which, Egelwin, the Biſhop, meeting him, adviſed him to beware of Treachery; but he deſpiſed his good Advice, for he did not believe any one would dare to oppoſe him; but the Northumbers having before hand unanimouſly reſolved never to ſubmit to a Stranger, agreed either to kill him, or elſe to dye themſelves. But the Earl coming to Durham, ſuffered his Men to treat the People like Enemies, killing ſome of the Biſhop's Tenants; and yet for all this he was kindly and honourably received by him; but the Rebellious Northumbers being now got together, and marching all Night, came to Durham by break of Day, and forcing open the Gates, killed the Earl's Followers, they being wholly unprovided for any Defence; ſo that great Cruelty was there uſed, and the Soldiers being tired, were Slain in the Houſes and Streets; then they aſſaulted the Biſhop's Palace, in which the Earl was quartered, but finding thoſe within reſolved to defend themſelves with Arrows, they ſet fire to the Houſe, and therein burnt the Earl, and all that were with him; and there was ſo great a Slaughter that the Streets ran down with Blood, ſo that of Seven hundred Men, but one eſcaped; this cruel Maſſacre was acted on the 28th of January. Nor had the Church been preſerved, had not a ſtrong Eaſt wind riſen of the ſudden, and driven the Flames from it; which our Author makes to have been done by a Miracle of St. Cuthbert. Anno Dom. MLXIX. [4.] Id. S. D. Robert Cumin, a Norman, made Earl of Northumberland. The new Earl coming to Durham, and having uſed the People ill, is there killed.

[5.] S. D. The King ſends down an Army to revenge his Death.

[5.] As ſoon as King William heard of this Inſurrection, he ſent down a certain Commander (whom our Author does not Name) with an Army to revenge the Earl's Death, but when they came as far as Alverton, (now North Allerton) and were that Morning about to march to Durham, ſo thick a fog aroſe, that they could ſcarce ſee each other, and ſo could not find their way; whereupon fancying that this miſt was raiſed by St. Cuthbert's means, they all agreed to March back again; ſo that thoſe againſt whom they were ſent, never knew any thing of it, till after they were gone; which Relation ſounding ſo like a Legend, and not meeting with it in any other Author, I ſhall not inſiſt upon the truth of it; but for ought we can find, the Northumbrian Rebels kept Durham (though without doing the Biſhop, or his Clergy, any Injury) until the beginning of Winter following, when King William marched thither on purpoſe to take in that place.

[1.] F. W. S. D. The two Sons of Sweyne, King of Denmark, invade England. And are joyn'd by Edgar Atheling, Goſpatric, and other Noblemen.

[1.] For about the end of Auguſt, Harold and Cnute, Sons of Sweyne, King of Denmark, together with Earl Osborn, their Uncle, as alſo another Daniſh Earl, called Turkil, (being incited by the exiled Engliſh) ſailing from Denmark with two hundred and forty Ships, arrived in the Mouth of the River Humber, where Edgar Atheling, Earl Waltheof, and Merleſweyn, and divers other Noblemen, coming thither by Sea, met them; in the mean while Earl Goſpatric, with the Northumbrian Forces marched by Land to their Aſſiſtance, being all reſolved to the utmoſt to oppoſe the Normans: But ſo ſoon as Aldred, Archbiſhop of York, heard of their coming, he fell into a deep Melancholy, which brought him into ſuch a lingring Sickneſs, that about the beginning of September, he ended his Days, as he had before deſired of God, and was buried at York in the Church of St. Peter: But [2.] William of Malmesbury relates, That though this Archbiſhop once loved King William like a Son, and honoured him as his King, whilſt he uſed any Moderation towards his Subjects; ſo, when he had impoſed that inſupportable Tribute upon them already mentioned, the Archbiſhop ſent Meſſengers unto him about it, (and I ſuppoſe to put him in mind of his Coronation-Oath) who being hardly admitted, and diſmiſſed with a rugged Anſwer; the Archbiſhop immediately upon their return denounced a Curſe againſt the King, and all his Poſterity, ſaying, That he might very deſervedly beſtow his Curſe, where he had undeſervedly before beſtowed his Benediction, which when it was told the King, he ſent ſome to appeaſe him, but before they arrived, the Archbiſhop was Dead.

[2.] De Geſt. Pontif. Lib. 3. p. 271.

But firſt beſtows a Curſe upon the King and all his Poſterity.

[3.] Idem. The City of York burnt by the Normans.

But [3.] about eight days after the Biſhop's Death, the Normans who kept the Caſtles of York, fearing leſt the Houſes near them, being pulled down, might help the Danes to fill up the Ditches, ſet them all on Fire, which raged ſo violently by reaſon of a high Wind, that it ſoon burnt the whole City, together with the Cathedral Church, and the Monaſtery of St. Peter; but the Divine Vengeance ſeverely puniſhed this Barbarity, for before the City had done burning, the Daniſh Fleet arrived, and then both the Danes and Northumbers beſieging the Caſtles, quickly took them, Robert Fitz-Richard the Governor, with Three thouſand Normans being there Slain; and only William Malet, then Sheriff of Yorkſhire, his Wife, and and Two Children, and Gilbert de Gant, with ſome few others eſcaped with their Lives: then the Daniſh Fleet, together with the Northumbers, being loaded with Plunder, retired to their former Quarters. Anno Dom. MLXIX.

[4.] Ordericus Vitalis paſſes by the Death of theſe Normans, and falſely makes the Northumbers to have only Slain the Governor of the Caſtle; but that William Malet ſtill kept the City for the King, and that it was then beſieged by the Danes: but what follows is more certain, That Edgar Atheling, and the Noblemen abovementioned, preſently joyned themſelves with them, upon which ill News the King in all haſt ſent away the Queen into Normandy for her greater Security, before he would go to Chaſtiſe thoſe Rebels. [4.] Pag. 515. Ordericus's miſtake in this Relation. The King ſends away the Queen, and then Marches towards the North.

But before I relate the reſt of this warlike Expedition, I cannot omit a moſt remarkable Civil Tranſaction, that happen'd ſome time before it: For to this Year I refer, what Matthew of Weſtminſter now relates, That King William upon receiving this ill News, and perceiving the greateſt part of his danger to have proceeded from his too ſevere Uſage of the Engliſh Nobility, he was now reſolved to mollify them as much as he could, and therefore before this Northern Expedition, he ſomewhat curbed the Inſolence of his Normans, and recalling many of the Engliſh Noblemen from Baniſhment, made a firm League with them.

To this time, whilſt the King was under this Apprehenſion, we may alſo refer that conſiderable Tranſaction related by [5.] Roger of Hoveden, (though under the Reign of King Henry the II.) and which is alſo to be found in the old Chronicle of Litchfield to the ſame effect, viz. That King William in the Fourth Year of his Reign, (this very Year) by the Council of his Barons, cauſed certain Wiſe and Noble Engliſhmen, throughout all the Counties of England to be ſummoned, that he might hear from them the Laws and Ancient Cuſtoms thereof; whereupon Twelve Men were choſen from each County of the whole Kingdom for that purpoſe, who firſt took an Oath, that they would without any Prevarication faithfully ſet down their Ancient Laws and Cuſtoms, not omitting or adding any thing whatſoever; Now theſe Men being met, and beginning with the Rights of Holy Church, they delivered the Laws concerning their Liberties and Securities in the Form there ſet down; which, though they may be genuine in the moſt material Points, yet certainly have had many later Additions made to them by ſome Monkiſh Interpolator, as appears by that Copy which Hoveden has given us of them; many of which Interpolations are not found in two other very Ancient Manucript Copies of thoſe Laws, in the Cottonian-Library, and in that at Lambeth. [5.] Pag. 301. The Laws of King Edward again renew'd and confirm'd.

I ſhall now give you the occaſion of the promulgating theſe Laws, which was this: King William (ſays our Author) did more approve of the Daniſh Laws, which were obſerved in Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, and Deira, (i. e. Northumberland) where the greateſt part of the Danes and Norwegians formerly inhabited, and he would therefore fain have had them obſerved throughout his whole Kingdom, becauſe all his Predeceſſors, and moſt of the Norman Barons had come out of Norwey; but ſince R. Hoveden's Account is more particular in the reſt of this Tranſaction, then the Book of Litchfield, I ſhall from him tranſcribe it Verbatim in Engliſh. [1.] Id. p. 304.

The

The [2.] Noblemen of England (who had before delivered thoſe Laws but now mention'd) hearing that King William was reſolved to make the Daniſh and Norwegian Laws (eſpecially thoſe concerning Fines and Forfeitures) to be obſerved all over England, they thereupon were very much dejected, and unanimouſly intreated him to ſuffer them to enjoy their own Laws and Ancient Cuſtoms, in which they and their Anceſtors had lived, and been brought up, becauſe it ſeemed very hard for them to receive unknown Laws, and to judge concerning thoſe things of which they were ignorant; but the King being very hard to conſent to it, they again importuned him, beſeeching him, by the Soul of King Edward, who had bequeathed him the Kingdom, and whoſe Laws theſe were, that he would not compel them to live under other Laws, than thoſe of their own Country; thereupon the King adviſing with his Barons, did at their Intreaty conſent to it: From which time (ſays my Author) the Laws of King Edward, which had been firſt ordained by King Edgar, his Grandfather, being now confirm'd by the King's Authority, became reſpected, and obſerved throughout all England, before all other Laws of that Kingdom.

[2.] Id. Ib. The Engliſh Nobility Petion the King to be govern'd by their own Laws.

N. B.

Yet I muſt own, that this could not be literally true, ſince in all other Writers we find, That in this King's Reign, as alſo in thoſe of his Succeſſors, great Complaints of the Breaches that were made on thoſe Laws of King Edward; and that therefore King Henry the Firſt was at his Election and Coronation, particularly ſworn to obſerve them. But as for thoſe Laws, the Reader may find them at large in Hoveden and Mr. Lambard's Archaionomia, from whence I have tranſlated them into Engliſh, and are inſerted at the end of the Reign of King Edward the Confeſſor, in the former Volume of this Hiſtory; yet, that King William did not long keep his fair Promiſes he now made to the Engliſh, you will find by what he did the Year following.

But it is now time to return to Martial Affairs. After this Council or Aſſembly was over, King William having heard what was done in the North, [3.] ſwore he would quite extirpate the Northumbers, and to that end reſolved to March againſt thoſe Rebels, who were joyn'd with the Danes at York; but [4.] he was firſt obliged to go a little out of his way, becauſe the City of Oxford had, about the ſame time, likewiſe preſumed to Rebel againſt him; but ſo ſoon as he had laid Siege to it, he took it, for part of the Wall falling down of its own accord, it gave an eaſy Entrance to his Soldiers, from whence he marcht on by [5.] Nottingham towards York, and coming to Pontfract, was there forced to make ſome ſtay, the River being at that time unpaſſable, and the Bridges broken down, till one Luſoi, a Valiant Knight, diſcovered a Ford, where the King going over with his Army, marched through a rough and woody Country, till he arrived in Yorkſhire, which was then part of the Earldom of Northumberland. Where moſt of the People he put to the Sword, and laid the whole Country waſt, to prevent the Enemies harbouring themſelves there, who now with their Engliſh Confederates lay encamped at York. [1.] Here the King coming to a Battle with them, and routing the Daniſh Army, he thereby ſo daunted the Engliſh in the City, that they ſoon ſurrendred it; yet William of Malmesbury makes this Victory over the Danes and Engliſh, not to have been ſo eaſily obtain'd; but that Earl Waltheof in this Fight at York, cut off the Heads of a great many Normans one after another, as they would have forced a Gate which he took upon him to defend, when King William took that City; but whether this happen'd before, or after this Fight, is uncertain. Anno Dom. MLXIX.

Therefore [2.] Ordericus Vitalis deſerves not much credit, when he relates, that ſo ſoon as the King drew near to York, he received intelligence that the Danes were all retired from thence; but this ſeems more likely, that he left certain Officers and Commanders to repair the Caſtles, whilſt he himſelf in the mean while marched into certain Mountainous, inacceſſible Places, and purſued and drove out his Enemies that there lay lurking; ſo that his Army ſpread it ſelf for near a hundred Miles in compaſs: Nor did the King ever ſhew greater Cruelty, whilſt his Army alike deſtroyed both the Innocent and the Guilty, in which Action he is (as our Author ſays) no way to be excuſed; yet this Severity had this good effect, that [3.] the Rebels in Durham hearing the ill Succeſs of their Confederates, and fearing the Kings ſpeedy coming againſt them, retired into certain remote places by the Sea-ſide, and getting aboard ſome Ships, made a Pyratical War. [2.] Ib. What the King did after the taking of York. [3.] W. G. l. 7. c. 42. The Rebels quit Durham.

Let us now ſee what was done in the mean while in the Southern Parts of England, [4.] where during the King's Abſence in the North, the Sons of the late King Harold having procured from Dermot, King of Ireland, a Fleet of Sixty ſix Sail, with Seamen ſufficient to Man them, they again landed not far from Exeter, and like cruel Pyrates plundering and burning where-ever they came, ruin'd the Country; but Brien, Son to Eudo, Earl of Bretaign, met and fought them twice in one day, killing Seven hundred of their Men, with divers of the Iriſh Nobility, the reſt flying to their Ships, returned into Ireland, where they cauſed great Lamentation for the loſs of ſo many of their Relations. [4.] W. G. l. 7. c. 40. O. V. p. 513.

I have placed this Action here, becauſe it is ſet by our Author preſently after King William's Expedition into the North, and was certainly a different Invaſion from that which the Sons of King Harold made the Year before in the ſame Country, when they went off victorious. But to return again to the buſineſs of the North.

The King now finding it for his advantage to make a Peace with the Danes, and being very deſirous to rid the Kingdom of them, [5.] ſent privately to Earl Osbern, their General, promiſing him a great Sum of Money, and alſo permiſſion to take what Proviſions he pleaſed for his Army all along the Sea-Coaſt, provided he would quietly leave the Country, ſo ſoon as the Winter was over: which Conditions he readily embraced, though he did not (it ſeems) ſet Sail for Denmark till about Midſummer following; where as ſoon as he arrived, the King, his Brother, baniſht him that Kingdom, being ſuſpicious of his Fidelity. [5.] F. W. The King makes Peace with the Daniſh General, and gives him Money to leave the Kingdom.

Nor can I here omit a Paſſage related by [1.] Simeon of Durham, that upon the news of King William's Approach, Egelwin, Biſhop of that City, being afraid of his Indignation, and adviſing with the Elder Monks what to do, they all reſolved to take up the Body of St. Cuthbert, and to carry it into the Iſle of Lindisfarne, which they immediately [1.] Hiſt. Eccleſ. Dun. Col. 39. The Body of St. Cuthbert removed into the Iſle of Lindisfarne.

diately performed, and got in Four Days to the Sea-ſide, where (if you will believe our Author) it being full Sea, it ebbed on the ſudden to give them a free paſſage to that Iſle; (but for this we have only the Monks Credit); here they ſtayed till the Lent following, and then their Peace being made with the King, they carried back the Saint's Body to its former ſtation.

[2.] H. Ib.

The [2.] ſame Author alſo tells us, that King William in his March from York towards Durham, found all the Country between Teys and Tyne utterly deſerted by its Inhabitants, they being all fled into the Woods and Mountains, and the Church of St. Paul at Girwy, (or Tarrow) being Burnt, certain of the King's Soldiers, who had Robbed the rich Crucifix of that Church of the Gold and Silver with which it was covered, were taken and brought before him, whom he ſent (as the greatneſs of their Crime deſerved) to the Biſhop to be puniſhed; but the Good Man immediately let them go without any puniſhment at all; either being afraid of further provoking the King, or elſe that he thought he had no power to do it. Then King William ſo ſoon as he arrived at Durham, ordered a Caſtle to be Built there, as well for the ſecurity of the Biſhop, as to keep the City in due Obedience; he likewiſe then confirmed to that Church all its ancient Rights and Priviledges.

How the King dealt with certain Soldiers that had Robbed a Crucifix.

All the Country between York and Durham Uninhabited.

But all our Hiſtorians agree, that in this War all the Northern parts were ſo miſerably depopulated by the Danes and Normans, that between York and Durham there remained no Town Inhabited, but the Land lay waſte for above nine Years; and indeed it muſt needs be a miſerable ſight to behold ſo many Carcaſſes lie unburied for want of hands. This was alſo attended by ſo terrible a Famine in all thoſe Northern parts, that this year, as well as the next, thoſe few People that remained, were forced to eat Horſes and Dogs, nay even Man's Fleſh, to ſave themſelves from Starving.

[2.] W. M.

The Feaſt of [1.] Chriſtmaſs approaching, that King cauſed his Crown to be brought from Wincheſter with the other Regal Ornaments, and returning to York, there kept that ſolemnity with as much ſtate as the turbulency of the times would permit. Whilſt the King continued here, the Earls Waltheof and Goſpatric made their Peace with him, and renewed their Oath of Fealty; and though the former had lately ſlain many Normans with his own hand, [2.] yet the King ſo much admired his vaſt Strength and Courage, that he was not only reconciled to him, but not long after gave him his Neice Judith in Marriage, together with the Earldoms of Northampton and Huntington.

[3.] O. V. p. 514. The King Marches againſt the reſt of the Northern Rebels.

But it was not the King's temper to waſte his time in idle Jollity when greater Affairs lay upon his hand, but as ſoon as the [3.] Holydays were over, he marched againſt a Party of Rebels who had Fortified themſelves in an inacceſſible Angle of that Country, almoſt encompaſſed either with Bogs, or by the Sea; but they hearing of his approach, ſtole away thence by Night, he following them as far as the River Teys. Then (having now ſettled his Affairs in the North) he marched over the Mountains, and through Woods, almoſt croſs the Kingdom, into Cheſhire, to be revenged on the Welſhmen, who had lately Beſieged Shrewsbury; but upon his arrival with his Army at Cheſter, he thereby quieted the whole Province of Mercia, and Edric the Foreſter having now made his Peace, the King Built a Caſtle there, and and another in his Return out of thoſe Parts at Stafford, putting ſtrong Gariſons into both: from thence he marched Southwards as far as Salisbury, where he kept his Eaſter, and then largely rewarding his Soldiers for their Pains in this Expedition, he diſmiſſed them. Anno Dom. MLXX.

The King having met with ſuch great and unexpected Succeſs in his late Northern Expedition, and having now no more Enemies to fear, [5.] (being over-perſwaded by the ill Advice of William Fitz-Osbern, Earl of Hereford) he in Lent after his Return cauſed all the Monaſteries in England to be ſearched, and there ſeized upon all the ready Money, which the richer ſort of the Engliſh had laid up in them, to ſecure it from his Violence; which tho the Monks exclaim againſt as a high Breach of the Privileges of their Houſes, yet certainly it was not Sacriledge, but rather down right Robbery, ſeeing that Money was not given to them, but only depoſited for the Owner's uſe. But it is much worſe, if it were as Matt. Paris relates, That the King alſo (to add the greater Contumely to the Church) did not ſpare ſo much as the Chalices and Saints Shrines; though I believe it much more certain, what immediately follows in the ſame Author, That this Year he forced the Biſhopricks and Abbies, that held Baronies, (hitherto free from all Secular Servitude) to hold them by Knights Service, enrolling and appointing, according to his Pleaſure, how many Men he would have each of them to maintain in time of War; but by thus laying up theſe Rolls of Eccleſiaſtical Servitude in his Exchequer, he drove many Clergymen out of his Kingdom, who utterly refuſed to ſubmit to this hard Conſtitution.

[4.] Mat. Paris.

The King ſeizes on all the Money and Plate laid up in Monaſteries.

As alſo the very Chalices and Shrines of Saints.

He alſo made the Biſhopricks, and greater Abbies, to hold by Knights Service.

Notwithſtanding, this Author's being thus tranſported againſt this Law, as a thing not only new, but illegal; yet Mr. [5.] Selden, in his Titles of Honour, is of opinion, That this Burden was not laid upon the Biſhopricks, and greater Abbies, without their own Conſents given in a Synod, or great Council of the Kingdom, which the King held this Year at Wincheſter, as you will find by and by; though the Law by which it was ordained, be now loſt; for the Clergy were then too powerful a Body to have ſuch a Burthen impoſed upon them by the King's ſole Prerogative, without any Law made for that purpoſe.

[5.] Page 578. Mr. Selden's Opinion, that this was not done by the King's ſole Power.

[1.] About this time alſo Egelwin, Biſhop of Durham, after his Return to his See, finding the State of England very turbulent, and dreading the Dominion of Strangers, whoſe Language he did not underſtand, was reſolved to quit his Biſhoprick, and live like a baniſhed Man, where-ever he could find a ſafe Retreat; ſo having provided a Ship, and ſtored it with all things neceſſary, he lay waiting for a Wind in the Port of Wiremuthe, where he alſo found divers other Ships, under the Command of Edgar Atheling, Siward (Sirnamed Barrie) Marleſweyn, and divers other Northumbrian Noblemen, who upon the late Taking of the Caſtles at York, and the Return of the Danes into their own Country, whom they had aſſiſted, (as you have already heard) lay here waiting for a Wind, to carry them into Scotland: But I could have wiſht our Authors would have told us, where they had ſtayed ever ſince that Action, which happened the laſt Year, when as the ſame Writers acknowledge the whole North was reduced unto the King's Obedience.

[1.] S. D. K. H. Egelwin, Biſhop of Durham endeavours to leave England.

He meets with Edgar Atheling, and other Noblemen, who intend to Sail for Scotland.

Anno Dom. MLXIX.

Not long after, [2.] a great Army of Scots, under the Command of King Malcolme, paſſing through Cumberland, and then turning Eaſtward, deſtroyed all Teyſdale, and the Parts adjacent on both ſides, and beyond it, with a miſerable Depopulation; but when they came to a place called in Engliſh, Hundred's Kelde, (i. e. a hundred Springs) they there met with, and killed certain Engliſh Noblemen; then the King kept part of his Army with him, and ſent a great Detachment back again the ſame way they came with much of the Plunder, which he alſo did with this deſign, that ſo the Inhabitants (who had before fled away, or hid themſelves) returning again ſecurely to their Houſes, he might there take them unawares, as he did; for having laid waſt great part of Cliveland, he alſo did the like in Heorterneſſe by a new and ſudden Incurſion, and from thence marching through the Lands of St. Cuthbert, (i. e. the Biſhoprick of Durham) bereſt all the Inhabitants of their Goods, and ſome of them of their Lives: He then alſo burnt the Church of St. Peter in Weremuthe, himſelf looking on; as alſo divers other Churches, together with thoſe who fled thither for Refuge.

[2.] Il. Ib. Malcolme, King of Scots, again invades England.

He plunders the Inhabitants of the Biſhoprick of Durham, and York ſhire.

But [3.] whilſt he rode near the River Weere, feeding his Eyes with theſe ſad Spectacles, it was told him, That Edgar Atheling, and the Ladies his Siſters, together with many Engliſh Noblemen, were arrived in the Mouth of that Harbour; whereupon the King went preſently to meet, and bid them all welcome, and promiſed them a ſafe Retreat in his Dominions.

[3.] Idem. He meets with Edgar Atheling, and the Ladies, his Siſters.

[4.] Whilſt the Scots committed theſe Spoils and Devaſtations, Goſpatric, Earl of Northumberland, (having lately bought that Earldom of the King for a great Sum of Money) in return, entred Cumberland, which was then part of King Malcolme's Dominions, and having there made great Depredations, he retired and fortified himſelf in Bebbanburgh (now Bamborough) Caſtle, from whence often ſallying out, he much weaken'd the Forces of the Enemy; But when King Malcolme heard what Outrages Goſpatric had committed upon his Subjects, he was ſcarce able to contain his Paſſion, and commanded for the future that they ſhould ſpare none of the Engliſh Nation, but either kill or carry them away Captives; which Order being thus given, it was a miſerable ſight to behold the Slaughter that was then made; Old Men, Women, and Children, meeting with the like ſad fate from the Cruelty of the Scots, whilſt the Young Men and Maidens, who were fit for Labours, were driven away Priſoners, and kept as Slaves; ſo that Simeon of Durham tells us, That in a very little time Scotland was ſo ſtockt with Engliſh Servants, that there was hardly a Village, nay, Houſe without them.

[4.] S. D. R. H. Earl Goſpatric enters Cumberland.

But ſince Hector Boethius and Buchanan, have given us a far different Relation of this War between the Engliſh and the Scots, I ſhall here give you their Account of it, yet without any diſtinction of Years, becauſe they do not ſet down any certain time, when thoſe things were done, only tell us in general, That Syward, Earl of Northumberland, ſiding with Prince Edgar, who was then again fled into Scotland, had alſo joyned his Forces with the Scots; and that thereupon King William being now puffed up with this late Succeſs, and believing that he might eaſily ſubdue the Scots, ſent one Roger, a Norman Nobleman, with ſome Forces into Northumberland, who being being conquer'd, and put to flight, and not long after killed by his own People, Richard, Earl of Glouceſter, was ſent with a much greater Army; but he being tyred out by Patric Dunbar in divers ſmall Skirmiſhes and by him ſtopped from proceeding farther, when he could do no Good, Biſhop Odo King William's half Brother led a much ſtronger Army thither; and having waſted almoſt all Northumberland, and ſlain ſome, who hindered his Depredations, King Malcolme, and Earl Syward ſet upon him as he was returning Home with a good Booty, and they killed and took priſoners a great Part of his Army. Anno Dom. MLXX.

But of all this we find not a Word in any of our Engliſh Hiſtorians, ſo that the moſt Part of this Relation is meer Romance, and the reſt very uncertain; for in the firſt Place, Earl Robert Cumin, whom their Scotch Authors falſely name Roger, never invaded the Scottiſh Dominions at all, being ſlain almoſt ſo ſoon as he came to Durham, as you have already heard: And as for Richard, Duke of Glouceſter, who is ſaid to have been worſted by Patric Dunbar, it is ſo far from being True, that there was not then, nor long after, any ſuch Duke; for Robert, baſe Son, to King Henry I. by him created Earl of Glouceſter, was the Firſt who enjoyed that Title: And as for Biſhop Odo's being worſted by King Malcolme, we cannot find in any of our Hiſtorians, that ever he marched at all into the North, till he was ſent Ano. Dom. 1080, and then not againſt the Scots, but to revenge the Death of Walcher Biſhop of Durham, as you will hear anon.

King [5.] Malcolme being returned Home, found Edgar Atheling and thoſe Noble Men that attended him ſafely arrived, whither alſo ſoon after came Biſhop Egelwin above mentioned, whom a contrary Wind had driven into Scotland, though his Intentions were to Sail for Germany. [5.] Idem.

About this Time, alſo King Malcolme married the Lady Margaret, Siſter to Prince Edgar, who though Noble by Her Royal Extraction, yet was much more ennobled by Her Prudence and Piety; through whoſe perſwaſions and endeavour the King himſelf laying aſide his former Roughneſs, became more gentle and civilized: By this Lady he had ſix Sons, (viz.) Edward, Edmund, Edgar, Alexander, and David, (the three laſt of whom ſucceeded each other in the Throne,) beſides another Son called Ethelred, who as well as his two eldeſt Brothers dyed without Iſſue; there were alſo two Daughters, Matilda Queen of England, and Mary married to Euſtace, Earl of Boloign. King Malcolme Marries Margaret Siſter to Edgar Atheling.

The War being now over, King William ſpent the reſt of this Year in Acts of Peace, and of this Time [1.] Ordoricus Vitalis relates, That Peace and Security began to be reſtored to the Kingdom by the Suppreſſing and Puniſhing of Thieves, and Robbers; and the Engliſh and Normans lived quietly together in the Cities and Towns, Marrying among each other; ſo that the Markets and Fairs were full of French Tradeſmen, and Commodities, and the Engliſh were much alter'd in their Habit; and now no Body daring to Rob, they fell to tilling the Ground, whilſt the Churches were either repair'd, or new Built; and where the Prieſts conſtantly celebrated Divine Service: Thus the King's care and diligence was not at all want- [1.] P. 520. ing to promote what was Good, and he by his Example excited others to do the like.

[2.] Idem. A Synod held at Winchester, where Archbishop Stigand is deposed.

But to look back to the Affaires of the Church: This [2.] Year also was held a great Council, or Synod, at Winchester on the Octaves of Easter, eight Days after Easter, King William not only appointing it, but being present at it; the Pope also approving it, and giveing it his Authority by his Legates Hermenfred Bishop of Sedun, and John and Peter presbyter-Cardinals; in which Council Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was solemnly degraded for three Causes, (viz) First, Because he had held the Bishoprick of Winchester, together with the Archbishoprick of Canterbury; and Secondly, For that he had not only assumed it, (Archbishop Robert being then alive,) but also had sometimes made use of his Pall (which he had left behind him) in the Celebration of Mass; and Lastly, Because he had received another Pall from the pretended Pope Benedict, whom the Church of Rome had excommunicated, because he had simoniacally intruded into the Apostolick Chair.

Likewise Agelmar Bishop of Helmham as also divers Abbots.

Agelmar Bishop of Helmham, Brother to the Archbishop, was at the same time likewise degraded, as were also divers Abbots by the Kings procurement; and divers of the English being thus deprived, the King the better to strengthen and support his Power, put those of his own Nation into their Places, and for the same End got some other Bishops and Abbots to be deprived of their Dignities, and kept them Prisoners during their Lives, whom neither Councils nor the Laws of the Land would have condemned: And this barely out of a Jealosy, that they endeavour'd a new Revolution of Government.

[3.] F. W. R. H. Wulstan Bishop of Worcester Challenges divers Possessions detained from his Church.

[3.] But [3.] in this Council, whilst others were afraid, lest they should be deprived of their Dignities, Wulstan, that venerable Bishop of Worcester, stoutly challenged divers Possessions which had been detain'd by Archbishop Aldred, when he was translated from the See of Worcester to York, and which (he being deceased) were now come into the King's hands, and thereupon desired Justice to be done him by the Legates, as well as the King himself; but because the Church of York, had not then a Prelate who should maintain her Cause, it was adjudged that his Claim should remaine undecided, till a new Archbishop was appointed, that should defend that Church by answering his Demands, so that both sides being fairly heard a just Sentence might be given thereupon.

And in this great Council (though it be not expresly mentioned) I suppose the Bishops and greater Abbots gave their Consents, that for the Future their Lands should be held by Knights Service (as we find related in Matthew Paris at the beginning of this Year). And from this time the Bishops and Abbots who sate before in our Councils and Synods as meer Spiritual Persons, appeared hence forward in the Great Councils of the Kingdom among the Lay-Nobility, as they do to this day.

[4.] W. M. De Gest. Pont. Lib. 1. P. 117. b. The deposed Archbishop kept Prisoner during his Life.

The late Archbishop Stigand being thus deprived, as you have heard, [4.] he was all the rest of his Life kept close Prisoner at Winchester, where he sustained Nature with very mean Fare; for his Allowance which was out of the King's Exchequer being but small, he

by

by reaſon of his natural covetouſneſs would not afford himſelf any thing out of his own Eſtate; but when his Friends, and particularly Queen Edgitbe, the Widdow of King Edward, perſuaded him to live more plentifully, he ſwore by all that was Holy, that he was not worth a Farthing; but the great Riches that were found hidden under ground after his deceaſe, ſufficiently declared his Perjury, which was diſcovered by a little Key, that was, when he was dead, found hanging about his Neck, and belonged to a certain Box or Cheſt he had, which being opened, Notes were there found that diſcovered both the quantity and quality of that hidden Treaſure. Anno Dom. MLXX.

On [5.] Whitſunday following, the King being at Windſor, beſtowed the Archbiſhoprick of York upon Thomas, Chanon of Bayeux; and he gave the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter to Walkelyn his Chaplain; and the next day Armenfred Biſhop of Sedun, the Pope's Legate, again held the Synod alone (the Two Cardinals being then returned to Rome) in which Agelric Biſhop of Selſey was alſo Degraded, but not Canonically, and the King preſently committed him cloſe Priſoner to Mearleaſbeorge (i. e. Marleborough) Caſtle, though without any Crime laid to his Charge. [5.] F. W. R. H. Thomas the King's Chaplain made Archbiſhop of York. Another Synod held, in which Agelric Biſhop of Selſey is Degraded.

There were alſo many Abbots depoſed at the ſame time: The King in the room of thoſe Biſhops who were thus Deprived, conferred the Biſhoprick of Helmham upon Arfaſt, and that of Selſey on Stigand, who were both his Chaplains; and he gave the Abbies to ſome Norman Monks; and becauſe the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was then Depoſed and the Archbiſhop of York, Elect, not yet Conſecrated, Walkelin abovementioned, was by the King's Command on the Octaves of Pentecoſt, Ordained Biſhop by the ſaid Legate: And about the ſame time alſo the Valiant Earl Edrick (Sirnamed the Forreſter abovementioned) was reconciled to the King.

About this time [1.] the King having ſent for Lanfranc, Abbot of Caën, out of Normandy, a Lombard by Nation, and a Man throughly Learned, and well verſed in all the Liberal Arts, as well as in all Divine Knowledge, and as prudent in his Councils and the management of ſecular affairs, he appointed him on the day of the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſometime after he was conſecrated at his Epiſcopal See, by Giſo Biſhop of Wells, and Walter Biſhop of Hereford, with others of his Suffragan Biſhops, and the reſt who were abſent, either by their Deputies or Letters, gave him the reaſons why they could not be there to aſſiſt. [1.] Idem. Lanfranc made Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

But though our Hiſtorians mention Archbiſhop Lanfranc's being choſen by none but the King, yet it appears from the Saxon Annals, that he was Elected, or at leaſt Confirmed by a Great Council of the whole Kingdom, the Elders (i. e. the Chief, or Senior Monks) of the ſaid Church Electing him, together with the Biſhops, Chief Men, Clergy, and People of England, in Curia Regis (that is, in the King's Great Council, or Parliament, as we now call it) which is alſo confirmed by the [2.] Author of the ſhort Relation concerning King William, Printed at the end of Silas Taylor's Hiſtory of Gavelkind, which relates, "That Lanfranc being arrived in England, the King committed to him the Church of Canterbury, with the Conſent and Advice of all the Barons, Biſhops, and Abbots, and alſo of the whole People of England, becauſe the King was well ſatisfied that he knew how to Govern it as he ought. Vid. The Latin Copy of thoſe Saxon Annals in Bennet Coll. From Anno Dom. MLXX.

From whence we may obſerve, notwithſtanding the encroaching Power of the Pope, and the growing Prerogative of the King, the Great Council of the Kingdom had not then loſt its ancient Priviledge of Confirming the Two Metropolitans of the Engliſh Church.

De Geſt. Pontif. l. ib. 1. p. 117. a.

And the ſame Year (as the Saxon Annals and William of Malmeſbury inform us) Thomas Archbiſhop of York came (according to Cuſtom) to Canterbury to be there Conſecrated by that Archbiſhop, and then Lanfranc demanded of him a Profeſſion in writing, declaring his Canonical Obedience, and that alſo confirmed by an Oath, according to the Cuſtoms obſerved by his Predeceſſors; whereupon the ſaid Thomas anſwered, That he would never do it, unleſs he might firſt read ſome written Authorities concerning that matter, and hear ſome Witneſſes that ſhould aſſert its Antiquity, ſince he could not do it without prejudice to his Church, before he had heard ſufficient reaſons for it: But this (ſays our Author) was the effect rather of his Ignorance than Pride; for being a Stranger, and wholly ignorant of the Cuſtoms of England, he had given too much credit to Flatterers; [2.] whereupon Archbiſhop Lanfranc commanded thoſe Biſhops who were come thither for this ſervice, to Diſrobe him, which was done accordingly; [3.] and ſo the Archbiſhop Elect for that time departed without any Conſecration: But the King hearing of it took it very ill, ſuppoſing Archbiſhop Lanfranc had truſted to his own Learning, rather than the truth and reaſon of the thing, though Thomas himſelf was not wanting neither in Wit nor Learning: But after ſome days Lanfranc coming to the King's Court (or Great Council) demanded Audience of the King, and having there given him his reaſons, he himſelf was not only very well ſatisfied with them, but alſo all the Foreigners there preſent; and as for the Engliſh who knew the matter, they gave Teſtimony for the Archbiſhop's aſſertion; therefore by the King's Command, and by the common Decree of all there preſent, it was Ordained, That for the preſent Thomas ſhould return to the Mother Church of the whole Kingdom, and there write his profeſſion of Obedience, and having Subſcribed it, ſhould read it aloud, and then deliver it to Archbiſhop Lanfranc to be examined in the preſence of all the Biſhops, in which Thomas ſhould abſolutely promiſe (without any conditions) that he would obey his Commands in all matters Eccleſiaſtical, yet that he ſhould not do it for his Succeſſors, until ſufficient reaſons ſhould be ſhewed him in an Epiſcopal Synod, whereby it ſhould be evidently proved, that all his Predeceſſors had ever performed the ſame to the See of Canterbury; ſo he having obeyed theſe Commands, was immediately Conſecrated, and not long after Lanfranc required and received the profeſſions of Obedience from all the Biſhops of England, who had been conſecrated by ſeveral former Archbiſhops.

A Relation of the great difference that now aroſe between the Two Archbiſhops about the Profeſſion of Obedience.

To this Year alſo (though we cannot fix the preciſe time further than that it was not long after Lanfranc's being made Archbiſhop) may be alſo referred that remarkable Tranſaction, which [4.] Matthew Paris in his Life of Abbot Fretherick thus relates, That when King William, (being now encouraged by having the Archbiſhop of Canterbury on his ſide) began more openly and ſeverely to Oppreſs his Engliſh Subjects; they, ſeeing their Lives and Eſtates to be now in danger, aſſembled together, and made a numerous Army, chuſing Edgar Atheling, that Valiant young Prince, for for their Leader, One in whom remain'd all the hopes of the Engliſh, and of whom they had made this Rhime. Anno Dom. MLXX.

Edgar Atheling, England's Dearling.

Alſo Fretheric, Abbot of St. Albans, a generous Man, and not a little formidable for his Riches and Power, was a chief Ring-leader and Promoter of his Deſign; then the King began very much to fear, leſt he ſhould looſe the Kingdom, which he had acquired with ſo great an Effuſion of Blood. Wherefore following Archbiſhop Lanfranc's prudent Advice, he began to deal more gently with the Engliſh Noblemen, and propoſing to them Terms of Peace, he invited them to a Subdolous Treaty (for ſo it proved in the end). But the Engliſh Nobility not ſuſpecting any Treachery, under the Conduct of Abbot Fretheric met the King at Berkamſtead, where after many Diſputes he in the preſence of Archbiſhop Lanfranc to obtain Peace, ſwore upon the Holy Relicks of the Church of St. Albans, as alſo upon the Holy Evangeliſts, (Abbot Fretheric adminiſtring the Oath) "That he would "obſerve the good, approved and ancient Laws of the Kingdom, which the "Holy and Pious Kings, his Predeceſſors, and chiefly King Edward had "ordained; ſo the Engliſh being herewith pacified, they all return'd home. Id. ib. The King forced at laſt to ſwear to obſerve the Laws of King Edward.

But the King cunningly concealing his Deſign, within a few days after privately and ſuddainly endeavoured to ruin thoſe ſingle and apart, whom being confederate together, he could not overcome; and this he perſormed by killing ſome, diſinheriting others, and outlawing a great many, violating the abovementioned Laws, and ſpoiling the Engliſh of their Eſtates at his pleaſure, without any legal Judgment, and thereby enriched his Normans to the great Grief of his Engliſh Subjects, who had of their own Accord made him King. Prince Edgar ſeeing theſe things fled again into Scotland, and did ever after bear him a Grudge; then likewiſe many of the Engliſh Nobility fled into Denmark, and ſome into Norwey, avoiding as much as they could the Norman Yoke. Id. ib. Yet is afterwards revenged on thoſe that had made him do it.

Sometime after, Abbot Fretheric began very much to fear, leſt the King, or his new Archbiſhop, ſhould fall upon him, as the principal Patron of the Engliſh, and depriving him of his Dignity, ſhould either put him to Death, or commit him to perpetual Priſon; and therefore one day coming into the Chapter-Houſe, he before all his Brethren, breaking forth into Tears, thus ſaid, Brethren and Sons, according to the Goſpel-precept, we ought to fly from thoſe who perſecute us, from one City to another. And upon this, with the advice and leave of the Convent, taking with him ſome Books, Cloaths, and Neceſſaries for his Journey, he privately fled to the Iſle of Ely, (being then under the Power of the Engliſh Lords, who had lately rebelled againſt King William) where falling Sick, a few days after he ended his days. King William hearing of the Death of this Abbot, kept the Abby of St. Albans vacant in his Hands, and very much oppreſſed it by cutting down the Woods, and impoveriſhing the Tenants; and unleſs he had been reſtrained by the Reproofs of Archbiſhop Lanfranc, he had irreparably deſtroyed the whole Monaſtery; but the Archbiſhop at laſt procured of him, that one Paul, his Kinſman, Id. ib. Abbot Fretheric reſigns for fear of the King.

Anno Dom. MLXX. man, (ſuſpected to be his Son) whom he had brought over into England, ſhould be made Abbot thereof; but this did not happen till ſome years after, (viz.) Anno 1077. Thus I have faithfully given you Mat. Paris's Account concerning this great Action, which if it be true (for ſome queſtion it, ſince it is related by no other Author) ſhews, That the Engliſh did not then own King William as a Conqueror, and that by the Oath abovementioned he wholly barred himſelf out of that Claim.

But ſince this Author could not well invent this Story (being moſt probably found by him in the Annals of his Abby) I think there can be no reaſonable Cauſe to deny the Truth of it; only this muſt be acknowledged, that Edgar Atheling could not be at all concern'd in this Affair, for he had fled into Scotland near two Years before, nor did he return into England, till about three Years after, when he came back in order to reconcile himſelf to the King, as you will find in its proper place; though this Author makes him to have done this the Year before.

Anno Dom. MLXXI. [1.] At the beginning of this Year, Archbiſhop Lanfranc, together with Thomas, Archbiſhop of York, went to Rome; where when Lanfranc arrived, Pope Alexander ſhewed him great Reſpect, riſing up to him, and kiſſing his Cheek; yet at the ſame time profeſſing he did it not as to an Archbiſhop, but to his Maſter in Learning; and he likewiſe gave him not only a Pall conſecrated at the Altar of St. Peter, but alſo another in Token of his Love, in which he was wont to ſay Maſs himſelf. Then Archbiſhop Thomas began to renew his former Challenge, of being exempted from ackowledging the Archbiſhop of Canterbury for his Superior, alledging, That Pope Gregory had appointed them both to be of equal Power and Dignity, only he was to have the Precedence who was firſt conſecrated; but Archbiſhop Lanfranc, though he reſented this very much, yet anſwered with great Moderation, that that Conſtitution was not made concerning Canterbury and York, but London and that See; However the Pope declin'd giving any Judgment in this matter, ſaying, It ought to be determin'd in England, in a Synod, by the Judgment of all the Biſhops and Abbots.

[1.] F. W. W. M. De Geſt. Pontif. p. 117. a. The Diſpute between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, heard before the Pope.

Then [2.] Archbiſhop Lanfranc, to be even with Thomas, charged him in the Pope's Preſence as Uncanonical, and ſo uncapable of that Archbiſhoprick, becauſe he was the Son of a Prieſt, and yet no Canon was then in force to debar Prieſts Sons from Spiritual Preferments, though indeed ſome years after, in the Council of Clermont, ſuch a Prohibition was made.

[2.] Eadmerus Hiſt. Novar. Lib. 1. The Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop Elect of Lincoln, are found to be Irregular.

Then [3.] Archbiſhop Lanfranc likewiſe charged Remigius, Biſhop Elect of Lincoln, for being Irregular, becauſe he was guilty of Simony, not that he had paid any Money for his Biſhoprick; but that upon King William's Invaſion of England, he had ſo far aſſiſted him in that Deſign, that by his diligent Service and Solicitation, he had as it were purchaſed that place of King William; whereupon both theſe Biſhops, having nothing left to excuſe themſelves, voluntarily ſurrendred their Rings and Croſiers, imploring the Pope's Clemency. He thereupon referred the matter wholly to Lanfranc's own Arbitration; and upon his ſhewing the Pope how neceſſary thoſe two Prelates were for the King's Affairs, in the new Orders he had made made for the Kingdom; the Pope aſſented to it, bidding the Archbiſhop do what he thought was moſt expedient for his Country; whereupon he immediately in the Pope's Preſence reſtored to the ſaid Biſhops their reſpective Paſtoral Staffs, and ſo returning into England, with both theſe in his Company, he was with great Reverence received at Canterbury, and there confirmed in his Primacy of Britain. Anno Dom. MLXXI.

About [4.] the ſame time, the Earls Edwin and Morchar, though they had been before reconciled to the King, yet fearing that he deſigned to commit them cloſe Priſoners, privately left the Court, and intended to raiſe a freſh Rebellion; but their Deſigns met with no good Succeſs; for Edwin reſolving to fly to the King of Scots, was murthered on the way by the treachery of his own Men; but as for Earl Morchar, he got into the Iſle of Ely, with many others by Sea; and a little while after, Egelwin, Biſhop of Durham, and Syward, Sirnamed Barne, came alſo thither by Sea out of Scotland; to whom we may alſo add [5.] Hereward, the Son of Leofric, Lord of Brunne, a Young Engliſh Nobleman of great Strength and Courage (as Ingulph relates) who, having come not long before out of Flanders into England, and finding Ediva, his Mother, then a Widow, much injured and moleſted by the Normans, and his own Eſtate alſo granted to one of them, was reſolved to be revenged of them, and gathering a conſiderable Number of his Kinſmen and Tenants, fell upon the Injurors of his Mother, and drove them off his Eſtate; then going to Brand his Uncle, then Abbot of Peterburgh, he received from him the Order of Knight-hood, according to the Engliſh Cuſtom at that time; the manner of which, was, by Confeſſion of his Sins, and Watching, and Praying in the Church the whole preceeding Night; then in the Morning before Maſs he offer'd up his Sword upon the Altar, and after reading the Goſpel, the Prieſt firſt having bleſſed the Sword, put it over the new Knight's Neck, and ſo having communicated, he was ever after held a lawful Knight; but this way of making Knights was deſpiſed by the Normans, they not looking upon ſuch as true Knights, but bigotted lazy Fellows.

This [1.] Young Nobleman being then in the Neighbourhood, the Earls abovementioned (who had now poſſeſſed themſelves of the Iſle of Ely) ſent for him to come to their Aſſiſtance; and there they made him one of their chief Commanders, who performed ſo many brave Exploits againſt their Enemies, that (in our Author's Judgment) he deſerved great Commendations, becauſe, whileſt he was able, he endeavoured to ſuſtain the ſinking Ruins of his Country: For not long before, hearing that his Uncle, Abbot Brand was dead, and that King William had conferred that Abby upon one Thorold, a Norman; Hereward much regretting, that a Stranger ſhould thus domineer over his Friends and Relations, ſet upon the Abby of Peterburgh, and put Abbot Thorold to flight, though he had brought Ivo Talboys, a Potent Norman, (who by the King's Favour then Commanded all the Neighbourhood about Holland) to his Aſſiſtance; yet, notwithſtanding Hereward took him Priſoner in open Fight, and would not ſet him free, till he had purchaſed his Liberty by a great Ranſom: Not long after this the King marched down againſt the Earls, who were ſtill in the Iſle of Ely, and by the means of his

[2.] Lib. 2. How ſtoutly the Engliſh Noblemen defended themſelves againſt the King.

Now when theſe Noblemen ſaw themſelves thus ſtreighten'd (as the [2.] Manuſcript Hiſtory of Ely tells us) they raiſed a high Fortification of Turfs againſt the King's Aſſaults, and defended themſelves for a long time: then the King removed his Camp nearer to the Iſland, by the River Ouſe, bringing with him a great Army, both of Horſe and Foot, to hinder their ſallying out of the Iſle, ſtriving to ſubdue them all the ways he could; yet one Morning as the King's Men were carrying Wood and Earth to fill up the Channel, and make it fordable; Hereward on the ſudden ſallied out upon them, and putting them all to flight, return'd Victorious with a great deal of Spoil.

[3.] Id. Ib. The Noblemen in the Iſle refuſe to ſubmit, or to truſt the King.

Whereupon [3.] the King being much diſturbed, made a Truce for the preſent with the Noblemen in Ely, but yet it was not long obſerved, for they not truſting the King, would not deliver up the Iſland, becauſe he had broken the Conditions, by ſeizing and impriſoning Biſhop Egelwin, as he was paſſing from thence; and cutting off the Hands and Feet, or putting out the Eyes of as many as were taken Priſoners; ſo the War being thus renewed, Hereward (who upon the laſe Truce was gone away for ſome time) was again ſent for by the Men of Ely to Command their Forces, who returning with divers other Outlaw'd diſinherited Engliſh Gentlemen, thenceforward Commanded in Chief, and marching out of the Iſland, killed many of their Enemies, and carried away a great deal of Plunder into the Iſle; nor did he admit any into his Society, who would not firſt take an Oath of Fidelity upon the Body of St. Ethelreede, or Audrey, to maintain that Quarrel to their utmoſt Power; ſo that the King being now called off by freſh Invaſions, was forced to raiſe the Siege.

He is forced to raiſe the Siege.

The Author of this Hiſtory is very much out in his Relations.

The Author of this Manuſcript Hiſtory farther relates, That then Archbiſhop Stigand, and Egfred, Abbot of St. Albans, both took Refuge here; the former bringing a great Treaſure along with him, and the latter the Body of that Saint, which he afterwards beſtowed upon the Church of Ely; but this is denied by Matthew Paris, in his Life of Abbot Fretheric, (abovementioned) for that was his Name, and not Egfred, (as this Author calls him) neither did Archbiſhop Stigand ever take Refuge in this Iſland, as he ſuppoſes, for being now degraded, he was kept a cloſe Priſoner as long as he lived.

The Monkiſh Author proved a Romancer.

But to return again to the Hiſtory of Ely, the Author of which alſo relates, That King William did not renew the Siege of this Iſland, till after his Second Return out of Normandy, which was Anno Dom. 1075. Whereas the Saxon Annals, and all our other Hiſtorians, makes him to have ended his War againſt Ely four Years before, viz. in this very Year: So that all that this Hiſtorian writes, to have happen'd after that time, ſeems to be pure Romance, to enhaunce the Honour of Hereward, his Hero, of whom he relates divers improbable Stories, needleſs to be here recited, ſince we are not aſſured of the truth of them.

At

At laſt this [3.] Author agrees, that the Abbot and Monks having had all their Lands ſeized that lay without, and having alſo conſumed all their Proviſions within the Iſle, they were forced at laſt to make Peace with the King, ſending Abbot Thurſtan, and ſome of his Monks to Treat on their behalf; but they, it ſeems, not agreeing to the Kings Terms, he thereupon ſent a new raiſed Army both of Horſe and Foot againſt them; who falling upon the Iſland afreſh, by the help of the King's Ships (which block'd up the Mouth of the River) they at length got over the Lakes and Bogs, and ſo aſſaulting the Beſieged with their Engines of War, put them to flight, and having once Landed upon the Iſland, ſoon made themſelves Maſters of it and the Abby.

Anno Dom. MLXXI.

[3.] Id. Ib. Thoſe in the Iſle of Ely forced at laſt to Treat, and the reaſon why. The King ſends freſh Forces againſt the Iſle, who at laſt take it.

After this the King Marched towards the Monaſtery, ſhutting up the Gates of the Church, that the Monks might not meet him in ſolemn Proceſſion with their Croſſes and Relicks of the Saints, and ſo appeaſe his anger; then arriving at the Monaſtery, he offered half a Mark of Gold at the Altar (or Shrine) of St. Audrey, and having put a ſtrong Gariſon of Normans into the Abby, as alſo in the Caſtle of Alrehede, he returned the ſame way he came.

Then the Abbot and Monks, by the mediation of Gilbert de Clare, and other Noblemen, endeavoured a Reconciliation with the King; ſo being brought into his Preſence at Wickford, they made the beſt Compoſition they could, viz. That they ſhould pay him Seven hundred Marks, which was ſo great a Sum, that they were forced to ſell good part of the Plate and Ornaments of their Church. This Sum being brought to the King's Receivers at Cambridge, there wanted by careleſsneſs of the Money-changers a Groat in weight, (for in thoſe times great Sums paſſed by Weight, and not by Tale) which when the King underſtood, he was very angry at it, (or at leaſt pretended it) as if they went about to Cheat him, and thereupon would not ſtand to the Articles of Peace; which did ſo perplex theſe Monks, that they were forced to promiſe him Three hundred Marks more to make it up a Thouſand; to raiſe which Sum they were neceſſitated to deſpoil the Images of the Saints of all their Ornaments of Gold and Silver, and ſo diſfurniſhed the Church of all the reſt of the Gold and Silver that was left; and when this Sum was paid, they bought but a precarious and uncertain Peace, till Thurſtan their Abbot dying, the King made Theodwin, a Norman Monk, Abbot, who refuſed to accept it, unleſs the King would reſtore to the Abby the Spoils he had taken from it, and ſo at laſt they got them all again.

Id. Ib. The Abbot and Monks forced to Buy their Peace.

But though I doubt whether divers paſſages in this Relation in the Monk of Ely, be true or not, as being written out of hatred and averſion to their Conqueror, yet this is certain (which it alſo relates) that the King, the better to ſecure the Iſland to his Obedience, quarter'd Forty Norman Knights, or Soldiers, upon that Abby, who eating in the Refectory with the Monks, the Cellerer, or Steward, was not only forced to find them Commons, but alſo Wages in Money.

The King Quarters Forty Norman Knights upon the Abby of Ely.

And as a Manuſcript Relation, cited by [4.] Mr. Fuller in his Church-Hiſtory, informs us, each of theſe Knights were quarter'd with ſome principal Monk, and living with them in the common Hall of the Monaſtrey, they entertained each other ſo lovingly, that at length, the fire of Civil Diſſention being quenched, the King's Power eſtabliſhed, and he finding the Pride of the Monks ſufficiently abated, ſent for the

Anno Dom. MLXXI. the Knights away, wanting at preſent their Service (moſt of them having been Chief Commanders, or Captains of Note) to curb the Inſolence of his Son Robert, who at that time had taken up Arms againſt him in Normandy; but it ſeems the Monks were ſo much taken with the Converſation of theſe Military Men, that they very mightily lamented their departure, and carried them on their way as far as Hadenham, with their Croſſes, Cenſers, and Hymns in a ſolemn Proceſſion.

But as for what follows in this Relation (which is no ancienter than Henry the VII*th*'s time) that the Monks in gratitude Painted the Arms of theſe Gentlemen upon the Walls of their Hall where they uſed to Eat, I do very much doubt; becauſe the cuſtom of bearing Coats of Arms, as Hereditary to their Families, was not in uſe till after the ſecond Expedition into the Holy Land, in the Reign of King Henry the Second; though I will not deny, but that the Names of theſe Gentlemen might be preſerved in the ancient Regiſters of that Abby. But thoſe that delight in things of this nature, may ſee a Tranſcript of the pretended Arms of theſe Soldiers in Mr. Fuller's Church-Hiſtory as they were drawn from the Original, which ſtill remains Painted upon the Wall of the Dean of Ely's Dining-Room.

[5.] F. W. How the King dealt with thoſe Noblemen, and others, who were taken in the Iſle of Ely.

But to return again to the Hiſtory: as for the [5.] Noblemen who were then in the Iſland, they were all forced to ſubmit themſelves to the King's Mercy, except Hereward, and he eſcaped with a few in his company over the Fens into Scotland; then the King, having cut off the Hands, and put out the Eyes of many of the common Soldiers, let them go, but as for Earl Morchar, with the Noblemen and Gentlemen that were takenwith him, he ſent them to divers Priſons; and as for Biſhop Egelwin, he was committed to ſafe Cuſtody at Abingdon, where he ſoon died of Hunger, by his peremptory refuſing all manner of Suſtenance.

[1.] S. D.

Not [1.] long after this, the King made Walcher, a Lorainer, and Canon of the Church of Leige, Biſhop of Durham, who was Conſecrated at Wincheſter; for being a Man of Noble Birth, and of virtuous Life, as alſo of ſome Learning, he had been invited over by the King to undertake that Charge; then Eiliaf the King's Houſcarle (that is, his Domeſtick Servant) and who was in great Favour with him, waited on the Biſhop as far as Tork, where Earl Goſpatric met him, and conducted him to Durham, and there he was inthron'd in Middle Lent following.

Anno Dom. MLXXII. [2.] C. S. F. W.

The [2.] next Summer, King William (having Edric, the Foreſter, in his Company) to be even with the King of Scots for his late Devaſtations in England, invaded Scotland with a great Army by Land, and a powerful Fleet by Sea, intending wholly to ſubdue it; but when he had entred Scotland, the King thereof met him at a place called Abernithie, and ſubmitting himſelf, made Peace with him, and became his Leige-man, giving alſo Hoſtages for his true obſervance of it for the future.

But Abbot Ingulph is more particular in this Tranſaction, and ſays expreſly, That King William then ſubjected Scotland to himſelf, and compell'd King Malcolme to do him Homage, and ſwear Fealty, at the place aforeſaid: I wiſh this Author had told us particularly for what what Territories this Homage was done, whether for all Scotland, or Cumberland, or only for the Low-lands, ſince it could not be for Northumberland, for that was not, till the Reign of King Stephen, made part of the Scottiſh Dominion, nor continued any longer ſo than only for his Time. Anno Dom. MLXXII.

Therefore [3.] Holinſhed, and other Modern Engliſh Writers, have without any Authority from our Ancient Hiſtorians, ſaid in expreſs Terms, That the King of Scots then did Homage to King William for all Scotland. [3.] Vol. 1. p. 123.

But to give ſome further Account of this Action; Polydore Virgil (from ſome Ancient Manuſcript in his time) relates, That this Victory was not ſo eaſily obtained, for King William having entred Galloway, his Soldiers were more harraſſed in paſſing over the Mountains and Marſhes than in purſuit of the Enemy, wherefore he was forced to give over his Expedition that way, and march directly into Lothian, (where King Malcolme then lay) being fully reſolved to end this Quarrel by a Battel; but Malcolme wiſely conſidering the great danger he was in, ſent Ambaſſadors to King William, and offered him Terms of Peace; they were well received, and he thinking it better to hearken to it than to try the Chance of War in a difficult and unknown Country, accepted of thoſe Terms propoſed by the King of Scots, but on this Condition, that he ſhould take an Oath of Fealty to him; and at the Interceſſion of King Malcolme, the Engliſh Exiles were reſtor'd to their Eſtates; but it ſeems Edgar Atheling did not make his Peace till afterwards, as you will find anon. A larger Account of this Victory from Polydor. Virgil.

The King having thus diſpatch'd his Affairs in Scotland, returned to Durham, where he built a Caſtle for the Security of the Biſhop, and thoſe that belonged to him. But [4.] Simeon of Durham, and other Monkiſh Writers do relate, That the King ſoon left that place, being frighted from thence by a ſtrange Miracle that happen'd to himſelf, for he doubting whither the Body of St. Cuthbert was really there or no, had ordered his Shrine to be ſearched; but he was thereupon immediately ſeized with ſuch an unuſual Heat, that he did nothing but Sweat, and being under a great Conſternation, he commanded his Chaplains, whom he had before order'd to open the Shrine, to let it alone, and preſently taking Horſe, never alighted till he got out of the Lands belonging to the Biſhoprick; but leaving this Miracle to be believed by thoſe that have a mind to it, it is certain that King William did not ſtay long at Durham, but returned to London. [4.] Hiſt. Eccleſ. Dunelmenſ. Col. 42.

Now, becauſe the [5.] Scottiſh Hiſtorians relate this Peace between their King Malcolme and King William ſomewhat differently, I ſhall alſo give you their Account of it; in the firſt place, they do not only conceal this Expedition of the King's into Scotland, with the great dread that King Malcolme was in of his Forces, and the Homage he thereupon made him; but on the contrary they make King William as it were weary of War, and ſo to deſire Peace at his hands; and that thereupon he confirmed the Grant of Cumberland to King Malcolme, upon this Condition, that he ſhould hold it of him by Fealty, and attempt nothing to the prejudice of the Crown of England. But what they further add ſeems certain enough, That in Memory of this Peace, there was a Stone-Croſs erected in the middle of the Mountains of Stanmore in Yorkſhire, which we call Rerecroſs, (and the Scots [5.] Hector. Boeth. Buchan.

Vid. Camden's Britannia in Yorkſhire.

So ſoon as the King return'd out of Scotland, he deprived Goſpatric of his Earldom of part of Northumberland, charging him that he had underhand aſſiſted thoſe who had ſlain Earl Robert at Durham, and had been alſo on the Enemy's ſide, when the Normans were ſlain at York; and he being thus deprived, Earl Waltheof was advanced to that Honour, which was due to him by Birth, as well by his Father as Mother's ſide, being the Son of Earl Syward, by Elfreda, the Daughter of Earl Aldred.

[1.] S. D.

Then [2.] Biſhop Walcher, and Earl Waltheof, became ſuch good Friends, that he ſitting together with the Biſhop in the Synods of the Clergy, obſerved and executed whatſoever had been by them ordained, for the advancement of Religign.

[2.] Id. Col. 205.

But to give you ſome further Account of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. This Year alſo [3.] the two Archbiſhops, Lanfranc and Thomas being returned from Rome, there was a great Council or Synod held at Eaſter, concerning the old Diſpute of the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury over that of York, where the matter being fully debated on both ſides, at laſt the Synod gave Sentence in favour of the See of Canterbury; which being ſo remarkable, I ſhall here give it you at large, as it is found in Ingulph's Hiſtory, and in [4.] William of Malmesbury, de Geſtis Pontif: in theſe Words,

" he did not intend thereby to prejudice his Succeſſors, who may ſtill " exact an Oath, together with the Profeſſion, from the Succeſſors of " the ſaid Thomas. Anno Dom. MLXXII.

" If the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhall deceaſe, the Archbiſhop of " York ſhall come to Canterbury, and there together with the reſt of " the Biſhops of the ſaid Province, ſhall Conſecrate him as his Right- " ful Primate; but if the Arcbiſhop of York ſhall deceaſe, he who is " choſen to ſucceed him, having received from the King the Arch- " biſhoprick, ſhall come to Canterbury, or where-ever elſe the Arch- " biſhop of that See ſhall appoint, and ſhall there Canonically receive " Ordination from him.

To this [5.] Conſtitution the ſaid King, and the Archbiſhops Lanfranc and Thomas, as alſo Hubert, a Sub-Deacon of the Roman Church, and Legate of the ſaid Pope Alexander, and the reſt of the Biſhops and Abbots there preſent, have all conſented: This Cauſe was firſt debated at the City of Wincheſter, at the Feaſt of Eaſter, in the King's Chappel in the Caſtle, and afterwards in the Royal Town, called Windleſbore, (now Windſor) where it received a final Determination in the Preſence of the King, the Biſhops and Abbots of ſeveral Orders, who were all aſſembled at the King's Court, at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt: Then follow the Subſcriptions of King William, and Matylda his Queen, of Hubert, the Pope's Legate, as alſo of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, together with that of the Biſhop of London, and moſt of the other Biſhops, and Chief Abbots of England, who all of them ſubſcribed with the Sign of the Croſs after their Names, according to the Saxon Cuſtom. [5.] Idem. Ibid.

[1.] William of Malmesbury has not only given us this Sentence, but alſo the whole Proceſs, with the Arguments pro and con, that were produced by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, in this great Cauſe, ſet forth at large in a Letter of Archbiſhop Lanfranc to the Pope; the Reaſons on both ſides were founded upon certain Letters of Pope Gregory's, and his Succeſſors, to Archbiſhop Auguſtine, and other Archbiſhops of Canterbury, as alſo to King Ethelbert, and other Saxon Kings, which are needleſs here to be recited; only from them (and eſpecially from that Pope's Letter to Auguſtine abovementioned) it appears, That Archbiſhop Auguſtine had conferred upon him, not only the Primacy, but the Juriſdiction over all the reſt of the Biſhops of that part Britain; and indeed Archbiſhop Lanfranc's Reaſon, why what was written to his Predeceſſors, ſhould extend to all his Succeſſors, is very ſubtil; for (ſays he) ſince, if thoſe Words of our Saviour to St. Peter, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church, are interpreted of all St. Peter's Succeſſors, by the ſame reaſon what was written to Auguſtine by the Pope, ſhould extend to all ſucceeding Archbiſhops of Canterbury. [1.] De Geſtis Pontif. Lib. 1. p. 112. b. & dein.

And indeed Lanfranc was ſo far in the Right, that the Argument is as good for the one as the other.

But notwithſtanding theſe Decrees of the Popes, we do not find that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury exerted this Juriſdiction at the firſt, for when (as * Bede relates) Pope Honorius had ſent two Palls for the two Metropolitans of Canterbury and York, that whenever one of them deceaſed, the Survivor might Conſecrate a new Archbiſhop in his ſtead. In the next Chapter he informs us, That Honorius being choſen

Yet for this the Superiority was not Ancient.

* Lib. 2.

Anno Dom. MLXXII. choſen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he went into the North to be Conſecrated by Paulinus Archbiſhop of York, and that Paulinus went as far as Lincoln to meet him, which ſhews nothing of that Superiority, that was long after claimed by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury over thoſe of York; nor do I find any ſuch to have been exerciſed by the ſaid Archbiſhop, till long after the Death of Paulinus, when York had for ſeveral years ceaſed to be an Archbiſhoprick. And in thoſe times, Archbiſhop Theodorus deprived Wilfred, Biſhop of York, in a Synod, which he held with the Biſhops of that Province, (as you may ſee related at large in the former Volumn) under Anno Dom. 678.

But when Egbert, Biſhop of York, did after many years re-obtain the Pall (and conſequently his Archiepiſcopal Juriſdiction) from the Pope, it was thereupon for many Ages after diſcharged from all Subjection to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as Primate of England; nor do we find any mention of a Profeſſion or Oath of Canonical Obedience required from the Archbiſhops of York to thoſe of Canterbury, till that famous Decree laſt mentioned, as [2.] Thomas Stubbs in his Hiſtory of the Archbiſhops of York has very well proved. This I thought fit to let the Reader know, That ſo he may underſtand by what means the Archbiſhops of Canterbury obtained, not only Superiority, but an Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over thoſe of York. But to return to Civil Affairs.

Anno Dom. MLXXIII. The next Year [3.] the War being again renewed between King William and the King of France; the former tranſported a great Army, as well Engliſh as Normans into Normandy; and then by the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh chiefly, he retook the City of Mans, and Province of Maine, which had lately revolted, not without making great Spoil in deſtroying the Vineyards, and burning of Towns.

[3.] C. S. F. W. The War renewed between England and France.

This is the Account which all our moſt Ancient Writers give of this Expedition, but the Manuſcript Hiſtory of Rog. of Wendover, which is Tranſcribed by Matt. Paris (as Matt. Weſtminſter Tranſcribes from him) inſtead of Cennomania, have under this year (by ſome Error in the Copies they made uſe of) inſerted Normannia; ſo that though they agree in the main circumſtances of this Relation, yet by this miſtake in the Name, they make a great Rebellion in Normandy this year, when indeed there was none at all there; and this miſtake in theſe Authors hath led Stow in his Engliſh Chronicle into the ſame, which I thought good to acquaint the Reader with.

[4.] Idem. Edgar Atheling again received into Favour.

Whilſt [4.] the King thus ſtayed in Normandy, Edgar Atheling came to him out of Scotland, by the way of England, and then went over with him, where the King received him again into favour with all his Followers, and being in the King's Court, he ſubmitted to ſuch Conditions as he was pleaſed to allow him: About the ſame time alſo, Earl Waltheof cruelly revenged the Death of Aldred, his Grandfather, upon the Sons of one Carle, who had cauſed him to be ſlain: for being all then feaſting together at a place called Settrington, the Earl ſent a Party of Horſe, who cut them all off by ſurprize. This was a very treachous and cruel Action, and would not have paſſed without a more ſevere Cenſure in any one, that had not been ſo highly devoted to the Monks, the only Hiſtorians of thoſe times.

Nor

Nor can I here omit taking notice of what was done this Year in England in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, when (as the Latin Copy of the Saxon Annals in Bennet-Colledge Library informs us) was held that great Plea, or Court, at Pinenden-Heath, in which Archbiſhop Lanfranc proved, That he held his Church, with all its Lands and Cuſtoms, as free as the King enjoys his Crown, except in three Points, (viz.) "If the King's High-way were dug up, or if a Tree being cut "down fell upon it, or if Man-ſlaughter was committed, or Blood "ſhed therein, whoever is taken in any of theſe things, having found "Pledges, ſhall pay his Mulct to the King, and then he ſhall be free "from the King's Officers.

Anno Dom. MLXXIII

A great Plea at Pinenden, about the Rights and Cuſtoms belonging to the Church of Canterbury.

But ſince [1.] Eadmerus has given us a more perfect Account concerning this great Suit, that then depended between the ſaid Archbiſhop, and Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, who (being Half-brother to the King, and Earl of Kent) had by his great Power ſeized upon divers Lands, belonging to the ſaid Archbiſhoprick, before ever Lanfranc came over; which when he came to underſtand, he gave the King an account of. He (though in Normandy) preſently ordered, That the chief and good Men, not only of the County of Kent, but alſo of other Counties of England, (where the Archbiſhop claimed any Lands) being aſſembled together, the Complaints of the ſaid Archbiſhop ſhould forthwith be examin'd, and determin'd by them. So there being an Aſſembly of the Great Men of the Kingdom appointed at Pinenden, (a large Heath or Common lying in the midſt of Kent) Godfrey, Biſhop of Conſtance, a Man very powerful at that time in England (being then the King's Lieutenant for this Affair) commanded Juſtice to be done to Archbiſhop Lanfranc; and in order thereunto, Egelric, Biſhop of Chicheſter, a Man ſingularly well vers'd in the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, was brought thither in a Waggon for his Advice and Aſſiſtance, being by reaſon of his great Age unable to ride; and Haymon the King's Sheriff, being alſo commanded to Summon the whole Country to give Evidence, (Biſhop Odo receiving likewiſe Orders to be there) the Archbiſhop's Cauſe was ſupported by ſuch ſtrong Reaſons and Proofs, that with the common Conſent and Judgment of all the Men there preſent, he recovered all thoſe Lands that were detained from his See, as alſo divers Cuſtoms, which were made out to have anciently belonged to Chriſt Church in Canterbury.

As [2.] for Foreign Affairs, this Year produced a great Alteration in the Church, for Pope Alexander dying, Two Popes were choſen at once, (viz. Hildebrand by the Name of Gregory the Seventh; and another Guibert, or Wibert, called Clement by the Emperor's Party) but Gregory was acknowledged, as lawfully Elected, by the Kings of France and England.

[2.] F. W. W. M. p. 61. Two Popes Elected at once.

One of the firſt things this New Pope did after his Acceſſion to the Papacy, was [3.] by Letters to demand an Oath of Fealty of King William for the Kingdom of England, to be held of the Roman See; becauſe (ſays he) the Royal Power is next under God to be ſubject to the Care and Government of the Apoſtolick; But the King who was not to be thus impoſed on, in Anſwer to the Pope's demand, returned this notable Letter, which Mr. Selden hath given us in his

Moſt Holy Father,

King William's Letter of denial to the Pope's demand.

"YOUR Legate, Hubert, coming unto me, admoniſhed me in "your behalf, that I ſhould do Fealty to You and your Succeſ- "ſors, and that I ſhould take better care for the Payment of the "Money, which my Predeceſſors were wont to ſend to the Church "of Rome; one of theſe I have granted, the other I have refuſed. "Fealty I would not do, nor will I, becauſe I neither promiſed it, "nor do I find that my Predeceſſors ever did it to yours; the Money "for almoſt three Years, (when I was abroad in France) hath been "but negligently collected, but now ſeeing by Divine Mercy I am "returned into my Kingdom, what is gathered, is ſent by the afore- "ſaid Legate, and the Arrears which remain, ſhall be ſent by the "Meſſengers of Lanfranc, our faithful Archbiſhop, in time convenient. "Pray for us, and for the good Eſtate of our Kingdom, becauſe we "have loved your Predeceſſors, and do deſire ſincerely to love, and "obediently to hear you above all others.

What pretence the Pope could have to demand this Fealty.

I know not what pretence the Pope could have to demand this Fealty, unleſs it were becauſe his Predeceſſor had ſent King William a conſecrated Banner, as a Token of his Approbation of his Expedition againſt Harold, and that therefore he ſuppoſed it muſt ever after owe Homage to the See of Rome; or elſe that he looked upon England as a Tributary Kingdom, becauſe of the Peter-pence which he received from it; and by reaſon of which moſt Popiſh Writers ſuppoſe England to have been always Feudetary to the Pope: And therefore Mr. Selden has here very much Reaſon to admire at the Confidence of Bertold of Conſtance, who in his Appendix to Hermannus Contractus, under the Year 1084. relates, "That King William the Conqueror "did then make the whole Kingdom of England Tributary to the "Church of Rome, nor would permit any one under his Power to "buy or ſell any thing whom he found diſobedient to the Apoſto- "lick See. Whereas indeed there was never any ſuch thing, for it was never a Tribute, but an Alms at firſt granted by King Ina to the Popes of Rome, and then regranted by King Athelwulf to be gathered all over England, as I have already ſhewn in the * former Volume; ſo that the beſt Reaſon I can give for this Demand of the Pope's, was, That it was this Pope Gregory that did it, who was the moſt bold and enterprizing Pope that ever ſate in that Chair, and who afterward humbled the Emperor, Henry the Fourth; but King William was ſo far from paying him any ſuch mean Submiſſion, that Eadmerus expreſly tells us, He would not permit any Subject in his Dominions to acknowledge any Pope, but whom he had firſt allowed of, nor ſo much as to receive his Letters, unleſs they had been firſt ſhewn to himſelf.

Peter-pence only an Alms granted by King Ina to the Popes of Rome.

But

But to return to our Engliſh Affairs. The [5.] ſame year that the King remained ſtill in Normandy, a dangerous Conſpiracy was formed againſt him, not only by ſome of the Engliſh, but alſo Norman Nobility; for Roger de Breteul, Earl of Hereford, now beſtowed his Daughter Emme in Marriage, againſt the King's Conſent, to Ralph de Waher, Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, (whoſe Father was an Engliſhman, but his Mother a Lady of Bretaign in France) this Earl then kept a magnificent Wedding at Ixningeham, near Newmarket in Cambridgeſhire, where Earl Roger, Earl Waltheof, ſome Biſhops and Abbots being preſent, they all reſolved to depoſe King William from the Kingdom, as being a Baſtard, but chiefly becauſe they were weary of his ſevere Government, and ſo deſired a Change; but Earl Waltheof, ſoon repenting of what he had done, having been (as he ſaid) overcome by the Wine he had Drank, and drawn in againſt his Will, went immediately to Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and confeſſing the whole Plot, received Abſolution from him; and then by his Advice going over into Normandy to the King, he there diſcovered it to him, ſubmitting himſelf to his Mercy; but the Noblemen abovementioned returning to their Caſtles, began the Rebellion with all their Joynt-forces, and confederating with the Welſhmen, they burnt and plundered ſeveral of the King's Towns; but the Governors of his Caſtles, together with the People of thoſe Countries, ſoon fruſtrated their Deſigns; for Wulſtan, Biſhop of Worceſter, with a great number of Men, (and Egelwin, Abbot of Eveſham, with his Tenants) being ſent for to his Aſſiſtance with Urſe, Sheriff of Worceſterſhire, and Walter de Lacey and his Men, all marching together, prevented the Earl of Hereford from paſſing the Severne, and joyning with Earl Ralph, and his Army, at the place appointed; but as for the latter, Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, and Godfrey, Biſhop of Conſtance, hindred him (being then encamped near Cambridge) from marching any further; whereupon the Earl ſeeing his Deſigns thus diſappointed, retreated back to Norwich, and there having committed the Caſtle, and the Gariſon that was in it, to the Cuſtody of his Wife, he took Ship, and ſailed over into Bretaign, and thence into Denmark; but his Enemies took as many of his Followers as they could find, and either kill'd or diſabled them; then the King's Lieutenants, abovementioned, laid cloſe Siege to the Caſtle of Norwich, and at laſt it was ſurrendred; the Counteſs, with thoſe of her Party, having the King's Permiſſion, left England, and went over into Denmark to her Husband, Earl Ralph, who ſometime after (as the Saxon Annals relate) bringing over along with him Cnute, Son to Sweyn, King of Denmark, and a certain Earl, called Hacun, returned into England with Two hundred Sail of Ships, but when they could not undertake any thing againſt King William, they went into Flanders.

The Noblemen break out into Rebellion, but are ſoon quell'd.

As ſoon as this buſineſs was over, the King returned in Autumn into England, and committed the Earls Roger and Waltheof cloſe Priſoners, notwithſtanding the latter had diſcovered the Conſpiracy, and implored his Mercy; then holding his Curia, or great Council at Weſtminſter, he baniſhed all the Conſpirators, puting out the Eyes of ſome, and cutting off the Hands of others, eſpecially the Welſhmen, who had been taken in the late Rebellion; but as for their Leaders, the Earls Roger and Waltheof, (being ing both condemned to dye) he committed them to a closer Prison.

By [1.] reason of this Conspiracy, William of Malmesbury excuses the Kings future Severity to the English, and says he had scarce found any of them faithful, which so exasperated his Temper towards them, that he bereft the more powerful first of their Money, then of their Lands, and at last many of them of their Lives: So that from this time we may date that remarkable Epocha, which the same Author mentions, (though under the Reign of King Edward the Confessor) and which had continued to his own time, viz. That England was then become the Habitation and Dominion of Strangers: So that it is certain, when he wrote, There was no Native, Original Englishman here, no * Earl, Bishop, or Abbot; but (says he) Foreigners devour the Riches of England, and knaw out its very Bowels.

* Princeps.

[2.] Page 521, 522. How far it may be true, that the King suffered no Englishman to enjoy any Place of Honour or Profit

And from this time (I suppose) it may be in great part true, what [2.] Ordericus Vitalis relates, that this King scarce permitted any Englishman to enjoy any Place of Honour, Profit, or Power; yet that a great many English Noblemen still enjoy'd Estates in England, notwithstanding [3.] Dr. Brady's Allegation to the contrary in his Compleat History, where two Years before this, he says, "That the Conqueror having baffled "the Earls Edwin and Morchar, the King divided the Nation among "his Assistants and Followers, having by hard Usage, Imprisonment, "and Banishment, made all the English to submit. But for this he gives on Authority besides his own Word; for Ordericus Vitalis, whom he cites in the Margin, says not one word of his giving the Lands among his Norman Followers this Year, neither fixes it to any certain time; and though it is true, he [4.] there gives us a Catalogue of divers great Estates given to the Norman Noblemen and Bishops, whom he thereparticularly mentions, and which the [5.] Doctor has transcribed Verbatim; yet I suppose he will not say, That those Estates were all the Lands of the Nation, or that all those to whom they were given were Normans, since it is certain, that one of them there mention'd, viz. Earl Waltheof was a Natural Englishman; and as for Ralph Guader, though he was a Bretaign by Extraction, yet he came not in with King William, but was settled here long before in King Edward's time; but since I have already proved in my Introduction, that let King William have bestowed those Estates when, and on whom he pleased, yet that he did not do it as a Conqueror, but as a Lawful Prince, who had right to bestow such Lands as were forfeited to him for the Treason, or Rebellion of their Owners; I shall say no more of that matter now, but refer the Reader to my Introduction for his farther Satisfaction.

Nothing else happen'd in England this year worth our notice, [1.] only that Queen Edgitha, Widdow of King Edward the Confessor, a Lady of great Piety, Prudence, and Learning, (above the ordinary rate of the Women of that Age) deceased a little before Christmas, and was buried by the King her Husband in the Abby-Church of Westminster, though we now do not find any Tomb there erected in her Memory.

[2.] F. W. A Council at Rome under Pope Gregory, against Priests marrying, or keeping any Women.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, [2.] this Year happened a very remarkable Alteration in the Western Church, for Pope Gregory the Seventh, being now pretty well fixed in his Seat, held a Council at Rome, wherein he not only forbad all Symoniacal Contracts, (i. e. buying or selling Eccleſiaſtical Benefices) but likewiſe all Prieſts, and Men in Orders, to have Wiues, or to keep Women in their Houſes (unleſs they were very near Relations) which ſevere Decree is juſtly Cenſured by [3.] Rad. de Diceto, as a new Example, introduced out of an immoderate prejudice againſt the Judgment of the Fathers of the Church; he there alſo ſhews the many inconveniences that happened by that Forced Continence of the Clergy, in which Cenſure he is likewiſe followed by Matt. Paris (though himſelf a Monk.)

ling

Anno Dom. MLXXIV.

[3.] Sub hoc Anno.

But this Decree not having the effect the Pope deſired, the year following he reinforced it by a Bull, which you may ſee at large in the Authors above-cited under the following Year, whereby he Prohibited all Perſons from hearing the Maſſes of ſuch Prieſts as would not quit their Wives; yet notwithſtanding, this Decree was not received in England till many years after, as you ſhall find in due Time.

In the beginning of this year [4.] Earl Waltheof was Beheaded without the City of Wincheſter, his Body being there Buried in the ſame place; but [5.] having been a great Benefactor to the Abbey of Croyland, it was ſometime after by the King's permiſſion taken up again, and ſent by the Abbot Walketule to be buried anew at that Monaſtery, where his Tomb ſoon after grew famous for Miracles, the Abbots and Monks crying him up for a Saint; which cauſed the King not long after to be ſo far diſpleaſed with that Abbot, that looking upon him as his Enemy, he depoſed him from his Office, and put Ingulphus (our Author) into his Place, as he himſelf informs us..

Anno Dom. MLXXV.

[4.] Id. Ib. Earl Waltheof Beheaded near Wincheſter.

[5.] Ingulph. p. 903. Then Buried at Croyland Abbey.

But though this Earl might not deſerve the Title of a Saint, yet this proceeding of the King's is juſtly cenſured by many of our Hiſtorians, as too ſevere (if not cruel) in putting the Nobleman (ſo nearly related to him) to Death; and who, though he had been drawn into the late Plot, yet he had likewiſe ſufficiently atton'd for it, by making the firſt diſcovery, and had before implored his Mercy: But it may be alledged on the King's behalf, that this was the ſecond time he had Rebelled againſt him, and had not been only received into Favour, but the King had alſo given him his Neice Judith in Marriage, together with the Earldoms of Northampton and Huntington, beſides that of Northumberland; and we may likewiſe here add, what Ingulph alſo tells us, that the King was inſtigated to this Execution, not only by divers Normans (and particularly Ivo Talboys) who gaped after ſome of his many Honours, and great Eſtate, but alſo by his own Lady, who deſiring another Husband, haſtened his end.

The King's Proceedings againſt him how far to be excuſed.

In [1.] the Spring following the King (having firſt committed the County of Northumberland to the care of Walcher Biſhop of Durham) tranſported an Army into little Bretaign, and there Beſieged the Caſte of Dole, which belonged to Ralph Earl of Norfolk, who had lately fled thither; but thoſe within defended it againſt him, till ſuch time as Phillip King of France came and raiſed the Siege, ſo that King William was forced to return from thence into England, with the loſs of a great many of his Men, and to paſs the reſt of the Year in Peace, though much againſt his will.

[1.] H. H. R. H. The Government of Northumberland committed to Walcher, whereupon the King paſſes over with an Army into Bretaigne.

This Year, (according to Brompton's Chronicle) a Synod was held in St. Paul's Church in London, under Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the uſe of Eccleſiaſtical Synods, being till then grown almoſt obſolete in England.

In which it was Ordain'd, that Biſhop's Sees ſhould be removed from ſmaller Towns to Cities, with the removes that happen'd thereupon.

But the firſt Canon made by it, was, concerning the Precedency of Biſhops in Synods and Councils, and the chief thing then Ordained was, That ſeveral of the Biſhops Sees ſhould be removed from ſmaller Towns to Cities; by vertue of which Decree the See of Selſey was tranſlated to Chicheſter; that of Wells to Bathe; that of Shirbune to Salisbury, (now called Old Sarum); that of Dorcheſter in Oxfordſhire to Lincoln; that of Litchfield to Cheſter; but Biſhop Robert the Succeſſor of Peter, who was at that time Biſhop, removed it from thence to Coventry; But ſome years after it was again removed to Litchfield.

Biſhop Wulſtan in this Council Deprived,

Alſo (according to the ſame Author) to this Council, Wulſtan Biſhop of Worceſter was ſummoned, as being one whom they had a mind to be rid of, becauſe he was the only Engliſh Biſhop that was left, therefore they accuſed him of Ignorance and Inſufficiency for his Office, and he was then ordered to be deprived; but he refuſing to deliver up his Paſtoral Staff and Ring to any but him who had firſt conferred it upon him, he went immediately to King Edward's Tomb, and (if you will believe the Monks that relate it) ſtruck the Staff ſo deep into the Stone, that none but himſelf was able to pull it out: By which Miracle (as they pretend) Archbiſhop Lanfranc being convinced, immediately recalled the Decree for his Deprivation, and ſuffered him to hold his Biſhoprick as long as he lived.

and how miraculouſly he came to be Reſtored.

But ſince neither Eadmerus, Florence of Worceſter, nor William of Malmeſbury, (who lived either in, or near thoſe times) mention any thing of it, it is to be looked upon as an invention of the next Century, when this Author lived.

This year [2.] Robert the King's Eldeſt Son, being diſcontented with his Father becauſe he would not ſuffer him to enjoy the Dutchy of Normandy, as he had promiſed him upon his acceſſion to the Crown of England, went over to the King of France, and ſtirred him up to make War againſt his Father; and ſo both together Invading Normandy, they burnt ſeveral Towns and did much miſchief, putting King William to a great deal of vexation and fatigue; yet there was a Peace ſoon after clapp'd up between the Kings of France and England, though it did not laſt very long.

The City of London burnt.

The ſame year (according to the Saxon Annals) there happened ſo great a Fire in London, that the like was never known ſince it was a City, for the greateſt part of it was quite burnt down: And alſo (as *Matt. The Abbey of St. Maries in York, Founded.

This year produced nothing of moment in England, for want of which we muſt take notice of ſome leſs matters, as particularly of the [3.] Founding of the Abby of St. Maries in York, by Alan Earl of Richmond, for Black Monks to the Honour of St. Olave; but it was afterwards Re-dedicated to the Bleſſed Virgin by his Brother Earl Stephen, at the Command of William Rufus, Anno Dom. 1089. This was a rich and ſtately Monaſtery, and the more remarkable, becauſe in the Tower once belonging thereunto, after the Reign of Henry the VIIIth. were carefully preſerved thoſe ancient Charters and Records that formerly belonged to moſt of the Monaſteries of the North part of England; from which the Induſtrious Mr. Dodſworth made thoſe vaſt Collections, which the Learned Sir William Dugdale afterwards inſerted into into his Firſt and Second Volumes of Monaſticon Anglicanum. This Tower with all the Records kept therein, being unhappily blown up in our late Civil Wars, the Memory of them had been quite loſt, had they not happened to be preſerved by the means above-mentioned. Anno Dom. MLXXVIII.

[4.] About this time alſo, the better to ſecure the City of London in Obedience, the King laid the Foundation of a ſtrong Caſtle or Citadel, entrenched with a large deep Ditch, lying on the Eaſt-ſide of the City, now called the Tower of London; the chief Surveyer of which Work was Gundulph, Biſhop of Rocheſter; and therefore this Relation of Stephanides is falſe, who would have it to be founded by Julius Cæſar, unleſs he had proved that the King only built it upon ſome old Foundations layed by him, which yet is not likely, ſince no Author relates, that Julius Cæſar ever came ſo far as London. [4.] Vid. Stow's Survey of London. The Tower. Vid. Regiſt. Eccleſ. Roff.

This year [5.] Malcolme, King of Scots, breaking the Peace lately made, invaded Northumberland as far as the River Tine, killed a great many Men, and carrying away more Priſoners, return'd home with large Spoils. Not long after which King William being then in France, was forced to defend himſelf againſt his Son Robert, who being again in Rebellion, held the Caſtle of Gerboret againſt his Father's Forces, who then came in Perſon to beſiege it; But his Son marching to its Relief, fought with that Obſtinacy, that encountring his Father hand to hand, unknown to him, (the Vizar of his Helmet being down) not only wounded him in the Arm, but alſo diſmounted him; but ſo ſoon as he heard his Voice, he immediately alighted, mounted him again on Horſeback, and begging his Pardon, let him go; for the King had very much the worſt of it, not only many of his Men being ſlain, and made Priſoners, but himſelf and his Son William were wounded, and put to flight. Anno Dom. MLXXIX. [5.] F. W. R. H. The King of Scots invades Northumberland. The defeat the King received from his Son Robert.

This was the only conſiderable Defeat he received in his whole Life; in all the reſt of which he was ſo fortunate, that even Foreign Nations dreaded his very Name.

But Bromton's Chronicle relates, That the King was ſo moved by the Valour and Generoſity of his Son, Prince Robert, that not long after he ſent Meſſengers to him, and made Peace with him, and they returned into England together, but however he could not thereby regain his Father's Favour. As you will ſee by the Sequel of this Story.

This year [1.] Walcher, Biſhop of Durham, was ſlain in a Town called Gateſheved, (i. e. Goatſhead near the River Tine) with above an hundred Men, all French or Flemmings; of which, becauſe it ſhews us the Ruin that oftentimes attends Great Men for being over-indulgent to their Servants, I ſhall here give you a particular Account from Simeon of Durham, and other Authors. There was an Engliſh Thane, called Ligwulf or Liulf, who had great Poſſeſſions in England, and finding all places at that time very uneaſy and unſafe, by reaſon of the Normans Inſolence, had removed himſelf and Family into the Biſhopprick of Durham, for he had married Algithe, the Daughter of Earl Aldred, upon which ſcore he was in great Favour with the Biſhop, who made uſe of his Council in ſeveral matters; for this he was much envied by Leobwin his Chaplain, who before govern'd all things in the Biſhoprick according to his pleaſure; but was now very angry becauſe Anno Dom. MLXXX. [1.] F. W. S. D. Walcher, Biſhop of Durham ſlain, and the occaſion of it.

Anno Dom. MLXXX.

becauſe the Biſhop preferr'd Ligwulf's Council in moſt Affairs to his; and therefore one day after a great Diſpute that happened between them inthe Biſhop's preſence concerning ſome publick Buſineſs, Leobwin was ſo enraged at his being contradicted, that he went immediately to one Gilebert, the Biſhop's Kinſman, and who as his Deputy governed the whole County of Northumberland, deſiring him to revenge him upon Ligwulf, and diſpatch him out of the way as ſoon as he could, which Gilebert preſently promiſed him to do.

[2.] Idem. Ibid. Leobwin and Gilebert conſpire to murder Ligwulf, at which the Biſhop is much concerned, but does not puniſh them.

[2.] So [2.] taking along with him a Company of Men, he went one Night to the Houſe where Ligwulf lived, and wickedly murdered him and all his Family; which when the Biſhop knew, he was very much troubled, and in a Paſſion pulling off his Hood, and flinging it on the Ground, told Leobwin, (being there preſent) that he had by his wicked Contrivances been the Ruin of himſelf and his whole Family; Then retiring into the Caſtle, he immediately ſent Meſſengers throughout all Northumberland, to publiſh that he was wholly Innocent of the Death of Ligwulf, and that only Gilebert and his Companions were guilty of it, whom he had already Out-lawed; upon this divers Meſſengers paſſing between him and the Kindred of the Party ſlain, he appointed them a certain place and time where they ſhould come, and make a firm Peace and Agreement with him; at the Day prefixed, the Biſhop came to a Town called Gateſheved, i. e. Goatſhed, yet would not Treat with them abroad in the open Air, but in the Church with his Clerks, and Feudal-Knights, i. e. thoſe that held of him by Knights-Service, whoſe Advice being taken in this Affair, he ſent out more than once ſome of his People to make Peace with the dead Party's Kindred, but they would not agree to his Propoſals, becauſe they believed Ligwulf was ſlain by his Command; for Leobwin had not only received Gilebert into his Houſe the Night after the Murder, but alſo the Biſhop had again taken him into his Favour and Family; wherefore they firſt fell upon, and ſlew all thoſe who belonged to the Biſhop, who were without the Church, and ſuſpected no ſuch matter; thereupon the Biſhop to ſatisfy their Fury, commanded his Kinſman Gilebert (whoſe Life they chiefly ſought) to go out of the Church, but ſome Knights immediately following to defend him, they were all in a moment kill'd by the Enemies without; then Walcher underſtanding that their Fury could not be otherwiſe aſſwaged unleſs Leobwin, the Author of all this miſchief were given up, deſired him to go out to them, but he abſolutely refuſing it, the Biſhop himſelf went to the Doors of the Church, begging his Life might be ſpared, but this being denied by the Conſpirators, the Biſhop then covered his Head with his Gown, went out, and was preſently run through with their Swords; then they called upon Leobwin to come out, who ſtill abſolutely refuſing it, they ſet Fire to the Roof of the Church, and ſo at laſt he being half burnt leaped forth, and was there preſently cut to pieces.

The Biſhop and Leobwin, both murdered.

This Tragical End had Biſhop Walcher, and all his Company, which conſiſted of near a hundred Men; and that for want of a due Execution of Juſtice; for had he at firſt puniſhed thoſe wicked Servants of his, (as he ought to have done) he had ſaved his own Life, and all thoſe that belonged to him.

But

But the Monks of Girwy (or Tarrow) ſo ſoon as they heard of the Biſhop's Murther, took a Boat and came thither, and finding the Biſhop's Body (though ſcarce to be known by reaſon of the many Wounds it had received) carried it to their Monaſtery, from whence it was ſoon after removed to Durham, and there ſolemnly Buried ſo ſoon as the Rebels were departed; for after the Murther they had marched thither, and Beſieged the Caſtle for four days, but could not take it, becauſe the followers of the deceaſed Biſhop manfully defended it; but on the fourth day when they ſaw it was in vain to attempt it any longer, they retired; and being diſperſed, all thoſe that had any hand in the Biſhop's death were ſlain ſoon after, or elſe leaving their Horſes, wander'd about like baniſhed Men.

Anno Dom. MLXXX.

[3.] Sim. Dun. Hiſt. Sux Eccleſ. Coll. 48. The Monks of Tarrow Bury the Biſhop's Body.

But Matthew Paris relates this Story ſomewhat otherwiſe, and more to Biſhop Walcher's diſadvantage, viz. That, contrary to his Epiſcopal Function, troubling himſelf with Temporal Affairs, he bought the Earldom of Northumberland of King William, and there acted the part of a Sheriff rather than a Biſhop; and buſying himſelf in the Secular Courts, extorted vaſt ſummes of Money from the People of all Ranks and Conditions; till at laſt the ordinary ſort of People, being by the Exactions of the Biſhop and his Officers reduced to Extremity, were ſo highly incenſed, that Aſſembling privately together, they unanimouſly agreed to meet Armed at the County-Court to repel any Injuries if there were occaſion; but when all the People of the Country came into that Court, and making their Complaints, deſired Juſtice to be done them for ſeveral injuries; then the Biſhop roughly anſwered them, That he would do no Man Juſtice in any matter unleſs he firſt paid him down Forty Pounds in good Money; then one of them ſpeaking for all the reſt, asked leave of the Biſhop that he might confer with his Brethren about this Demand, that ſo he might the better know what anſwer to return him, which the Biſhop agreeing too, and that they had now withdrawn themſelves for a little while; at laſt one of them, whoſe Opinion they all depended on, cried out in Engliſh, ſhort * Rede, good Rede, Slea ye the Biſhop, and then all of them at this word taking Arms, cruelly fell upon, and ſlew the Biſhop and a hundred of his Company at a Town near the River Tine, where the County Pleas were then held.

Matt. Paris relates this ſtory more to the Biſhop's diſadvantage.

Note, That Rede ſignifies as much as Law, or Judgment.

[4.] King William, when he heard of this Barbarous Murther, ſo deteſted it, that he preſently ſent down Odo Biſhop of Bayeux with a great Force to revenge it, who waſting moſt of Northumberland, killed all thoſe whom he could find to have been any ways concern'd in it.

[4.] S. D. The King ſends down Biſhop Odo to revenge Walcher's death.

To this time (I ſuppoſe) we may alſo refer what [5.] Ingulphus relates, that the King leading, or rather ſending an Army into Northumberland (where the Danes formerly uſed to Land), they laid that County deſert for many Miles together, which (as * William of Malmeſbury adds), he ordered to be done to prevent Cnute, King of Denmark (whom he was then afraid of) from Landing in thoſe Parts, ſince if he did, he might find no Proviſions or Forrage either for Men or Horſes; but I ſuppoſe this Author forgets himſelf in placing this Action, the ſame year in which the King took the City of York; ſince not Cnute but Swain was then King of Denmark; and I ſuppoſe Ingulphus alſo forgot himſelf, when he places this Action near five Years

Anno Dom. MLXXX. after, when there was a fear of that King's Invading England; whereas we do not find by any other Author, that King William ſent an Army into the North that Year.

[1.] Id. Ib. The King ſends his Son Robert againſt the King of Scots. Newcaſtle upon Tine Built.

[1.] Not long after this, about Autumn, King William ſent his Son Prince Robert into Scotland againſt King Malcolm; but when he came as far as a place called Egglesbreth, he returned without doing any thing, except the building of a Caſtle upon Tine, at a Ford or Paſſage where had been before a ſmall Village, called Monkceſter, from certain Monks who lived there in great Auſterity and Retirement: But after the building of this Forteſs, it was from thence called (as it is at this Day) New-Caſtle upon Tine.

[2.] Lib. 2. A notable Tryal concerning the Lands and Liberties of the Abby of Ely, with the manner of it.

This year alſo (according to the [2.] Manuſcript Hiſtory of Ely), was held that notable Tryal concerning the Lands and Liberties of that Monaſtery, which had lain for fourteen Years neglected and oppreſſed by the unjuſt Exactions of the King's Officers; but at length the King being touch'd in Conſcience for it; did in the preſence of his chief Nobles, command all the Matters to be tryed before Odo Biſhop of Bayeux at a place called Kenetford: At this Tryal many Perſons of Quality were preſent, there being ſeveral Inqueſts from the Four adjacent Countries united for this Purpoſe: Four of them were Abbots, with their French and Engliſh Tenants, viz. Baldwin Abbot of St. Edmundsbury; Ulfwold of Certſey; Ulfchetel of Croyland; and Alfwold of Holme; as alſo Richard the Earl's Son; and Haymon the Sewer; beſides the Sheriffs Picot, and Euſtace with their Men, other approved Knights both French and Engliſh: And then it was ſoon determin'd that St. Ethelred ſhould enjoy all that was her's, as freely as ſhe had done in the Times of the Engliſh Saxon King's, diſcharged from all ſecular Servitude whatever; for the farther Confirmation of which they alſo obtain'd the King's Charter, directed to all his faithful Subjects, and to all Sheriff's where the Abby had Lands, that they ſhould ſuffer it to enjoy all its Cuſtoms, viz. Sac, Soc, Tol and Team, Infangtheof, Hanſocne, Gritbreche, Fibtwite and Ferdwite within the Burrough and without, and all other Forfeitures, as had been by his Command adjudged at Kenetford before his Barons (as hath been above related): Thus the Lands of the Church of Ely were for the future ſettled in Peace.

I have been the more particular in this Relation, to let you ſee that King William in cold Blood did not think he had any Right by Conqueſt over the Lands belonging to the Church.

Anno Dom. MLXXXI. This year [3.] paſſed without much Action, only the King being provoked by the Incurſions of the Welſh, marched with a great Army into Wales, and ſubdued them, and made them ſubmit to his Terms: one of the chiefeſt of which was, to make them ſet at Liberty a great many Priſoners whom they had then taken.

[3.] C. S. F. W. King William Subdues the Welſh.

After [4.] this the King went over into Normandy, where the Archbiſhop of Roüen held a great Council or Synod of the Clergy at Liſlebone, at which the King and a great many Noblemen were preſent; and then He return'd again into England.

[4.] M. P. And then paſſes into Normandy.

Anno Dom. MLXXXII. This year affords little worth noteing, only the King being now inform'd that [5.] Odo his half-Brother, whom he had made Biſhop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, aſpired to the Papacy, and that he had bought a Pallace at Rome, whither he was going with a great Retinue and and much Treaſure; the King came upon him on the ſudden being then in the Iſle of Wight, ready to go to Sea, and ſeized him with his own Hand, when he could not perſuade thoſe that were with him to do it, who ſaid he was a Clerk, and ſo could not be ſentenced without the Judgment of the Pope; but the King replyed, he ſeized him as Earl of Kent and not as a Clerk or Biſhop, whereupon all his vaſt Treaſure was taken from him, and his Eſtate ſeized on: The Crimes laid to his Charge were the mighty Oppreſſions of the People during his Government, and the Seduction of the King's Subjects to forſake the Realm without his Leave; for he had engaged Hugh Earl of Cheſter with a great many Knights and other Perſons of Quality to attend him in his Journey to Rome.

Anno Dom. MLXXXII. [5.] O. V. P. 680. Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, ſeized and committed to Priſon, and for what.

Nothing happen'd this year conſiderable in England, unleſs that all things continued in a moſt profound Peace; neither can I any where find, whether King William came into England, or continued ſtill in Normandy till the year following.

Anno Dom. MLXXXIII.

Therefore for want of other Matter in England, I will here inſert a piece of Monaſtic Hiſtory; [1.] King William had made one Thurſtan a Monk of Caën Abbot of Glaſtenbury, a Man of a violent Temper and no Diſcretion; among other imprudent Actions, he muſt needs oblige his Monks to leave off the old Gregorian Way of ſinging Service, and to learn a new One, invented by one William a Monk of Feſcamp, which the Monks refuſing to follow, having been long uſed to another Way; the Abbot reſolved to compel them by Force; and to this End brought ſome Souldiers into the Choir, who falling upon the Monks, murthered divers of them at the very Altar, and pierced the very Crucifix with their Arrows: the poor Monks being thus put to it, did what they could to defend themſelves with the Forms and Candleſticks of the Church; and being ſuperior to them in Number, at laſt drove the Souldiers out of the Church, but not without great loſs, Two of the Monks being killed, and many more wounded.

[1.] C. S. F. W. A ſquabble between the new Abbot and the Monks of Glaſtenbury.

The King [2.] being inform'd of this ſad Accident, depos'd the Abbot, and ſent him back to his old Abby in Normandy; and leſt the Monks (who were Engliſh) ſhould brag of their Succeſs, he ordered many of them to be ſent to divers Monaſteries there to be kept Priſoners; this Relation may ſerve to ſhew the folly and miſchief of making Alterations in Religious Rites, and then impoſing them upon People by Force.

[2.] F. W. The King depoſes the Abbot, and Impriſons the Monks.

As to Foreign Affairs, I ſhall only take Notice, that this Year the [3.] Emperour Henry the IV. took the City of Rome, and drove Hildebrand who was called Pope Gregory the VII. from thence, and then placed one Wibert in the Papal Chair, whom he called Clement; in the mean while Gregory fled to Beneventum, and there continued till his Death, which happened not long after.

Anno Dom. MLXXXIV.

And ſince nothing was done in England worth noteing; I ſhall give here a farther Account from the ſame Author of what was done in Italy this [4.] Year. Pope Gregory now lying upon his Death-bed, ſent for Twelve of the Cardinals in whom he moſt truſted, and there confeſſed to God and St. Peter, that he had highly offended in the Exerciſe of his Paſtoral Charge; and had by the Inſtigation of the Devil, ſtirred up hatred and contention among Mankind; and then ſent his Confeſ-for to the Emperour and to the whole Church to Pray for him, and ſo not long after he died.

[5.] P. 61.

This I thought fit to take notice of, becauſe I find it in no other Author except Florence of Worceſter. [5.] William of Malmesbury gives a high Character of him for thoſe Reformations he took upon him to make in the Church; yet confeſſes he had made the abovementioned Emperour Henry, to wait at his Gates bare-footed, and that (as other Authors ſay) for the ſpace of two Days in the midſt of Winter, without ever admitting him into his Preſence, pretending the Emperour was guilty of Sacriledge and Inceſt: But he was ſo exaſperated with this Affront, that it was no wonder, that he afterwards did that Pope all the miſchief he could.

[1.] Id. Ib. A great Tax of Six Shillings upon each Hyde, and the Occaſion of it.

[1.] I find [1.] little done in England this Year, only the King laid an intolerable Tax of no leſs than Six Shillings upon every Hyde of Land throughout England; which I ſuppoſe was levied by vertue of that Prerogative, the King then claim'd of impoſing the old Tax of Danegelt upon the Nation, when ever he thought it in danger of an Invaſion, and there ſeem'd then good cauſe for it.

Anno Dom. MLXXXV.

[2.] C. S. F. W. Cnute King of Denmark, and Robert Earl of Flanders ready to invade England.

For in the beginning of this Year, [2.] Cnute King of the Danes having got together a great Fleet, was by the Aſſiſtance of his Father-in-Law Robert Earl of Flanders ready to invade England: Upon which News, the King being then in Normandy, he preſently raiſed many Thouſands of mercenary Souldiers in that Province, as alſo in France, and return'd with them into England in Autumn, whom as ſoon as they arrived, he quartered upon all the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons and Sheriffs, as alſo upon his own * Reeves or Stewards throughout the whole Kingdom. Where by this Action it appears, that though theſe Souldiers had then free Quarters, yet the Burthen was laid equally upon the whole Nation, his own Tenants not being excuſed from it.

* Præpoſitis Regis.

The danger over, the Army ſent back.

But when he found that his Enemies were hindered from making any Invaſion this Year, by reaſon of the contrary Winds; he ſent back part of the Army into Normandy and the reſt he detain'd here all the Winter, but by the Spring following the fear of this Invaſion was vaniſhed.

[3.] Ingulphus, O. V. P. 647. Queen Matbilda dies.

Whilſt [3.] the King continued thus in England, his Queen Matbilda (who was left to Govern Normandy in his Abſence) deceaſed on the Firſt of November after a lingering ſickneſs, the News of which was a great Affliction to her Husband, for he loved her very tenderly, tho' not long before her Death there had been ſome difference between them, about their Son Robert, whom ſhe privately ſupplied with Monies, with which he maintained Souldiers, that were often made uſe of againſt his Father; who being much concern'd at it, and taxing his Queen with too much Fondneſs to ſo undutiful a Son, ſhe juſtified her ſelf by ſaying that that Son was the greateſt Comfort ſhe had; which highly provoked the King, who loved him the leaſt of any of his Children; beſides this, ſhe had no other Fault, being a pious and prudent Princeſs, and in all other things very Obſervant of her Husband. He to expreſs his Affection for her Memory, made a very Noble Funeral for her; the Body being buried in the Nunnery of the Holy Trinity in Cäen, which ſhe her ſelf had founded: [4.] The King took her Death ſo much to Heart, that he is reported to have abſtain'd ever after from his wonted Recreations. Anno Dom. MLXXXV.

Death

I have put the Death of this Queen under this Year, therein following the Authority of Ingulphus who was then alive, and mentions it as a great Misfortune to him, and therefore it is not likely he ſhould forget the year when it happened; and he is alſo ſeconded by Ordericus Vitalis, who alſo places it under this very Year; which I thought fit to take notice of, becauſe the Saxon Annals and Florence of Worceſter, as alſo the reſt of our Engliſh Hiſtorians who have followed them, place her Death two Years ſooner than indeed it happened, viz. in the Year 1083.

Anno Dom. MLXXXVI.

The [5.] King kept his Chriſtmas at Gloceſter, where he beſtowed the Biſhopricks of London, Thetford and Cheſter, upon his three Chaplains, Maurice, William and Robert; after which he kept his Whitſuntide at Weſtminſter, where he made his Son Henry a Knight: And [1.] not long after he ſummon'd all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons and Sheriffs, together with their Military Tenants, to meet him at Salisbury, on the laſt of July, and when they came thither, he made all of them to take an Oath of Fidelity to himſelf againſt all Men whatſoever; from thence he went into the Iſle of Wight in order to paſs over into Normandy, and whilſt he lay there, he extorted a great deal of Money from the Subjects, upon ſome Pretences or other, whither he had any Right to it or not: [2.] And then he paſſed over into Normandy, where Edgar Atheling having obtain'd the the King's leave went into Italy with two Hundred Knights, from whence he paſſed into the Holy Land with Robert the Son of Godwin to Fight againſt the Sarracens, but his Siſter Chriſtina had ſome time before vow'd her ſelf a Nun in the Monaſtery of Rumſey in Hampſhire.

But the greateſt and moſt notable Action of this Year, was [3.] that great Survey, which this King had ſix Years before began, but was not till now finiſhed, having ſent as Commiſſioners ſome of the greateſt Earls and Biſhops of the Kingdom; who by the Verdict or Preſentment of Juries, or certain Perſons Sworn in every County, Hundred or Wapentach, enquired and noted down, what Arable-Land, Paſture, Meadow and Wood every Man had, and what was the Extent and Value of them, in the time * of King Edward. And alſo at the ſame time, the Survey was made by Counties, Hundred Towns or Mannors, Hydes, half-Hydes, * Virgates and Acres of Arable-Land, Meadow, Paſture and Wood. Alſo they noted what Mills and Fiſhings, and in ſome Counties, what and how many Free-Men, Sock-Men, Villains, Borders, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, working Horſes, &c. belong'd to every Town and Mannor, and whoſe they were; always in every County ſetting down the King's Name firſt, and after him all his Great Men in order, that held of him in Chief, with Numbers placed before them, for the better finding them in the Book, as may be ſeen in the Catalogue of Tenants in Chief, or the Poſſeſſors of ſuch Lands at the time of the Survey: All England (except the Three Counties of Weſtmorland, Cumberland and Northumberland) was deſcribed, with part of Wales; and the Deſcription or Survey written was in two Books, now called the great and little Domeſday-Book, remaining in the cuſtody of the Vice-Chamberlain's of

This is [4.] Dr. Brady's Account of it; and from whom I make bold to borrow it, having, as I ſuppoſe, ſtudied it very exactly, yet not ſo well, but that he has made ſome falſe Interpretations of divers Paſſages in it, as alſo wrong Deductions from it, of which I have taken notice in my Introduction.

[5.] P. 516. b.

I ſhall alſo from [5.] Ingulphus, an Author who lived in the very time when this Book was made, farther ſhew you the reaſon of its Name. This Survey (ſays he), was called the Roll of Wincheſter, (becauſe firſt kept there), and is by the Engliſh called Domeſday (i. e. * Liber Judiciarius) or the Book of Judgment: King Alfred alſo long before made ſomewhat a like Roll, in which all England was ſurvey'd by Counties, Hundreds and Tythings, which was kept at Wincheſter.

* Doom, ſignifies Judgment in Old Engliſh.

Beſides what this antient Writer ſays of it, the Author of the Black Book in the Exchequer (not without appearance of Reaſon) ſuppoſes, That the Name of Domeſday was firſt given to this Book, becauſe it is no more lawful to depart, or appeal from what is in it, than from the Day of Dome, or laſt Judgment.

Since being the higheſt Record in the Kingdom, it was then (and is to this day) a deciſive Evidence in any Controverſy or Tryal, in which there may be occaſion to make uſe of it.

[1.] Ing. p. 908.

Yet is it not for all that, [1.] ſo exact a Survey as our Monkiſh Hiſtorians repreſent it, who ſuppoſe there was not a Hyde, or Yard-Land, or a Lake or Fiſh-Pool, or any Town or Place, that is not ſet down in theſe Books: To which [2.] William of Malmesbury alſo adds, that the King did then take an Account how many Heads or Perſons there were in England; all which are miſtakes, for ſince (as Dr. Brady well obſerves), this Survey was chiefly intended to give the King a true Account of his own Lands or Demeſnes, as alſo what were held by his Tenants in * Capite: It is not to be admired, if many of thoſe Towns and Villages, which were then held by their Feudataries or under Tenants, are quite left out and omitted in it: And I my ſelf have obſerved ſome Cities and Towns of Note, which are not mention'd, as any one may find, that will but take the Pains to compare it with an exact Catalogue of the antient Towns and Villages in England, the greateſt part of which, he will not be able to find there. The like I may ſay concerning the Number of Inhabitants then in England: For firſt, there are no Women nor Children at all taken notice of, and the number of Free-Men, Sock-Men, * Cottagers, Servants and Villains, is only noted in ſuch Townſhips or Villes, as then belonged to the King or his Head Tenants; nor was this done in all Counties with a like exactneſs: ſo that whoever ſhould go about to reckon the Numbers of Men in England from theſe Books, will find that they muſt needs have been three times as many as are there regiſtred, or elſe this Kingdom could never have raiſed ſuch Great Armies as it did in thoſe Times. But whoever deſires to be farther ſatisfied concerning the Manner and Method of entering Places and Lands in theſe Books, may conſult Dr. Brady's Hiſtory, p. 206, 207. but this much I thought fit fit to mention, to obviate thoſe falſe Notions that ſome have framed concerning it. Anno Dom. MLXXXVI.

But however exact and faithful this Survey is ſuppoſed to be, yet Ingulphus himſelf owns, that the Inquirers, or Aſſeſſors, who gave in their Accounts, were very favourable to his Abby (as foreſeeing the King's future Exactions) and did not return the exact Survey of that Monaſtery, either according to the true Value, or Extent of its Lands; and I doubt not but other Monaſteries likewiſe found the like Favour: Yet certainly this Author never intended that this Hiſtory of his own Abby ſhould be made publick, for had this falſe return of the Aſſeſſors, been once known, it might have cauſed this King, or his Succeſſors, to have made a new Servey, not only upon this but other Monaſteries.

Anno Dom. MLXXXVII.

The beginning of this Year proved very unhappy to England, by [3.] reaſon of the cruel Feavers and Famines that deſtroyed many; alſo that ſudden Fires conſumed ſeveral of the Principal Cities in England; and that the Church of St. Paul, with the greater and better Part of the City of London, were burnt to the ground.

[3.] Ingulph. S. St. Paul's Church with great Part of London burnt.

King William [4.] having now ſettled his Affairs in England, paſſed over into Normandy with a Great Army, to make War upon the King of France, but not long after there was a Truce made between them, for ſome time; which was well obſerved on King William's Part, until the King of France happened one Day to jeſt at that King's great corpulency (for which he was then in a Courſe of Phyſick), That ſure his Brother of England had lain in long enough of his Great-belly, and might now afford to go abroad: Which bitter Scoff being told the King (who was then at Roüen) he ſo deeply reſented it, that he ſwore by God's Reſurrection (an Oath which he had fram'd on purpoſe to appear more terrible to his Hearers) that ſo ſoon as he was up again from his lying in, he would offer a thouſand Lights in France at his up-ſitting; thereby alluding to the Cuſtom of lying in of Women of thoſe Times, who were won't to offer lighted Candles at their Churching: And in Auguſt following the King, to make good his Oath, entered France with a Great Army, deſtroying the Corn and Fruits, and burning a great many Towns, and did a world of Miſchief; he then beſieged the City of Mante, and having ſoon taken it, burnt it, with the Churches therein, commanding the Fire to be continued, till they were alſo burnt to the ground.

[4.] Idem. W. M. P. 63. The King paſſes into Normandy, and is highly provoked by a bitter Jeſt of the French King's.

King William enters France, and burnt Mante with all the Churches.

But [5.] the King, being too earneſt and intent upon this Buſineſs, was put into a great Heat, as well by reaſon of the warmth of the Seaſon, as the Fire, which he ſtood on purpoſe to behold; and then in his Retreat leaping over a Ditch on Horſe-back (being very corpulent) he ſo bruiſed the rimm of his Belly againſt the Pummel of the Saddle, that it caſt him into a dangerous Diſtemper, his Belly being ever after in great Pain; ſo that finding himſelf incurable, [1.] he ſent for * Anſelm, then Abbot of Bec (and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury) that by his Prayers and Interceſſion he might (if poſſible) recover his Health; but it was to no Purpoſe, for Anſelm himſelf was taken with ſuch a Diſtemper, that he could not wait on the King, nor the King go to viſit him, his Diſeaſe ſtill encreaſing upon him: So that perceiving the time of his Death at hand, he began to think of Acts of Mercy, and then gave Order for the ſetting at liberty the Earls Morchar, [5.] Idem. The King over heats himſelf, and alſo bruiſes his Belly with leaping a Ditch, which caſt him into an incurable Diſtemper.

Morchar, Roger and Syward (the Son of Barn); as alſo Wulnoth, Brother to King Harold, whom he had kept a Priſoner from his Child-hood, together with all others that were in Cuſtody, either in England or Normandy.

[2.] O. V. P. 65.

But [2.] as for his half-Brother Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, it was not without the great importunity of his Brother Robert Earl of Mortaign, and others, that he only gave Conſent to his Releaſe: Becauſe he foreſaw he would raiſe freſh Diſturbances as ſoon as he was ſet at Liberty.

How the King on his Death-bed bequeathed his Dominions.

The ſame Author has likewiſe given us the King's dying Speech, which contains alſo his laſt Will, "whereby, tho' he bequeathed to Robert his Eldeſt Son the Dutchy of Normandy; yet as for the Kingdom of England, he ſaid, that he would not make any Body his Heir of it: For he durſt not leave that, which he had obtain'd by ſo many Crimes, to any but to God, in whoſe Power all things were; tho', he ſaid, he could wiſh it were God's will, that his Son William, who had been always moſt Obedient to him, might enjoy it after his Deceaſe. As for his Eldeſt Son, Robert, he makes his Father to call him on his Death-bed a proud fooliſh Knave, and that the Country would be very Miſerable, whenever it came under his Dominion: Yet that he would leave it to him, becauſe he had long ſince engaged ſo to do: But to Henry his Third Son (then alive), he left no more then five Thouſand Marks in Money, without any Territories; which his Son repining at, asked his Father, what he ſhould do with the Money, unleſs he had ſome Place left him to ſecure it? And then, he makes the King thus to Encourage him, "bidding him to be of good Courage, for in time he ſhould enjoy all that Honour, which he himſelf now had, and that he ſhould exceed both his Brothers in Glory and Riches; which if it were really ſpoken, was a ſtrange Prediction of what afterwards happen'd. Our Author alſo makes him in his long winded ſpeech, not only to ſet forth at large his own warlike Actions, and charitable Deeds, in founding and enriching ſo many Monaſteries, but alſo makes him to confeſs his own Cruelty and Oppreſſion of the Engliſh, in putting ſo many of them to Death, and diſinheriting others of their Eſtates.

The Effect of the King's Letter to Archbiſhop Lanfranc, about making William Rufus King.

Moſt of which ſeems very improbable, and perhaps might be added by this Monk, in hatred of Duke Robert, for whom the Church-Men had as great a Contempt, as they had a Veneration for his younger Brother Henry. But this is more certain (which the ſame Author relates), that the King, not long before his Death, fearing leſt ſome ſuddain diſturbances might thereupon happen in England, wrote a Letter to Archbiſhop Lanfranc on his Son William's behalf, concerning the electing or ordaining him King*; which ſo ſoon as he had obtain'd, and likewiſe receiv'd his Father's laſt Benediction, he immediately rid away as faſt as he could to the Sea-ſide; and as for Henry, he went alſo away to ſecure the Money his Father had left him.

The King lies in a Village near Roüen.

The [3.] King having ſettled his Affairs concerning this Life, the better to prepare for that to come; cauſed himſelf to be removed to the Village of Hermentrude (which lies on the other ſide of the River Seine over againſt Roüen) to avoid the Noiſe and Diſturbance of the City, where he preſently after departed this Life. So ſoon as the Breath was out of his Body, all his Attendants left it, except one Servant;

vant; then the [4.] Corps being privately conveyed over the Water in a ſmall Boat, it was from thence carried to be buried in [5.] the Abby Church of Caën which the King himſelf had founded; when one Anſelm Fitz Arthur a Country Gentleman came, and challenged the very Soil in which the Grave was made, affirming that it was his Inheritance, and had been unjuſtly taken from him, demanding Satisfaction for it; which was immediately given by the Biſhops and Noblemen there preſent, paying him ſixty Shillings for the Place of the Sepulchre, and promiſing to ſee him farther ſatisfied for the reſt of the Ground; which they afterwards ſaw performed.

His Body is bury'd at the Abby of Caën and the diſturbance at the Funeral.

Thus He, who not long before was Lord of ſo many large Territories, had not now Ground enough of his own to be buried in: He deceaſed on the 6th of the Ides (i. e. the 9th) of September, in the ſixty firſt Year of his Age, and the fifty ſecond of his Dukedom, and the two and twentieth of his Reign, as King of England; for he had Govern'd this Kingdom (reckoning from the Time of his Coronation) one and twenty Years and ten Months.

The time of his Death, and how long he lived, and reigned.

I ſhall conclude this King's Life with a Deſcription of his Perſon, and a Character of his Diſpoſition, taken from two antient Authors who lived in, or very near thoſe Times.

A Deſcription of this King's Perſon, with a Character of his Diſpoſition.

*He was of a moderate Stature, but very Corpulent in his latter Years; he had a ſevere Countenance, but was of ſuch great Strength in his Arms, that none elſe could bend his Bow, which nevertheleſs he could eaſily do on Horſe-back with his Foot, pulling at the ſame time the String with his Hand; he was of a Noble Preſence, ſitting or ſtanding, but his too great Corpulency towards his latter Days render'd his Shape ſomewhat unſizey; of ſo ſtrong a Conſtitution, that he had no dangerous Sickneſs, till that of which he dy'd.

W. M. * Ad fin. vita.

As for his Recreations, above all others He admir'd Hunting, ſo that he beſtowed what time he had to ſpare, from his more ſerious Affairs upon it, and for that End he deſtroyed many Villages and Towns on the Coaſts of Hampſhire, for above thirty Miles together and turned that Country into a Deſart, which being ſtock'd with Deer was called the New-Foreſt; though good part of it having been long before a great Wood, was by the Engliſh called Ttene; theſe Deer he forbad to be killed by any without his Warrant under great Penalties; and therefore it was looked upon as a juſt Judgment, that not only Richard his Son came to his Death by Hunting in this Forreſt; but alſo Richard his Grandſon by Duke Robert there alſo loſt his Life, being taken up by the Neck between the Branches of a Tree as he rid underneath it: As for his Son William who reigned after him, what an unfortunate End he met with, as he hunted in this Forreſt, you will find when you come to the end of his Reign.

But for the reſt of this King's good Qualities, they are theſe, according to the Account of the ſame Author; He was very Magnificent in his Entertainments, keeping the Feaſts of Chriſtmas at Glouceſter; that of Eaſter at Wincheſter; that of Whitſuntide at Weſtminſter, every year whilſt he ſtay'd in England; and then he there ſummon'd all the Great Men of the Kingdom, as well Clergy as Laity; that the Ambaſſadours of Foreign Nations might ſee the Appearance of ſo great a Multitude, and alſo admire his extraordinary Magnificence: Nor was he at any time more eaſy of Acceſs, nor ſhewed greater Liberality or Indulgence; ſo that Strangers every where extol'd his Bounty as ſuitable to the vaſt Riches he poſſeſſed.

And yet for all this (as it happens commonly to vain-glorious and ambitious Men), our Author grants that Covetouſneſs was one of his greateſt Faults, and he every where took all Occaſions to ſcrape Money together; and this made him ſay, and do ſome things the moſt unworthy his Royal Dignity, becauſe they were done for meer Lucre ſake; nor does our Author go about to make any Excuſe for it, unleſs that which one ſaid long ſince, neceſſe eſt, ut multos timeat, quem multi timent; it is neceſſary that he ſhould be afraid of many, whom many Fear: Which indeed is not ſo much an Apology for, as a Conſequence of Tyranny; for (ſays he), out of fear of his Enemies, he often drained his Dominions of Money, to repell, or at leaſt retard their Aſſaults.

But then to attone for this Fault, this Author tells us, he was very Humble to the Servants of God, that is, the Monks and Clergy; and Eadmerus farther ſays, That he was ſo kind and affable to Archbiſhop Lanfranc, that as often as he came to Court, about any Eccleſiaſtical, or other Affairs, the King laying aſide his uſual Auſterity (which rendered him formidable to moſt Men) when he was Preſent, he was ſo placid and eaſy that to all Men's wonder he ſeemed quite another Man: He was alſo merciful to his Subjects, inexorable toward Rebbels, and ſo devout, that he conſtantly aſſiſted at Maſs, and alſo heard both Matins and Veſpers: He built two Monaſteries, (viz. that of Caen in Normandy, and that called Battle-Abby in England) which we have already mentioned.

Having thus given you his Vertues and Vices from one who was a great Honourer of his Memory; I ſhall now give you the Character which an Engliſh Monk, the Author of the Saxon Annals has given us of him under this Year, partly for his Commendation, but more for his Diſpraiſe in theſe Words:

His Character from the Saxon Annals.

"If any One deſires to know what kind of Man he was, and what "Territories he commanded, we will deſcribe him to you as far as we "know; King William was a very wiſe and powerful Prince, being "greater and more Fortunate than any of his Predeceſſors; and then "goes on with his Praiſes much to the ſame purpoſe as William of "Malmeſbury, who is therein alſo followed by Henry of Huntington. "From the Author of theſe Annals; with this addition that he was "more honoured than any of the former Dukes of Normandy, more "powerful than all the King's of England before him, and more wor"thy of Praiſe than his Predeceſſours. He had Wiſdom, but mix'd "with Craft; was Profuſe, yet Covetous; deſirous of Fame, yet "Vain-glorious: But in all the reſt he follows the Annaliſts above "mentioned, which proceed to tell us, that this King, and all his No"ble Men, were exceeding greedy of Money, nor car'd they how un"juſtly any thing was obtain'd, provided they had got by it; the King "would let his Lands to him, that would bid moſt, and if a third "Man came who would offer more than the Former, he ſhould be ſure "to have it; nor did he care, at what rate the Officers fleec'd the "Poor, nor how many unjuſt Actions they did. The more the Peo"ple complained of unjuſt Laws, ſtill the worſe they acted, often exact"ing cruel and unjuſt Taxations, and doing many things againſt all " Right and Equity. But the King was ſo very rigid and ſevere, " that none durſt contradict his Will; for he committed thoſe Earls " to Priſon who had preſumed to reſiſt him; he deprived both Biſhops " and Abbots at his Pleaſure, and ſpared not Odo his own Brother. " But yet we muſt not omit, that this Severity produced ſo great a Se- " curity, that any one might Travel through the whole Kingdom " with his Boſom full of Gold without being hurt or wronged; nor " durſt any Man kill another, although he were never ſo much inju- " red; if any Man had to do with a Woman againſt her Will, he was " preſently bereft of his Genitals. Wales was under his Dominion, " and he built divers Caſtles in it; alſo he ſubdued the Iſle of Mona " (that is now called the Iſle of Angleſy): He alſo brought Scotland " under his Subjection by main Force, and would have gain'd Ireland " even without Fighting, had he lived but two Years longer. In his " Days Men ſuffer'd much Sorrow, and indured many Injuries; he " caus'd Caſtles to be built, and the Poor to be much oppreſſed; and " was ſo rigid that he extorted from his Subjects many Marks of Gold " and Silver, when he had little need of it; he was given to Uſury, " and wholly intent upon Avarice; he made much Foreſt Ground, " and fenced it with ſuch ſevere Laws, that who ever killed a Stag or a " Hind, was to looſe his Eyes; and as he forbid the killing of Deer, " ſo did he alſo of Wild Boares, for he loved all thoſe Beaſts, as if he " had been their Father: And much the ſame Law he ordained con- " cerning Hares, that they might be free from danger. This Men of " the beſt Condition much complain'd of, and the meaner Sort hardly " bore; but he was ſo ſevere that he valued not their hatred, for it be- " hoved them altogether to ſubmit to the King's Will, to have his Fa- " vour; then after a Prayer for his Soul, and that God would grant " him Remiſſion of his Sins, the Author thus concludes; we have given " you this Account of his Actions, as well the bad as the good, that " Men may, by following the one, and avoiding the other, walk in " that Way which leads to the Heavenly Kingdom.

But ſince this Character of an Engliſh Monk (who was prejudiced) may be thought too Severe, I think his true Character lies between theſe Extremes. It is acknowledged by all Writers, that he was Vali- ant, Pious and Magnificent in all his Actions, eſpecially thoſe that expreſt his Royal State and Dignity: As alſo that he ſhewed great reſ- pect to Clergy Men, and often hearkened to their Advice; ſo that if he were not better and more gentle to his Subjects, it lay much at their Doores, who either did not tell him of his Sins, in breaking his Co- ronation-Oath, and treating his Subjects too ſeverely; or, if they did, they taught him according to the Superſtition of thoſe Times, that the building of Monaſteries, and a ſimple Attrition on his Death-bed, with much Money given to ſing Maſſes for his Soul, were ſufficient to Attone for whatever Crimes he had committed; and though it cannot be deny'd that he was very Covetous (which was indeed his greateſt Fault), and alſo ſevere in his Execution of Juſtice, yet that he was Cruel I cannot admit, there being ſo many Inſtances of his great Cle- mency and Generoſity: The Firſt is, concerning Edgar Atheling, the laſt Heir-male of the Engliſh Saxon Blood-Royal; whom any other Prince more Cruel and Jealous of his Power than himſelf, would have either taken out of the Way, or at leaſt have committed him to perpetual Impriſonment; whereas he did not only beſtow upon him large Poſſeſſions in Lands, but allowed him a Pound of Silver a Day for his private Expences, which was a very great Revenue, for a young Prince in thoſe Days, who had neither Wife nor Children: And for all this, though he rebell'd twice againſt him, and went over to his Enemy the King of Scots, yet he ſtill pardon'd, and received him again into Favour. We have ſeveral other Inſtances of his Clemency to divers Engliſh Noblemen; as Syward, Morchar, Edric, Heyward and Waltheof, all whom he pardoned, and ſome of them afterwards advanced to great Dignity, notwithſtanding they had revolted, and fought againſt him: But for Earl Waltheof, as he is the only Inſtance of a Nobleman's being put to Death in all his Reign, ſo that was not neither, till after he had been pardon'd, and highly promoted by him, and that he had a freſh conſpired againſt his Life. But for Roger Earl of Hereford, though he was Guilty of the ſame Offence, yet becauſe he had been the Son of his truſty Favourite, William Fitz-Osbern, he was contented with keeping him a cloſe Priſoner, till he ordered him to be diſcharged, when he lay upon his Death-bed, as you have already heard.

As for his Severity to the Engliſh Clergy and Nobility, William of Malmesbury hath made a very plauſible Apology for it; that firſt he did not Exerciſe it, till he had found that none of them were truly Faithful to him, and therefore thought it abſolutely neceſſary for the preſerving the Crown to himſelf and his Poſterity, not only to deprive them of their Dignities; but alſo for the future not to advance any of them, ſince he knew very well, that the Poſterity of King Cnute had been defeated of the Kingdom by his too great Indulgence, in ſuffering ſo many of the Engliſh Clergy and Nobility not only to enjoy their former Eſtates and Dignities, but to be advanc'd equally with, if not before, thoſe of his own Nation.

To conclude, he was certainly a Great, Wiſe and Valiant Prince, and deſerved the Character of a kind Husband, an indulgent Father to his Children (I mean to ſuch as were Dutiful), and an excellent Maſter to his Servants and Followers, all whom he rewarded with conſiderable Eſtates: And for his Faults, they are ſuch as commonly attend Princes of great Courage, and immoderate Ambition, who are highly deſirous of Glory, though often miſtaken in the true Cauſes of it. And there is ſcarce to be found in Hiſtory an Example of any Prince, that raiſed himſelf to a more conſiderable Figure of Greatneſs by the Terror of his Arms (as this King had done), in whom there was not a great Mixture of Evil as well as good Qualities: For as they are often forced to make uſe of Cruelty and Injuſtice to acquire new Dominions, ſo can they ſcarce retain 'em without the like indirect means by which they got them.

I have been ſomewhat the larger in the Character of this Prince, becauſe he was not only a Great Man himſelf, but alſo becauſe he was the Anceſtor of all our ſucceeding King's from that time.

The

The WIFE and Iſſue of King WILLIAM. I.

THIS King had by his Queen Matilda, Daughter to the Earl of Flanders, Four Sons, Robert his Eldeſt ſirnamed Curthoſe (i. e. Short-Boots, or Hoſe) Duke of Normandy. William ſirnamed Rufus, who ſucceeded his Father Henry ſirnamed Beau-clerk who though the Youngeſt, yet was elected King before his Brother Robert who was paſſed by; as you will find hereafter.

But beſides theſe Three, the King had alſo another Son who is ſuppoſed to have been Elder then Rufus, and was a Youth of great Hopes; but having been Hunting [1.] in the New Forreſt, through ſome infection of the Air, fell into an incurable Diſeaſe, or rather (as others relate) received his death's Wound in that Forreſt by the goreing of a Stag's Hornes, about three Years before his Father's deceaſe. He was buried at Wincheſter, * and his Epitaph ſtiles him Beorniæ Dux.

[1.] W. M. P. 62.

* Vid. Sandford's General Hiſtory.

The King had alſo Five Daughters, of whom Cicely the Eldeſt was Abbeſs of the Nunnery of Caën; Conſtance the Second, was married to Alan, Earl of Bretaign; the Third called Adela, was the Wife of Stephen, Earl of Blois, and after the Death of her Husband became a Nun. As for the two others whoſe Names, though William of Malmeſbury cannot give us, yet William Gemeticenſis hath preſerved them; the Elder of theſe, called Adelidis, was promiſed to Earl Harold, but dy'd before ſhe was fit for Marriage; as for the Younger, called Margaret, ſhe was betroathed to Alfonſo King of Gallicia, but not affecting a married Life obtain'd leave from that King to die a Virgin.

Id. Ib. His Five Daughters.

To which Mr. Speed alſo adds another Daughter, who he makes to be the Fourth, but whoſe Name he cannot give us; he ſays, ſhe was married to William Earl Warren, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the firſt Earl of Surrey; by whom ſhe had Iſſue, William the ſecond Earl, Progenitor of all the Earls that followed of that Family. But this is certainly a great Miſtake, for the Learned Sir William Dugdale in his Baronage of England ſhews, that this Earl William did not Marry the King's Daughter, but the Lady Gundrede, Siſter to Gherbode a Flemming, to whom King William the I. gave the Earldom of Cheſter; and this he proves from an unqueſtionable Author, viz. Ordericus Vitalis.

I ſhall alſo from [2.] William of Malmesbury, ſay ſomething of King William's Brethren by Arlotte his Mother (for on the Father's ſide he had none); who was afterwards married to one [3.] Herlewin, a Man of an ordinary Fortune, by whom ſhe had two Sons; Robert, the Eldeſt, a Man of a dull and ſluggiſh Temper, whom Duke William, before he came into England, made Earl of Mortaign; and Odo, whom his Brother promoted to be Biſhop of Bayeux, and after his being King he created him Earl of Kent; who being of a much more ſtirring and crafty Nature, was after the deceaſe of William Fitz-Osburn, often in the King's abſence made his Leiutenant of all England, till at laſt falling into Diſgrace with the King (as you have already heard), he remain'd in Priſon till the King ſet him free a little before his Deceaſe.

Of

Of KING WILLIAM's LAWS.

I Shall now (before I end his Reign) give you a Catalogue of the principal Laws he made, as they are to be found at the latter end of Ingulphus's Hiſtory, as alſo, as they ſtand in Mr. Lambard's Archaionomia, that ſo by comparing them together, you may ſee the difference between them.

Theſe that follow are in old Norman French, and were by Mr. Selden tranſlated into Latin, as much as he was able to underſtand them; and I have here render'd them into Engliſh (ſo far as the Obſoleteneſs of the Norman Dialect, and the many Errors crept into the Copies through the Ignorance or Negligence of the Scribes would permit): by the Aſſiſtance of the Reverend and Learned Dr. Hicks and have alſo by his Help found, I hope, the true meaning of divers of them, which appear'd unintelligible even to Mr. Selden himſelf: But to come to the Laws themſelves, the Title of them in * Ingulphus runs thus:

Theſe are the Laws and Cuſtoms which King William granted to all the People of England after the * Conqueſt of the Land; being the ſame, that King Edward his Couſin obſerved before him.

* Note, Conqueſt does not always ſignify a ſubduing by Force, but any other way of Acquiſition, as by Purchaſe, Teſtament, &c. for which ſee Spelman's Gloſſary, Verb Conqueſt.

THE Firſt eſtabliſhes the Priviledge of Sanctuary both for Life, and Members; to him that flies to a Church, and appoints what Mulct each Man is to pay, who has lay'd Hands on any thing which any Mother Church, whether it be Cathedral, Abby or Monaſtery ſhall of Right demand, viz. He ſhall reſtore the thing taken away, and pay one hundred Shillings beſides for a Mulct, or Fine; and whoſoever tranſgreſſes the King's Peace, ſhall forfeit an hundred Pence within the * Mercian Juriſdiction: So in like manner breaking up of Houſes, and of deſigned lying in wait to do Miſchief: Theſe Pleas belong to the Crown; and if any Man, Count, or Provoſt do any wrong to thoſe under his Juriſdiction, and be attainted of it before the King's Juſtitiary, he ſhall forfeit for the Injury done.

* Note, The old Diviſion of Kingdom's was ſtill in uſe to ſomepurpoſes. The Word in the Original, is Laie which (as alſo the Saxon from whence it is derived) ſignifies ſometimes Law, and ſometimes Juriſdiction.

The Second is concerning the Priviledge of the King's Tenants (except in thoſe Pleas, that immediately belong to the Crown) that if any * do evil intreat the Men of his Bailywick, and be thereof convicted by the King's Juſtice, he ſhall forfeit double to what any other Man ſhould forfeit, in the like Caſe.

* Man, Count or Provoſt, &c.

The Third is concerning Violators of the publick Peace; He who breaks the King's Peace, by Dane Law, ſhall make amends by an hundred forty four Pounds, and the King's forfeiture which belongs to the Sheriff, is forty Shillings by Merchen Law; but fifty Shillings by Weſt Saxon Law. And if any Free-Man having Sac, and Soc, and Tol, and Team, and Infangentheof be impleaded, and condemned to forfeiture in the County Court, then that belongs to the Sheriff: viz. Forty Ores by Dane Law, and of another Man that has not thoſe Liberties, thirty two Ores: Of theſe thirty two Ores, the Sheriff ſhall have Ten to the King's uſe, and he who impleads him ſhall have Twelve Ores more for Satisfaction, and the Lord on whoſe Land he dwelt ſhall alſo have the other Ten Ores, this is the Law of the Danes.

From whence we may obſerve, that after the Conqueſt, the Criminal, or Penal Laws were not ſo reduced into one Form, or Body, but that there was ſtill different Mulcts or Fines to be paid, according to the ſeveral Laws, or Juriſdictions, that were then in uſe in divers Parts of the Kingdom, in the Time of Edward the Confeſſour; ſo that nothing was as yet alter'd in this Point. And in the next Place we may alſo obſerve, that (as Mr. Somner in his * Gloſſary informs us) theſe Ores did not ſignify any ſort of Coin, or Money, but ſo many Ounces of Silver, twelve Ores making a Pound.

* Verbo Ore.

The Fourth Law is, concerning one accuſed of Theft and what ſhall be done with his Surety, the Party fled; in which Caſe the Mercian Law is, that if any one be appeal'd of Theft, or Robbery, and then is Bail'd to appear to Juſtice, and ſhall after that fly for it; his Pledge, or Bayl, ſhall have four Months and one Day to find him out, and if he cannot find him, he ſhall then purge himſelf by the Oath of twelve Men, that he knew him not to be a Theif, at the time when he bayl'd him, nor had any Hand in his running away, neither can find him. The reſt ſetting forth what Forfeiture he ſhall pay to the King, and what for the Were or Head of the Party ſo abſenting himſelf, which is different according to the Weſt Saxon, and Dane Law; yet ſo, that if within one Year and four Days he can find the Theif, and bring him to Juſtice, the twenty Shillings which was pay'd for his Head ſhall be reſtored to his Pledge or Surety.

The Fifth is, concerning the apprehending of a Thief without any Perſuit or Cry; in which caſe, if the Pledge ſhall deliver him up to the Perſon from whom he ſtole, if he Fly, and ſhall afterwards appear, he ſhall pay Ten Shillings for his firſt Eſcape; but the Perſon is bound to Try him at the firſt Court after his taking; but if he fail to do it, he ſhall forfeit Forty Shillings.

The Sixth is, concerning the particular Sums of Mony that any Man ſhall pay to the Provoſt who ſhall Reſcue any Horſes, Bullocks, Cows, Hogs, or any other ſort of Beaſts, which is called in Engliſh, Forfengen; in which caſe the Complainant ſhall pay to the * Provoſt or Underſheriff, for the Reſcue of a Cow, or an Ox, Eight-pence, for a Hog Four-pence, for a Sheep One-Penny; and farther, the Party who ſeized them ſhall find Sureties, that if any other come to claim the Cattle within a Year and a Day, he will then produce in Court whatſoever he had before reſcued.

* Note, By the Provoſt is here meant the Sheriff or his Deputy.

The Seventh is, concerning things found by Chance, which is much to the ſame effect with the antient Saxon Laws concerning ſuch things, viz. that is, firſt they are to be ſhewed in Three places of the Neighberhood, that ſo there may be good Witneſs of their being found; and if any will come and lay claim to them, he ſhall find Pledges, that in caſe any other ſhall alſo claim them within a Year and a Day, he will be ready forthwith to produce in Court whatſoever he had ſo found.

The Eighth is, concerning Homicide, and the Were, or Price of each Man's Head, to this effect:

If any one Kill another, and be Convict, and yet deny to make ſatisfaction, he ſhall give unto the Lord for his Man-bote, for a Freeman Ten

Ten Shillings, for a Servant Twenty Shillings (as a Were, or Price of the Life); that of a Thane by the Merchen and West-Saxon Law, is Twenty Pounds; and the Were of a Villain, a Hundred Shillings by the ſame Law.

The Ninth is, concerning thoſe to whom the Were (or Price of the Head or Life) was to be paid; if the Manſlayer were of the Half Blood to the Widdow, thus; That the Manſlayer ſhall pay to the Widdow and Orphans, Ten Shillings, and for their ſhare the Orphans and Kindred ſhall divide it among them.

The Tenth appoints at what Rate a Man ſhall pay Cattle inſtead of Mony, viz. for the Were of a Perſon ſlain, a Stone-horſe at Twenty Shillings, and a Bull at Ten Shillings; and for a ‖ Beaſt Gelt or Spayed, Five Shillings.

‖ Iter.

The Eleventh appoints the Penalty on him who ſhall Wound another. If a Man wounds another, and denies to make him any amends according to his * Head, and according to the Wounds given; and ſhall alſo Swear upon the Goſpels that he did not do it of Malice or Hatred.

* i. e. Degree or Quality.

The Twelfth Ordains, what ſatisfaction ſhall be made to him who is Wounded to the Bone, or where a Bone is drawn out; if the Wound appear to be an Inch wide, he ſhall pay Fourpence; and ſo if a Bone be taken out of the Wound. The reſt is obſcure.

The Thirteenth appoints a Rate for all Members that are cut off. So that if it happen that one cut off another's Hand, or Foot, he ſhall render the moity of his Were according to the Offence, be it what it will; the reſt of the Law containing the particular Rates that were to be paid for the cutting off Mens Thumbs, Fingers, &c. I ſhall here omit, as being ſet already down in the Laws of King Alfred, though the Penalties were now increaſed.

The Fourteenth is, That he who violates a Woman that is Married, or Betrothed to another, ſhall pay to her the value of his Were (i. e. the value of his own Head) to his Lord: Whereby you may obſerve, That though Adultery was not then immediately puniſhed with Death, yet if he were not able to pay his Were, his Life lay at the King's, or Lord's mercy.

The Fifteenth is concerning corrupt Judges, viz. That he who gave a falſe Sentence, ſhould forfeit his Were, unleſs he could Swear upon the Holy Goſpels that he could Judge no better.

The Sixteenth is, concerning the Purgation of him who is accuſed of Theft, viz. That where one Appeals another of Robbery, the Perſon Appealed, if he be a Freeman, and hath clear Teſtimony of his Honeſty, ſhall purge himſelf by his Oath; but he who has been infamous, muſt do it per Serment nomed that is, (I ſuppoſe) by the expreſs Oath of Fourteen lawful Men; and if he cannot have ſo many, he ſhall purge himſelf by Twelve Men; but if he cannot have thoſe, he ſhall then defend himſelf by Tryal, and the Appellant ſhall Swear with Seven Men that he did it not for Hatred, or any other cauſe, but to perſue his Right.

The Seventeenth is, concerning thoſe who are Appealed or Accuſed of breaking open a Monaſtery, or a Houſe; where if ſuch were never before counted infamous, then they ſhould purge themſelves by Twelve

Twelve Lawful Men; but if he were a Perſon of bad Fame, then by Forty eight Men, and if he cannot procure them, then by Tryal; the Senſe of the reſt is, what ſhare the Archbiſhop, Biſhop, as alſo the Count and Baron ſhould have by the Mercian Law, within whoſe Dioceſs or Juriſdiction the Theft was proved or confeſſed.

The Eighteenth is, concerning the Payment of Peter-pence; viz. That a Free-man, who has to the Value of Thirty-pence in Cattle, ſhall give one Penny to St. Peter; but for Four-pence, that any Lord ſhall pay down, all his Cottages, Villains and Servants ſhall be acquited: But a Townſman who had Chattels to the Value of half a Mark, as alſo a Free-man living under the Dane-Law having Cattle to the Value of half a Mark, ſhall pay likewiſe one Penny.

The Nineteenth is, concerning Women raviſhed, or whoſe Chaſtity had been aſſaulted; viz. That he who ſhall Raviſh a Woman, ſhall forfeit his Privy-members; he who ſhall fling a Woman down on the Ground, ſo as to offer Violence to her, ſhall pay a Mulct of Ten-ſhillings to the Lord: But if he lye with her by Force, then he ſhall loſe his Privities.

The Twentieth is, concerning the ſeveral Mulcts of thoſe who willfully deny or detain Peter-pence; He that detains Peter-pence ſhall make Satisfaction to Holy Church and alſo forfeit Thirty-pence: And if he be proſecuted before the King's Juſtice, then he ſhall forfeit Thirty-pence to the Biſhop, and Forty-ſhillings to the King.

The One and Twentieth is, what Satisfaction he ſhall make, who ſhall put out another's Eye by miſadventure? In which Caſe he ſhall be fined Seventy-ſhillings of Engliſh Money; but if the Eye be reſtored, then but half ſo much.

The Two and Twentieth is, concerning the Releif of an Earl: The Releif of an Earl, who belongs to the King, is, Eight Horſes ſadled and bridled, Four Halberts, Four Helmets, Four Shields, Four Lances, Four Swords and Four Huntſmen, and Four Hunting Horſes, with Bridles and Headſtals.

The Three and Twentieth ſets down the Releif of a Baron. viz. Four Horſes ſadled and bridled, Two Halberts, Two Helmets, Two Shields, Two Lances, Two Swords, and One Huntſman, One Hunting Horſe with Bridles and Headſtals.

The Four and Twentieth is, concerning the Releif of a Vavaſor to his Leige Lord, viz. that he was to be acquitted for his Horſe (ſuch as he had at the time of his Death); as alſo by his Halbert, and his Helmet, and his Shield, his Lance and his Sword; but if he died ſo unfurniſhed of theſe things as to have neither Horſe, nor Arms; then the Heir was to pay a Hundred-ſhillings in Money.

The Twenty Fifth is ſomewhat Obſcure by reaſon of the Perplexity of the Syntax, but this the Purport of it. If any Man ſhall cry Emblet (i. e. ſhall challenge any Ware or Merchandize as taken from him by ſtealth), and find Pledges to perſue his Claim; then he in whoſe Lands the Thing is found, ſhall name his Guarranty (that is, the Perſon of whom he had it) if he have any ſuch; but if he have not, he ſhall name his Hennel Burh (i. e. his Surety) that the thing ſhall be forth coming, and his Witneſſes, whom he ſhall have ready at a certain Day or Time; but if he have no Guarranty, nor Witneſſes, he ſhall loſe his Goods and pay a Were to his Lord, as it is in * Merchan-Lay, Dane-Lay, and Weſt-Saxon-Lay: The reſt being very Obſcure through the Faultineſs of the Copies, I will not take upon me to render it.

* i. e. Within thoſe Territories where thoſe Laws had Force.

The Twenty Sixth is, concerning the Mulct of the Hundred, where the Man-ſlayer cannot be found; viz. if a Murther be newly committed, and the Men of that Hundred do not apprehend the Manſlayer, and bring him to Juſtice within eight Days, to ſhew Cauſe how he came to do it, they ſhall pay Forty ſeven Marks.

The Twenty Seventh is, concerning the Action of a Tenant againſt his Lord; viz. if any one will dereine (i. e. plead off) any Covenant againſt his Lord, he muſt do it by his Peers of the ſame Tenure, whom he ſhall appeal or ſummon, as Witneſſes, to plead it off, for he cannot do it by Strangers.

The Twenty Eighth is very Obſcure, but to this Senſe: If a Man plead in any Court, except that of the King, and ſhall be queſtioned for a Thing which he does not acknowledge; if he cannot Plead it off by Eleven diſcreet Men, he ſhall not recover the Thing in Controverſy by his own Word.

The Twenty Ninth is, concerning the Releif of Villains: The Releif of a Villain ſhall be the beſt live Cattle (whether Horſe, Bull or Cow), that he had at the time of his Death, which he ſhall give to his Lord, and afterwards he ſhall be admitted to Frank-Pledg, as other Villains.

The Thirtieth is, concerning the publick Ways; viz. thoſe Three great ones of Watling-ſtreet, and Erming-ſtreet, and Foſſe. He who aſſaults, or kills any Man travelling on any of theſe Ways, breaks the King's Peace.

The Thirty Firſt is of Robbery, that if a thing ſtolen or robbed, and the Robber be found together in any one's Ground, the Lord of the Land, and his Wife, ſhall have the Moiety of the Robber's Goods (though they were the claimers Goods before) if they find them; but if the Robber be found within * Sac and Soc, the Lord's Wife ſhall looſe her ſhare of the Robber's Goods, and the Lord ſhall have them all.

* i. e. Within the Lord's own Juriſdiction.

By the Thirty Second, a Man ſhall be appointed out of every Hyde of Land of the Hundred, betwixt Michelmaſſe and Martinmaſſe, to guard or keep the Highways, and the Ward-Reve or Overſeer of the Highways, ſhall for his Pains have Thirty Hydes diſcharged of this Service; and if any Horſes or Cattle die in the Highways which he is to overſee, and that he cannot ſhew that it ſuffer'd Violence, that Horſe, &c. ſhall be made Good by him.

The Thirty Third is, concerning thoſe that hold Lands by cuſtomary Rent, who ſhall not be troubled for any thing but their Droit Conſe, or Cheif Rent; and thoſe that hold them by Tilling the Lord's Land, ſhall not go away 'till they have performed their yearly Services; and the native Villains, which forſake the Lands where they were Born, and do not perform the Service appendant to them, ſhall not change Quarters, or ſeek Reception elſewhere; and if they leave the Lands upon which they were Born, and go to others, none ſhall retain them, or their Goods, but ſhall ſend them back to perform their Services belonging to them; and if the the Seigniories, or Lord's of Mannors, will not make thoſe Fugitives return to their Lands, the Law ſhall do it.

The Thirty fourth Ordains, That none ſhall defalcate any thing from the Arrerages of due Service, which the Tenant or Villain owes his Lord, upon pretence that whilſt he reſted, another was to do his Work.

The Thirty fifth is, that of Reprieving big-Bellied Women: If a Woman with Child be Condemn'd to death, or loſs of any Members, the Sentence ſhall not be executed, until ſhe be delivered.

Whence we may ſee the Antiquity of that Law ſtill in uſe, by which Women with Child have their Execution reſpited till they are brought to Bed.

The Thirty ſixth is concerning Inteſtate's Goods: That where a Man dies Inteſtate, his Children ſhall divide his Eſtate equally among them.

The Thirty ſeventh is of an Adultreſs taken by her Father in the very Act.

If a Father ſhall take his Daughter in Adultery in his own Houſe, or in that of his Son-in-Law, it ſhall be lawful for him to kill the Adulterer.

This Law is now out of uſe, and (I ſuppoſe) became ſo by non-uſer; but it ſeems ſtrange, that the Husband of the Adultreſs was not allowed by this Law the ſame priviledge with the Father.

The Thirty eighth is concerning Goods flung out of a Ship for fear of Death.

Which tho' very obſcure, yet the Senſe ſeems to be to this Effect, That if a Man is aſſaulted being on Ship-board, and caſt another's Goods out of the Ship for the Safety of his own life, he ſhall not be impleaded for it, becauſe it is lawful to do damage to another, when he finds the danger cannot be otherwiſe avoided; &c. But if any one fling Goods out of a Ship, when there is no ſuch neceſſity, he ſhall render to their full value.

The Thirty ninth is concerning the Sentence againſt one that is abſent; as where two are co-partners of an Heritage, and one of them being impleaded without the other, looſe his Right by his own negligence, it ſhall not prejudice him who was abſent, becauſe ſuch Judgment ought not to affect him.

The Fortieth is concerning the Relief of Tenants; viz. That the lawful Relief of thoſe who hold their Lands at a Rent, ſhall be one year's Rent of the Land.

The Forty firſt Ordains, That thoſe who preſide in Judgments take great care, that they Judge as thoſe that deſire to be heard, when they ſay, Forgive us our Treſpaſſes, as we forgive them that treſpaſs againſt us. And we forbid any Chriſtian in this Land to ſell his Garment for Payment; for care ought to be taken that a Life be not loſt for which Chriſt redeemed with his Life. Whoſoever ſhall promote wrong, or give falſe Judgment for hatred, or malice, or Bribery, he ſhall forfeit to the King Forty Shillings; and if he cannot prove that he could do no better, he ſhall loſe his Freedom, if he cannot redeem it at the King's Pleaſure. And if he be within the Dane Law, ſhall forfeit Lahſlite, [i.e. pay the Mulct for violation of the Law] if he cannot prove that he could Judge no better: But whoſoever ſhall re- Of Judgments.

fuſe, or deny right Law and Judgment, he ſhall forfeit to him to whom he denies it, according to his Rank; if to the King, Six Pounds; to an Earl, Forty Shillings; if it be within an Hundred, Thirty Shillings; and to all thoſe who Sue in England, all muſt be paid in Engliſh Money; if within the Juriſdiction of Dane-lay, whoſoever denies right Judgment, he ſhall be obnoxious to the puniſhment of Labſlite. Nor ſhall any Man complain to the King of Failure of Judgment in Hundred or County.

The Forty ſecond is concerning taking a Diſtreſs: None may take a * Diſtreſs, either within the County, or without, until he has three times demanded Right in the Hundred and County-Court; and if he cannot have Right at the third demand, he ſhall then go to the County-Court, and that ſhall appoint him the fourth day; and then if he who ſhould claim it, fail to appear, the other may uſe his Liberty, to take the Diſtreſs to his own uſe.

* Nam, from the Saxon or Francik Niman, or Neman capere, vel auferre. Vid. Dr. Hicks's New Edit. of his Saxon Grammar in his Notes on a Charter of King William the Conqueror, p. 164.

The Forty third is, That none ſhall buy any thing without Lawful Vouchers: viz. None ſhall buy to the value of Four-pence. either of Dead or Live-Goods, without the Teſtimony of Four Men of the Borough or Town; and if any one challenge it, and he have no Teſtimony thereof, nor warrant for it, he ſhall render to the Challenger his Goods, and he ſhall have the forfeiture to whom it is due; and if he have Witneſſes (as we have ſaid above) let him vouch them three Times, and the fourth Time deraign; (i. e. ſtand Tryal for it) or elſe reſtore it.

The Forty fourth, concerning Stollen Goods, put into the hand of a third Perſon, ſeems only to be a Continuation of the former to this effect; for it does not appear reaſonable to Us, (i. e. to the King) that Proof be made by the Witneſs of thoſe who know that the Thing is Sequeſtred, or put into the hand of a Third Perſon; but that no Proof be thus made, till ſix Months after the Thing were Stollen.

Of Defalters in Tryals. The Forty fifth appoints, that he who is accuſed in Court of Robbery by Witneſſes, and makes Default three Times, and the Summoners ſhews his three Defaults, then he ſhall be requir'd to find Sureties for the Peace, and to take Tryal; but if he will not, or cannot be found, alive or dead, let all he hath be ſeiz'd, and let the Accuſer have his Chattels; and the Lord the moiety of what remains, and the Hundred the other moiety.

Concerning Harbouring Strangers, the Forty ſixth appoints, that none ſhall Lodge a Stranger above three Nights, unleſs he be recommended by a Friend.

The Forty ſeventh is concerning Servants, viz. That no Perſon ſhall let his Man or Servant depart from him, after he is once accuſed of any Crime.

The Forty eighth Ordains, That whoever meets with a Thief, and without Cry lets him go, he ſhall be mulcted according to the value of the Thief, unleſs he can clearly prove that the Party were no Thief; and he that ſhall make a Cry, and preſently ceaſe, the King ſhall mulct him for his ſo ceaſing, unleſs he can purge himſelf.

The Forty ninth is concerning Servants, That every Lord ſhall produce his Servant, or his Pledge, that if he be accuſed he may be tryed in the Hundred Court.

The

The Fiftieth is concerning the manner of Purgation of one accuſed, to this effect: If any Perſon accuſed, be within the Hundred, and four Men arraign (i.e. accuſe) him, he may purge himſelf by the Twelfth hand (i.e. the Oaths of Twelve men) but if he fly from the Place where he was arraigned, his Lord ſhall pay his Were; and if the Lord be accuſed, that he was privy to his Flight, he ſhall clear himſelf by * ſix Men; but if he cannot, he ſhall be fined to the King, or elſe be Outlaw'd.

* i.e. By their Oaths.

After the Concluſion of theſe Laws *, Ingulphus tells us, that he brought them down with him from London to his own Monaſtery of Crowland, being thoſe which King William had confirmed, and commanded to be obſerved throughout all England, under grievous Penalties, and had alſo commended them to his Juſtices.

* In Edit. Oxon, Vol. 1.

Then our Author farther adds, That he had brought them down in the ſame Language, in which they were written (viz. Norman-French) leſt it ſhould happen that either himſelf, or any of his Tenants, ſhould to their great hazard tranſgreſs them, and by offending the Royal Majeſty incur thoſe rigid Cenſures therein contain'd.

* Homines.

But it is pity the time, when theſe Laws were made, had not been alſo there ſet down: yet it is certain, that it was not long after Ingulph's going up to London about the Affairs of his Monaſtery, in the Sixteenth year of King William's Reign; and therefore this could not be that Collection of King Edward's Laws, which R. Hoveden hath given us; for they are ſaid to be Collected and Confirmed in the Fourth Year of this King's Reign: So that theſe ſeem to have been an Extract, or rather diſtinct Body of Laws taken out of the former, having received ſuch Corrections and Additions as King William thought fit to make.

But as the World is very much beholding to Mr. Selden for firſt publiſhing theſe Laws, which had been before omitted in Sir Henry Savil's Edition of Ingulph's Hiſtory; ſo are we alſo highly obliged to the Generoſity of my Worthy Friend, Sir John Marſham the younger, Baronet, Deceaſed; who was pleaſed to furniſh the Publiſhers of the Firſt Volume of Engliſh Writers with an antient Copy of Ingulph's Hiſtory, in order to the more full and Correct Printing the late Oxford Edition, to which I muſt own my ſelf beholding for divers more genuine Readings, than thoſe in Mr. Selden's Copy; and from which I have (tho' not very correct) mended divers things in this Engliſh Tranſlation, which Mr. Selden himſelf, by reaſon of the faultineſs of his Copy, was at a loſs how to Tranſlate.

But ſince the Learned Mr. Lambard in his * Archaionomia, has given us another Set of King William's Laws, much different from the former, I ſhall here give you them alſo; ſince theſe contain the Civil, as the former do the Criminal Code: they are in the form of a Charter, beginning thus:

* Pag. 170.

Note, Sir R. Twiſden has in his Edit. Printed 1644, Publiſhed another Copy of theſe Laws from the Red Book in the Exchequer, with ſome Variations.

William, by the Grace of God, King of the Engliſh, to all his Subjects both of France and England, Greeting.

The firſt Law is concerning Religion, and the Publick Peace.

By which the King Ordains, that one God be Worſhipped, and one Faith in Chriſt maintain'd inviolable throughout the whole Kingdom, and that Peace and Concord, Juſtice and Judgment be obſerved between the Engliſh and Welſh, French, and Britans of Wales and Cornwall wall, and all others of his Dominions; ſo that none ſhould offend another in any Point without a full Satisfaction to be made for it.

The ſecond is concerning Fidelity and Obedience toward the King, in theſe Words:

We alſo Ordain, That all Free-men affirm both by their Covenant and Oath, that as well within, as without the whole Kingdom of England, (which was formerly called Britain) they ſhall be faithful to their Lord King William, and every where preſerve his Lands and Honours with all Fidelity, and together with him defend them againſt all Enemies and Strangers.

The Third is concerning the Killing a Norman, or Frenchman, thus:

We alſo will and enjoyn, That all thoſe Men whom we have brought over with us, or who ſhall come over after us, ſhall be under our Protection, and in our Peace, throughout our whole Kingdom; and if any of them ſhall be Killed, the Lord ſhall produce the Man-ſlayer within five days; or if otherwiſe he ſhall pay to us ſix and forty Marks of Silver, as far as the Lord's Subſtance will hold out; and where the Lord (i.e. of the Mannor or Townſhip) ſhall fail, the whole Hundred, in which the Man-ſlaughter was committed, ſhall pay the remainder amongſt them in common.

The Fourth is concerning thoſe Normans, who were Engliſh Subjects before King William's coming over.

That every Frenchman, who in the time of King Edward our Couſin, was here a partaker of the Engliſh Cuſtoms, which they call * Anhlote, and Anſcote, ſhall pay according to the Engliſh Law.

* I know not whatit means, unleſs it be the ſame with thoſe Payments we call Scot and Lot at this day.

The Fifth Law is concerning the Right of Feudal Tenants, and of the Immunity of Noblemen and Gentlemen.

Alſo we will and firmly Command and Grant, That all Freemen of the whole Monarchy of our ſaid Kingdom, ſhall have and enjoy their Lands and Poſſeſſions in Peace, free from all unjuſt Exaction and Taillage; ſo that nothing ſhall be Exacted, or taken of them, except their free Service, which they owe, and of right ought to give us, as it is appointed them, and by Us given and granted to them, as an Hereditary Right for ever, by the Common Council of our ſaid Kingdom.

The Sixth is concerning Night-Watches.

We do alſo Ordain, and firmly Command, that all Cities, Towns, Caſtles, Hundreds and Wapentakes of our ſaid Kingdom be Watched, and kept each Night by Turns, to prevent Enemies and Malefactors; as the Sheriffs, Aldermen, Provoſts, and other our Bayliffs and Miniſters, ſhall ſee fit by the Common Council, for the benefit of the Kingdom.

The Seventh is concerning Meaſures and Weights, thus:

Alſo, that all the Perſons above mentioned, keep through the whole Kingdom faithful Seal'd Meaſures and Weights, as our good Predeceſſors have Ordained.

The Eighth is concerning the Duties of Tenants, or Vaſſals.

We alſo Ordain and firmly Command, That all Earls, Barons, Knights, and their Servants, and all Freemen of our ſaid whole Kingdom, always have and maintain themſelves well provided both with Horſe and Arms, as becomes and behoves them to do; and that they they ſhall be always ready to fullfil and perform their whole Service to us, when ever there ſhall be need, according to what they owe to us of Right out of their Fees and Tenements, as we have appointed them by the Common Council of the whole Kingdom; and as we have given and granted to them in Fee by Hereditary Right: And this our Command ſhall not be violated in any wiſe upon pain of an abſolute Forfeiture.

The Ninth is, that Subjects ſhall endeavour to preſerve the Royal Rights unprejudiced according to their Power.

We alſo ordain and firmly Command, that all Freemen of our ſaid whole Kingdom ſhall be Sworn-brothers manfully to defend and keep our Monarchy and Kingdom according to their Powers and Eſtates; and ſhall preſerve the Power and Dignity of the Crown entire, and conſtantly perform Right, Juſtice and Judgment by all means according to their Ability without fraud and delay: (* This Decree had its Sanction in the City of London).

* Note, It ſeems from hence, that theſe Laws were ordain'd at different Times.

The Tenth is, that there be no buying and ſelling unleſs before Witneſſes, and in Cities, viz.

We alſo forbid that any live † Cattle be bought or ſold unleſs in Cities, and that before Three faithful Witneſſes, or that any Thing forbidden be ſold without Security and Warranty; and whoever does otherwiſe ſhall pay the Value over again, and afterwards forfeit the thing bought.

† Pecunia.

The Eleventh is, concerning Markets, and the Priviledge of Cities and Towns of Note. Alſo no Market or Fair ſhall be kept or permitted to be held unleſs in the Cities of our Kingdom, and in Burroughs, or wall'd Towns, or in Caſtles and ſafe Places, where the Cuſtoms of our Kingdom and the Common Law (ordained by our Predeceſſors), and the Dignity of our Crown cannot be violated; but that all things be done fairly and openly according to Judgment and Juſtice; and ſince the Caſtles, Burroughs and Cities were founded and built for the Defence of the Nation, and People of the Kingdom, they ought therefore to be kept free and inviolable.

The Twelfth is, concerning Men's Purgation in publick Judgments.

It is alſo ordained, That if a Frenchman ſhall accuſe an Engliſhman of Perjury, Murther, Theft, Homicide and Ran (i. e. open Rapine) which cannot be denied; the Engliſhman ſhall defend himſelf by what means he ſhall think beſt, either by the Judgment of the Hot Iron (i. e. the Ordeal) or elſe by Duel. But if the Engliſhman be weak or infirm, he ſhall then find another to perform it for him; and if either of them be vanquiſhed, he ſhall pay to the King Forty-ſhillings: But if an Engliſhman ſhall accuſe a Frenchman, and will prove it either by Judgment or Duel, I will, that the Frenchman ſhall purge himſelf by Oath, and not by the Hot-Iron.

Which Law is expreſſed more at large in Bromton's Chronicle at the End of King William's Reign, and is publiſh'd at the End of this ſaid King's Laws in the Cambridge Edition abovementioned. Col. 981.

And begins thus by way of Charter as the former.

William, by the Grace of God, King of the Engliſh, to all to whom this Writing ſhall come, greeting; Know ye, that I Ordain and and Command it to be Obſerved through the whole Engliſh Nation:

That if an Engliſhman appeal a Frenchman by Duel, of Theft, Homicide, or any thing for which Combat ought to be allow'd, or Judgment to be given between two Men; the Appellant ſhall have full liberty of demanding it; and if the Engliſhman ſhall refuſe the Duel, the Frenchman ſhall be then compell'd to purge himſelf by his Witneſſes upon Oath, according to the Law of Normandy; alſo if a Frenchman appeal an Engliſhman by Duel concerning the like Things, the Engliſhman, has leave to defend himſelf by Duel, or by Judgment (i. e. of Ordeal) if he ſhall chooſe it rather; and if either of them be weak or infirm ſo that he refuſe the Duel, or cannot perform it, he ſhall then find a Legal Champion; and if the Frenchman be vanquiſhed, he ſhall pay to the King Sixty-ſhillings; but if the Engliſhman will not defend himſelf by Duel, or purge himſelf by Teſtimony (i. e. Oath of twelve Men) he ſhall clear himſelf by the Judgment of God (i. e. by Ordeal).

By which you may obſerve, that whereas in Lambard's Copy of theſe Laws, where an Engliſhman appeal'd a Frenchman, and would prove it by Judgment or Duel, it ſeems as if the Frenchman might have purged himſelf by Oath only, without any Ordeal; whereas it appears more plainly by Bromton's Copy (which I here take to be the Truer) that an Engliſhman had the ſame Priviledge with the Frenchman; for it follows thus.

The King has ordain'd in all Matters of Outlawry, that an Engliſhman ſhall purge himſelf by Judgment (i. e. Ordeal); and if an Engliſhman appeal a Frenchman of Outlawry, and will undertake to prove it upon him, the Frenchman ſhall defend himſelf by Duel; but if the Engliſh will not undertake to prove it by Duel, the Frenchman ſhall clear himſelf by his full Oath, and not by meer Niceties of Words.

Obſervanda.

From whence you may alſo obſerve, that the only Priviledge a Frenchman could claim above an Engliſhman by this Law was, that he was not obliged to undergo the Judgment of Ordeal, as the Engliſhman was, but only the Oath of his Compurgators; becauſe the Former was the Engliſh, and the Latter the Norman Way of Tryal.

There are alſo in Mr. Lambard's Archaionomia, another Fragment of the Laws of this King, which being not found in the aforeſaid Red Book in the Exchequer, I have omitted as not of ſufficient Authority.

VOL. II. Book II.

King WILLIAM II.

WILLIAM commonly called Rufus (in French Le Rous) either from his Red Complection, or elſe from the Colour of his Hair, having been (as you have already heard) * appointed Succeſſour by his Father's Teſtament to the Crown of England, went immediately over before he expired, to ſecure it for himſelf; † being attended by Robert Bloet his Father's Chaplain, and taking along with him as [1.] Priſoners, Earl Morchar and Wulnoth, Son to King Harold; both whom (though King William had lately ordered them to be ſet at Liberty, yet) his Son thought fit again to ſecure at Wincheſter, immediately after his Arrival; [2.] and there alſo he ſeized upon his Father's Treaſure which amounted to Sixty thouſand Pounds, beſides Gold, Jewels and Plate, a prodigious Sum in thoſe Days; but a Manuſcript Hiſtory of the Foundation of the Abbey of Colcheſter now in the Cotton Library cited by [3.] Sr. William Dugdale, makes Eudo Steward to King William I. to have been very Inſtrumental to his New Maſter at this juncture: For haſtening into England before him, he ſo far inſinuated himſelf into William de Ponte, Arch-Conſtable of Wincheſter Caſtle, that he obtained the Keys of that Treaſury; and then paſſing to Dover he obliged the Keepers of the Caſtle there not to deliver it to any without his Knowledge: The like he did at Pevenſey, Haſtings and other Caſtles on that Coaſt, pretending that the King (whoſe Death he concealed) being reſolved to ſtay longer in Normandy than he at firſt deſigned, would have good aſſurance of the Safety of thoſe Places by himſelf his Steward; which done he returned to Wincheſter, and diſcovered vered the King's Death: Thus by his Care and Induſtry, while the Noblemen in Normandy were conſulting about the Succeſſion, William ſirnamed Rufus was * elected King, and confirm'd in the Throne.

By what means he obtained the Crown.

But to return to more antient Authors (from whom this is only a Digreſſion), one of the chiefeſt things he had to do after his coming over, was, to obtain the good Will of the Biſhops and Noblemen of England in order to his Admiſſion to the Throne; for the obtaining of which, [4.] He was firſt of all to apply himſelf to Archbiſhop Lanfranc, without whoſe Favour he knew (in all probability) he could by no means Succeed, ſince it was to him his Father's Letter or Teſtament (call it which you pleaſe) by which he was nominated his Succeſſour, was directed; and this Prince had great reaſon to expect his Kindneſs, for he had not only Educated him, but alſo made him a Knight; which ſhews, that the Old Engliſh Saxon Cuſtom of receiving Knighthood from the Hands of Biſhops or Abbots, was not yet out of Faſhion.

[4.] Ead. Hiſt. nov. Lib. I. P. 13. W. M. P. 320.

[5.] Wherefore fearing leſt the delay of his Coronation might chance to defeat his Expectations of what he ſo much deſired, he by himſelf (as well as his Friends) promiſed and ſwore to the Archbiſhop, that if he were made King, He would obſerve Juſtice, Equity and Mercy, throughout his whole Kingdom; and alſo defend the Peace and Liberties of the Church; and in all things obſerve the Archbiſhop's directions: And upon theſe Terms he found it no great difficulty to obtain his Conſent, and ſo chiefly by his Means and Perſwaſions, he gained the reſt of the Biſhops: The deſigned King alſo brought over the greateſt Part of the Nobility with large Promiſes made either by himſelf, or others on his behalf.

[5.] Id. Ib. His fair Promiſes before his Coronation.

[1.] Then a Great Council of the Kingdom being immediately aſſembled, He was by their General conſents Crowned King at Weſtminſter on the 27th of September being Sunday, by Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury; Thomas Archbiſhop of York, and moſt of the other Biſhops of England being alſo preſent: Then the King returning to Wincheſter diſtributed his Father's Treaſure according to his laſt Will, (viz.) to ſome of the Principal Cathedral Churches and Monaſteries ten Marks of Gold a Piece, to ſome ſix, and others leſs; beſides rich Croſſes, Candleſticks and other Ornaments for the Altar; and to ſmaller Churches in the Country five Shillings a Piece; he alſo beſtowed one hundred Pounds to each County, to be diſtributed amongſt the Poor.

[2.] After this he kept his Chriſtmas at London with great Solemnity where he alſo held his * Court, or Great Council, at which the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, together with all the Biſhops and Chief Men of England, were preſent; as alſo Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, who was now reſtored to the Earldom of Kent and all his other Eſtates: Yet all this could not ſecure him to his Nephew's Intereſt, as you will ſee by and by.

[3.] Alſo about this time Duke Robert, eldeſt Son to the late King, returned out of France (where he reſided at his Father's Death) into Normandy, and not long after was inveſted with the Sword of that Dutchy, a Ceremony which was the ſame in Effect with a Coronation in England and France: And (not to be behind his Brother in the Concern for his Father's Soul) [4.] He alſo beſtowed what Treaſure he found found there, on Monaſteries and Churches; ſo whoſoever loſt the Church (that is the Prieſts) were ſtill ſure to be the greateſt (if not only) gainers by the Sins of Princes: Duke Robert likewiſe did then ſet at Liberty [5.] Ulf, another Son to the late King Harold, and Duncar Son to the King of Scots, whom his Father had kept Priſoners. Anno Dom. MLXXXVIII. [5.] Idem Ib.

[1.] The Winter paſſed quiet enough, but in Spring following there aroſe a great Diviſion between the Norman Noblemen that were ſetled in England, ſome of whom now began (though too late) to repent of the Choice they had made, inclining to Duke Robert the Elder Brother, whom the greateſt Part now favoured, as a Man of a more free and eaſy Nature, yet this was not the ſole Occaſion of their ſudden Change; for beſides that Conſideration (which might go a great way with ſome), it ſeems to have alſo proceeded from thoſe Diſapointments which many of thoſe Noblemen who at firſt ſided with him had met with in their Expectations; for it is highly difficult (if not impoſſible) to ſatisfy all Men's deſires according to what they themſelves think they deſerve; and thoſe who are failed, will look upon themſelves as diſobliged. [1.] W. M. F. W. Many of the Nobility repent their making of William, King.

[2.] But 'tis certain this Commotion was chiefly ſtirr'd up by Robert Earl of Mortain, and Odo his Brother, out of hatred to, and Emulation of Archbiſhop Lanfranc who was prefer'd before him in the King's Favour; and therefore he was reſolved to give both the King and him what diſturbance he could, and ſo conſpired with his Brother and as many of the Norman Lords as he found either already to Affect, or could be perſuaded to endeavour a Change; theſe he ſet on work to diſtract the King's Forces by taking Arms in divers Parts of the Kingdom at once; the principal Heads of this Inſurrection were Geoffry Biſhop of Conſtance, and William Biſhop of Durham (both whom Biſhop Odo had engaged to his Party) Robert Earl of Mortaign, Roger Earl of Shrewsbury, and many others too tedious to be inſerted here; ſo that moſt of the principal Men of the Kingdom, except Archbiſhop Lanfranc, conſpired to deprive the King of his Crown, if not of his Life: This Plot was firſt hatched in Lent, but did not break out till a little after Eaſter. [2.] Idem. Earl Robert and Biſhop Odo, Chief Exciters of this Commotion.

[3.] But Ordericus Vitalis gives us a larger and ſomewhat different Account why the greateſt part of the Norman Nobility thus conſpired againſt the King, to this Effect: That the Chief Men of England and Normandy, who had great Eſtates in both Counties, during the preceeding Winter met and conſulted about the Conſequences of this Diviſion and Separation of them one from the other; they were in a great ſtreight what to do, they could not at once ſerve two Lord's, ſo diſtant in Place and different in Intereſt, without diſpleaſing one of them, and thereby hazarding their Eſtates in the Territories of the offended Prince. At laſt moſt of them reſolved, ſince Duke Robert was the Elder Brother, to ſet him up, and make him Prince of England and Normandy, for Preſervation of the Unity of both Nations: This was the Contrivance of Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, Euſtace Earl of Bulloigne, Robert de Belleſme and many other Norman Lord's; which Deſign they communicated to Duke Robert, to whom (if they would once begin) he promiſed a ſufficient Aſſiſtance: In all which this Author ſpeaks very probably, except in what he writes concerning the Norman Nobilitie's [3.] P. 665. The true Reaſon why ſo many of the Norman Nobility conſpired againſt the King.

* He was Son to Roger Earl of Shrewsbury, and Arundel, and was Heir to both thoſe Earldoms.

litie's doing Homage to Duke Robert in his Father's Life time: Which, (beſides that it is not related by any other Hiſtorian), is alſo very unlikely, ſince his Father was angry with him a long time before his Death, and utterly refuſed to reſign the Dutchy of Normandy to him, as he expected he would: [4.] But this Author farther tells us (with greater certainty), that ſometime after Chriſtmas ſeveral of theſe Lords paſſed into England, where they fortified their Caſtles, and in a ſhort time ſtirred up a great Part of the Kingdom againſt the King; with theſe joined Roger Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, Hugh Grantmeſnill, Viſcount or Sheriff of Leiceſter, and many more very Great Men in England, who tho they ſeemingly continued in King William's Intereſt, yet privately favoured Duke Robert. Theſe alſo fortified, manned and victualled their Caſtles; and waſting the Countries almoſt all over the Nation, expected the Duke's arrival with an Army out of Normandy at the Spring.

[5.] Id. Ib. His great Preparations to Invade England.

[5.] For during this Winter Duke Robert plentifully diſtributed his Wealth among his Veteran Souldiers and Knights, and by hope of Rewards brought into his Service a Multitude of young Soldiers; but his Treaſure failing, he borrowed of his Brother Henry three thouſand Pounds, for which he received the whole Country of Conſtantine (now Contantin) being then the third Part of Normandy with the Cities thereunto belonging, as alſo St. Michael's Mount lying in the Sea, which was to be a Place of Retreat for him: Notwithſtanding which, as ſoon as the Duke had fail'd of his Deſign upon England, he unjuſtly diſſeized his Brother Henry of that Country and Fortreſs which he had mortgaged to him.

[1.] Id. Ib. What means the King uſed to prevent it.

[1.] King William being ſenſible of the ill Poſture of his Affairs, reſolved to ſuppreſs theſe Inſurrections, and to that purpoſe, ſummon'd Archbiſhop Lanfranc with the Biſhops, Earls and Natural Engliſh and ſhewed them his Intentions: They exhorted the King to proceed againſt theſe Diſturbers of the publick Peace, and promiſed him their utmoſt Aſſiſtance; which is alſo confirm'd by William of Malmeſbury, who ſays, the King had no way left but to apply himſelf to his Honeſt Engliſh Subjects.

[2.] C. S. F. W. What Actions happen'd upon the breaking out of the War.

In the beginning of the Spring the War broke out almoſt at once, divers Biſhops and Great Lords taking up Arms in ſeveral Places. Our [2.] Engliſh Writers make Geoffry Biſhop of Conſtance and Robert de Mowbray, his Nephew, to have begun this War; who went to Briſtol where they ſeized the Caſtle, and from thence they marched and plundered Bath with all the Countries thereabout: Alſo the Earls of Hereford and Shrewsbury with their Tenants in thoſe Counties, and a great Multitude of Welſhmen, marched as far as Worceſter, where they hoped to have got that Church and Caſtle into their Hands, being then Commanded by Biſhop Wulſtan who was much troubled at this News; yet reſolving to continue firm to the King, he immediately retired into the Caſtle, and from thence ordered his Men to ſally out upon the Enemy, who had ſuch good Succeſs, that they killed and took Priſoners above five hundred of them and put the reſt to flight. About the ſame time Roger Bigot ſeized the Caſtle of Norwich, and after that made a great Spoil in the Adjacent Country, whilſt Hugh Grantmeſnill did the like in Leiceſterſhire and Northamtonſhire; and Bernard of Newmarket ſeized upon the Caſtle of Hertford: Nor was the

North

North free from Diſturbances; For William Biſhop of Durham (a Man of great Power, and a Voluble Tongue) on whoſe Advice the King at firſt very much relyed, revolted from him, and raiſed a War, not only in his own Country, but in thoſe that lay next to him. Anno Dom. MLXXXVIII.

[3.] In the mean while Biſhop Odo (who was the Ring-leader of this miſchief) went into Kent, where he Plundered the King's Towns, as alſo the Lands of all thoſe who adhered to him, and new Fortified the Caſtle of Rocheſter, [4.] as a place of Advantage, and moſt fit for their chief Magazine, being in the mid-Way between London and Canterbury, near the Sea-Coaſt of Kent, where they intended to Land their Forces and Warlike Proviſions; and from thence too they could at pleaſure keep a Correſpondence with Duke Robert.

[4.] O. V.

[5.] But the King did not give them any long time to fortifie themſelves, for he immediately marched with his Army againſt Rocheſter, ſuppoſing his Uncle the Biſhop had been there; but hearing that he had left it, and retired to Pevenſy Caſtle, he reſolved to follow him thither, ſince if he could take him, he looked upon the War as half ended: ſo drawing off his Forces from Rocheſter, he marched to Tunbridge, where he found the Caſtle ſtrongly fortified by Biſhop Odo's Men; but the Engliſh manfully aſſaulting it, thoſe within ſurrendered upon Conditions, and the King then ordering it to be demoliſhed; he marched with his whole Army towards Pevenſy, in perſuit of the Biſhop; which Caſtle belonging to Earl Robert, Odo's Brother, the King preſently beſieged with his whole Army, for the ſpace of ſix Weeks.

[5.] F. W. King William marches againſt the Biſhop.

[1.] Whilſt things went thus, Robert Duke of Normandy, had got together a Great Army which he ordered to be tranſported into England, ſeeming reſolved to follow it himſelf ſoon after; but yet conſulting too much his own eaſe and ſecurity, he came not at the time appointed; which delay proved the ruin of this Enterprize, [2.] for the King's Fleet ſo well defended the Sea-Coaſts, that falling upon the Duke's Forces, which was then paſſing over, they killed and drowned an incredible number of them.

[1.] C. S. F. W. Duke Robert Aſſembles a Great Army, but fails to come over.

[2.] W. M. P. 68. a.

From whence we may obſerve how neceſſary it is for a King of England to be Maſter at Sea; for had the Duke's Forces now Landed, and joyned with thoſe that were in Rebellion, they had certainly either depoſed the King, or at leaſt put him in great hazard; whereas the Duke's Succours being deſtroy'd at Sea, and his Party in England not having an Army great enough to take the Field, they were quickly ſubdued one after another, before Duke Robert could come over to their aſſiſtance, which when he would have done, it was too late.

Wherefore, tho' Polydore Virgil tells us, that ſome Engliſh Writers make Duke Robert to have then come into England to aſſiſt thoſe of his party: I (for my part) cannot find ſo much as one antient Writer that aſſerts it; for, the Truth is, he loſt the Kingdom by his own Slothfulneſs, in failing to come over in due Seaſon.

Polydore Virgil's miſtake in making Duke Robert to have now come into England.

[2.] But to return to our Hiſtory; whilſt things paſt thus ſucceſsfully at Sea, Biſhop Odo, and thoſe who were with him in the Caſtle of Pevenſy, compelled by Famine, were forced to Surrender that place, as alſo to ſwear they would quit the Kingdom, and never return to it again, unleſs King William commanded them; then the Biſhop being taken Priſoner, engaged (to obtain his Liberty) that his Men ſhould alſo alſo deliver up the Caſtle of Rocheſter; but when the Biſhop was brought thither by the King's Soldiers who were to receive the Caſtle; the Gariſon that kept it, inſtead of Surrendering, Sallied out, and ſeiſed the Biſhop, together with thoſe that came with him, and carried them into the Caſtle, which was ſuppoſed to be done by the Biſhop's contrivance, for the Caſtle was very well Mann'd, and Victual'd, and there was then within it moſt of the [4.] Nobility of the French Faction: as Euſtace, the younger Earl of Boloign, and Robert de Belleſm, with many other Norman Lords. But when the King heard this, he marched thither with what Forces he had with him, and ſending throughout all England, he commanded every Man as well French as Engliſh, who would not be counted a * Nithing, to repair to him; ſo that great Numbers being thus aſſembled, he marched to Rocheſter, and there Beſieged the Caſtle, where the Defendants in vain expected the Aſſiſtance of Duke Robert, for he was detained at home by eaſe and Luxury from that Expedition.

* i.e. In Engliſh Saxon, a Baſe Cowardly Fellow.

[4.] Ordericus Vitalis further relates, that thoſe of the Duke's Party at firſt held the Town, as well as the Caſtle, but being beaten out of the former, and reduced into a narrower compaſs, many periſhed of a raging Sickneſs; and then too being preſſed by divers Neceſſities, they ſent to King William, that upon condition they might enjoy their Lands and Eſtates, they would yield the Caſtle, and for the future ſerve him faithfully as their Natural Lord. The King was angry at theſe Propoſitions, and ſwore he would take the perfidious Traytors by force, and hang, and deſtroy them all, by divers kinds of deaths; and to ſome of his Nobility (who having many Friends and Relations in the Caſtle, perſwaded, him to Moderation) he gave this notable Anſwer, That whoſoever ſpared Perjured Men, Thieves, Plunderers, and Execrable Traytors, took away quiet and peace from innocent Men, and laid a foundation of innumerable miſchiefs to the good and harmleſs. But at length overcome by the Interceſſion of his Friends, the Biſhops, with the Engliſh Noblemen, Hugh Earl of Cheſter, Robert de Roelent, William de Warrenna, Robert Fitz-Haimon, and other Loyal Antient Barons, he granted the Beſieged their Lives, pardoned the loſs of their Limbs, and gave them leave to paſs out of the Caſtle, with their Horſes and Armes, but without hopes of ever enjoying their Lands and Eſtates during his Reign; whereupon they were forced to quit the Kingdom, as was alſo Biſhop Odo, who now irrecoverably loſt both his Honour (i.e. his Earldom of Kent,) and great Eſtate in England; yet to make him ſome amends for his loſs, ſo ſoon as he returned into Normandy, he had the Government of that Province committed to his Charge, by his Nephew Duke Robert.

[1.] Then King William beſtowed the Eſtates of theſe Baniſhed Noblemen upon others, who had ſerved him faithfully during this War; which tho' it was now happily and unexpectedly ended, yet it would not have been over ſo ſoon, had it not been for certain very Politick Methods which this King took at the beginning of theſe Commotions; [2.] for it was not by open force that he quell'd this Univerſal defection of the Normans; but by publiſhing, That he would eaſe all his Subjects, and eſpecially the Native Engliſh of their great Taxes, promiſing them better Laws, with the free Liberty of Hunting in his Foreſts; as alſo by bribing ſome of the chief Norman Noblemen, with with large Promiſes of what great things he would do for them: Thus he inſinuated himſelf into Roger Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, (concerned, tho' under-hand, in this Inſurrection) to whom he pretended he would moſt willingly quit the Government, if he and thoſe his Father had deſign'd his * Curators ſhould think fit; yet adding, that he knew not why they were ſo violent againſt him; for if they would have Money or Augmentation of their Eſtates, they might have what they would, upon condition they did not endanger nor queſtion his Father's Judgment; which if they deſpiſed, they might hazard their own ſafety; for the ſame Man that had made him a King, made them Earls and Great Men. With theſe fair words and promiſes the Earl was brought off from the Confederacy, which was immediately then broken, and the Nation reduced to quiet (as was ſaid before) the Confederates either ſubmitting, or leaving the Kingdom. Anno Dom. MLXXXVIII.

And the great Promiſes he made divers Noblemen, who were at firſt againſt him.

But no ſooner was the King rid of theſe Fears, and ſettled in his Throne, [2.] but, forgetting all his Oaths and Promiſes, he took quite contrary Meaſures in his Government to what he had done before; of which breach of Faith being mildly admoniſhed by Archbiſhop Lanfranc, the King grew very angry, and preſently replied, Who can perform all things he hath promiſed? But he never after could afford him a kind look: [3.] Yet being ſtill ſomewhat in awe of him, he refrain'd from doing many things to which he had a great inclination; but this good Archbiſhop continued not long a Reſtraint to him. Anno Dom. MLXXXIX.

[4.] For on the 24*th.* of May, this Year, he departed this Life, of a lingering Feaver, to the great grief of all good Men, being not only a Great Scholar for that Age, and well vers'd in the Affairs of the Kingdom, but alſo very Pious and Charitable, and not at all addicted (as our Hiſtorian relates) to that ſordid Covetouſneſs, for which his Country-men the Lombards were then noted. He not only gave a great deal to the Poor, (whom he often ſerved with his own hands;) but, which was more, when he found his Church and Monaſtery burnt down, he new built them from the Ground, after a more Magnificent manner, with a Palace likewiſe for himſelf and his Succeſſors, and all in the ſpace of ſeven Years; he likewiſe nobly adorned the Church with rich Copes, and all other Neceſſary Ornaments: So that it ſeems a wonder how he was able to perform ſo much in ſo little time.

[2.] About this time Henry, younger Brother to Duke Robert, having been ill uſed and impriſoned by him, and alſo diſſeized by King William of his Mother's Lands in England, ſtood Neuter, and fortified the Towns which were mortgaged to him, viz. Cherburgh, Auranches, Conſtance, and other Places, and craftily gained to his Party many of his Father's Nobility, as Earl Hugh de Auranches, Richard de Redvers, and others of the County of Contantine, by which means his Forces encreaſed daily.

The Citizens of Rouën about to deliver that City to King William.

About the ſame time King William's Army marched almoſt where it would through Normandy, the Norman Nobility favouring him for his Money; the Citizens of Rouën being likewiſe bribed by his Gifts and Promiſes, treated with him about charging their Prince, and conſulted how to betray the Metropolitane City of Normandy, together with their Lazy Duke, to the King. One Canon a Rich Citizen was the Chief Conſpirator, and had bargained with King William to let his Forces into the City; but the Duke being made ſenſible of this Conſpiracy, preſently ſtruck up a Peace with his Brother Henry, and ſome others, that that had revolted from him, who put themſelves time enough into the Town to ſecure it, tho' with great Slaughter of the Citizens, who made Reſiſtance; Conan the chief Traytor was taken, and for his puniſhment was by Henry's Order carried up into a high Tower, and from thence was by his own hands flung headlong out of a Window: But this Reconciliation between theſe Brothers did not hold long, as you will find by and by. Anno Dom. MXC.

[3.] In the mean time I find nothing done in England, only the Kingdom was extremely exhauſted by cruel and illegal Taxes, with other Misfortunes. [3.]

[4.] The next year King William having kept his Chriſtmaß at Weſtminſter, paſſed over about Candlemaß following into Normandy with a great Fleet, wholly to deprive his Brother Robert of it, and made him raiſe the Siege of a Caſtle called Curcey, which he had Beſieged for ſome time, but the King had not been long there, before a Peace was concluded between 'em upon theſe Conditions, that the Duke ſhould grant to the King the Country of Ou, now called Eu, and the Towns of Feſcamp and Karesburgh, with all thoſe Caſtles which had revolted from him; in conſideration of which, the King was to reduce to the Duke's Obedience the County of Main, and all thoſe Caſtles in Normandy that were then in Rebellion; that the King ſhould alſo reſtore to the Norman Noblemen all thoſe Lands they had loſt for their fidelity to the Duke, and that the King ſhould confer upon him as much Land in England as was then agreed upon between them: Laſtly, That if the Duke ſhould die without any Son lawfully begotten, the King ſhould then be his Heir, as he alſo the King's, upon the ſame Terms. Theſe were the chief Conditions of the Peace then concluded between them: for the true performance of which Twelve Barons on each ſide took their Oaths on the behalf of their reſpective Princes. Anno Dom: MXCI. [4.] Idem. C. S. The King paſſes into Normandy with a Fleet. A Peace concluded between the King and Duke, and on what Conditions.

[5.] After which the two Brother Princes came together to Rouën, where all former Quarrels being laid aſide, they were reconciled to each other. The Duke received great Gifts and Preſents from the King, to whom the Duke granted the Country or Earldoms of Ou, and Albemarle, with the Lands of Gerard de Gournay and Ralph de Conches, with all the Caſtles and Fortreſſes belonging to them. But when Henry their Brother ſaw how things were carried, he was not at all pleas'd with theſe Tranſactions, for he was thereby wholly left out of the Agreement, and being therefore reſolved to Right himſelf as well as he could, after having made great Complaints (tho' in vain) againſt the hard dealing of his Brothers; and having demanded ſome part of the large Poſſeſſions of his Father, and being refuſed them, he gathered together a Body of the Bretaignes and Normans, and fortified Conſtance, Auranches, and ſome other Towns, which it ſeems, remain'd ſtill in his power: But how this will agree with what other Authors relate, that Henry ſtood then diſſeiſed of thoſe places which had been formerly Morgaged to him, I know not. [5.] O. V. P. 693. The two Princes being reconciled, the King comes where they make each other great Preſents. Henry their Brother being included out of this Peace, ſtands upon his own defence.

But to return to our Author: Hugh E. of Cheſter, and others, who much favoured Henry, yet weighing his Poverty, and the great Riches and Power of K. Will. deſerted the former, and yielded their places of ſtrength to the latter; whereupon Henry being thus forſaken by all, was forced to betake himſelf to his laſt Retreat, St. Michael's Mount, [1.] from whence Henry betakes himſelf to St. Michael's Mount. whence Sallying out with his Soldiers, he ſpoiled the adjacent Country; to put a ſtop to which, his two Elder Brothers being now Confederates, and joyning their Forces, Beſieged that Fortreſs all the Lent, where they loſt many Men without ſucceſs; till at laſt the King being quite wearied out, raiſed the Siege, and departed; after which (as [2.] Ordericus relates) the Fortreſs was Surrendered to the Duke for want of Water, on condition that Henry and thoſe with him might have liberty to go whither they pleaſed; after which (according to the ſame Author) this poor Prince being thus deſerted, retired into Bretaigne, and going thence, remain'd for ſome time in the * French Veuxin, often ſhifting places, being attended with one Knight, a Clerk or Chaplain, and three Eſquires, or Servants; tho' all our Hiſtorians except William of Malmesbury, make his Brothers to have been reconciled to him, and that King William preſently after took him and Duke Robert both over into England along with him: But however it were, Henry did not long remain in ſo forlorn a condition, for this [3.] Author himſelf relates him to have been about the very next year after in the City of Damfront in Normandy, as you will find anon.

[3.] W. M. P. 698.

But before I diſmiſs this Subject, I cannot omit two remarkable accidents related by [4.] William of Malmesbury during the Siege above mentioned, the one to ſhew the Magnanimity of the King, and the other the good nature of Duke Robert; the former riding one day out of his Camp alone to take the Air, ſaw ſome of the Enemies Soldiers riding very boldly up to him; and tho' he was alone, yet truſting to his own Perſonal Valour, he would needs ſet upon them, believing none would dare to reſiſt him; but at the firſt Encounter being by one of them flung from off his Horſe (which alſo happen'd to be killed under him) the Soldier who did it, had now drawn his Sword, and was ready to ſtrike him, when he being ſenſible of the extremity of the danger, cried out, Hold Knave, I am the King of England; theſe Soldiers being ſurprized at this Speech, preſently took him up with great Reſpect, and ſet him upon another Horſe; as ſoon as he had mounted, looking briskly round him, he asked who it was that had diſmounted him? Then after they had whiſpered together, at laſt he who had done it, boldly anſwered, It was I, who did not think you were any more than a common Trooper. Then the King with a pleaſant Countenance replied, By St. Luke's Face (which was his uſual Oath) thou ſhalt be my Soldier, and ſerving under me, ſhalt enjoy the juſt reward of thy Valour. This our Author thinks ſo generous an action, that he prefers it before that of Alexander the Great, who pardoned a Perſian Souldier, that was about to have wounded him.

[4.] Hiſt. p. 68. (b) Two Relations that ſhew the different Tempers of the King and Duke.

[5.] The other inſtance of Duke Robert's Generoſity and good nature, is this, that at this Siege, when it had now held out long, and Water grew ſcarce in the Fortreſs, Henry ſent Meſſengers to his Brother the Duke, deſiring he might not be denied Water, or elſe that he would ſubdue him by force of Arms, and not by Thirſt. The Duke being moved with natural affection towards his Brother, commanded his Men to keep ſuch a negligent Guard on that ſide, as that his Brother's Men might have the opportunity of fetching in Water.

[5.] W. M. Ib. P. 121.

But when this was told King William, who was more Politick, as well as ill natur'd, he ſaid to the Duke in anger, You know indeed very well, well, how to make War, who allow your Enemies ſuch plenty of Water. The Duke replied ſmiling, What ſhall I ſuffer my Brother to die with Thirſt; where ſhall we have another when he is gone? But the King deriding the Duke's eaſie nature, quitted the Siege, and returned into England, where the frequent Invaſions of the Scots and Welſh required his preſence to repell them. Anno Dom. MXCI.

Yet Florence makes the King to have ſtayed in Normandy with his Brother Robert till Auguſt, and then to have return'd into England, but which of theſe Author's Relations is moſt to be followed, I will not take upon me to determine, tho' the latter ſeems moſt likely.

[1.] However this is more certain, that the King before he left Normandy, made his Brother Duke Robert baniſh Edgar Atheling out of that Country, and the King himſelf deprived him of all the Lands he had given him, only becauſe he had been of the weaker ſide, who thereupon went into Scotland to King Malcolm his Brother-in-law. But not long after this King William ſo prevail'd with Duke Robert, either by promiſing him money, or ſome further performance of the reſt of the Treaty, that was ſtill to be finiſht here, that he brought him over into England, and had his Company in the Expedition which he now made againſt Malcolm King of Scots; who the May before taking advantage of the King's abſence, had [2.] Invaded Northumberland, and intended to do greater miſchiefs to the Engliſh, had he not been hindred by ſome ſudden, unexpected accident; but whither it was the fear of a Rebellion at home, or of the great Preparations that were making againſt him in England, none of our Hiſtorians vouchſafe to tell us, only in general, That God would not have it ſo. But whatſoever was the cauſe of his ſudden Retreat, his Army carried away great ſtore of Booty into their own Kingdom.

[3.] The Auguſt following, ſo ſoon as King William and his Brother Duke Robert arriv'd in England, they marched againſt the King of Scots with a very great Army, having ſent a powerful Fleet before to annoy the Coaſt; but the greateſt part of the Ships were loſt in a Storm, about Michaelmaſs, before the King's arrival in Scotland.

[4.] As ſoon as the King came to Durham, he reſtored Egilwin Biſhop thereof to his former Office and Dignity, which he ſtood deprived of for his Rebellion againſt him, ever ſince the firſt Year of his Reign.

[4.] S. D. The King reſtores the Biſhop of Durham.

[5.] Then the King of Scots met King William in the Country of Lothian upon the Borders of England, who had loſt a great many Men and Horſes by Hunger and long Marches. Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, ſeeing the Scots ſo well prepared, ſent for Edgar Atheling to come privately to him, (who ever ſince his late Baniſhment out of Normandy had reſided in Scotland) and by his means a Peace was clapt up between the two Kings on theſe Conditions: Firſt, That Malcolm ſhould yield the King the ſame Obedience as he had done to his Father King William. Secondly, That the King ſhould reſtore to Malcolm Twelve Mannors, which he had formerly held under his Father, and ſhould alſo pay him every year Twelve Marks of Gold. But this Peace did not laſt long, as you will find hereafter; therefore in conſideration of this good Office, the King was again reconciled to Prince Edgar, and thereupon both the Kings returned home in peace.

[1.] P. 701. Another Relation of the making this Peace by means of Duke Robert.

But [1.] Ordericus Vitalis relates this Tranſaction ſomewhat another way; that this Peace was made chiefly by the means of Duke Robert, for that the King of Scots refuſed to Treat with any but him; to whom, as to the Eldeſt Son and Heir of King William, he was willing to yield what ever was due; and that the Duke thereupon going to him, and after having entertain'd him very kindly for the ſpace of three days, the King carried him at laſt to the top of a high Mountain, from whence he ſhewed him two great Armies, with which he ſaid he was ready to fight his Brother; for having never promiſed him any thing, he owed him nothing; but was ready to do to him what he had promiſed to his Father: But the Duke civilly refuſing it, perſwaded that King to go along with him to King William; from whom, as from a richer and more powerful Prince, he needed not doubt of a kind Reception. And that then the King went with him; ſo upon this Enterview they were made Friends.

But this Story I take to be as true as the reſt of the Speech this Author makes for King Malcolm, that his Wife Queen Margaret was betrothed to him by King Edward the Confeſſor; and that at the ſame time he received Lothian at his hands: Both which are quite contrary to the Teſtimony of the Saxon Annals, and of all other Engliſh Hiſtorians, as you will find hereafter in this Reign; therefore I look upon this whole Relation to be invented by the Norman Monks, to advance the Honour of their Duke Robert.

[2.] C. S. Duke Robert with Edgar Atheling returns into Normandy.

But this is more certain concerning this Duke, [2.] that when he had ſtayed with the King till toward Chriſtmaſs, and found that he would not truly perform the Conditions of the Peace lately agreed upon between them, he went on Board his Ships two days before that Feaſt, and taking Edgar Atheling along with him, paſſed over into Normandy.

Great Part of South Wales Conquer'd by the Engliſh and Normans.

[3.] P. 124. And on what Occaſion.

During the King's abſence there happen'd the total Conqueſt of all the Country of Glamorgan and Morganwie in South-Wales, a ſhort account of which I ſhall give you from [3.] Dr. Powel's Welſh Chronicle, under the year of our Lord 1091, viz. that in the fourth year of the Reign of King William Rufus, Jeſtyn, the Son of Gurgant, being Lord of the Territories of Glamorgan and Morganwie, Rees ap Tewdor Prince of South-Wales (that is of Caërmarthen and Cardigan Shires) made War upon him; whereupon Jeſtyn finding himſelf too weak to withſtand Prince Rees without ſome foreign Aides, ſent one Eneon, a Gentleman of his, into England, to one Robert Fitz-hamon, a valiant Man, and Knight of the King's Privy Chamber, for aſſiſtance. Robert being deſirous to Exerciſe himſelf in the Feats of Arms, ſoon agreed with Eneon for a Salary to be paid him for his Service when perform'd. Whereupon Robert Fitz-hamon alſo retained for this Expedition Twelve other Knights, and a competent number of Soldiers, with whom he march'd into Wales, and joyning there with the Forces of Jeſtyn, fought with Prince Rees ap Tewdor, and killed him, together with Conan his Son. After which Victory, the ſaid Robert Fitz-hamon reſolving to return home with his Company, demanded his Salary due to him from Jeſtyn, according to the Covenants agreed upon between him and Eneon, on the behalf of his Maſter; which Jeſtyn denying denying to perform, they thereupon fell out, and at laſt it came to a Battel; and when Eneon ſaw his Maſter thus to go from divers of thoſe Articles that had been agreed with Robert Fitz-hamon on his behalf, he forſook his Maſter, and took part (both he and his Friends) with Robert Fitz-hamon, in which Conflict Jeſtyn, with a great number of his Men, were ſlain, whereby Robert Fitz-hamon conquered the whole County of Glamorgan, with its Appurtenances; of which he gave certain Caſtles and Mannors to the Twelve Knights that aſſiſted him in this Expedition, as a reward of their Service; ſome of whoſe Poſterity enjoy part of thoſe Lands to this day. Anno Dom. MXCI.

This again ſhews us, that the Ruin of the Princes of Wales proceeded from the Diviſion of that Principality into ſo many ſmall Shares, the Lords of which (being oppreſſed by their chief Princes) called in the Engliſh to their Aſſiſtance, who never fail'd to make their Advantage of thoſe unnatural Diviſions.

I have nothing more to add under this Year, [4.] but certain ſtrange Accidents; That in October happened ſo great a Thunder and Lightning in Glouſterſhire, that it made a great Hole in the Tower of the Abbey-Church of Winchelcomb, and paſſing through it, broke one of the Beams in ſunder, and ſtruck off the Head and one of the Leggs of the Great Crucifix, overthrowing the Image of the Virgin Mary, that ſtood by it; this was followed by ſo intollerable a ſtench, that the Monks thought good to drive it away with Incenſe, Holy Water, and Singing of Pſalms; for they ſuppoſed nothing but the Devil himſelf durſt have treated their Images ſo rudely. [4.] F. W. The ſtrange Effect of Lightning at Winchelcomb Abbey.

[5.] Alſo about the beginning of November following, there aroſe ſuch a violent Storm from the South-Weſt, as overthrew Six hundred Houſes, and divers Churches in London: Which Tempeſt took off the whole Roof of the Church of St. Mary le Bow in Cheapſide, and carried it a good way, to the amazement of all that ſaw it; and then the Raſters ſtruck into the Ground with that prodigious force, that Six of them (being Twenty ſeven foot long) were fixed ſo deep into the Earth in the ſame order as they ſtood in the Church, that not above a third or fourth part of them were to be ſeen above Ground; ſo that not being without great difficulty to be dig'd out, they were fain to cut off the Ends even with the Ground; This would ſeem incredible, unleſs we conſider, that the Streets were not then Paved, as they are now; and did not ſuch grave Authors as William of Malmesbury, who lived at that time, and Florence of Worceſter, who flouriſhed not many years after, aſſure us of it. [5.] Idem Ib. W. M. P. 71. b. A ſtrange Storm of Wind at London, and its wonderful force.

Alſo about this time, [1.] there was a great Diſpute in the Roman Church between Odo Biſhop of Oſtia, who had been choſen Pope at Rome by the Name of Urban the Second, and Wibert Archbiſhop of Ravenna, who had alſo been Elected and Named Clement by the Cardinals of the Emperor's Party, ſo that England for a great while owned neither of them; for tho' Italy and France had already acknowledged Urban, yet King William was more inclinable to Wibert. In Normandy I find nothing to have happened conſiderable, [3.] but that the ſtrong Sea-Port Town of Damfront, being weary of the Yoke of Robert de Belleſme their Governour, privately ſent for Henry, Duke Robert's Brother, and Surrender'd the Town into his hands, and received him for their Lord: Who having thus obtain'd it by the Aſſiſtance of his Friends, Gariſon'd it very well, and made it his Refuge, till ſuch time as King William his Brother being reconciled to him, and having need of his Service, ſent for him over, as you will find two years hence.

[3.] O. V. P. 698. Damfront in Normandy ſurrenders to Henry the Duke's Brother.

As for Eccleſiaſtical matters there happened nothing Remarkable, [4.] but that Remigius Biſhop of Dorcheſter, having in the laſt King's Reign removed his Epiſcopal See from that Town in Oxfordſhire to Lincoln, and there built a ſtately Church, that City with the Country about it, was Challenged by Thomas Archbiſhop of York, as lying within his Dioceſs; [5.] which Claim the King underhand encouraged, till at length upon payment of a great Sum of Money to the King, Remigius obtain'd of him to declare in his favour: then all the Biſhops in England were commanded to be preſent at the Conſecration of the New Church; but two days before that Solemnity, the Biſhop died ſuddenly, and put an End to the matter; being a Prelate of a great Soul, but of a very little contemptible Stature.

Where King William kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year, our Authors do not tell us; only [2.] Eadmerus ſays, That when all the chief Men of the Kingdom met at the King's Court according to Cuſtom, ſome of them complain'd, that the Church of Canterbury had long wanted its Paſtor, therefore they reſolved to move the King to fill up that vacant See; but He would then by no means hearken to it, tho' one of the Earls who had the King's Ear, propoſed Anſelm, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, as a Man very Pious and fit for that Dignity: But in Lent following falling very Sick at the Mannor of Alveſtan in Glouceſterſhire, he was carried from thence to Glouceſter, and there his Diſeaſe increaſing, he lay Sick all the Lent, inſomuch that he thought he ſhould have died; then all the Biſhops, Barons, and Abbots, who came on purpoſe to wait on him, and take their laſt leaves, perſwaded him to Repentance, and not to let the vacant Biſhopricks out to Farm, as he had hitherto done, but beſtow them upon worthy Men; to which he was then inclined to yield; and thereupon vowed to God, that if ever he ſhould recover, he would abrogate all unjuſt Laws, and ordain right ones in their ſtead.

[2.] Eadmerus. P. 15. The King refuſes to make an Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

But falling Sick, is at laſt perſwaded to fill up that See, and Lincoln.

[3.] In performance of which Vow, he beſtowed the Biſhoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet his Chancellor, and the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury upon Abbot Anſelm, who was then newly come into England to viſit Hugh Earl of Cheſter, that then lay Sick, and was like to die.

[3.] Id. Ib. Abbot Anſelm made Archbiſhop, and Robert Bloet Bp. of Lincoln.

But Anſelm well knowing the wide difference between the King's diſpoſition and his own, was very loath at firſt to accept of ſo Great a Charge; but at length he yielded to the King's Intreaties (who then ſeemed ſeemed extraordinary penitent) and the perſwaſions of the Biſhops and Noblemen that had a high opinion of his Sanctity, and ſo he received the Croſier and Ring at the King's hands, and did him Homage, as his Predeceſſors had uſually done; as for the particular Circumſtances of this Tranſaction, being ſomewhat tedious and improper to our preſent deſign, I ſhall refer the more curious Reader to [5.] Eadmerus his relation of it, where you will find the Archbiſhop to have been very Judicious, (not to ſay Prophetick) in his fore-knowledge of what related to the King and himſelf.

Anno Dom. MXCIII.

[5.] Lib. I. p. 15, 17, 18, 19.

[1.] So ſoon as the King recovered from his Sickneſs, inſtead of becoming better, he grew much worſe, and wholly alter'd and diſannull'd whatever he had already done; for he commanded the Priſoners (not yet diſmiſſed) to be kept more cloſely than before; and thoſe already diſcharged, to be again taken up: In ſhort, all things were reduced to the ſame ſtate (or worſe) than they were in before, and brought under the management of thoſe who rather endeavoured to ſubvert, than defend Juſtice, and who took more care to get Money, than to correct offences.

[1.] Idem. Ib. P. 19. The King upon his Recovery diſannuls almoſt all he had done.

[2.] However, the Conſecration of the new Archbiſhop was perform'd at Canterbury, about the beginning of September, with the uſual Solemnities, where he alſo received the wonted Submiſſions of Thomas Archbiſhop of York, with the reſt of the Biſhops of England: But the former refuſed to agree to the Inſtrument of his Election, in which the Church of Canterbury was called the Metropolitan of all Britain, ſaying, If that be the only Metropolitan, then the Church of York is none, tho' it is well known ſo to be: We indeed allow the Church of Canterbury to be the chief, but not the ſole Metropolitan of all Britain. Whereupon the Writing was alter'd, and for Totius Britanniæ Metropolitanus, it was made Totius Angliæ Primas. And ſo the Controverſie reſted for the preſent.

[2.] Idem. Ib. P. 20, 21. The new Archbiſhop Conſecrated at Canterbury, where he received the Submiſſions of all the Biſhops.

[3.] But the Archbiſhop coming to Court towards Chriſtmaſs following, was joyfully received by the King, whom he found now reſolved once more to Invade Normandy; and lying under great difficulties how to carry on the War, Anſelm was perſwaded by his Friends to offer the King Five hundred Pounds, as a free Gift or Preſent; which was at firſt very kindly accepted, but the King being afterward incenſed by ſome about him refuſed it, expecting to have it doubled; whereupon ſome ſharp ſpeeches paſſed between Him and the Archbiſhop, which are related at large by Eadmerus, but the Archbiſhop's ſtout denial of any further Money was the firſt occaſion of the King's unkindneſs to him.

[3.] Id. Ibid. Archbiſhop Anſelm coming to Court, there ariſes a great difference between the King and him, and on what occaſion.

[4.] Not long after, Malcolm King of Scotland came to King William about Bartholomew-tide, being then at Glouceſter, as had been before agreed by his Ambaſſadors; he was accompanied thither by Edgar Atheling his Brother in Law, and the deſign of his coming was, that the late Peace being now confirm'd, a laſting Friendſhip might be made between the two Kings, which was much wiſhed for by ſome of the chief Nobility; but their deſires were wholly fruſtrated; for either out of pride, or ſome particular prejudice to Malcolm's Perſon, King William would not ſo much as vouchſafe to ſpeak with, or admit him into his Preſence; which the King of Scotland took ſo heinouſly (as well he might) that he returned home big with that rage, rage, which broke out not long after in a cruel and terrible War.

Now, tho' our Monkiſh Hiſtorians do not directly tell us the reaſons which induced King William to treat his Royal Neighbour thus rudely, who came ſo far to make him a viſit, yet I cannot believe him tranſported with meer pride or prejudice, but pure reaſon of State; which is hinted at in Simeon of Durham, who tells us, that King William then required of Malcolm to do him Homage in his own * Court, or Great Council, which he utterly refuſed to do any where but in the Confines of both Kingdoms, as the Kings of Scotland were wont to do in former times. Now this being (I ſuppoſe) required to be agreed to before Malcolm's admittance into the King's Preſence, and being by him refuſed, might be the reaſon why the King would not admit of an Enterview with him.

* Curia.

[5.] Id. Ib. R. H. King Malcolm as ſoon as he return'd home, raiſed an Army, and Invading England, is there ſlain.

[5.] But let the cauſe of this miſunderſtanding be what it will, King Malcolm, as ſoon as he return'd into Scotland, rais'd an Army, and Invading England as far as Alnewick, made great Devaſtations; but Robert Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, with what Forces he could get together, ſetting upon him unawares near that Town, unfortunately ſlew him upon St. Brice's day. He was a Prince of great courage and vertue, tho' too apt to revenge the leaſt injuries; our Saxon Annals relate that he was ſlain by one Moreal of Bebanburgh, who was the Earl's Steward, but the * Scottiſh Hiſtorians ſay he was killed very treacherouſly; for having Beſieged the Caſtle of Alnewick, and reduced it to that extremity, that thoſe within were forced to treat of a Surrender; and it being agreed to, they only deſired that the King in Perſon would receive the Keys of the Caſtle, which were brought by a Soldier upon the top of his Lance, who, ſtanding within the Wall of the Caſtle, thruſt the point of the Lance into the King's Eye, as he was going to take them. This ſounds very improbable, for how could the Soldier be ſure to hit the King in the Eye? and if he had fail'd of his Thruſt, what could he expect but certain deſtruction to himſelf and the whole Gariſon. But this is certain, that his Eldeſt Son, Prince Edward, who accompanied him in this Expedition, going about to revenge his death, fell too raſhly upon the Enemy, and received a Wound of which he ſoon after died. The Scots having received ſo great a loſs by the death of both their Kings returned home under a terrible Conſternation.

Prince Edward, Son to Malcolm, ſlain at the ſame Time.

[1.] S. D. F. W. Queen Margaret upon hearing the News, dies of Grief.

When [1.] Q. Margaret heard at once of the death both of the King her Husband, and the Prince her Son, ſhe was taken with ſuch a ſudden failure of Spirits, that immediately going to the Church, and there deſiring of God not long to ſurvive ſo great a loſs; ſhe had her Prayers granted, and departed this life within three days after ſhe had heard this killing News. Being a Princeſs of moſt Exemplary Piety and Charity to the Poor, whom ſhe often ſerved with her own hands.

Her Character.

But notwithſtanding what the Scottiſh Hiſtorians relate of the ſafe Retreat of their Army from this Expedition, Simeon of Durham is poſitive, that all the reſt of it did either periſh by the Sword, or elſe were drown'd in the Rivers, which were then ſo much ſwelled by the Winter Rains, that they had overflown their Banks.

[2.] S. D. King Malcolm's Body buried at Tynmuthe.

[2.] Now to ſhew further the Errour of thoſe Writers, it appears that their King's Corps remain'd in the power of the Engliſh, which being being found among the Slain, two Country fellows put it in a Cart, and carried it to the Monaſtery of Tynmuthe to be buried there, which could never have been done had he been killed amongſt his own Subjects, who would then certainly have kept the Body, and carried it into Scotland.

Anno Dom. MXCIII.

The King being thus dead (as you have heard) the Engliſh [3.] Hiſtorians relate, that the Nobility of that Kingdom aſſembling with one conſent Elected Duffnal (or Donald) Brother to Malcolm to be their King, expelling Edgar Atheling, with all the Engliſh that were ſettled in Scotland; who taking with them the Children of the late King Malcolm ſought refuge in England; where they were kindly received.

[3.] F. W. S. D. The Scottiſh Nobility Elect Donald, Brother to Malcolm for their King, ſetting aſide his Children.

[4.] But King Donald did not long hold the Kingdom; for Duncan, a baſe Son to the late King being then in the Court of William Rufus as a Hoſtage, deſired the King's aſſiſtance to obtain his Father's Kingdom, who thereupon granting his requeſt, (and having firſt taken an Oath of Fealty to himſelf,) furniſhed him with a great Army of Engliſh and Normans, with which he marched againſt his Uncle, who had then alſo newly Invaded England; and coming to a Battel, he utterly routed this Donald, and forced him to flie into the Weſtern Iſles, and Duncan was immediately Crowned King in his Room.

[4.] C. S. Duncan baſe Son to Malcolm, by the Aſſiſtance of King William, routs Donald, and kills him.

[5.] I have given you this piece of Scottiſh Hiſtory to let you ſee that the Succeſſion of that Crown was not yet ſo ſettled in a Right Line, but that the Scottiſh Nation made bold to Elect two Kings together (one of which was a Baſtard) in prejudice of Prince Edgar, Eldeſt Son to the late King Malcolm.

[1.] As for other foreign Affairs I find none, only that Rhees King or Prince of the Welſhmen was killed this Year in Eaſter Week, in a Fight near Brecknock Caſtle, from which time Kings have ceaſed to rule in Wales, I ſuppoſe the Author means in South-Wales; for North-Wales enjoy'd its own Princes for above a hundred and fifty years after.

[1.] F. W. Rhees Prince of Wales ſlain.

[2.] King William keeping his Chriſtmaſs this year at Glouceſter, there came Ambaſſadours from Duke Robert out of Normandy, who told the King, that his Brother would no longer keep the Articles of Peace on his part, unleſs the King would alſo perform what he had promiſed and ſworn to obſerve; and telling him plainly that he was perjur'd for having thus violated his Oath. But the King upon the receipt of this Meſſage was reſolved to be before hand with his Brother, and immediately marched with his Army to Haſtings about Candlemaſs, where he waited for a Wind a whole Month; and during his ſtay there deprived [3.] Herbert Biſhop of Thetford, of his Paſtoral Staff, becauſe he was about to go privately to the Pope to obtain Abſolution of his Simony, in buying that Biſhoprick for himſelf, beſides an Abbey for his Father of the King, for One thouſand Pounds; yet this Biſhop not long after got the King's Leave to go to Rome; and having there obtain'd the Pope's Pardon, built the Cathedral Church of Norwich, as you will find anon.

[4]. But at laſt King William about Mid-Lent paſſed over into Normandy, and ſoon after his Arrival had an Enterview with his Brother, about a Treaty of Peace, but they could by no means hit upon it: However a Second Meeting was appointed by the Mediation of their common common Friends in the Fields of * Martius, where thoſe Barons who had taken their Oaths to ſee the Peace obſerved on both ſides, caſt all the blame upon the King, who yet would neither acknowledge his fault, nor perform the Agreement; ſo that they departed from each other much more exaſperated than they were before.

* Where they lay I know not.

The Brothers meet and part without coming to any Agreement.

[5.] Idem. King William draws off many Noblemen from his Brother.

[5.] Then the Duke went to Rouën, and the King returned to the Caſtle of Eu; and whilſt he ſtayed there, he hired a great number of Soldiers, and drew off many Norman Noblemen from his Brother's Allyance, by promiſing ſome of them ready Money, and others Great Eſtates in England, provided they would deliver up their Caſtles into his hands; which when he had obtained, he preſently Gariſon'd them with the Soldiers he had before raiſed.

The Duke retakes ſeveral Caſtles.

The King alſo took the Caſtle of Buers, with all the Duke's Men that were in it; ſome of whom he ſent Priſoners into England, and others he kept in Normandy: But the Duke having obtained ſome Forces of the King of France, Beſieged and took the Caſtle of Argentine, with Eight hundred Men in it, who were all made Priſoners; So the King of France return'd home. Then Duke Robert Beſieged the Caſtle of Holme, until he forced William Peverel the Governour, with all the Men to Surrender at Diſcretion.

[1.] Idem. The King ſends into England, and raiſes more Men, who being ready, he takes Money of each of them, and ſo lets them go.

[1.] When the King had received this bad News, he ſent over into England, and Commanded Twenty thouſand Foot to be immediately raiſed and Tranſported to him, who being all Muſtered at Haſtings, Ranulph the King's Treaſurer, by his Order, told the Men, that each of them paying Ten Shillings (which it ſeems had been before given by thoſe that raiſed them for their Maintenance) they might all return home, and be diſmiſſed their preſent Service. By which artifice the King had a good Sum of Money ſent him into Normandy, which it ſeems he moſt of all wanted. So that England was grievouſly afflicted, as well this Year as the next, with heavy Taxes, and great Mortality.

[2.] C. S. Duke Robert joyns his forces with thoſe of the French King; who being bought off, King William returns home.

King William ſends for his Brother Henry, and is reconciled to him.

[2.] Duke Robert by thus joyning his Forces with thoſe of the King of France, was now become ſo ſtrong, that they marched together in a Body towards the Caſtle of Eu, intending to have Beſieged King William there; but when they came as far as Longueville, the King of France being prevailed upon, either by the Money or Perſuaſions of King William, returned home again; ſo that the whole Army was forced to retreat. In the mean time the King had ſent for his Brother Henry (who was then in the Caſtle of Damfront, being at variance with Duke Robert) to come to him; and becauſe he could not come through Normandy, for fear of the Enemy, Hugh Earl of Cheſter was ſent to bring him by Sea; but inſtead of going to that Caſtle where the King was, (I know not for what reaſon) they ſet Sail for England, and Landing at Southampton, after ſome ſtay there, he went thence to London, where they remained till the King came over.

[3.] Dr. Powel's Chron. The Welſh take Arms, and Invade the Engliſh Conqueſt.

[3.] Whilſt King William continued in Normandy, firſt the Northern Welſhmen, and then thoſe of South-Wales endeavoured to caſt off the Norman Yoke, and recover their Antient Liberties; the former reduc'd the Caſtle in the Iſle of Angleſey unto their Obedience; and Griffyth ap Conan King of North-Wales, with Cadogan ap Blethyn, who then ruled South-Wales, entred the Country of Cardigan, and killed a great a great number of Normans, being no longer able to ſuffer their inſolent pride and cruelty; but after their return, the Engliſh Captains ſent over for more Men, and thought ſuddenly to make an Incurſion into North-Wales, which being diſcovered to Cadogan, he gathered his Forces and met with them in the Wood or Foreſt of Iſpys, and ſet upon the Engliſh and Normans with great Out-cries; and tho' they defended themſelves very manfully, yet in the end they were forced to flie with great loſs; and Cadogan purſuing them cloſely, ſpoiled the Countries of Cardigan and Dyvet, and deſtroyed all the Caſtles, except Pembroke and Rydcors, which he could not take, and ſo returned to Powys with great Rejoycing. Anno Dom. MXCIV.

[4.] Then King William being informed of the great Slaughter of his Subjects in Cheſhire, Shropſhire, and other bordering Counties, which Griffyth ap Conan, and the Sons of Blethyn ap Convyn, had lately made, was conſtrained to leave the War of Normandy unfiniſhed, and returning into England, preſently after Chriſtmaſs gathered a great Army, and entered Wales by the way of Montgomery, which Caſtle being lately demoliſh'd by the Welſhmen, he new built again; but they kept ſo cloſe in the Straites of the Mountains, encompaſſed with Woods and Rivers, that the King could do them no harm; ſo that loſing his labour, and (which was worſe) many of his beſt Men, he returned back with ſhame and diſhonour. Anno Dom. MXCV.

[4.] F. W. S. D. Dr. Powel's Chron. King William returns, and Invades Wales, but without any ſucceſs.

[5.] In the mean time the King ſent his Brother Henry into Normandy with a great Sum of Money to make War upon Duke Robert, whom he often overcame in fight, and did a great deal of miſchief both to his Territories and Subjects.

[5.] C. S. He ſends his Brother Henry into Normandy to make War upon his Brother Robert.

The King now kept his Court at Eaſter in Wincheſter, where Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland refuſed to appear; at which the King, being much incenſed, ſent him a threatning Meſſage, commanding him not to fail to come at the Whitſontide following; which Feaſt the King kept at Windſor, all his Great Men being preſent, except that Earl, who came not at all, becauſe (as he pretended) the King would not give him ſafe Conduct for his coming and returning again. But the true reaſon of his diſobedience was, [1.] that he had now entered into a ſecret Conſpiracy with William Earl of Eu, and divers other Norman Noblemen, to deprive King William both of his Life and Kingdom, and to make Stephen Earl of Albemarle his Siſter's Son, King in his room. But their Plot came to nothing, for being diſcovered, the King gathered a great Army throughout England, and beſieged Newcaſtle at the mouth of the River Tyne, for the ſpace of two Months; and tho' without taking that, yet however he took another ſmaller Fortreſs, wherein were many of the Earl's beſt Soldiers; after which the King at laſt made himſelf Maſter of Newcaſtle, together with the Earl's Brother, and many Knights, whom he committed to ſafe Cuſtody.

But [2.] Ordericus Vitalis gives us ſome Particulars of this action, that are omitted by others; as that the King in his March from thence was like to have been ſurprized by an Ambuſh which Robert de Mowbray had laid for him in a Wood, but it being diſcovered to him, and the deſign prevented by Gilbert de Tonbridge, one of the chief Conſpirators, the King marched on to Banborough Caſtle in which the Earl then was.

[3.] But the King not being able to take it by reaſon of the ſtrength of the Place, he built another Fortreſs over againſt it to Block it up, naming it Mal-voiſin, (which is in French an ill Neighbour) and having put a good Gariſon into it, return'd himſelf into the Southern parts; after whoſe departure ſome Soldiers belonging to Newcaſtle upon Tyne promiſed Earl Robert that they would give him Entrance into it, if he would come thither privately, with a few followers; at which he being very well pleaſed, went out one Night with about Thirty Soldiers to ſeize it, but being betrayed by ſome of his own Men, he was purſued by the Gariſon out of the Fortreſs of Mal-voiſin, as far as to the Monaſtery of St. Oſwin near Tinmouth, where (not being able to reach Newcaſtle) he made what reſiſtance he could; but ſeveral of his Men being killed or wounded, and he himſelf hurt in his Leg, he at laſt fled into the Church, from whence he was taken out by force, and committed cloſe Priſoner.

[3.] F. W. C. S.

Robert Earl of Northumberland taken Priſoner.

[4.] In the mean time the Welſhmen made freſh Incurſions; and having taken the Caſtle of Montgomery, they ſlew there divers Soldiers belonging to Hugh Earl of Shrewsbury; but when it came to the King's ears, he was ſo exceedingly provoked at it, that he immediately commanded another Expedition againſt the Welſh, tho' it were now after Michaelmaſs, and preſently marched himſelf into Wales, dividing his Forces, ſo that his whole Army met at the Feaſt of All-Saints under a high Mountain in Caernarvonſhire, called Snowdon; but the Welſh having retreated into their Faſtneſſes in the Bogs where no Body could follow them, the King was forced to return home; the Winter ſo faſt approaching, that it would have hinder'd any conſiderable action. Thus did he make as little of this Expedition as he did of the former; having loſt a great many Men and Horſes to no purpoſe.

[4.] Idem. The Welſhmen Invade the Borders.

The King again Invades Wales, but without any effect.

[5.] But ſo ſoon as the King return'd, he commanded the Earl of Northumberland (who was ſtill a Priſoner) to be carried before his Caſtle of Banborough, and there to have both his Eyes put out, unleſs his Wife, and Moreal his Steward who then held it, would agree to a Surrender; which they were thereupon forced to do. Then Moreal [1.] being brought into the King's Court (or Great Councel) many conſiderable Men, as well of the Clergy as Laiety were by him accuſed, as being privy to the late Conſpiracy; Some of whom the King commanded to be committed to Priſon, and then ſent out a ſevere Summons, by vertue of which all thoſe who held Lands of the King were obliged to appear at his Court at the Feaſt of Eaſter enſuing, under pain of his high diſpleaſure; but as for Earl Robert, the King commanded him to be carried to the Caſtle of Windſor, and there kept cloſe Priſoner, where he continued as long as he lived.

[2.] As for the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year, that Pious Prelate Wulſtan Biſhop of Worceſter deceaſed in the beginning of January, being the only Engliſh Biſhop who was left of thoſe Ordained in King Edward's time; and after his Deceaſe no Engliſhman was advanced to any Biſhoprick till the Reign of King Henry the Second, in whoſe time all Diſtinction between Engliſh and Frenchmen, as to Preferment, was happily laid aſide. About Eaſter following, Walter, Biſhop of Alba, the Pope's Nuntio, came into England, and brought over the Pall for Archbiſhop Anſelm; and having ſtayed here great part of the the Year he carried back with him the Rome's-Scot, or Peter-pence, which it ſeems had not been paid in a great while before. Anno Dom. MXCV.

I ſhall alſo from [3.] Eadmerus give you a fuller Account of the Great Quarel that now aroſe between the King and Archbiſhop Anſelm, who (you muſt know) before he was made Archbiſhop, had unknown to the Court own'd Urban for Lawful Pope, which the King had hitherto refuſed to do, but rather inclin'd to his Antagoniſt, Clement; but the Archbiſhop having a mind to go to Rome, attended on the King at Ilingham, not far from Shaftsbury, and deſired his leave to go beyond Sea to procure his Pall from the Pope; the King asked him from what Pope? Anſelm anſwered from Pope Urban: Then the King replied, That he himſelf had not yet owned him for Lawful Pope; and it never had been the Cuſtom either of his Father or himſelf, that any One ſhould own a Pope in England without their Licenſe; and whoever would deprive him of this Prerogative, did as good as endeavour to pull the Crown it ſelf from off his Head. To which Anſelm return'd, That he had already told him before he was Conſecrated, whilſt he was only Abbot of Bec, he had acknowledged Urban for the true Vicar of Chriſt. Whereupon the King being much moved, preſently proteſted it was impoſſible to make the Fidelity he owned due to the Crown conſiſt with his Oppoſite Obedience to a Pope not own'd by his Sovereign. Then Anſelm humbly deſired ſome reſpite for the further Examination of this matter, until the Biſhops, Abbots, and Chief Men of the Kingdom at their Convention might determine by Common Conſent, whither thoſe Two Things were not very conſiſtent; for if it appear otherwiſe, I muſt needs confeſs (ſaid he very modeſtly) I had much rather quit your Kingdom until you receive the true Paſtor, than deny Obedience to St. Peter and his Vicar, tho' but for an hour.

[3.] Hiſt. Nov. Lib. 1. p. 25. The Original of the Quarrel between the King and Archbiſhop Anſelm.

Wherefore the Buſineſs was put off for the preſent, and by the King's Summons almoſt All the Nobility of England met about the beginning of March at Rockingham Caſtle in Northamptonſhire.

[4.] Where there was a Great Council held on Sunday, in the Chappel of that Caſtle, about One of the Clock in the Afternoon. But the King and his Councellors in the mean time had privately conſulted what was to be done with Anſelm; but He having called the Biſhops, Abbots, and Chief Men of the Kingdom, made a Long Speech to them, (a great number of Monks, Clerks and Laicks alſo aſſiſting) in which he ſtated the Caſe between the King and Himſelf, as is already declared; And then put them in mind, That notwithſtanding he had told them when they Elected him, that he had owned Urban for Lawful Pope, and would never depart from his Obedience to him; yet they had forced him to take that weighty Charge upon him ſore againſt his Will: He now therefore deſired their Advice, how he ſhould act in ſo nice an Affair, as to preſerve both his Canonical Obedience to the Pope, and the Fealty due to his King; ſince it ſeemed to him impoſſible (at preſent) duly to obſerve both. To which the Biſhops very cunningly replied, that he was beſt able to direct himſelf in this great Point; tho' if they might give their Opinion, he would do well to refer the whole matter to the King's pleaſure, yet if he thought fit they would further acquaint him with any thing he deſired. But becauſe this was Sunday, the Buſineſs was adjourned till the Morrow, Morrow, when they met again in the ſame place; and the Archbiſhop anew demanding their Advice in this Great Point, which they wholly ſeem'd to decline, told him, if he would pleaſe abſolutely to ſubmit himſelf to the King's Will, he ſhould have their frank Advice and Conſent, otherwiſe he muſt not expect either from them; for he ſhould find they would never aſſiſt him in any ſuch matter. So they All held their peace.

[5.] Idem. P. 27. Archbiſhop Anſelm's Oration to the Biſhops.

[5.] Upon this Anſelm, lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, made them another Speech to this effect: "That ſince they had all of them refuſed to give Advice to Him who was their Chief, unleſs he would act according to the Humour of one ſingle perſon, he would from thenceforth take Counſel of Him who was the Supreme Paſtor and Head of them all: For Chriſt ſaid to Peter, the Chief of the Apoſtles, Upon this Rock will I build my Church, &c. Likewiſe to all the Apoſtles in Common, He who heareth you heareth me, and he who deſpiſeth you deſpiſeth me, &c. Theſe things as they were chiefly ſpoken to St. Peter, and in Him to All the other Apoſtles; ſo we alſo hold them to be ſpoken principally to the Vicar of St. Peter, and through him to all other Biſhops who were to ſucceed the Apoſtles, and not to any Emperour, King, Duke, or Earl; but in our Subjection to Secular Princes, the ſame Chriſt hath taught and inſtructed us, ſaying, Render unto Cæſar the things that are Cæſars, and unto God the things that are God's. This I approve of, and receive, and will never depart from: Wherefore know All of you in Common, that in thoſe things which belong to God, I will yield Obedience to the Vicar of St. Peter, and in thoſe things which of right concern the Dignity of my Earthly Lord and King, I will according to the beſt of my capacity give faithful Counſel and Aſſiſtance.

[1.] Idem. P. 28. What effect it had.

[1.] When the Archbiſhop had made an end of his Speech, our Author further relates, That all there preſent being much confounded, could only reply, That they would report his words to the King; which yet the Archbiſhop would not truſt them to do, but went himſelf, and with his own mouth told him all he had ſaid. At which the King was very angry, and conſulted with his Biſhops and Nobles, what anſwer to return; about which they ſpent ſome time before they could agree, being of ſeveral minds; but at length the Biſhops with ſome of the Nobility made the Archbiſhop this Reply, (or at leaſt to this effect): "That the King deſired his ſpeedy and poſitive "Anſwer concerning thoſe things which had been Treated of between "them at Ilingham, and were hitherto deferred; tho' he well knew "the whole Kingdom complained of him, as going about to take "away the King's Crown from off his Head; for, ſaid they, whoever takes away the Antient Prerogatives belonging to the Royal "Dignity, does the ſame in effect as if he took away the Crown "from his Head; He ought therefore in the firſt place, to throw off "his Obedience from Pope Urban, and ſubmit himſelf intirely to the "King's Will, as became an Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and alſo to "ask his pardon, for what he had done contrary thereto. Which when the Archbiſhop had heard, he told them, "That he could by "no means renounce his Obedience to the Pope; but deſired that "ſince it was now towards Night, the Buſineſs might be adjourned "till

The King highly reſents the Archbiſhop's Carriage.

" till to Morrow, and then he would anſwer what God ſhould inſpire " him with. But when they attended him next day with the ſame Demands, and again laid to his charge the breach of his Oath of Fidelity to the King. The Archbiſhop briefly replied, " Whoſoever " will maintain, that becauſe I will not renounce my Obedience to " the Chief Biſhop of the Roman Church, therefore I break my " Oath of Fidelity which I owe to my Temporal Prince, let him " come forth, and (in the Name of God) he ſhall find me ready to " anſwer him, as I ought. Which when they heard, looking upon each other, and knowing not what Reply to make; they returned to the King; for now they began to underſtand what they had not hitherto conſider'd, (and which they thought he had heeded as little himſelf,) That the Archbiſhop of Canterbury could be judged or condemned by none but the Pope, neither could he be compelled by any body to anſwer any Accuſation, but to Him alone.

Anno Dom. MXCV.

The Biſhops dare not proceed againſt the Archbiſhop.

[2.] In the mean time there aroſe a great murmur amongſt all there preſent, complaining of the injury that was done to ſo great a Man; tho' none durſt ſpeak openly for fear of the King, one Knight excepted, who coming out from the Crowd, and kneeling down before the Archbiſhop, ſaid, My Lord and Father, your Suppliant Sons deſire you by me, that you would not be troubled at thoſe things you have heard, but be mindful of bleſſed Job, who overcame the Devil even upon the Dunghill; and revenged Adam, whom he had overcome in Paradice. Which words the Archbiſhop received with a pleaſing look, for he thereby underſtood that the People were on his ſide.

[2.] Idem. P. 29. A great Diſcontent ariſes in the Council.

[3.] But when this came to the King's ear, he was very much troubled, and ſaid to the Biſhops, What does this mean? Did you not promiſe me, you would deal with, Judge and Condemn him according to my Will? Then William Biſhop of Durham (the chief Inſtigator of this Quarrel) not being able to give a ſatisfactory anſwer, talked very weakly; at laſt the Biſhops deſired leave to go home, that they might conſider farther of this affair againſt the Morrow, when alſo finding the Archbiſhop's Reaſons not to be eaſily anſwered, they in fine told the King, how ſorry they were that they could not give him that ſatisfaction he required, by a poſitive Condemnation of the Archbiſhop: " For (ſaid they) he is not only Primate of this " Kingdom, but of Scotland and Ireland, and the adjacent Iſlands; and " we (being his Suffragans) cannot Judge or Condemn him, altho' it " could be proved that he were in a fault. Then replied the King, " What now remains to be done? Cannot you however renounce " all Friendſhip with, and Obedience to him. To which they anſwered, Yes, if you command it. He then bid them go, and do ſo immediately; That Anſelm ſeeing himſelf ſlighted and forſaken by them all, might be ſorry and aſhamed for having preferred Urban before him. So the Biſhops went to Anſelm, and did as they were commanded.

[3.] Idem. Ib. The Biſhops being much perplexed, know not what to do.

[4.] But the Archbiſhop made them a very diſcreet Reply; telling them, " They did not act well in denying him their Friendſhip and " Obedience, becauſe he maintained his Subjection and Fidelity to " St. Peter's Succeſſor: Yet that he would not return the like Uſage, " but yield them all Paternal and Brotherly affection; and that (if " they would permit it) by the power God had given him, he would " again

" again reſtore them to the right way from which they had ſo wretchedly ſwerved; and tho' the King had refuſed to own him for " his Archbiſhop and Spiritual Father, yet he promiſed him all faithful ſervice and care of his Soul, if he would vouchſafe to accept " it himſelf: Still reſolving to retain the Power, Title, and Office " of Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whatſoever Oppreſſions he might " endure for ſo doing. This being told the King, he utterly ſlighted his offer'd ſervice, and further required of the Lay-Nobility of the Kingdom, that they ſhould renounce all Fealty to, and Friendſhip with him, as the Biſhops had done; but they plainly told him, that they never had been his Leigemen, and ſo could not renounce what they never owed; but he was ſtill their Archbiſhop, and ought to Govern Matters of Religion in the Kingdom; wherefore being Chriſtians they could not decline or renounce his Power, eſpecially not finding him guilty of any crime which might oblige the King thus to proceed againſt him. Which anſwer, tho' not at all ſatisfactory, yet for fear of diſpleaſing them all at once, he would not by any means then contradict.

[5.] Idem. P. 31. The Archbiſhop deſires leave to depart the Kingdom.

[5.] But Archbiſhop Anſelm now perceiving that there was no ſecurity left for him in England, deſired the King's leave and ſafe Conduct to depart out of it, which made the King not a little concerned; for tho' he did really deſire his abſence, yet durſt he not deprive him of his Archbiſhoprick, becauſe he knew this would give greater offence, than any thing he had done already. Beſides, he found it impoſſible to be done; leaving therefore the Counſel of the Biſhops, by whom he now complained he was drawn into theſe Streights, he asked Advice of the Lay-Noblemen, what was beſt to be done? who thereupon conſulting together, adviſed the King to ſend for the Archbiſhop again to Court; where, when he came, the Lay-Lords accompanied with ſome of the Biſhops, ſpoke to him (as it were from themſelves) to this effect, That they deſiring out of Antient Friendſhip to him, that a perfect peace and concord might be made between the King and him, did therefore propoſe, that a Truce ſhould be allowed on both ſides concerning this affair, until a certain time to be agreed on between them, during which, nothing ſhould be tranſacted by the King or his Subjects, nor yet any thing by the Archbiſhop or his Servants, which ſhould any ways tranſgreſs this Agreement: And to this they deſired his poſitive Anſwer.

The Propoſal made by the Biſhops and Lay-Lords to the Archbiſhop.

[1.] Id. Ib. His Anſwer to it.

[1.] Whereupon the Archbiſhop replied to this effect: " That he no " ways refuſed peace, but only deſired time to conſider what ſort of " Agreement it was they offered; yet that he might not be thought to " truſt intirely to his own Judgment, rather than that of others, he " was contented to ſubmit to what ever it pleaſed his Lord the " King and them to appoint for the obtaining this Concord, ſtill ſaving " the Reverence which he owed to Pope Urban: Which Anſwer they approved of, and reported to the King. Whereupon a Truce was granted him by the King's promiſe, until the Octaves of Pentecoſt, to which time all things were to remain as they were.

But our Author tells us, that this Ceſſation was not at all well obſerved on the King's part; for within a few days after he drove one Baldwin a Monk (upon whoſe Advice the Archbiſhop chiefly depended) and Two other of his Clerks out of England, beſides doing ſeveral Injuries to the Archbiſhop's Servants. [2.] But

Anno Dom. MXCV.

[2.] But ſome days before the time expir'd, Walter Biſhop of Alba came into England, Legate from Pope Urban, bringing along with him two Clerks of the King's Chappel, William and Gerard, whom the King had ſent over before privately to Rome, (without the knowledg of Anſelm) being deſirous to learn by them the true ſtate of the Roman Church, for there were then (as we have already ſaid) two Popes, who were both called Apoſtolical by their different parties; but which of them was choſen Canonically, and which till that very time was wholy unknown in England; and therefore theſe two Clerks had been ſent over to diſcover the truth of that matter; which when they had found out, they were order'd (if they could) to bring the True Pope to this Point, that he ſhould ſend over the Pall to the King, for the uſe of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, without ſpecifying his name; by which means the King believed, that Anſelm being Depoſed from his Archbiſhoprick, and Baniſhed the Kingdom, he might afterwards diſpoſe of the Pall in the Pope's ſtead upon whomſoever he would; But this deſign miſcarried, tho' the King thought he had laid it very cunningly and ſure.

[2.] Idem. Lib. 2. p. 32. The Pope's Legate comes into England.

[3.] For the two Clerks he had ſent, judging Pope Urban's Title to be the beſt, and having thereupon acknowledg'd him; the ſaid Legate was ſent over with them into England, bringing the Pall along with him, and ſeemed at firſt to comply ſo far with the King's deſigns, that paſſing privately by Canterbury, as it were on purpoſe to avoid the Biſhop, he made haſt to the King's Preſence, not ſpeaking to any one in the abſence of his two Conductors, as the King had ordered, the better to cover his Deſign. Thus he came to the King ſome days before Pentecoſt, and put him in great hopes, by his ſmooth and cunning Anſwers, to every thing that was propoſed to him, ſaying nothing on Anſelm's behalf, or that might tend to a Reconciliation between them; whereupon many began to ſuſpect that the Pope had been wrought upon by the King's Money, to ſacrifice the Archbiſhop to his Reſentments.

[3.] Id. Ibid. The King is outwitted by the Pope's Legate.

[4.] Wherefore the King believing that the Legate would declare all things from Pope Urban according to his own mind, and that if he ſhould receive him for Pope in his Kingdom, he would then confirm by his Apoſtolical Authority what he had now deſired, he commanded Urban to be acknowledged for Lawful Pope, throughout all his Dominions. After which the King dealt privately with the Legate, promiſing him a great Sum of Money, beſides what he would pay yearly to the Roman See, if he wou'd but concur with him to deprive Anſelm of his Archbiſhoprick.

[4.] Idem. Ib.

[5.] But the Legate having now done the buſineſs which he came about, was too cunning for the King in this affair, and knowing it not for his Maſter's intereſt to diſcourage ſo faithful a Servant as Anſelm, he at laſt plainly told the King, That what he deſired could by no means be granted: Which when He heard, he was cruelly vexed, perceiving he had gain'd nothing at all by receiving and acknowledging this new Roman Biſhop; yet conſidering that what was done was not to be recalled, he took advice of thoſe about him after what manner, his Royal Dignity preſerved, he might outwardly expreſs ſome kindneſs to a Man whom he mortally hated, but on whom at preſent he was not in a condition to be revenged.

[1.] Ibid. P. 33. The Archbiſhop Summon'd to come to Court.

[1.] Now the day drawing near in which this forementioned Truce was to expire, the King ſent Meſſengers to ſummon the Archbiſhop to come to his Court at Windſor at the next Feaſt of Pentecoſt, which he obey'd; but after his coming, there flock'd to him almoſt all the Biſhops of England, who were ſet on to try whither they could bring him to give ſome Money for obtaining the King's favour, but they finding him in this point as inflexible as ever, they deſiſted from that " Propoſal, and only deſired him, ſince he would give nothing to make " his Peace, he would briefly tell them what he was reſolved to " do. To which he replied, He had already told them, that he " would never put ſuch an Affront upon his Lord the King, as to " ſhew all the World that his Friendſhip was to be bought with Mo- " ney; yet if he would love him gratis, as his Spiritual Father, and " permit him to live quietly under the Obedience of Pope Urban, " he would then faithfully ſerve him as his King and Lord; but if he " refuſed this, he deſired his Safe-Conduct to the Sea-ſide, and then " he would do what he underſtood was his duty. But when they " asked him, Whither he had any thing more to ſay, and he had " told them, No; Then they further inſiſted, That the Pope had " ſent the Pall by his Legate to the King, and therefore he ſhould do " well to conſider, what return to make him for ſo great a Benefit, " which he could not have otherwiſe obtained without many dan- " gers, much trouble and great expence in a Journey to Rome, all " which was now ſaved. This the Archbiſhop alſo put off. Then they preſs'd him, that he would at leaſt give the King as much as the Journey to Rome would have coſt him, leſt he ſhould be accounted ungrateful. But when he bid them deſiſt, for he would give nothing at all upon that conſideration, they ceas'd all further diſcourſe about it, and left him to follow his own Reſolutions.

[2.] Idem. P. 33, 34. The King not being able to prevail upon him, ſeems to yield.

[2.] When the King found he could by no means draw Money from the Archbiſhop, He by the advice of his Nobles, laying aſide all paſt Quarrels, ſeemed to reſtore Anſelm to his former favour, and gave him leave to exerciſe his Archiepiſcopal Authority throughout England, which the Archbiſhop thankfully received; and ſo all Quarrels being forgot on both ſides, he preſented himſelf at the King's Great Councel at Windſor, who admitted him to his own familiar Converſation, and that of the Lords and the reſt there aſſembled.

But the Buſineſs of the Pall was again renew'd, and ſome to curry favour with the King endeavour'd to bring the Archbiſhop to this, that for the honour of his Royal Majeſty, he ſhould receive it from the King's hand, but he would by no means aſſent to it; declaring that this gift did not belong to the Royal Dignity, but the particular Authority of St. Peter; and ſo at laſt it was agreed, that the Pall being carried to Canterbury, ſhould be laid upon the High Altar by the ſame hand that had brought it over, and from thence the Archbiſhop ſhould receive it as if it were from the hand of St. Peter himſelf. Whereupon a day being appointed for this Solemnity, the Pope's Legate brought the Pall to Canterbury, and was met by all the Monks of both the Monaſteries, (with a great number of Clergy and Laiety,) and by the Archbiſhop himſelf, ſuſtained on each hand, and array'd in his Pontifical Habit, but yet he went bareſoot to meet this Sacred Preſent, which being brought in a Silver Box, and laid upon the Altar, was by him devoutly kiſſed, as alſo by all the Spectators, and was then taken up, and put on by the Archbiſhop himſelf, who ſo array'd celebrated Maſs. Anno Dom. MXCV.

[3.] Not long after this a certain Iriſh Monk of St. Alban's Abbey, whoſe name was Samuel, being Elected by Murdach a King of Ireland, and the Clergy and People of the City of Dublin, to be Biſhop of that See in the Room of Donatus lately deceaſed, came to Archbiſhop Anſelm to be Conſecrated according to Antient Cuſtom; to which Election and Petition of theirs Archbiſhop Anſelm aſſenting, after he had Treated him Honourably for ſome time, and had fully inſtructed him in all things relating to his Epiſcopal Charge, he Conſecrated him Biſhop, having firſt taken his Oath of Canonical Obedience as was formerly uſual: then this new Biſhop after he had received the Archbiſhop's Benediction, with his Letters to the King, Clergy and People of Ireland, return'd into his own Country with great Satisfaction. [3.] Idem. Lib. 2. p. 34. An Iriſh Monk Conſecrated by Anſelm Archbiſhop of Dublin.

I have been the larger in this Relation concerning Anſelm, that ſo the Reader might not only ſee the mighty Power the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had in that Age, and how great a party he could make amongſt the Laiety, even againſt the King himſelf; but alſo that he may take notice of the notable Policy of the Pope's Legate in the Conduct of this Affair, in which he was too hard for the King himſelf; Which ſufficiently ſhews us, that the Court of Rome underſtood how to manage Secular Princes in that Age as well or better than in ours.

No other Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of any moment happened this Year, but among thoſe of leſs Note we may obſerve, the founding of the Rich Abbey of Cheſter by Hugh Lupus Earl thereof, who expelling the Secular Chanons, placed Benedictines in their Room, adding many New Mannors to the Old Endowments; and thoſe being long after diſſolved by King Henry the Eighth, he there placed a Dean and Prebendaries, and alſo made that Church a diſtinct Biſhop's See, taken out of the Dioceſs of Litchfield: For tho' that Biſhop is often ſtiled in our Antient Hiſtorians Biſhop of Cheſter, yet it was no more than the Biſhop of the former place that is meant by that Title. Mon. Angl. I. Vol. p. 199. The Abbey of Cheſter Founded. That Church when made a Biſhop's See.

This [4.] Chriſtmaſs the King held his Court or Council at Windſor, where William Biſhop of Durham died the firſt day of January: and in the Octaves of Epiphany the King, with all his Great Men, removed to Salisbury, where he order'd a Great Council to be held, and Godfrey Bayard accuſed there William Earl of Owe, or Eu, the King's Couſin, of High Treaſon; alledging, that he was privy to the late Conſpiracy: and fighting with him upon it in a ſingle Combat, overcame him. This the King took for a ſufficient Conviction, and commanded firſt his Eyes to be pull'd out, and then his Teſticles to be cut off: he likewiſe order'd William de Alderi the Earl's Kinſman, as well as his Steward to be hanged, being privy to the ſame Conſpiracy, tho' he took it upon his Death that he was wholly innocent of that Crime. He alſo committed Odo Earl of Champaign, and Philip Son to the Earl of Shrewsbury cloſe Priſoners, and deprived them of all their Eſtates in England, with ſeveral others, on whom the ſame puniſhment was inflicted, beſides ſome who ſuffer'd Death at London upon the ſame account. Anno Dom. MXCVI. [5.] Idem. The Pope comes into France, and there exhorts Christian Princes to undertake the Crusado. And who were that undertook it.

[5.] In the Spring Pope Urban being forced to quit Italy, came to France about Lent, and there held a Council at Clermont; where he exhorted all Christian Princes to undertake a War against the Turks in the Holy Land, they having some time before Conquer'd Jerusalem, and driven the Christians out of Palestine, and the Adjacent Countries. So that chiefly by the Pope's perswasions, Raymond Count of St. Giles, Hugh Brother to the King of France, Godfrey Duke of Lorrain, Robert Duke of Normandy, Robert Earl of Flanders, with several other Princes and Noblemen from Germany, France and England, being all Signed with the Cross upon their Upper-Garments, engaged in this Expedition, and were followed by vast multitudes of their own, as well as other Nations. One Peter a Hermite (a great Preacher up of this War) going along with them himself.

[1.] Idem. Robert Duke of Normandy resolves to make one in this War. And to that end desires to Pawn his Dutchy for Money to undertake it.

[1.] The Duke of Normandy being thus resolved to undertake this Expedition, sent over Ambassadors to his Brother King William, desiring that a firm Peace might be established between them, and that he would lend him presently Ten thousand Marks of Silver, and take the Dutchy of Normandy for his Security, for three Years, till the Money should be repaid. The King was highly pleas'd with this Proposal, and presently sent to all the Great Men of England, that they should furnish him with what Money they could, towards the raising this Sum; [2.] insomuch that the Bishops, Abbots, and Abbesses broke in pieces the very Gold and Silver Plate and Ornaments of their Churches; and the Earls, Barons and Sheriffs squeezed their Knights and Tenants to help to raise it.

[2.] Ead. p. 35.

[3.] Then the King passing into Normandy in September following, concluded a Peace with Duke Robert, and upon the Payment of the aforesaid Sum, he took Possession of that Dutchy by his Brother's consent; who presently after took his Voyage to the Holy Land, together with his Uncle Odo, Bishop of Bayeux.

But perhaps it may seem strange to those who read this Relation, that all England should be thus put to it to raise so small a Sum as Ten thousand Marks, which does not amount to Seven Thousand Pounds: to this I can only say, that the Kingdom had been already exhausted by grievous Taxes, and that the Money was to be raised all on the sudden; and besides it was much greater than it sounds for, being more than Sixty thousand Pounds at this day.

[4.] P. 722, 723.

But here I ought to tell you, [4.] that Ordericus Vitalis makes Duke Robert's Voyage to the Holy Land, to have proceeded from another cause, than meer Devotion, (viz.) that notwithstanding the late Peace between him and the King his Brother, the former being given up to Sloth and Luxury, stood more in awe of his Subjects than they of him, whence much mischief happened to his Country; wherefore King William being now possest of above Twenty Castles, then brought over many of the Great Men, being either bribed by his Gifts, or else awed by the terrour of his Arms; as the Earls of Albemarle and Mellent, with Gerard de Gournay, Ralph de Conchis, Walter Giffard, Philip de Braüse, Richard de Curcey, and several other Barons, who all adhered to the King: by which misfortune the Duke, being much perplex'd, and fearing lest somewhat worse might happen, and being almost too destitute of Friends, by the Advice of certain Monks, resolved to make over his Dukedom to his Brother King William, whilst he he himſelf went to Jeruſalem, upon the Conditions above mentioned.

Anno Dom. MXCVI.

The ſame [5.] Author further tells us, (what we cannot find in any of our own) that the King being thus poſſeſſed of Normandy, claimed the French-Veuxin of Philip King of France, with the chief Towns thereof, Pontoyſe, Chaumont, and Mante; and that after about a Year's ſcuffle for it, by Burnings, Rapines, and making the People Priſoners on both ſides, the two Kings came to make a firm Peace; William's Affairs in England requiring his Preſence, which probably was the Inſurrection of the Welſh, and the freſh attempts they had lately made upon England.

This Year [3.] King William having kept his Chriſtmaſs in Normandy, arrived in England on Eaſter-Eve, (having been long detain'd by contrary Winds;) then after ſome time ſpent at Windſor, where he held a Curia, or Council, he marched with a great Army into Wales the third time; but tho' he paſſed quite through the Country by the help of ſome Welſhmen, who had come over to him, and ſhewed him the ſecret paſſes into it, and ſtayed there from Midſummer to the end of July; yet the People retiring into their accuſtomed Faſtneſſes, he loſt more of his own Men by Hunger or ill Diet, than he could kill or take of the Enemy; for the Welſh, after they had revolted, had choſen among themſelves divers notable Leaders of their own Nation, and among the reſt one called Cadogan, who was Nephew to Prince Griffyn; but when the King ſaw he could not perform what he had a mind to, he returned home again re infecta, having only commanded certain Caſtles to be built in the Marches between England and Wales.

[3.] C.S. H.H. The King returns into England, and then Invades Wales.

But meeting with ill ſucceſs, is forced to return.

[4.] A little before Michaelmaſs there appeared a terrible Blazing-Star, or Comet, towards the South-Eaſt, ſhooting very long Rays; tho' it was viſible but for fifteen days. About the ſame time King William ſent Edgar Atheling with a great Army into Scotland, to make his Nephew Edgar King thereof, by expelling Dufnal or Donald his Uncle, who had Uſurped that Kingdom; which Edgar Atheling in a ſhort time valiantly performed, and placing his Nephew on the Throne, tho' under the Dominion of King William, returned into England.

King William ſends Edgar Atheling into Scotland to make his Nephew King.

[5.] About this time the Quarrel broke out afreſh between the King and Archbiſhop Anſelm, and it was upon this occaſion: You have already heard how Anſelm got the better of the King in the buſineſs about acknowledging the Pope; but when he perceived no hopes of amendment in the King, as to the Sale of Biſhopricks and Abbeys, and ſeeing what ſpoil was made of their Revenues, when he came to attend attend him at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, after the ordinary buſineſs was over, Archbiſhop Anſelm deſired ſome of the Chief Men about the King to let him know, that being conſtrained by his neceſſary occaſions, he deſired his leave to go to Rome, at which the King ſeemed much aſtoniſhed; ſaying, by no means, for we do not think him guilty of any ſuch ſin, that may render it neceſſary for him to beg the Pope's Abſolution; nor yet to be ſo void of prudence, as to be more fit to be adviſed by the Pope, than the Pope by him. Which being told the Archbiſhop, his Anſwer only was, The power is in the King's hand, he may ſay what he pleaſes, but if he will not grant it now, perhaps he will grant it another time, I will reiterate my Intreaties to him.

The Archbiſhop urges for leave to depart the Kingdom, the King's Meſſage thereupon.

At the next Great Council in Auguſt following, when the publick buſineſs was diſpatched, he again renewed his Petition, but was denied as before. After which the Archbiſhop attending the King at Wincheſter, again repeated his requeſt, upon which the King was very much provoked; but ſtill civilly denied him. In ſhort, after divers Meſſages that paſſed between them, the King ſent him word, That if he went away, he gave him firſt fair notice, that he would ſeize upon the Revenues of his Archbiſhoprick, and never for the future own him for Primate. At laſt, when the Biſhop of Durham, and divers of the Biſhops had done all they could to perſwade him not to go (tho' to no purpoſe) they brought him this peremptory Meſſage from the King, that ſince he preſum'd to do that which was contrary to the Cuſtom of the Kingdom; (for no Great Man, and particularly himſelf ought to go to Rome without his Majeſty's leave) that he might not be further troubled, he required him to take an Oath, never upon any occaſion whatever to appeal to the Pope; or if he denied this, he ſhould with all ſpeed depart the Kingdom. Which when they had told him, they return'd to the King, Anſelm himſelf preſently following them; and then there aroſe a ſharp diſpute between the King and Him, too long here to be inſerted, and which at laſt ended very abruptly; for the Archbiſhop riſing up, and going to the place where he had before attended, ſome Meſſengers from the King preſently followed, and brought him word, that he might go if he pleaſed; but he was to know this much before hand, that he ſhould carry nothing of the King's away with him. To which the Archbiſhop replied, I have Horſes, Apparel, and Furniture, which the King may ſay are his own, and if he will not permit me to take theſe with me, let him know that I will go away on foot, nay naked, rather then I will deſiſt from my deſigned Journey.

The Archbiſhop at laſt obtains the King's Leave to depart. But upon very ſtrict Conditions.

The King being a little out of Countenance with this Anſwer, ſent him again word, "That he miſunderſtood him, for he did not mean, "that he ſhould go away naked, or on foot; nevertheleſs he com- "manded, that he ſhould within Eleven days be ready at the Port "for his Voyage, where he ſhould meet a Meſſenger from himſelf, "who ſhould tell him what He and thoſe that accompanied him "ſhould be permitted to carry over with them.

[1.] Idem. P. 41. The Archbiſhop takes his Leave of the King.

[1.] This Affair being thus diſpatched, the Archbiſhop went and took his leave of the King, when offering him his Bleſſing before he departed, the King replied, I do not refuſe your Bleſſing. So bowing his Head, the Archbiſhop making the Sign of the Croſs over it, and giving him his Benediction, he preſently departed, and went to Canterbury, terbury, to take his Leave of, and comfort the Monks, and a multitude of People that reſorted thither. Then he took a Scrip and Staff, after the manner of Pilgrims, and commending them all to Chriſt, he departed, they following him out of Town with tears and great lamentations. But when he came to Dover, he found there one William a Prieſt or Clerk ſent from the King, who for fourteen days that the Archbiſhop lay there Wind-bound, ſaid nothing concerning what he was ſent about; but when on the fifteenth day the Wind ſerved, and the Seamen urged them to go on Board, he then commanded him from the King not to depart till he had ſearched whatever he had brought with him. So that all his Trunks and Baggage were open'd, and ſearch'd to ſee if he could find any quantity of Plate or Money in them; but miſſing of what was expected, he at laſt permitted him to go on Board; ſo he quickly paſſed over to Whitſand, and from thence went to St. Omers, and after ſome ſtay there, he travelled to Lyons, where he abode a good while, till the Pope ſent for him to come to Rome; of which I ſhall ſay more anon. But ſo ſoon as the King had heard that the Archbiſhop was Landed, he preſently commanded all his Goods and Revenues to be transfer'd into his own Exchequer, and all things that had been ordain'd, or alter'd by him, from his firſt coming to the Archbiſhoprick, to be declared null and void.

Anno Dom. MXCVII.

The Archbiſhop paſſes over beyond Sea.

I have been the more particular in this Relation, becauſe the Reader may ſee how much an Archbiſhop of Canterbury took upon him in thoſe days, and the great boldneſs of this Man, who being ſure of ſupport from the Pope, durſt quit the Kingdom againſt the King's will; a thing which none of his Predeceſſors ever attempted before; tho' perhaps the King was glad to hear of his departure, becauſe he was thereby not only rid of One who always took upon him to controll him, but he alſo by that means got all his ample Revenues into his own hands.

The King having ſeized the Archbiſhop's Revenues, goes into Normandy.

The King being now rid of the Archbiſhop, about the end of November paſſed over into Normandy, where he ſpent all the reſt of this Year, either in Buſineſs, or Diverſions; for I find no particular Action related.

But to conclude this Year's Tranſactions between the King and this Archbiſhop, I ſhall from the ſame Author give you a ſhort account of what happened at Rome after his arrival, [2.] where he was received very kindly by the Pope; to whom he gave the ſame account of the occaſion of his leaving England, as he had before done by [3.] Letter from Lyons; in which he highly complained of the King, that he had given the Lands of the Archbiſhoprick to his Knights, and did not reſtore them to him, as Lanfranc had enjoy'd them: That he exacted grievous Services from him, ſuch as his Predeceſſors knew not, and ſuch as he could not, nay ought not to bear: And that he overturned the Laws of God, and all Canonical Conſtitutions by his Arbitrary Cuſtoms, and would not give him leave to come to his Fatherhood to ſeek redreſs, or ask advice what he ſhould do, &c.

[2.] Idem. P. 45. The Archbiſhop is kindly received at Rome.

[3.] Idem. P. 43.

[4.] The Pope having heard his Complaints, promiſed him relief; and immediately wrote Letters to King William, wherein he earneſtly exhorted him to reſtore the Archbiſhop to all that had been taken from him, as alſo to what other Rights he ought to enjoy. And Anſelm himſelf wrote to the King to the ſame effect; but before the Meſſenger Meſſenger that carried theſe Letters could return, Anſelm made great Complaints to the Pope of the burthen of his Place, and beg'd his Holineſs's leave to reſign it, which he would by no means permit, but enjoyn'd him to keep it: And he had very good reaſon for ſo doing, for he could not have had a better Man for his turn. He alſo told the Archbiſhop, that as for King William he ſhould be Excommunicated in the next General Council, which was ſhortly to be held at Bari in Apulia, if the King refuſed to obey his Commands.

[5.] Ibid. P. 48,49. The Archbiſhop attends the Pope at the Council of Bari, and what was done in it.

[5.] Then the Archbiſhop retiring for ſome time to an Abbey not far from Capua, remain'd there till the Council met, where he not long after attended on the Pope, and being placed among the chief Biſhops of the Weſtern Church, he by the Pope's Command was called up to ſit on a Seat nearer to him, and there made a Speech to the General ſatisfaction of all there preſent, concerning the differences then in Diſpute between the Greek and Latin Church touching the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt; after which mention being made in this Council of King William, and the Pope making great Complaints againſt him, it was decreed, that he ſhould be Curs'd and Excommunicated, which Anſelm hearing, fell down upon his Knees before the Pope, and with much difficulty obtained the Revocation of that Sentence.

[1.] Idem. P. 51, 52, 53. How the King received the Pope's and Archbiſhop's Letters.

[1.] This Council being ended, the Pope and Anſelm departed to Rome, where they found the Meſſenger that carried the laſt Letters to King William; who told them that with much ado he received the Pope's Letters, but would by no means receive Anſelm's; and that perceiving the Meſſenger to be a Retainer of his, he ſwore by God's Face, (his uſual Oath) That if he did not depart the Kingdom immediately, he ſhould have his Eyes pulled out, which highly incenſed both the Pope and the Archbiſhop. But let us ſee what in the mean while happen'd in England.

[2.] Idem. Ibid. The King ſends an Envoy to Rome about Archbiſhop Anſelm, and what was then Tranſacted.

The [2.] King being rather willing to return the Pope an Anſwer by his own Envoy, ſent William Warelwaſt on purpoſe to Rome, who declared that the King his Maſter wonder'd not a little, why he ſhould ſo much urge the Reſtitution of Anſelm, ſeeing he was expreſsly warned, that if he departed out of England without Licenſe, the King would ſeize his Archbiſhoprick. The Pope asked, whither there was any thing elſe againſt Anſelm, ſave that he had appealed to the Apoſtolick See, and come thither without his King's leave? He anſwered no: Wonderful! (ſaid the Pope) have you come thus far to tell me this! Return, and that quickly, and command your King on behalf of St. Peter, if he will not be Excommunicated, to reſtore Archbiſhop Anſelm intirely to all things; and let me know his Reſolution before the next Meeting of the General Council, (which was to be not long after Eaſter in that City) otherwiſe he ſhall there receive the Sentence he deſerves. To which the King's Agent replied, That he had private Inſtructions to impart to his Holineſs. And remaining a good while in Rome, he ſo well managed this Affair, that with Gifts and Promiſes he procured ſeveral Cardinals to favour his Cauſe; who ſo turned the Pope's mind, that to the ſatisfaction of his Maſter, the further Proſecution of it was put off until Michaelmſs following, it being then Chriſtmaſs time. After Eaſter the Pope, as he had appointed, held a Council at Rome, in which, tho' Anſelm's Cauſe was propounded, and and vehemently urged by ſome, yet nothing was done in it particularly to his advantage, the Pope himſelf putting a ſtop to all further proceedings againſt the King. So that the chief Affair which paſſed in this Council was, that all Laymen that gave Inveſtitures of Churches, as alſo thoſe that received them, ſhould be Excommunicated. But of this you ſhall hear more hereafter. Anno Dom. MXCVII.

I ſhall conclude this Year with ſome Engliſh Tranſactions, tho' of leſs moment. [3.] The King continuing ſtill in Normandy, England ſuffer'd very much in the mean while, by reaſon of the great ſcarcity of Proviſions, occaſion'd by the badneſs of the Seaſon; as alſo through the heavy Taxes that were laid upon the Nation, for the rebuilding of London-Bridge, which had been lately carried away by an unuſual Flood; and for building the New Walls about the Tower, and the Great Hall at Weſtminſter; which tho' they were Buildings of great uſe, as well as Magnificence, yet requir'd vaſt Sums of Money to finiſh them. [3.] C. S.

All [4.] this Year King William remain'd in Normandy, being taken up in reducing the City of Mans, and great part of that Province to his Obedience; and all that time there happened nothing here in England, worth the mentioning, except that the [1.] Nation continued ſtill to be very much oppreſſed by the King's cruel and unreaſonable Taxes; and that Hugh Earl of Shrewsbury, and Hugh Sirnamed Lupus, Earl of Cheſter, (with a good number of the Nobility) raiſed a great Army, and invaded North-Wales, being thereto excited by certain Lords of that Country. But Griffyth ap Conan Prince of Wales, and Cadogan ap Blethyn took the Mountains for their Defence, becauſe they were not able to cope with the ſaid Earls, neither durſt they truſt to their own Men; and ſo the Earls came over againſt the Iſle of Mon or Angleſey, where they built the Caſtle of Aberlhiennawc. After this the Princes Griffyth and Cadogan went to Angleſey, thinking to defend that Iſle, and ſent for Succours to Ireland; but what they received thence was very ſmall and inſignificant. Then did Owen ap Edwin, who was the Prince's chief Councellor, and Father-in-law, diſcover his Treaſon, in going with all his Forces to the Earls above mentioned, and marching them over into the Iſle of Angleſey, which ſo ſoon as the Princes Griffyth and Codagan perceived, diſtruſting the Treachery of their own People, preſently fled over into Ireland; but the Earls coming into the Iſle, Plundered it, uſed great Cruelties toward thoſe Inhabitants they could meet with; in cutting off the Hands and Feet of ſome, and the Privy-Parts of others. Anno Dom. MXCVIII. The Welſh Princes being betray'd, the Earl's take the Iſle of Angleſey.

But they had not been long there, [2.] before Magnus Son of Olave, King of Norway, (who had lately Conquered the Orchades and Iſle of Man) happened to come thither with a few Ships (either being driven by a Storm, or elſe coming to ſpy the Country, for our Authors do not tell us which) and would fain have Landed with his Men, but theſe Earls with their Forces oppoſed him. However there Magnus with an Arrow ſhot the Earl of Shrewsbury in the Face, of which Wound within a few days after he died; which at that time was looked upon as a juſt Reward of his Cruelty toward the Poor unarmed Welſhmen. But yet Magnus his Norwegians, when they found they could not Land, return'd home; and the Earl of Cheſter and the Engliſh that were with him, being ſenſible they could not keep the Iſland, left the Com- [2.] F. mand of it to Owen ap Edwin, who had invited them thither.

[3.] King William kept his Chriſtmaſs in Normandy, and returning into England a little before Whitſontide, kept that Feaſt in his New Hall at Weſtminſter, which had been built in his Abſence; when he firſt ſaw it, and heard others highly admire it for its Spaciouſneſs, the King was of another opinion, ſaying, it was too little by half; which ſhew'd the Greatneſs of his Mind, whatever it did of his Judgment. From [4.] thence he went down to hunt at New Forreſt, and whilſt he was one day there at his Sport, a Meſſenger came in all haſt out of Normandy, and told him, that the City of Mans was ſurprized by Count Hely de la Fleſche, who (in right of his Wife pretended to it) and that the Caſtle which held out ſtoutly for him, was, without ſome preſent relief, like to be Surrendered: Upon which News he immediately ſent back the Meſſenger, bidding him to tell thoſe in the Caſtle, that if poſſible he would be with them in Eight days. And then turning his Horſe's Head toward the Sea-ſide, he rode on with all the ſpeed he could; but ſome that were near deſiring him to ſtay till his Army could be got ready, he replied only this, They who love me will follow me. And ſo coming to Dartmouth with very few Attendants, in order to take Shipping, the Weather proved ſo very rough, that the Maſter of the Veſſel ſaid there was no paſſing over without eminent hazard of their Lives: Tuſh, (ſaid the King) ſet ſail, I never yet heard of a King that was drowned. And ſo making all the Sail he could, he arrived at Barfleur the next Morning, and ſent for all his Officers and Soldiers that were in Normandy, to attend him at Mans; but no ſooner had the Enemy heard of his approach, but they raiſed the Siege, and the King preſently after taking this Count Elias Priſoner, and he being brought before him, the King ſomewhat as it were in triumph, ſaid, Now Sir, I have got you: Yes, anſwered he, you have got me, but it was by a Wile, yet if I were at liberty again, I know what I could do: The King thereupon replied, Well, Sir, and what would you do? get you gone, and do your worſt, nor do I expect any return for the favour; And ſo preſently diſmiſſed him to go where he pleaſed. The King having thus reſcued Mans, and reduced the Country once more to his Obedience, return'd into England about Michaelmaſs.

The King reſolved to go to Sea notwithſtanding a Storm.

As [5.] for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this Year Pope Urban held a General Council at Rome, in which he Excommunicated all Laymen who ſhould offer to grant the Inveſtitures of Churches, and all thoſe Clergymen that ſhould offer to receive them at their hands, or any that ſhould Conſecrate ſuch Receivers, as likewiſe all thoſe that did any Homage to Laymen for Eccleſiaſtical Benefices; all which Decrees being approved of by the Cardinals and Biſhops there preſent were confirmed by the Pope. Archbiſhop Anſelm was preſent at this Council, and from thence went to Lyons, where he ſtayed till the King's Death.

[5.] F. W. Pope Urban holds a Council at Rome.

[1.] At a Great Court or Council held at London about Whitſontide, he beſtowed the Biſhoprick of Durham upon Ranulph his Chaplain, [2.] whom from one of the meaneſt of the Vulgar the King advanced by degrees, and long made uſe of as a chief Informer and Miniſter to raiſe Money by all manner of ways; it was he who let out the Vacant Biſhopricks and Abbeys to Farm for the King's uſe, and thereby gained gained him a great Revenue; and when the King iſſued out his Edict, and had ſet what Tax England ſhould pay, this bold Man would by one ſtroke of his Pen make it as much more: He was an invincible Lawyer, and to whom the King committed the management of the Revenues of the whole Kingdom. Thus he continued oppreſſing the Rich, and peeling the Poor during all the King's Reign; being but too well rewarded for his Tyranny and Injuſtice. Anno Dom. MXCIX.

[3.] This Year alſo the Chriſtians took the City of Jeruſalem by Storm, and near Forty thouſand Saracens that were in it were put to the Sword; then the Chriſtian Princes all agreed to Elect Robert Duke of Normandy King of that City, and all Paleſtine, but he refuſing out of an expectation of the Crown of England, it is obſerved by our Hiſtorians, that he never after proſpered in any thing he undertook; and upon this his Denial, the Chriſtian Princes agreed to chuſe Geoffrey Duke of Lorrain (commonly called Geoffrey of Boloign) King of Jeruſalem, a Prince of great Courage and Piety, and who Governed very worthily, tho' it happened to be but for a little time. [3.] W. M. P. 80. a. F. W. Jeruſalem taken by the Chriſtians.

[4.] King William being now in perfect quiet and great proſperity, kept his Chriſtmaſs at Glouceſter, and his Eaſter at Wincheſter, where [5.] (as Ordericus informs us, for I find it in no other Author) the King had vaſt deſigns in his head; for William Earl of Poictou having an Intention to go to make War in the Holy Land (according to the humour of the Princes of that Age) now offer'd King William to Morgage to him his Dutchy of Aquitain, with his other Territories, for a great Sum of Money which he deſired to borrow for that Expedition, and that the King moſt willingly embraced the Propoſal, and commanded a mighty Fleet to be prepared, and a great Army to accompany him out of England, that he might hinder his Brother Robert's return into Normandy, take Poſſeſſion of Aquitain, and extend the Bounds of his Empire, as far as the River Garonne. In order to which his Royal Navy that was to carry over vaſt Sums of Gold and Silver, was now almoſt ready to Sail; which till it was got ready, the King to divert himſelf went in the beginning of Auguſt to Hunt in the New Forreſt (which in the Engliſh-Saxon was called Itene) where he met his Death; of which our [1.] Author gives us theſe Circumſtances. A Monk (it ſeems) the Night before had dream'd, that he ſaw the King knaw a Crucifix with his Teeth, and that as he was about to bite off its Leggs, the Image ſpurn'd him to the Ground, and that as he lay groveling on the Earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, with abundance of ſmoke; this being related to the King in the Morning by Robert Fitz Haimon, he made a Jeſt of it, ſaying, This Monk would fain have ſomething for his Dream: Go, give him a Hundred Shillings, but bid him look he dream better Dreams hereafter. Nevertheleſs the King being much diſſwaded by thoſe about him not to make tryal of the truth of this Dream at his own expence. Anno Dom. MC. [4.] Idem. C. S. [5.] P. 649. [2.] When ſetting aſide all ſerious buſineſs, he went to Breakfaſt, and having drank plentifully, would needs in that humour go out into the Forreſt a Hunting, being accompanied with but a few Followers, of whom his Brother Henry was chief; yet one of the moſt intimate, was, * Walter Tyrrell a French Knight (who had lived in Normandy for ſome years, and being invited hither by the King's Liberality, was newly newly come over; this Man being an expert Huntſman, and an excellent Archer, remain'd alone with the King, who at the end of the Chace being then alighted, ſtayed till the reſt of his Company (diſperſed up and down the Forreſt) could come up; when about Sun-ſet a Stag happening to paſs by the King, he ſhot at him, and gave him a ſlight Wound, and as he ran away, the King followed him (holding up his hand before his Eyes to defend them from the Sun, then ſhining full in his Face) when another Deer juſt paſſing by, Walter ſhot at it; But his Arrow miſſing the Stag, hit the King (then intent upon another Object) full in the Breaſt, who preſently fell down without ſpeaking a word, and in the fall not only broke the Arrow, but haſtened his own Death; upon which, Walter when he ſaw he had neither Breath nor Life in him, left him, preſently took his Horſe, and Gallopped away as faſt as he could, no Man perſuing him; every Body's thoughts being taken up about greater matters. Then a few Colliers paſſing through the Forreſt, put his Body into their Cart, and drove it to the Biſhop's Palace at Wincheſter, where it was the next day Buried in the Church under the Tower, many Noblemen being preſent, and few or none lamenting his loſs.

He is Kill'd by Walter Tyrell.

His Body is Buried at Wincheſter.

His Tomb (ſomewhat raiſed from the Ground) remains at this day in the midſt of the Choir of that Cathedral: Thus fell this Magnanimous, but rough-natured Prince, in the Forty fourth Year of his Age, and the Thirteenth of his Reign.

And here I cannot but take notice, that tho' W. of Malmesbury, Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham (Authors of the beſt Credit, who flouriſhed and wrote their Hiſtories within leſs than forty years after this Accident) I ſay tho' they do all agree not only in the Place, but the Perſon, who had the misfortune thus to kill this Prince, yet there are alſo Authors of that very Age, and thoſe of good credit too, who are not only doubtful of it, but ſome of them do poſitively deny that this Walter had any hand in it; for [3.] Eadmerus ſpeaking of it by the by, only ſays, That whither the Arrow was ſhot at him, as (as moſt affirm) ſlew him by his ſtumbling, and falling down upon it, it were needleſs to enquire; it being ſufficient to underſtand, that which way ſoever it happened, it was by the juſt Judgment of God.

[3.] Lib. 2. P. 34.

But tho' Dr. Brady in his Hiſtory makes it uncertain, whither Tyrrell then ſhot at a Deer, or elſe at the King, yet I am ſatisfied he cannot make out his Suſpition from the Authority of any other Author; for thoſe that lived in that very time make a great doubt of it, as may farther appear from [5.] Sugerius Abbot of St. Denis near Paris, who lived at that time, and in his Life of King Lewis the Groſſe, ſpeaking of the manner of William Rufus's Death, ſays thus, It was laid by ſome upon a moſt Noble Perſon, called Walter Tyrrell, as if he ſhould have ſhot him through with an Arrow, whom we (ſays he) have often heard, when he had no occaſion either to fear or hope to affirm with an Oath, That he came not that day into that ſide of the Forreſt, where the King hunted, nor ever ſaw him there. The ſame Paſſage is taken almoſt word for word by the Continuator of Bede's Hiſtory, out of the Author above mentioned, who, without ſo much as citing him, ſpeaks in his own Perſon, as if he had ſeen it himſelf, which ſhews what a bungling Plagiarie this Writer was, who ſeems to have been a Monk, that lived in that very time, ſince he concludes his Hiſtory with the beginning of the Reign of King Henry the First; I desire the Reader's pardon for this digression, for tho' it be of no great moment to posterity, how this King came by his Death, yet since it is a piece of History not commonly known, and also concerns the memory of a Person, who is looked upon as the Common Ancestor of all of that numerous Family both in England and Ireland, of the same name, I hope I may not appear impertinent, if I have dwelt somewhat the longer upon it. Anno Dom. MC.

I cannot but here also remark that this Prince was the Third of this Race who found their Deaths in this Forrest within a few years: for [1.] Richard his Elder Brother here perished by the goring of a Stag's Horn, or (as William of Malmesbury relates it) by the blast of a Pestilential Air that took him as he was Hunting; and Richard his Nephew, base Son to Duke Robert, was but the Year before this killed by an Arrow as he was Hunting in this same Forrest, much after the same manner, as his Uncle King William; or else (as others relate) was caught by the Neck as he rid under the Boughs of a thick Oak, and his Horse going from under him was there hanged: So that it seems as if God designed to revenge upon the Children their Father's Sins, in destroying so many Churches and Villages to make them a Receptable for wild Beasts. [1.] Idem. P. 111.

I shall now conclude with saying something of this King's Person and Disposition: [2.] He was but of a middle Stature, yet strong and well set, his Face Red; his Hair a deep Yellow, inclining to the same colour; his Forehead square, his Eyes speckled, the one not like the other; His Countenance severe, his Speech unpleasant and stammering, especially when provoked to anger. [2.] W. M. P. 124. The Description of this Prince's Person.

As for the Qualities of his Mind, they may be best known from the Actions of his Life, which shew him to have been stout and daring, never dejected in the greatest extremity. A Character of his Humour.

He was also very Liberal to his Friends, and especially to Soldiers; Magnificent in his Retinue and Buildings, which Westminster Hall remains a lasting Monument of; but as to his own Apparel very plain and moderate, reckoning the finery of his Clothes, not by the outside, but the price they cost; as appears by the noted story of the pair of Breeches or Hose which his Chamberlain brought him one Morning, which he disliked, because they cost but three Shillings: which being so common a Story, I need but only mention. Idem. P. 122, 123.

He was also a Prince of little or no Faith, breaking his Oaths and Promises not only to his own Subjects, and foreign Princes, but even to his own Brother when he found it for his Advantage; as you may observe through the whole course of his Reign. He is also by divers Monkish Writers said to be mightily addicted to Fornication, but they do not name any particular Mistress of his; which shews, that either he was not very constant in his Amours, or else that the Mistresses he kept were of that mean condition as not to deserve any particular mention: But being never Married, it is not likely a Prince of his loose Principles and Sanguine Constitution should be very chast. He was also cruel, seldom or never pardoning any that he thought had offended him; but either putting them to death, or else to punishments worse than death it self, as you may observe by his severe usage of William Count of Owe or Eu, his near Kinsman, and others; as likelikewiſe by this paſſage: [3.] There were fifty Engliſh Gentlemen (who had ſome Eſtates left,) accuſed for hunting and killing the King's Deer, which they denied, and were therefore condemned to the tryal of the Fire-ordeal, which (by God's mercy) they paſſed through untouched. The King hearing of it, and being deceived of the Confiſcations he expected, ſaid in a great paſſion, How happens this? is God a Juſt Judge in ſuffering it! Now a Murrain take him that believes it: So that he ſeems to have been as cruel as he was prophane; and how unſetled he was in the Chriſtian Religion, may appear alſo in the Story related by the ſame [4.] Author.

[3.] Ead. P. 48. Some Inſtances of his Prophaneſs and Infidelity.

[4.] Idem. P. 47.

A young Jew was Converted to the Chriſtian Faith (as he ſaid) by the Viſion of a Saint that had appeared to him; his Father being much troubled at it, preſented the King with ſixty Marks, intreating him to make his Son return to his former Judaiſm; whereupon the King ſent for him, commanding him without more a do to return to the Religion of his Nation. But the young Man anſwered with much Reſolution, He wondred his Majeſty ſhould uſe ſuch words; for being a Chriſtian himſelf, he ſhould rather perſwade him to continue in that belief. With which Anſwer the King was ſo confounded, that he commanded the young Man to get out of his ſight. His Father finding the King could do no good upon his Son, required his Money again: Nay, (ſaid the King) I have taken pains enough for it all; but yet that thou may'ſt ſee how kindly I will uſe thee, thou ſhalt have one half, and the other half thou canſt not in conſcience deny me for my pains. Which Reply ſhews him to have had Wit enough had he been pleaſed to have made good uſe of it; which ſince he did not, I ſhall not relate ſeveral other of his prophane Sayings, for the very reading of them were enough to create Horror and Averſion in all ſober Readers.

[5.] W. M. Pag. 184.

[5.] He was of a very haughty Temper, as appears by his carriage to the King of Scots; and yet in private converſation amongſt his Confidents no Prince could be more free, playing and jeſting not only upon others, but Himſelf too, if he thought he had done any thing that they might juſtly carp at. Yet notwithſtanding his ſevere and covetous temper, there are ſome Relations that ſhew he had ſometimes a ſenſe of Generoſity, Juſtice, and Good Nature, of which I ſhall give you ſome Inſtances, I find in our [1.] Authors: One is that a great Abbey becoming vacant by the Death of the Abbot, two rich and ambitious Monks came to the King, each of whom deſiring to purchaſe it, privately ſtrived to out-bid the other, but whither the King did not like the Price they offer'd, or elſe his Chapmen, is uncertain; only that ſeeing a third Monk (who came as a Companion to one of them) ſtanding at a diſtance, he called him to him, and asked what he would offer for the Inveſtiture of that Abbey? the Monk replied, That he had no Money, and if he had, that his Conſcience would not permit him to give any thing for it, and that for his part he had enough already; whereupon the King admiring his modeſty, immediately made Anſwer, By St. Luke's Face, thou alone doſt deſerve it, and therefore ſhalt have it for nothing. And ſo immediately beſtowed it on him, and caus'd the Monks of that Abbey to chuſe him, as he commanded.

[1.] Ran. Higden. Polychron, & alii.

The

The other is this, [2.] one Hugh a Norman Knight, and Kinſman to King William, having been a valiant Warrior, quitted the World, and took the Habit of a Monk in the Monaſtery of St. Auguſtine in Canterbury, where he had not been long, when Guido the Abbot deceaſing, the Monks of that Abbey ſent two of their Brethren, and with them this Hugh (being as yet in the year of his Probation) to the King, to ſee if they could prevail with him, to give them leave to chuſe a new Abbot; ſo ſoon as they came into his Preſence, and that he ſaw Hugh in the Habit of a Monk, whom he had lately known in all his Military Gallantry, he could not forbear weeping, and hearing their Requeſt, preſently gave them leave to Elect one, provided it were his Kinſman Hugh, and no other Perſon; threatening if they did not, to burn down their Houſe about their Ears. With which Injunction the Monks eaſily complying, preſently choſe him Abbot, tho' much againſt their will; and this the King did out of pure kindneſs and compaſſion, tho' he might have had a good Sum of Money for it: yet theſe were but ſingle Inſtances, and the greater part of his Life being Covetous and cruel, we may juſtly repute him One of the worſt and moſt Tyrannical Kings that ever England had; and yet none had better fortune than he, till the Accident of his untimely Death; which I term ſo, not in reſpect of the Nation, but of himſelf, being then in the flower of his Age.

Of Laws and Taxations during his Reign.

As for his Laws, if ever he made any, they are loſt, and indeed there ſeemed no great need of any under a Prince who commonly made his Will his Law; yet as Arbitrary as he was, we ſee he would not condemn thoſe Gentlemen above mentioned, who had been quitted by the Ordeal.

As for his Taxations, we cannot tell how many they were, (his whole Reign being ſo full of them) only it is certain, he impoſed the Danegueld in divers years thereof; and we find in the Saxon Chronicles under almoſt every year great complaints of his Taxes, and oppreſſing Exactions. He alſo ſold divers Abbeys for Money, and let out others when vacant, and alſo Biſhopricks to Farm; and at the time of his Death had the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, with the Biſhopricks of Wincheſter and Salisbury in his hands, of all which he received the Profits.

As a Concluſion to this Reign, I ſhall alſo here take notice from [3.] * William of Malmesbury, and † Odericus Vitalis, of the great corruption of Manners among the young Noblemen and Gentlemen of thoſe Times, notwithſtanding the Warlikeneſs of the Age; for it was then the faſhion for them to wear their Hair as long as Women, which they kept every day curl'd, and nicely Combed out; they wore alſo ſtraight-Bodied Coats with wide Sleeves, * their Breaſts open, ſo that they differ'd not much from our preſent faſhions; only they wore the Tooes of their Shoos long and picked, which much exceeding the length of their Feet turn'd up in their Faces; which fooliſh faſhion was again reaſſumed in the Reign of King Richard the Second; inſomuch that the Hiſtorians of thoſe Times tell us that many Noblemen and Gentlemen uſed Gold or Silver Chains tyed to their Knees to keep keep them ſtill turned up. From whence we may obſerve, that the ſame Modes in Clothes after ſeveral Ages return again, and are ever thought becoming by thoſe that wear them.

[4.] W. M. Ibid.

[4.] But which was worſe than the folly of thoſe Faſhions the young Men that wore them ſeem'd to contend with Women in ſoftneſs and effeminancy, walking affectedly, as if they ſeemed unwilling to appear what they really were, ſhewing themſelves Men in nothing ſo much as in their attempts upon the Chaſtity of the Women: and I wiſh a great deal of this Character might not be too juſtly applied to the Youth of our preſent Age.

King HENRY I.

HENRY, Youngest Son to King William the First, was the only Child he had Born in England, after he came to the Crown; upon which account he is looked upon by [1.] William of Malmesbury to have had the best Right to it. He was in his Youth kept close to his Book, which gave his Mind such a deep tincture of good Literature, that neither Wars, nor Domestick Troubles could ever efface it: This also gave him so great a Reputation for Learning (not then commonly found among the Laiety, and especially Princes) that it procured him the Sirname of Beau-clerk, that is, the Good Scholar. He had not much Land left him by his Father, the greatest part of his Portion being in Money, which was bequeathed him both by King William, and by the Queen his Mother; but most of what he had by the former, he was defrauded of by his Brother Duke Robert, who payed it away to his Mercenary Soldiers, that under him made War upon King William, whilst Henry was gone into Bretaign upon Duke Robert's Service: after which being still hardly used by him (as you have heard) in the former Reign, he came over to the late King, and continued with him for some time before his Death; and being a Hunting with him that day he was killed, he laid hold on that opportunity to obtain the Crown, and immediately Posting to Winchester, where the late King's Treasure then was, and boldly demanding the Keys, he seized it to his own use; and had, I think, as much right to it as his Brother Robert, who was then upon his return from the Holy Land.

[2.] The day after his Brother's Interment, he haſted to London, (where as many of the Nobility as could meet upon ſo ſhort warning attended him) and was in a [3.] Great Council of the Biſhops, Earls and Barons, the Saturday following Elected King, tho' ſome * diſputes had aroſe among them about it, but they were at laſt compoſed by Henry Earl of Warwick, whoſe Friendſhip he had gained long before; and the next being Sunday the fifth of Auguſt, he was ſolemnly Crowned by Maurice [4.] Biſhop of London. But before hand he took an Oath, [4.] Eadm. p. 55. Archbiſhop Anſelm invited to return home.

[4.] Preſently after the Coronation, the King and great Men diſpatched a Meſſenger to Archbiſhop Anſelm, then in Exile at Lyons in France, inviting him to return into England with what ſpeed he could; the King in his Letters adding his Prayers and Wiſhes for the ſame, promiſing to ſubject himſelf and his Kingdom to his Council and Direction: So he making all the haſt he could, Landed at Dover the Twenty third day of September, to the great ſatisfaction of the whole Nation.

[5.] W. M. P. 88*a*. Ead. p. 56. The King is inclined to Marry Mathilda, Daughter to the late King of Scots.

[5.] Not long after his return, the King by the advice of his Friends, and eſpecially the Biſhops, reſolved to leave off his Miſtreſſes, and Marry; and he having a very great affection for Matilda, Daughter to Malcolme, late King of Scotland, and Grand-daughter to Margaret, Siſter to Edgar Atheling, reſolved (if it could proved be Lawful) to Marry her; for there being ſome ſcruple, Whither ſhe might Marry or not, the Cauſe was brought before the Archbiſhop not long after his return; and the reaſon of this doubt was, for that ſhe had been educated in the Monaſtery of Wilton amongſt Nuns from her Infancy; whereon it was thought by many that had often ſeen her there, that her Parents had devoted her to God: theſe Reports putting a ſtop to the intended Mariage; to take away all Scruples about it, it was left to the determination of Archbiſhop Anſelm, to whom the Lady privately applied her ſelf, and begged his Advice and Aſſiſtance in it; and confeſſed, to him, That indeed ſhe had been Veil'd, tho' againſt her will, and took that Habit upon her, only to preſerve her Chaſtity from the then raging luſt of the Normans, (which ſhe could prove by ſufficient Witneſſes) But as for the Veil ſhe had never worn it, unleſs in the preſence of the Abbeſs Chriſtiana her Aunt, and that as ſoon as her back was turned, ſhe flung it away; alſo that the King her Father ſeeing it once upon her Head, had pulled it off and torn it, proteſting to Alan Earl of Bretaign, that he intended to Marry her, and not to make her a Nun. This is the ſubſtance of this Lady's Defence.

Some Scruples againſt it, as ſhe had been a Nun.

[1.] Idem. P. 57. Anſelm calls a Synod to determine whither Mathilda had been really a Nun.

[1.] Upon hearing which, Archbiſhop Anſelm deferr'd giving his Judgment, and for greater ſecurity reſolved to adjourn it to an Aſſembly of all the Clergy, who were to meet immediately after by his Command; where in a full Council of the Biſhops, Abbots, and Inferior Clergy, together with certain Noblemen, held at Lambeth, the Cauſe Cauſe being ſolemnly heard, and all there preſent giving their Votes according to their Conſciences, and the Merits of the Cauſe, the matter of fact appear'd to be thus; That when the Great William had ſubdued this Land, divers Virgins went into Monaſteries, and Veiled themſelves, that they might be thereby protected from the Luſts of his Soldiers, who being puffed up with ſo great a Victory, thought all things ſubject to their will, and that they might not only ſeize the Eſtates of the Conquered, but alſo raviſh Matrons and Virgins whenever they had opportunity. Yet that Archbiſhop Lanfranc, when Peace was ſettled, being asked his Opinion concerning ſuch Perſons, whither they ſhould be kept to a Monaſtick Life or not, had given it in the Negative, unleſs they would undertake it by their own Free wills. Whereupon the Archbiſhop, after hearing all the ſaid Allegations and Proofs, coming out before the Church-doors, there in the preſence of the King, the Nobility and * Common People (who all flocked about him) related the whole Proceſs in this Cauſe, and then openly gave Sentence, That the Lady might enjoy the Lawful liberty of her Perſon, and according to the Law of God might Marry; which being approved of by the whole Aſſembly there preſent, not long after (viz.) at Martinmaſs following, the Mariage between King Henry and the Lady was Solemnized.

* Populus minor.

This Year in [2.] September, after the King's Coronation, Duke Robert his Brother returned home from his Voyage to Jeruſalem, from whence he brought more Reputation than Money; but tho' in all that Expedition, as alſo at the taking of that City from the Saracens, he behaved himſelf with remarkable valour; yet (as for what ſome of our Hiſtorians relate) that he was offer'd by all the Princes there preſent, to be choſen King of that new Kingdom, but that he refuſing it, Godfrey Duke of Lorrain was Elected in his ſtead, ſince I find it in no antienter Author than [3.] Henry of Huntington, I ſhall not mention it, as any more than a common Tradition of that Age.

[2.] W. M. P. 89. F. W. Duke Robert returns from his Voyage to the Holy Land.

[3.] Idem. Ibid.

Yet he was now joyfully received into his Dutchy without any oppoſition, [4.] having in his return home Married in Sicily a moſt beautiful Lady, called Sibilla, Daughter to William Earl of Converſano, a Prince of Italy, and with whom he had a Portion ſufficient to have redeem'd his Dutchy (had there been occaſion for it) but he ſquander'd away all that Money in a ſhort time, upon Paraſites and mean Fellows. The Duke was no ſooner a little ſettled, but being much diſcontented at the loſs of the Kingdom of England, many Noblemen that were diſſatisfied with the new King's Government, went over to him, and excited him to vindicate his Right; but ſince he did nothing in it all the reſt of this Year, I ſhall defer the further mention of it till the next.

[4.] F. W. W. M. Ibid. His Mariage in his way home.

I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs: [5.] Archbiſhop Anſelm not long after his Return waited on the King at Salisbury, who firſt made him an Excuſe that he could not ſtop his Coronation till coming over, becauſe it required his immediate diſpatch; and then deſired him, that according to the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, he would do him homage, and receive the Inveſtiture of his Biſhoprick at his hand: To which the Archbiſhop anſwered, That he could by no means agree to it; and being asked the reaſon, he then related, what Injunctions he had lately received at Rome concerning ing that, as well as other matters; plainly declaring, That if the King would be contented with this, they might then agree, and there would be a firm Peace between them; but if he ſaw the King reſolved to confer Biſhopricks and Abbeys as had been done formerly, he (the Archbiſhop) ſhould then be ſatisfied, that his ſtay in England would neither be Honourable nor Safe; for he had not come over, nor would ſtay here, if the King was not reſolved to obey the Pope, and therefore deſired a poſitive anſwer what he muſt expect. The King hearing this, was very much troubled, becauſe it ſeemed hard for him to loſe the Inveſtiture of Churches, and the Homages of his Prelates, nevertheleſs it ſeemed as difficult to ſuffer the Archbiſhop to leave the Kingdom, being as yet unſetled; for he was ſatisfied he ſhould run a great Riſque if Anſelm ſhould go over to his Brother Duke Robert, and having perſwaded him to ſubmit to the See of Rome, ſhould thereupon own him for King.

[5.] Eadm. p. 56. Archbiſhop Anſelm returns into England, and his Anſwer to the King's demands.

Anno Dom. MC.

The King being loth to loſe his Inveſtiture of Biſhopricks and Abbeys, requires ſome Reſpite.

[1.] Idem. Ib.

[1.] Henry therefore deſired ſome reſpite till Eaſter, that he might ſend to Rome to ſee if they could obtain of the Pope, that the Antient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom might continue, and that in the mean time the Churches of England ſhould remain in the ſame ſtate as they were at preſent, and the Archbiſhop ſhould have the Lands reſtored to him which the late King had taken away; and that if the Pope could not be drawn from his former Sentence, all things ſhould remain in the ſame ſtate as they were at preſent: this, tho' Anſelm very well knew would be altogether in vain (as he then foretold) yet leſt he ſhould give any ſuſpicion to the new King and the Nobility, as if he intended to tranſlate the Kingdom to his Brother, he yielded to their Entreaties, and the * Council being diſmiſſed, the Archbiſhop return'd home to his See.

* Curia.

[2.] Idem Ib. A Legate from the Pope comes over hither.

The ſame Year [2.] Guido, Archbiſhop of Vienne in Dauphine, came into England, as Legate of all Bretaign, by the Pope's command and authority, which being made publick, (as the ſame Author tells us) cauſed great Admiration, ſince all Men knew it was unheard of before in Bretaign, that any Man ſhould repreſent the Apoſtolick See here, except the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and therefore as he came ſo he return'd, without being received by any body as the Pope's Nuncio, or performing the Office of a Legate in any matter whatſoever.

Now this ſeems very ſtrange, ſince, as this Author himſelf relates, Walter Biſhop of Alba came over hither as Nuncio from the Pope in the laſt King's Reign; not to mention others, who had been likewiſe ſent hither, and had preſided in former Synods, as you have already heard.

Anno Dom. MCI.

[3.] Idem Ib. Upon the News of Duke Robert's intended Invaſion, the Nation is divided.

But [3.] at Whitſunday following, the Report of Duke Robert's intended Invaſion of England, diſturbed the whole Realm, and (as it afterwards appear'd) drew Men's minds ſeveral ways; for Ranulph Biſhop of Durham, having lately made his eſcape out of Priſon into Normandy, (as has been ſaid before) had done his utmoſt to excite the Duke to make War upon his Brother; which news divided the Nobility into parties, and made the King very jealous of them; for as he ſuſpected their fidelity, leſt they ſhould depart from the Faith they had plighted to him, ſo they likewiſe fear'd, that when he was once ſettled in his Throne in Peace, he would again oppreſs them with ſeverer Laws: therefore it was upon mature deliberation reſolved, that that ſuch a Security ſhould be mutually given on both ſides, as might effectually remove all Jealouſies; but when they were about to take a further engagement of the King's Faith, the whole Nobility of the Kingdom, with all the People, made Archbiſhop Anſelm Mediator between the King and them; who giving them his hand * on the King's behalf, ſolemnly promiſed, that he would govern the whole Kingdom ſo long as he lived, by pious and juſt Laws; which being done, every one was very well ſatisfied with this Security; from whence you may obſerve, how great a truſt the whole Nation at this time placed in this Archbiſhop's promiſe and engagement.

Anno Dom. MCI.

* A Cuſtom then in uſe upon all Pledging of Faith, which is ſtill retain'd in Mariage.

After [4.] the King was aſſured of his Brother's coming over, he reſolved to raiſe a Great Army out of the whole Kingdom to reſiſt him, which indeed was very numerous; and Archbiſhop Anſelm with his Dependants continued moſt faithful to the King in this Expedition.

[4.] Idem Ib. The King raiſes a great Army to reſiſt his Brother.

But ſince the Saxon Annals give us a more exact account of this affair than any other Author, I ſhall here give you what they relate concerning it, (viz.) that upon the News of the Duke's coming over, many of the Chief Men of this Kingdom became ſecret Enemies to the King, ſo that when he ſet out his Fleet to Sea, ſome of the Ships deſerted him, and went over to the Duke: To which Florence of Worceſter adds, That many of the Great Men had privately invited Duke Robert over, and that when he Landed, ſome of them openly ſided with him, whilſt others diſſembling their kindneſs, ſtayed with the King, expecting an opportunity to revolt; but that the Biſhops, Common Soldiers and Engliſh remain'd firm to the King: yet William of [5.] Malmesbury ſays expreſly, that almoſt all the Great Men of England broke their Oaths of Allegiance to him, ſome for no cauſe, and others for very ſlight ones, as that he would not grant them what Lands they deſired, or the like. To which [1.] Ordericus Vitalis joyns another reaſon, which might ſway very much with divers of theſe Seditious Grandees, viz. that they feared the Magnanimous temper of King Henry, that it would keep them too much in awe, and therefore prefer'd the eaſie and ſlothful humour of Duke Robert, ſo that (as the former Author relates) only Robert Fitz-Haimon, Richard de Redvers, and Roger Bigod, and a few others there named, ſtill remain'd faithful to him in this extremity. Then about Midſummer the King marched to Pevenſie with his whole Army againſt his Brother, and there tarried for his coming over; but he was at that time in ſuch great fear of both his Life and Kingdom, that he ſcarce truſted any Body beſides the Archbiſhop.

Many of the great Men deſert the King, as alſo ſome of his Fleet.

[1.] P. 786.

[2.] In Auguſt Duke Robert ſetting Sail from Ultreſport in Normandy with a powerful Force, (yet relying more upon the Revolt of the Nobility) arrived at Portſmouth, and marching thence encampt near Wincheſter; then the King with all his Army went out againſt him, but before he did ſo, he promiſed the Archbiſhop, that he ſhould freely exerciſe Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline as he pleaſed, and that for ever after He himſelf would be obedient to the Decrees of the Apoſtolick See. Then the Archbiſhop called together all the Great Men, and urged to them and the whole Army, how execrable a thing it would be for them to violate their Faith once given to their Prince; by which Pathetical Diſcourſe he ſo well fixed their minds, that they reſolved rather to loſe their Lives, than ever to revolt from the King; and and it was chiefly the owing to Archbiſhop's Fidelity and Induſtry, that at this time King Henry kept the Crown upon his Head: for Duke Robert being thereby defeated of the Truſt he repoſed in the Nobility, and fearing to be Excommunicated by Anſelm as an Invader of another's Right, He by the Mediation of ſome of the Chief Men of his own as well as his Brother's Party, made Peace with the King upon certain Terms.

A Peace made between the King and Duke.

[3.] A more full Relation of it from Ordericus.

[3.] Ordericus Vitalis is ſomething more particular in this Tranſaction, and ſays, that ſo ſoon as the Duke Landed, he was received by the Noblemen of his Party, and that the two Brothers remain'd with their Forces in a Plain not far from Wincheſter, for ſome days, and there was a daily Intercourſe of Meſſengers between the Noblemen of both ſides, but without any effect; yet at length only the two Brothers by mutual conſent, without any Aſſiſtants, met between the two Armies, and after ſome Diſcourſe agreed upon the conditions that are expreſt more at large in our own Authors, being theſe that follow:

[4.] C. S. F. W. The Articles of their Agreement.

1. That [4.] the King ſhould ſurrender to the Duke whatſoever he had taken or held in Normandy by Force.

2. That all Perſons ſhould have their Honours and Lands reſtored to them who had loſt them upon the Duke's Account, and alſo Euſtace (Earl of Boloign) ſhould have thoſe his Father had enjoyed in this Kingdom, as alſo thoſe of the King's party, who had their Eſtates in Normandy ſeized, were to be reſtored to them.

3. That the King ſhould alſo pay to Duke Robert the Sum of three Thouſand marks of Silver yearly, and that the ſurviving Brother ſhould be Heir to the other, both of England, and Normandy, if the Deceaſed left no Lawful Heirs of his own Body.

Twelve Noblemen of each ſide ſwear to the true obſervance of them.

For the performance of which Agreement, Twelve of the chief Noblemen on each ſide were ſolemnly ſworn: Then the Duke diſbanded his Army; but before that, his Soldiers did a great deal of miſchief in all places where ever they marched; yet the Duke (being a Prince of an eaſie Temper) ſtayed here till Michaelmaſs was over, and then he returned into Normandy.

[5.] Eadm. p. 58. Archbiſhop Anſelm Summon'd to give his Anſwer concerning the Inveſtiture of Biſhops.

Not long after this Reconciliation, [5.] Archbiſhop Anſelm was Summon'd to appear at the King's Court, to give his Anſwer concerning the Inveſtitures of Biſhops, which had been hitherto delayed; for the Meſſengers being now returned from Rome, brought Letters from Pope Paſchal (who had lately ſucceeded Urban) concerning this Affair; which becauſe they are very tedious, and only contain ſome frivolous reaſons, why the Pope would not grant the King a Diſpenſation for his beſtowing the Inveſtiture of Biſhopricks and Abbeys, I ſhall paſs by, and refer the Reader for his further ſatisfaction to [1.] Eadmerus his Hiſtory concerning them.

[1.] P. 59.

Idem Ib. What was done upon his Arrival there.

But ſo ſoon as the Archbiſhop came to Court, the King by the Counſel of his Brother Duke Robert, and thoſe of his party (who were very angry with Anſelm, becauſe that by his means he had been defeated in his hopes of the Kingdom) required of him, that either he ſhould become the King's Liegeman, and, according to the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, conſecrate thoſe on whom the King would beſtow "Biſhopricks and Abbeys, or elſe quit the Kingdom without delay; "which was but an ungrateful return for the Archbiſhop's late kind-

" neſs and fidelity: But to this meſſage he modeſtly replied that he " had already told the King what had been Ordained at the Council " of Rome in this matter, and that if he ſhould now yield to what " was required, he ſhould be Excommunicated by his own Sentence; " and ſince the Meſſengers who were ſent thither to get this altered, " were returned without doing any thing, that he ſhould be ve- " ry indiſcreet, if he ſhould offer now to tranſgreſs in thoſe things " which could not be done with any ſafety or honeſty. Whereupon " the King anſwered again, What is that to me? I will not loſe the " Uſages of my Predeceſſors, neither will I ſuffer any one to ſtay in " my Kingdom, who will not be my Subject. To which the Arch- " biſhop as ſharply retorted, I know very well to what all theſe things " tend, and have been already verſed in like matters; yet I ſhall not " leave the Land, as the King commands me, but will go to my " own Church, and there performing my duty, will ſee if any Body " dare do any violence to me and mine. There were many Meſſa- ges about this Affair carried between them by the Biſhops and No- bles, who in all things endeavoured to obſerve the King's will, and would have perſwaded the Archbiſhop to comply with it too, and not to obey the Pope: But nothing being now concluded, Anſelm returned home, and was much grieved at theſe great oppreſſions (as he thought them) of the Engliſh Church.

Anno I... [illegible]. Anſelm refuſes to receive any Inveſtiture from the King.

[2.] Not long after, the King ſent friendly Letters to the Arch- biſhop, inviting him to come to Court, telling him, That he was re- ſolved to mitigate his former Sentence; upon which the Archbiſhop went to Wincheſter, where the Biſhops and the Chief Men of the Kingdom were ſoon after aſſembled, and there it was by common aſſent reſolved, that farther time ſhould be allowed on both ſides, and other Meſſengers ſhould be ſent to Rome of greater quality than the former, who ſhould relate to the Pope by word of mouth, that he muſt either depart from his former Sentence, or elſe that Archbi- ſhop Anſelm, and thoſe of his party would be Baniſhed England, and then his Holineſs might loſe the Subjection of that Kingdom, and the Profits he was wont to receive from thence. Alſo the Archbiſhop ſent two Monks, viz. Baldwin of the Abbey of Bec, and Alexander of Canterbury, partly that they might appeal to the Pope againſt theſe Court-threatnings, and partly that they might relate to Anſelm the final Determination of the Roman See in this matter; ſo likewiſe from the King there went three Biſhops, (viz.) Gerard late Biſhop of Hereford, (now made Archbiſhop of York) Herbert Biſhop of Thetford, and Robert Biſhop of Cheſter, who had each of them their own parti- cular buſineſs beſides; but what ſucceſs they had in the Affair they were ſent about, you will hear further hereafter.

[2.] Idem ib. The King a- gain writes to the Arch- biſhop, and promiſes to mitigate his former Sen- tence.

Whereupon he and the Biſhops meet at Wincheſter.

The Archbi- ſhop and the King ſend their ſeveral Meſſengers to Rome.

The King had not been long free from the danger of a foreign In- vaſion, but there aroſe a freſh diſturbance at home, which proceeded from his over great ſeverity; for whereas it had been his wiſeſt way to have forgiven all offences paſt, yet he was no ſooner confirm'd in his Kingdom, but [3.] he began by degrees to puniſh all ſuch as had deſerted him, or adhered to, or invited over Duke Robert; he alſo Summon'd to tryal Robert Mallet, Ivo de Grentemaiſnil, Robert de Pon- teſract, the Son of Ilbert Lacy, and Robert de Beleſme the greateſt of them all, with divers others; tho' not all at once, but at ſeveral times, and in divers methods, he impleaded them as guilty of the Violation of their Oaths; ſome of them that could not purge themſelves of the Crimes wherewith they were charged, he condemned in great Sums of Money; and from others, whom he moſt feared and ſuſpected, he took away all their Eſtates, and Baniſhed them.

[4.] Idem. P. 806. Robert Earl of Shrewsbury Summon'd to appear.

But [4.] R. de Beleſme Earl of Shrewsbury, (a young Noble Man of a fierce and arrogant diſpoſition, and alſo very powerful by reaſon of his great Territories in Normandy and England) being now Summon'd to the King's Court, there were above forty ſeveral Crimes laid to his charge, as well of words as actions, and he was commanded to anſwer plainly to every one of them; for the King by the ſpace of a year laſt paſt, had ſet ſpies upon him, who obſerved and ſet down all his moſt culpable actions. He being thus charged, asked leave to adviſe with his friends, and having obtain'd it, and being conſcious that he could not purge himſelf of the tranſgreſſions objected to him, he in great fear fled to his Caſtles, while the King and his Barons were expecting his anſwer: But One of the Purſevants came and inform'd them, that Earl Robert had made his eſcape, whereupon the King iſſued forth his Proclamation, declaring, that unleſs he came in, and ſubmitted himſelf to tryal, he ſhould be adjudged a publick Enemy: [5.] But inſtead of appearing any more before the King's Court, he fortified his Caſtles of Shrewsbury, Arundel, and Tickhill, with all ſorts of Warlike Ammunition and Proviſions, and then prayed aid of the Normans, that were of his Alliance, as alſo of other his Dependants, nay of his antient Enemies the Welſh, who being now joyned with the Normans, the Earl and his Brother Arnulph ſpoiled great part of Staffordſhire, driving the Cattel they had taken into Wales.

He falls into open Rebellion.

[5.] F. W.

[1.] O. V. P. 806. * Angliæ Exercitium. The King raiſes the Militia, and Beſieges the Earl's Caſtles.

Upon this Rebellion the King [1.] preſently aſſembled all the * Militia of England, and Beſieged his Caſtle of Arundel in Suſſex, but being not able to take it by reaſon of its great Strength, he blocked it up by building ſeveral Forts about it, and ſo marched off. Then the Beſieged finding themſelves thus ſtreightened, Petition'd the King for leave to diſpatch Meſſengers to their Lord, that he would either ſend them Relief, or permit them to make their Peace, which was granted them; upon this the Earl ſeeing he could not help them, (tho' much againſt his will) gave them leave to make the beſt terms they could for themſelves.

[2.] R. H. The Biſhop of Lincoln Beſieges Tickhill-Caſtle, whilſt the King Beſieges Bridgnorth.

At [2.] the ſame time the King alſo commanded Robert Biſhop of Lincoln, with part of the Army, to Beſiege Tickhill-Caſtle, while he himſelf went and Beſieged that of Bridgnorth in Shropſhire, (but Earl Robert was lately gone from thence to Shrewsbury) the King ſpent three Weeks before it, until by his Gifts he had corrupted the Welſh, in whom the Earl placed moſt confidence, ſo that they ſurrendered the Caſtle. It ſeems Earl Robert ſtayed not long in Shrewsbury, but left it to the care of Roger, the Son of Robert de Nevil, and Ulger de Venables, with whom he joyned Eighty Stipendiary Soldiers, and then making a League with the Welſh, drew over their Princes Cadagon and Gervaſ, the Sons of Rees, to his party, by whom and his own Forces he often much diſturbed the King's Army.

[3.] O. V. P. 807. William Pantulf quits the Earl's Party.

[3.] But William Pantulf, a Nobleman of Shropſhire, (who had been before diſinherited by the King) about this time fell off from the Earl, and returned to the King's Allegiance; who forthwith ſent him him Two hundred Soldiers, and made him Governour of Stafford-Caſtle; from whence by Excurſions he mightily annoyed the Earl; and it was He that by great Promiſes and Gifts brought over the Welſh Princes to the King's ſide. After this the King demanded Shrewsbury of the two Governours, and threaten'd, that if it were not delivered to him in three days, he would hang all he ſhould take therein. Then the Governours Treated with the King by the Mediation of William Pantulf, One allied to them, who with the Townſmen and Burgeſſes were willing to ſave themſelves, and deliver up the Town; ſo the Keys of the Caſtle were ſent to the King by Ralph Abbot of Seys, who was afterwards made Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but the Mercenaries knew nothing of this Treaty, but ſtill remained faithful to their Maſter, and therefore when the King entred the Town, he permitted them freely to depart with their Horſes and Armes.

Anno Dom. MCII.

The King Summons Shrewsbury, which is at laſt ſurrendred.

King [4.] Henry having thus ſubdued his Enemies, took away from Robert de Beleſme his Earldom and Lands, and all the Eſtates of ſuch as adhered to him; yet gave him a ſafe Conduct to paſs into Normandy, (knowing very well, that a Nobleman bereft of his Eſtate, is like an Eagle ſtript of his Wings and Feathers; the King alſo Baniſhed his two Brothers, Arnulph and Roger of Poictou, which put an end to this Rebellion ſooner than was expected.

[4.] O. V. Robert de Beleſme is diſinherited and Baniſhed the Kingdom, with other Noblemen.

But theſe Noblemen being expell'd England, raiſed freſh Diſturbances in Normandy, which laſted three years longer; for Duke Robert, tho' he had courage enough, yet wanted Power (or rather Diſcretion) to quell them; for Robert de Beleſme being a Man of great Power in Normandy, always kept conſiderable Forces about him, and ſupported himſelf by his vaſt Wealth, which he had Treaſured up in Thirty four ſtrong Caſtles, formerly built with a deſign to rebell when ever it lay in his Power.

Let us now look back to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs: [5] The Meſſengers who were lately ſent to Rome, as well on the Archbiſhop's as on the King's behalf, returning this Summer, brought back the Pope's Letters to the King in anſwer to his laſt Meſſage, concerning his Reſolution of retaining the Inveſtiture of Churches; the Pope alſo wrote to the Archbiſhop upon the ſame Subject; in thoſe to the King, by his Pontifical Authority he poſitively forbad him any longer to retain thoſe Inveſtitures; whilſt in thoſe to the Archbiſhop he exclaims againſt it as the Root of all Simoniacal corruption, and directly againſt the late Decrees of the Lateran Council.

[5.] Eadm. Lib. 3. p. 63. The Meſſengers return from Rome, with Letters from the Pope.

But [1.] the King concealing the Letters which were ſent to himſelf, Summoned the Archbiſhop to Court, and the Nobility being again aſſembled at London, he demanded of Anſelm, either to obſerve the Cuſtoms of his Predeceſſors, or elſe to quit the Kingdom. To which the Archbiſhop anſwered, That he deſired the Pope's Letters might be read that were lately brought, and then he ſhould not ſtick to obey the King, ſtill preſerving his Obedience to the Apoſtolick See; which the King denying he had receiv'd, the Archbiſhop told him, That when ever he pleaſed to produce thoſe Letters, he ſhould always find him ready to obſerve them: Whereupon the King ſtill perſiſting in his denyal that he had any, he at laſt declared he would treat with him no further about them, but bid him to anſwer poſitively, whither he would obey his will or not, without any further Subterfuges: Which made ſome give out, That the Pope's Letters were according to the King's own deſires, and that he would quickly publiſh them, whither Anſelm would or not.

[2.] Idem. P. 65. The Biſhop's Report differs from the Archbiſhop's Letters.

But thoſe to the Archbiſhop being read over and over before all there preſent, nothing could be found in them to the King's advantage, yet notwithſtanding the Biſhops who came from Rome pretended to have received other private Inſtructions from the Pope by word of mouth, than what the Letters even to the King himſelf contained; and being required upon their Epiſcopal Veracity to ſpeak the truth, they further declar'd that the Pope himſelf had ſent the King word by them, that ſo long as he did the part of a good Prince in other things, he would connive at the Inveſtiture of Churches, and would never Excommunicate him, altho' he Inveſted Religious Perſons with the delivery of the Paſtoral Staff; but the reaſon why he would not grant him that priviledge in Writing, as they pretended, was, leſt if it ſhould come to the knowledg of other Princes, they ſhould contemn the Authority of the Pope, and without his leave uſurp it to themſelves. Which Baldwin the Monk hearing, he challenged the Biſhops as if they had acted contrary to the Faith and Oaths they had given the Pope at Rome. So there aroſe no ſmall Diſſention among the Noblemen and Biſhops, ſome endeavouring to maintain, that ſlighting the uncertainty of Verbal Meſſages, they ought rather to believe the Pope's Letters, and the Teſtimony of the Monks, whilſt others maintained the contrary, that they ought rather to give credit to the aſſertion of three Biſhops, than to a piece of Parchment ſcribled over with Ink, or to the Teſtimony of two Monks, who as ſoon as they profeſſed to renounce the World, had loſt the credit of Witneſſes. Whereupon a great Diſpute aroſe between them and the two Monks, inſomuch that the Archbiſhop was for ſome time doubtful which way to turn himſelf, the Pope's Letters ſaying one thing, and the Biſhops another.

[3.] Ibid. P. 66. The King inſiſts that Anſelm ſhould do him Homage, whereupon the Archbiſhop reſolves to go to Rome.

The [3.] King therefore being encouraged in his opinion from thoſe things which the Biſhops then alledged, and the Noblemen inciting him to it, he began again to inſiſt, That Archbiſhop Anſelm ſhould do him Homage, and alſo promiſe to Conſecrate thoſe whom the King ſhould nominate to Biſhopricks; which the Archbiſhop refuſed, ſaying, That if the Pope's Letters had agreed with the Biſhop's words, perhaps he would have done what was now required; but to prevent all miſtakes for the future, he thought it better to go to Rome himſelf, to conſult the Pope in this Affair, than to precipitate his opinion in ſo doubtful a point. So after ſome further conteſt between him and the Biſhops that came from Rome, he at laſt told them, that he reſolved to ſend thither again about this matter, and in the mean time would not Conſecrate any of thoſe who had received their Inveſtitures from the King, nor yet would command any other Biſhop to do it. Upon which the Controverſie was laid aſleep for a time.

[4.] Ibid. P. 67. A General Synod held at Weſtminſter.

Not [4.] long after, (viz. at Michaelmaſs following) the King being at Weſtminſter, there was held a General Synod in the Church of St. Peter's, of all the Biſhops and Abbots of England, in which Archbiſhop Anſelm preſided, there ſitting with him Gerard Archbiſhop of York, and the other Biſhops particularly named by Eadmerus, who has given us the Decrees of this Synod at large, and likewiſe informs us, us, that at the requeſt of Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (the chief Noblemen of the Kingdom being alſo preſent) it was declar'd, that whatſoever was decreed by the Authority of the ſaid Council, (and being alſo eſtabliſh'd and confirm'd by the joynt conſent of both Orders) ſhould be inviolably obſerved; the chief Decrees of which Synod, ſince they alter'd many things in Church-Diſcipline, and alſo relate to Secular Affairs, I ſhall here ſet down at large from [5.] Eadmerus. Anno Dom. MCII. [5.] Idem Ib.

1. That Symony be ſeverely puniſhed; of which ſeveral Abbots (there named) being found guilty, were by this Synod depoſed.

2. That Biſhops undertake not the Office of Secular Pleas, nor wear Habits like Lay-men, but as becomes Religious Perſons. "Yet "notwithſtanding this Decree, we find ſeveral Biſhops not long after to "Officiate as Judges in the King's Courts; which ſhews how little "they were concern'd in thoſe days for the Canons of the Church, "when either profit or honour ſtood in competition with them.

3. That no Arch-Deaconries ſhould be let out to Farm.

4. That all Arch-Deacons ſhould be Deacons.

From whence we may obſerve, that before this Council, that great Office of an Arch-Deacon was often by the Biſhops let out to Farm to meer Lay-men.

5. That no Arch-Deacon, Prieſt, Deacon, or Chanon marry a Wife, or retain one, tho' Maried to him; and that every Sub-Deacon that is not a Chanon, (if he had Maried after his Profeſſion made of Chaſtity) ſhould be bound by the ſame Rule.

This Decree tho' made before at Rome, was not till now received in England, and gave occaſion to Henry Arch-Deacon of Huntington, to paſs this ſevere remark upon this Prohibition: Hoc quibuſdam mundiſſimum viſum eſt, quibuſdam periculoſum, nè dum munditiæ viribus majores Sacerdotes appeterent, in immunditias horribiles ad Chriſtiani nominis ſummum dedecus inciderent: In Engliſh thus, Which thing ſeemed very pure to ſome, to others very dangerous, leſt whilſt the Prieſts ſought for a purity beyond their ſtrength, they ſhould fall into horrible uncleannesſes to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtian Profeſſion. Which cenſure has ſince been found but too true, amongſt many of the Clergy of the Church of Rome.

6. That a Prieſt, ſo long as he holds unlawful converſation with a Woman (tho' his own Wife) is not Chanonical, nor can rightly Celebrate, nor is his Maſs to be heard.

7. That none be admitted to the Order of Sub-Deacon, or upwards, without the Profeſſion of Chaſtity.

8. That the Sons of Prieſts be not made Heirs to the Churches of their Fathers.

9. That no Clerk be a *Bayliff or Steward in Secular Matters, or Judge in Blood. * Præpoſitus.*

This is the Reaſon, ſaith the Appendix to Harpsfield's Church-Hiſtory, why Biſhops, being arraigned for their Lives, are not to be tryed by their Peers, but by a Jury of Ordinary Men; becauſe debarred by the Canons to be Judges of Lay-Peers in like Caſes, and therefore it was conceived unfitting, that they ſhould receive that Honour which they could not return.

But

Anno Dom. MCII.

But ſince this is only that Author's gueſs, I think I may alſo give another, and I hope as ſatisfactory a reaſon for this Law, or rather Cuſtom now in uſe; viz. that Biſhops, being formerly exempted from the Authority of Secular Courts, could not be arraigned before them, until they were firſt ſolemnly degraded of their Epiſcopal Orders, and when ſo degraded they were no longer Barons.

10. That Prieſts ſhould not go to publick Drinkings, Nec ad pinnas bibant, nor drink to the Pins.

You may remember at the end of the laſt Volume there is an additional Law of King Edgar's, whereby Men were forbidden to drink at one Draught below certain Pins, that were ordered to be fixed on the inſide of the Cups and Goblets; which being alſo abuſed to Drunkenneſs by the Clergy as well as Laiety, it now produced this Law to forbid it.

11. That the Garments of Clergy-men be of one Colour, and their Shoos alſo, according to order.

12. That Monks and Clerks, who have caſt off their Orders, either return thereto, or be Excommunicated.

[1.] Idem. P. 68.

13. [1.] That Clerks have Crowns Patent, (i.e. broad Shaved) ſo that their Shaving be conſpicuous to the Beholders.

14. That Tythes be given to none, but to Churches.

15. That Churches, or Prebends, be not Bought.

16. That New Chappels be not made without the conſent of the Biſhop.

17. That no Church be Conſecrated, until a neceſſary Maintenance be provided for the Prieſt and Church.

18. That Abbots make no Knights, and that they Eat and ſleep in the ſame Houſe with their Monks, except ſome neceſſity forbid.

Hence it farther appeareth, that it was the Antient Cuſtom of Abbots in thoſe days to make Knights, as you may find from the example of Abbot Brand's Knighting his Nephew Hereward, in the Reign of King William the Firſt, the Form of which I have there alſo ſet down: And yet this is certain, that notwithſtanding this Canon, King Henry the Firſt, ſome years after granted, and King John confirmed to the Abbot of Reading, the Power of making Knights, with ſome Cautions for their Behaviour therein.

19. That Monks enjoyn no Pennance to any, without permiſſion of their Abbot, and that only to ſuch Perſons, of whoſe Souls they have the Cure.

By which Decree great part of the Monks's Profits, which aroſe from their hearing Confeſſions, was now taken away.

20. That Monks and Nuns, be not God-fathers nor God-mothers.

21. That Monks hold no Lands in Farm.

22. That they take no Churches unleſs by the Biſhops Conſent; and that they may not alienate the Revenues of ſuch as are given them, ſo that the Prieſts ſerving in thoſe Cures, may be provided with Neceſſaries.

This is to be underſtood of ſuch Churches whoſe Advowſons belonged to their own Monaſteries; yet of theſe they were to take Inſtitution from the Biſhop.

23. That

23. That Vows of Mariage pledged ſecretly, and without Witneſſes betwixt Man and Woman be of no effect, if either party do deny them. Anno Dom. MCII.

24. That ſuch as * wore long Hair be ſo polled, that part of their Ears may appear, and their Eyes be not covered. * Criniti.

This the Church then thought it had cogniſance of, as being contrary to the dictates of * St. Paul. * 1 Cor. 11. 14.

This Faſhion having very much prevailed in the laſt King's Reign, was come to that height, that the ſame † Author tells us, the young Gentlemen of the Court uſed to wear their Hair very long, and daily combed out like Women; which Archbiſhop Anſelm not enduring, when ſeveral of thoſe Gallants came on Aſh-wedneſday to hear his Maſs, he refuſed to ſprinkle aſhes on them, or to give them Abſolution, unleſs they would cut off their Hair; whereupon a good many of them did: but it ſeems this faſhion could not ſuddenly be rooted out, and therefore this Decree was now made againſt it, and yet all to little purpoſe (as you will ſee anon) till the King himſelf reformed it by his own example. † Eadmerus.

24. That Parties akin to the Seventh Generation be not Coupled in Mariage, and that Perſons ſo Coupled remain not in that ſtate; and if any be privy to this Inceſt, without declaring it, he ſhall be accounted guilty of the ſame crime.

26. That the Bodies of the Dead be not carried to be buried out of their own Pariſhes, leſt the Pariſh Prieſt ſhould loſe his Dues.

From whence we may gather the Reaſon, why Parſons now a days demand their Fees for the Burial of ſuch as die within their Pariſhes, tho' carried to be Interr'd elſe where.

27. That none out of a raſh deſire of Novelty pay any Reverence to any dead Bodies, Fountains, or other things without Authority from the Biſhops.

Where you may obſerve, that this Superſtition of paying Religious Worſhip to Bodies of pretended Saints was unlawful without the Biſhop's Licenſes.

28. That none preſume hereafter to ſell Men like Brute-beaſts; a thing which hath hitherto been too much uſed.

From which time we do not read of the publick Sale of Slaves, which before was frequently practiſed.

29. That the Sin of Sodomy both in Clergy and Laiety ſhould be puniſhed with heavy Cenſures, until by Pennance and Confeſſion they might deſerve Abſolution.

And it was Decreed, That if a Perſon in Holy Orders were found guilty of it, he ſhould be deprived, and advanced no higher; but a Lay-Gentleman and Nobleman was to be degraded from his Dignity.

And it was likewiſe Ordained, That the ſaid Excommunication ſhould be renewed every Lord's-day through all England.

But this was alſo diſpenſed with by Archbiſhop Anſelm's Order, which ſhews how general this Horrid Sin was then in England, and the ſmallneſs of the puniſhment that was ordained for it.

Theſe were the Decrees of this Council, which now broke up.

But it is high time to return to Civil Affairs.

This

Anno Dom. MCIII.

This [2.] Year Duke Robert came again out of Normandy to visit the King his Brother, and then out of Kindness and Generosity, or (as others report) at the request of his Sister-in-law, Queen Mathilda, he also remitted the Pension of Three thousand Marks, which the King was to pay him, according to the late Agreement between them.

[2.] C. S. Duke Robert comes into England, and the 3000. Mark's Pension he was to have from hence.

[3.] Not long after the Duke's coming over, the old Quarrel between the King and the Archbishop about Investitures was again revived, upon the Archbishop's refusing to Consecrate those Bishops the King had nominated: Whereupon the King commanded Gerard Archbishop of York to Consecrate those on whom he had before bestowed the Investitures of the Bishopricks, (viz.) William Gifford Bishop Elect of Wincheſter, and Roger Bishop Elect of Sarum; but as for Renelm Bishop Elect of Hereford, he repenting of what he had done, returned the King the Pastoral Staff and Ring; upon this, when the Archbishop of York was just ready to Consecrate the two other Bishops, William Elect of Wincheſter also would not consent to be Consecrated by him, as not being his Metropolitan; and being thereof accused before the King, and having endured many threatnings about it, he still obstinately refused to obey his Commands; whereupon he was bereaved of his Goods, and Banished the Kingdom, which begot such a Division among these Bishops of the King's making, that now there were not any Bishops Consecrated at all.

[3.] Eadm. p. 69. The old Quarrel between the King and the Archbishop about Investitures is again revived.

[4.] Then about Mid-lent following the King went down to Dover, in order to treat with the Earl of Flanders about some weighty Affairs; and taking Canterbury in his way, stay'd there for three days, and from thence sent Messengers to the Archbishop, admonishing him to observe the Antient Customs of his Kingdom, and not provoke him to Execute against him according to the utmost of his Power. To which the Archbishop answered, That the Messengers he had sent to Rome concerning the Message lately brought by the Bishops, were now return'd, and had brought Letters along with them, attesting the truth, which he desired might be opened, to see whether there were any thing in them that might persuade him to yield to the King's will: But to this the King reply'd, That he would endure no farther delays, but expected his final resolution in this matter; for what had the Pope to do with his Affairs? Did not whatsoever his Predecessors had enjoy'd, belong to him? therefore whoever would take it from him, was his Enemy. To which the Archbishop protested, that his design was not to take away any thing which belonged to the King, yet he should know that for his Life he could not consent to those things which he had heard forbidden in the Council at Rome, unless he could receive a Dispensation from the same See from whence they had received their Sanction. Upon this many Messages passing to and fro between them, the King at last meeting the Archbishop himself, spoke to him very calmly, and desired him with many Entreaties to go to Rome in Person, and that he would endeavour to procure for him what others could not obtain, lest losing the Antient Rights of his Predecessors, he should appear inferiour to them. Then the Archbishop perceiving whither these things tended, desired that all might be defer'd till Easter, that the chief Men of the Kingdom being met in Council, he might there give his Answer, and so they parted for the present upon pretty good Terms.

Anno Dom. MCIII.

[5.] Therefore when the Archbiſhop came to the Court at Eaſter, he conſulted the * Nobility of the Kingdom upon the preſent Affair, and then received the General Vote of the Common Council, that " it was very fitting, for the ſake of ſo weighty a Buſineſs, that he " ſhould not refuſe the trouble of ſo long a Journey; to which the " Archbiſhop replyed, Since they all agreed in that opinion, tho' he " were weak in Body, and on the confines of old Age, yet he would " undertake the Voyage and go to Rome, as they adviſed, as God " gave him ſtrength; yet they muſt know, that if ever he came to " the Pope's Preſence he ſhould not deſire him to do any thing at his " requeſt, which might be contrary to the Liberty of the Church, or " his own honeſty. They then reply'd, That the King would ſend his Ambaſſadour along with him, who was to repreſent the whole matter to the Pope, ſo that the Archbiſhop was to do no more than atteſt thoſe things to be true, which he ſhould ſay. The Archbiſhop's anſwer to this was ſhort, (viz.) That what he had already ſaid he now repeated, that by God's help he would never contradict any Man ſo long as he ſpoke the truth.

[5.] Idem Ib.
* Ingenuitas Regni.
The Nobility of England deſire Anſelm to go to Rome.

[1.] The Feaſt of Eaſter being over, Anſelm left the Court, reſolving to haſten his Departure out of England, for he was much concern'd that the King would neither by himſelf, nor any of his Miniſters let him know the Contents of the Letters lately brought from Rome, which however ſome believed he did, becauſe he ſeem'd already to underſtand the ſubſtance of them; for one of thoſe whom Anſelm had ſent to Rome might have acquainted him therewith. Whereupon the Archbiſhop got himſelf ready to begin his Journey with all the ſpeed he could, leſt by Communicating with thoſe who were Excommunicated, he himſelf might be involved in the ſame crime, and arriving at Canterbury, he ſtayed there about four days, and having beſtowed his Benediction upon the Monks, Citizens, and thoſe multitudes of People that flock'd to take their leaves of him, he went to the Sea-ſide, and there embarking (with the King's approbation) Landed at Witſands, and went by Boloign into Normandy, where he made his Reſidence for ſome time at the Abbey of Bec.

[1.] Idem Ib.
The Archbiſh. reſolves upon the Journey, and takes his Leave.

So ſoon as he came thither, he opened the Pope's Letters, which, tho' he had before received them, he had deferred peruſing till now, for fear the King ſhould have required them to be read; and then finding their Seals already broken, might have had ſome pretence to deny their Authority; but as for the Letters themſelves you may find them at large in Eadmerus; the ſubſtance of which is, that the Pope there utterly denies, whatſoever the Biſhops that came from Rome had ſaid, concerning his being willing to connive at the King's granting the Inveſtiture of Churches, or that he would not Excommunicate him for it, and informs the Archbiſhop, that, it ſeems, the Biſhops had made him ſay thoſe things which he had never ſo much as thought of before. The reſt containing his Reaſons, why no Lay-men ought to confer the Paſtoral Staff and Ring, for if they did, that the Chriſtian Religion would be trampled upon, &c. I omit, as not material enough to be here related.

The Archbiſhop arriving in Normandy, opens the Pope's Letters.

Yet I cannot but take notice, that ſome things in this Tranſaction ſeem very myſterious: Firſt, that the King, who ſent two Biſhops as his Ambaſſadours on purpoſe to Rome, ſhould not from them have received a full Account of the Pope's Determination in this Affair, but that he muſt have it at ſecond hand from the Archbiſhop's Meſſengers; Next, what ſhould make ſo quick-ſighted a Prince as King Henry, ſo earneſt to ſend the Archbiſhop himſelf to Rome, to mediate for him in an Affair, to which he could not but be ſenſible that he was in his own opinion wholly averſe.

But before we leave this Year, and return to Civil Affairs, it is fit we give you a ſhort account, what ſucceſs the Buſineſs (about which Archbiſhop Anſelm went) met with in the Pope's Court.

[2.] Idem. P. 72.

The Archbiſhop comes to Rome, and there finds the King's Ambaſſadour.

They both receive Audience of the Pope, and what paſſed there.

The [2.] Archbiſhop having paſſed the Summer heats at the Abbey of Bec, about the end of Auguſt began his Journey for Rome, where he found William de Warelwaſt, the King's Ambaſſadour (who had been formerly ſent thither by William Rufus on the like Errand) already arrived; the Archbiſhop being very kindly received by the Pope, within a few days after his coming had an Audience of him together with William Warelwaſt aboveſaid, who uſed all his Intereſt as well as Rhetorick, to perſwade the Pope to confirm to his Maſter the Antient Rights and Uſages of his Predeceſſors; ſince otherwiſe, as the King of England had been very kind and bountiful to the Apoſto-See, ſo it would prove a thing of fatal conſequence, ſhould the Pope go about to deprive him of his Antient Rights.

[3.] Idem. P. 73.

The Pope's ſturdy Reply to the Ambaſſadour's Remonſtrance.

[3.] Then the Ambaſſadour preſuming on the great Intereſt he ſuppoſed he had already made in the Roman Court, and that the Pope could deny him nothing he deſired, broke out into this Expreſſion, That whatever may be thought to the contrary, the King his Maſter would not for his Kingdom ſuffer himſelf to loſe the Inveſtiture of Churches. Then the Pope interrupting him, anſwered ſharply, tho' in few words: If, as you ſay, your King would not for his Kingdom loſe the Inveſtiture of Churches, you muſt then know, that whilſt Paſchal is Pope, (were it to ſave your King's life) he will never permit him ever quietly to enjoy it. At which poſitive Anſwer of the Pope, the King's Ambaſſadour was much confounded, eſpecially when he perceived all the Cardinals to applaud his Holyneſs for it.

[4.] Idem Ib.

[5.] Idem Ib.

The Pope forbids all Lay-Inveſtitures, and orders all Biſhops who had receiv'd them to remain Excommunicated.

And [4.] as for Archbiſhop Anſelm, he was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he did not ſo much as interpoſe the leaſt word on the King's behalf. [5.] Whereupon the Pope again abſolutely forbad all Lay-Inveſtitures of Churches, and tho' he left the King free from the Sentence of Excommunication for ſome time, yet all thoſe Biſhops who had already received any ſuch Inveſtitures at his hands, were ſtill to lye under it, until they had acknowledged their crime, and made the Church ſatisfaction. And further, left the Parties already ſo Inveſted to the Judgment and Cenſure of the Archbiſhop, who having met with all the ſucceſs in this Buſineſs which he could well deſire, and having likewiſe received the Pope's Letters containing a confirmation of the Power and Preheminence of the See of Canterbury above that of York, and having had his Audience of Leave from the Pope, he departed Rome in Company with the King's Ambaſſadour, by whom alſo the Pope ſent a Letter to the King, wherein he again declared, That he could by no means conſent to his conferring Inveſtitures, it being contrary (as he alledged) to the Word of God.

The Archbiſhop having done his Buſineſs, takes leave of the Pope.

[1.] And

Anno Dom. MCIII.

[1.] And now the Archbiſhop and the Ambaſſadour travelled together till they came near Lyons, and there the latter took his leave of him, being to return ſpeedily for England; but before his Departure he told him the King's Meſſage, which he had till then concealed, (viz.) "If he would carry himſelf towards the King as his Predeceſ-"ſors had done towards his Anceſtors, he ſhould then deſire his Com-"pany in England, otherwiſe not. And thereupon the Archbiſhop asking him, Whither he had any thing more to ſay? He replyed, "I "ſpeak to a prudent Man, and I need ſay no more. To which the "Archbiſhop returned, I underſtand what you ſay, and take it accordingly. And finding by this Diſcourſe, that he ſhould not be welcome in England, he went to Lyons, and there remained with the Archbiſhop of that Place. From thence he ſent Letters to acquaint the King with the Pope's Final Determination concerning the Buſineſs he had gone about, and then repeating the Meſſage which had been delivered to him by William Warelwaſt, he returned this Anſwer to it, That he "could not continue with the King upon the ſame Terms as his Pre-"deceſſors had done, for he could now neither do him Homage, nor "yet communicate with thoſe who had received Inveſtitures from "his hands, becauſe of the Church's late Prohibition to the contrary; "therefore humbly deſired to know the King's pleaſure, whither he "might return into England upon the Terms he had propoſed, for he "was ſtill ready to do his Duty to the King, and the People com-"mitted to his charge; but if he might not, and that any damage "ſhould happen thereby to Men's Souls, he hoped it would not lye "at his door.

[1.] Idem. P. 75. Returns back with the King's Ambaſſadour, but by the way is forbid to go into England, unleſs he would comply with the King.

[2.] The Archbiſhop having ſent away theſe Letters, tarried at Lyons waiting the King's Anſwer; but when William the late Ambaſſadour arrived in England, and had given him an account of the whole Affair, he without any more ado commanded the Rents of the Archbiſhoprick to be ſeized to his own uſe, yet appointed two of the Archbiſhop's Tenants to receive them, that ſo there might be the leſs oppreſſion uſed in the collecting of them: But I will leave this matter for a time, and now return to the Secular.

[2.] Idem. Lib. 6. P. 76. The Archbiſhop thereupon writes to the King.

Anno Dom. MCIV.

[3.] This Year produced little Alterations in England, only William Earl of Mortaigne, the King's Couſin, (viz. Son to Count Robert the King's half Uncle) was diſſeized of all his Honours and Eſtate in England, upon this occaſion; [4.] he had been under-hand a favourer of the Rebellion of Robert de Beleſme, (tho' it was not then known to the King) and alſo not being contented with two Earldoms, that of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England; upon the late Invaſion of the Norman Duke, he had alſo ſued to the King for the Earldom of Kent, which Biſhop Odo his Uncle had before enjoyed; but he was then for that time put off by the King's prudent Anſwer; but thoſe ſtorms being blown over, and peace now happily ſettled, the King did not only deny his Requeſt, but alſo began to challenge whatſoever he had illegally uſurped; yet it was done by Judicial Proceſs, leſt he ſhould ſeem to act any thing contrary to Law; upon which Earl William being caſt by the Judgment of the King's Court, he ſo highly reſented it, that he went over into Normandy, where beſides the aſſaults which he committed upon the King's Caſtles there, he alſo invaded and took away by force ſome Lands belonging to Hugh Earl of of Cheſter, being then a Minor under the King's Tutelage; and thus the Counts Robert and William (above mention'd) became the Heads of two ſeveral Factions, who together with divers others (whom for ſome reaſons our Author will not name) became the Principal Inciters of Rebellion, and every where Plagued their Native Country with continual Devaſtations, whilſt the Injured People made frequent complaints of their violence to the Duke, but all in vain; for tho' he was ſomewhat concerned at it, yet fearing leſt theſe Noblemen, when once ptovoked, ſhould joyn together and diſturb his eaſe, he winked at all their Exorbitancies.

[5.] P. 812. The remiſs Government of Duke Robert occaſions many miſchiefs to Normandy.

But [5.] Ordericus Vitalis farther adds more particularly (what our Engliſh Hiſtorians have omitted) that this careleſs Duke having pawned and imbezelled the greateſt part of the Revenues of his Dutchy, even to the City of Roüen it ſelf, and ſeeing the deſolation of his Country, and his own Inability to defend it againſt the Inſolence of Robert de Beleſme, without the advice or Privity of the King his Brother, he made Peace with him, who was his utter Enemy; but Serlo Biſhop of Seez, and Ralph Abbot of the ſame place, not being willing to lye expoſed to the Tyrannical Power of Robert, after they had Excommunicated him for his former Violences, they departed from that City, and fled into England to King Henry, who received them very kindly.

[1.] Idem. P. 813. King Henry is deſired by many of the Normans to come over and redreſs them, which he complies with.

Not [1.] long after which many of the Norman Nobility both of the Clergy and Laiety, reflecting upon the Miſeries of their Church and Country, Petitioned King Henry to come over, and take both into his protection, and to correct thoſe Prophane Robbers with the Rod of his Juſtice; accordingly he paſſed into Normandy with a great Fleet, and viſited Damfront and other Towns ſubject to him, and was very Honourably received by his own Great Men, and alſo magnificently preſented by thoſe belonging to the Duke his Brother; then Robert Earl of Mellent, and Richard Earl of Cheſter, with ſeveral Norman Earls and Barons (too many to be particularly ſet down here, and thoſe that are curious may ſee their Names in our Author) who all held Great Eſtates in England, upon the King's Arrival in Normandy, did alſo adhere to him, together with their Tenants and Dependants, and were ready to fight for him even againſt their own Country-men the Normans: A few days after this, the King ſent to his Brother for an Interview, and when they met, he then gently reproved him for breaking the Accord concluded between them in England, by making Peace with Robert de Beleſme (a Traytor to them both) and reſtoring him to his Father's Eſtate, as alſo for many other things unkindly done on his part. Then the Duke fearing his Brother's power, deſired his Friendſhip, and they being again outwardly reconciled, the King before Winter returned into England.

[2.] Idem. P. 814. As ſoon as the King is gone back, a freſh Rebellion breaks out there.

But [2.] no ſooner was he gone, but Robert de Beleſme with his Nephew, William Earl of Mortaigne, and as many Nobles as they could ſeduce to their Party, broke out again into open War, and falling upon ſuch as favoured the King, ſeized their Lands, killed their Tenants, and burn'd their Houſes; ſo that the Ploughmen and ordinary People fled into France with their Wives and Children, and ſuffer'd Great Miſeries during their abode there; in the midſt of theſe troubles the Normans applied themſelves anew to the King of England for Succour and Relief.

He

Anno Dom. MCV.

He having kept [3.] his Chriſtmaſs at Windſor, there received their Addreſſes and Complaints, and ſeeming much concern'd at them, he not long after took Shipping, and [4.] the laſt Week of Lent Landed again at Barbefleet (now Barfleur) in Normandy, and on Eaſter-day was at Carenton, ſeated on the River Vire, where Serlo the Biſhop of Sees came to him and offer'd his ſervice; then going with the King into the Church of Carenton to celebrate the Solemnity of Eaſter, they found it almoſt filled with the Cheſts and other Moveables of the Country People, which was brought thither as to a place of ſafety; upon which ſad ſpectacle he in an harangue to the King, laid open the Miſeries of that Country, and ſhewed him what ſhift the poor People were forced to make to ſecure themſelves from Robberies and Plunders, and that it was for want of a good courageous Prince and Governour that theſe things had happened to them; likewiſe laying open all the Vices and Failings of Duke Robert, he exhorted the King that by the Sword of Juſtice he would recover and defend that Dutchy. The King inflamed by this Speech, and by what he heard from the Noblemen that were with him, immediately conſented by their aſſiſtance to procure the Peace and quiet of the Church and State, then in ſo much danger; whereupon the Earl of Mellent by the direction of all the Great Men there preſent, adviſed and urged him immediately to put in Execution what he had reſolved.

[4.] O. V. P. 815.
The King, upon the freſh Addreſſes of the Norman Nobility, returns again thither.
The Biſhop of Sees makes a Speech to the King.

But [5.] before they made any farther progreſs in this Affair, the Biſhop laid hold of this opportunity to put in practice a ſmall point of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; the Norman Nobility (as I have told you) then wore very long Hair, and uſed much art in preſerving and making it (as was then thought) Ornamental, when this Eloquent Prelate (ſays our Hiſtorian) continuing his Oration enveigh'd mightily againſt that (then ſuppoſed) vice, admoniſhing and exhorting the King to ſhew a good Example to others, and ſuffer his own Hair to be firſt cut off; to which he preſently ſubmitting, the Biſhop as preſently drew a pair of Sciſſors out of his Sleeve, and firſt polled the King, and then the Earl of Mellent, and ſeveral Noblemen with his own hands; upon which the reſt of the People, fearing the King's Edict came from all parts, and ſtrove who ſhould be thus polled, or clipt.

[5.] Idem. P. 815.
The Biſhop's Artifice to make the King and the Lay-Nobility cut off their Hair.

Whence we may obſerve that the Examples of Princes, are much more prevalent than their Laws; for tho' this ſuppoſed ſin of long Hair had been often endeavoured to be reformed by Law in this King's, as well as in his Brother's Reign, yet they all proved ineffectual, till the King himſelf not only reſolved to obſerve it, but made all others that belonged to his Court to follow his Example.

After [1.] Eaſter the King ſent Ambaſſadors to Philip King of France, and invited Geoffrey Earl of Anjou to his Aſſiſtance, and by that means ſeverely chaſtized thoſe that prey'd upon the Goods of Churchmen.

[1.] Idem. Ib.
The King ſends Ambaſſadours to King Philip.

King [2.] Henry was now reſolved to make himſelf ſole Lord of Normandy, deſigning wholly to take it from his Brother Robert; and to this end hired more Forces of Elias Earl of Main, and Beſieged the City Bayeux, of which one Gunter Dauney was Governour, who went out to the King, and put into his hands Robert Fitz-Haimon, whom he had lately taken Priſoner; but yet he would not (though I know not for what what reaſon) ſurrender the City to him; whereupon the King forthwith aſſaulted it, ſet it on fire, burnt it (with the Cathedral Church) almoſt to the Ground, and took the Governour and Gariſon Priſoners; at which ſharp proceeding the Inhabitants of other places were ſo much affrightned, that the People of Caën (when the King marched againſt them) ſent to him and yielded to his Terms, expelling Engeran Fitz-Ilbert their Governour, and received the King's Gariſon: for this Service He beſtowed on four of the chief Citizens of Caën, the Mannour of Dallington in England, worth fourſcore Pounds per Annum Rent; from hence he proceeded to Falais, but could not take it, becauſe Count Elias would aſſiſt him no further, but returned home; yet there was an Aſſault given to the place in which he loſt many Men whom he much valued, as Roger of Glouceſter a Valiant Knight was ſlain, by a ſhot from a Croſs-bow. But the Reader may obſerve, that altho' the Printed Copies of Ordericus Vitalis place theſe Actions under the next year, viz. 1106. yet it is a miſtake, and they ſhould be put under this, for the King went not over into Normandy the next Spring (as this Author places it) but in this; and the year following he did not arrive there until the latter end of July, as you will find in the Saxon Chronicle, as alſo in Florence of Worceſter, Authors beyond exception, and tho' Co-temporaries with this Writer, yet are more curious in their Chronology, albeit his Relation of theſe matters of Fact is the moſt exact of any we have.

Yet thus much is certain, that the King this Year (as all our Authors agree) having taken Bayeux by force, and Caën by Compoſition, beſides many other Caſtles and ſtrong Places that were Surrendered to him, [3.] returned into England Victorious, in the end of Autumn, in order to Renew the War the next Campagne, being not able to finiſh his Conqueſts in this, for want of Money, which he went over on purpoſe to raiſe; in the mean time the Earl of Mortaigne did not fail to do the King all the miſchief he could during his abſence.

This is the Account the Norman Hiſtorians do give of the occaſion and beginnings of this War, being very much to the King's Advantage; to which [4.] William of Malmesbury likewiſe adds, that as well for his Brother's Reputation, as for the Sufferings of Normandy, he could no longer endure that wicked Men ſhould maintain their own Luxury with the Eſtates of the Poor, and therefore he firſt ſent for his Brother into England, and there admoniſhed him with gentle words, That he ſhould Act like a Duke, and not like a Monk: And that ſince the King himſelf had before taken from Earl William (the chief Inciter of theſe Troubles) all his Eſtate in England, and razed his Caſtles to the Ground, and that Duke Robert had notwithſtanding made Peace with him, who was the Common Enemy of his Country, therefore the King thought it high time to correct his Injuſtice and Partiality, yet was divided within himſelf for a while, whither he ſhould lay aſide all Brotherly Relation, and deliver his Country from ſo eminent a danger as it was then in, or elſe ſhould prefer the Natural affection to his Brother before it. Yet at laſt the Common Good prevailed over his private Inclinations, which was alſo furthered by Pope Paſchal's Exhortatory Letters, exciting him thereto; wherein he aſſerted, That it could not be reckoned an unjuſt War, but a commendable mendable Benefit to relieve his Country, which was then in ſuch a confuſion. Whereupon the King paſſed over into Normandy, and there acted as you have already heard. Anno Dom. MCV.

But moſt of our Engliſh Writers give us no better Reaſons for this War, than the King's Ambition, as if he deſired to make uſe of the opportunity of the preſent diſturbances in Normandy, only to Conquer that Dutchy for himſelf; and that as ſoon as he arrived, almoſt all the Great Men of that Country, deſpiſing their own natural Duke for his too great Lenity and careleſneſs, ran after the Gold and Silver the King had brought over with him, which he ſo well beſtowed, that they eaſily betrayed the Caſtles and Fortified Towns which had been committed to their Charge; and that thus King Henry Sacrificed his Brother to his own Ambition under the ſpecious pretence of the publick good of his Country. How moſt of our Engliſh Hiſtorians repreſent this Action of King Henry's.

But it is very hard for a Writer (unleſs he knows it himſelf) poſitively to determine on what motives Princes have acted, eſpecially at ſuch a diſtance of time, and perhaps a mixture of both cauſes here given might influence King Henry to make this Expedition.

Therefore having faithfully given you the ſeveral Accounts related by the Hiſtorians of the cauſes of this War, I ſhall leave them to the Reader to determine as he ſhall think fit. After the King's coming over there happened little conſiderable this Winter, [5.] only not long before Chriſtmaſs, Robert de Beleſme came over into England, but whither upon any Ambaſſy from Duke Robert, or elſe upon his own private account, to make his Peace with the King, they do not tell us; tho' the latter ſeems moſt likely, ſince the ſame Author ſays, that he again left the Kingdom about Chriſtmaſs following much diſpleaſed; and indeed it ſeems ſomewhat ſtrange, that the King ſhould permit a Man to ſtay here ſo long, againſt whom he had expreſſed ſo great an averſion. [5.] C. S. Robert de Beleſm comes over into England.

This [1.] Year was very calamitous in England, as well by reaſon of the great Dearth, as the many ſevere Taxes, which were levied not only before he went over, but alſo after his return home. [1.] Idem Ib. This Year very Calamitous to England.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs I cannot here omit, that this Summer, whilſt the King ſtayed in Normandy, [2.] he was in great part reconciled to Archbiſhop Anſelm, who was now returned thither from the farther parts of France; for a meeting being procured between the King and him, by the Interceſſion of his Siſter Adela, Counteſs of Blois, at the Caſtle of Aquila, he ſo far relaxed of his former ſeverity, that the Archbiſhop was again reſtored to the Profits of his Archbiſhoprick, and the King would have given him leave to return into England, if he would have promiſed not to withdraw himſelf from the Communion of thoſe Biſhops who had received the King's Inveſtiture, or of thoſe who had Conſecrated them; which he ſtill refuſing to accept of, reſolved to remain in Normandy, till the Meſſengers that were ſent to the Pope for his directions in that, as well as in ſome other Affairs, could again come back from Rome; and ſo the King for the preſent avoided the Excommunication, which was every where reported to be ready to iſſue out againſt him. [2.] Eadm. p. 80. The King is almoſt quite reconciled to Archbiſhop Anſelm, and thereby avoids the Excommunication with which he was threatned.

Yet ſo [3.] ſoon as he returned into England, that he might raiſe Money with greater Expedition, he ordered all the Prieſts to be impleaded in his Court for having Wives or Concubines, and to make them [3.] Idem. P. 83, 84. The King exacts Money from the Prieſts that kept either Wives, or Concubines.

Anno Dom. MCV. them pay ſoundly for that offence; but when very many were found innocent, and that the profit thereby expected was like to fall much ſhort of the Sum at which it was firſt rated, the King's Officers changed their Methods, and confounding the innocent with the guilty, Taxed all Pariſh Churches at a certain Rate, all Perſons being to redeem themſelves by the immediate payment of it, which when ſome refuſed, and others delayed to perform, many of them were caſt into Priſon; but the King coming to London in the height of this Exaction, near two hundred Prieſts in their Surplices went to Petition Him on their bare Feet to have pity upon them; but all to no purpoſe.

Anno Dom. MCVI. This [4.] Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Weſtminſter, and ſomewhat before Lent Duke Robert came over to viſit him, who was gone then to Northampton, deſiring to be reſtored to thoſe Places which had been lately taken from him in Normandy; but the King abſolutely refuſing it, the Duke returned back again much more exaſperated then he was before, and threaten'd to be revenged for all theſe injuries.

[4.] C. S. F. W. Duke Robert comes over into England, hoping to obtain his Brother's favour, and being repulſed, goes back more exaſperated.

[5.] Matthew Paris in his Relation of this Affair, makes King Henry to feel ſome remorſe of Conſcience for this unkind uſage of his Brother, and uſurping of his Kingdom, and alſo that he feared ſome ſudden Rebellion of his Subjects; yet that he rather feared Men, than God; whom he ſuppoſed he could appeaſe by building of an Abbey; all which depending on the Author's ſole Relation, and not being to be found in any Writer of that Age, I think ſhould rather be ſlighted as a malicious ſurmiſe, proceeding from the ill will the Monks bore to this King's memory. But this ſeems more certain from the ſame Author, that not long after Duke Robert's departure, the King called a Great Council at London, and there he brings him in making of a long Speech to them, "Enveighing againſt Duke Robert his Brother; and "that for refuſing the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, he was now forſaken "of God. Then ſetting forth his uneaſie temper, and contempt "of the Engliſh Nobility, as alſo his own humble and peaceable "diſpoſition and reſolution to maintain their Liberties, and the "Laws of King Edward; and that if he had but their affections, he va-"lued not any thing his Brother and all his Normans could do againſt "him: And with theſe fair Promiſes he ſo won their hearts, that they "declared they would live and die with him againſt any Enemy "whatever.

P. 61, 62.

The King after his Departure holds a Great Council at London, where he enveighs againſt his Brother.

From whence you may obſerve, that an Engliſh King, who has once gain'd the affections of his People, by the reſtoring and maintaining their Antient Liberties and Priviledges, needs not fear any foreign Powers, being ſtrong enough of himſelf to make an abſolute Conqueſt.

After this the King ſtayed in England moſt part of this Summer, keeping his Eaſter at Bathe, and his Whitſontide at Salisbury, becauſe he would not hold his Court or Great Council in Foreign Parts.

[1.] F. W. O. V. P. 818. Then [1.] about the end of July (as our Writers place it) the King paſſed over again into Normandy with the Principal Nobility of the Kingdom; where upon his arrival moſt of the chief Men of that Country ſubmitted themſelves to him, except Robert de Beleſme, and William Earl of Mortaigne, with ſome other Barons who ſtill held firm to Duke Robert.

The King paſſes again into Normandy, where moſt of the Great Men ſubmit to him.

Not

Not long after the King built a Fort near the Town of Tenerchebray (now called Tinchebray) and put a Garison into it, with intention so to streighten it, as to make it yield; but the Earl of Mortaigne with some Companies of Soldiers relieved it, at which the King being much incensed, assembled his Army, and laid Siege to the Town; whereupon the said Earl sollicited Duke Robert, and Robert de Belesme, and others for their assistance, to raise the Siege, and obtain'd it; for there immediately marched along with the Duke, (besides the two Great Earls last mentioned) Robert de Stuteville, and William de Ferrars, with many other Noblemen, and indeed all the Forces the Duke could then muster together. The King had on his side William Earl of Eureux, Robert Earl of Mellent, William Earl of Warren, with divers other Barons, most of whom had Estates both in Normandy and England. And tho' the King had a greater number of Horse in his Army; yet the Duke had many more Foot; so before this Town they came to a Battel, which was very sharply fought on both sides, till at last the Duke's Army was totally routed, with very small loss on the King's part. There were taken Prisoners at this Battel, the Duke of Normandy, and the Earl of Mortaigne; and of Norman Barons, William Crispin, William Ferrars, Robert Stuteville the Elder, and many others, to the number of Four hundred Knights, or Horsemen, and Ten thousand Foot; so that upon this Great Victory all Normandy Surrendered it self to the King, as appears by a Letter, which he then wrote to Archbishop Anselm on that Subject, as you will find in [2.] Eadmerus; for the Archbishop had not long before returned into England after more than three years absence, all differences between the King and him having been fully composed at a meeting they lately had at the Abbey of Bec.

Anno Dom. MCVI.

The Great Battel of Tenchebray, where Duke Robert with divers Barons are taken Prisoners.

Whereupon all Normandy submits to the King.

[2.] P. 90.

I have been the more particular in this great Battel between the King and his Brother, because it was fought on Michaelmas Eve, near that time forty years, that the Battel of Hastings had been gained before, and as the Norman Duke then subdued an English King, and thereby obtained this Kingdom; so now an English King (by the assistance of his English Subjects) now Conquered Normandy, which from that time was held by the King's of England, (except for some part of King Stephen's Reign) till Philip (Sirnamed Augustus,) King of France took it from King John, by the same means by which it was at first acquired.

The [3.] King notwithstanding this great Success was so far from claiming Normandy as a Conquerour, that calling a Great Council at Lisieux of all the Great Men of Normandy, it was then decreed, That for the future a firm Peace should be establish'd throughout all that Dutchy; so that all Plunderings, Robberies, forcible Entries, and Warlike Invasions upon Men's Estates being suppressed, the Churches as well as private Subjects should enjoy their Possessions in Peace, as they did the day his Father died.

[3.] O. V. P. 822. The King does not claim that Province as a Conquerour, but settles it by a Council of the Estates.

He then also took into his own Possession all his Father's Lands and Lordships, which his Brother had Sold, or squandered away, and by the Judgment of his Great and wise Men made all those Grants void, which had been imprudently bestowed upon undeserving Persons.

Anno Dom. MCVI.

As for the Priſoners taken in this Battel, [4.] he ſent Duke Robert his Brother, William Earl of Mortaigne, Robert de Stuteveille, and ſome others into England, where they were kept perpetual Priſoners, notwithſtanding all the Interceſſion and Promiſes made on their behalfs for their Releaſes; for the King wiſely truſted more to the ſtrong Caſtles wherein they were kept, than to the frail and uncertain engagements of thoſe who had always ſhew'd themſelves his Enemies.

[4.] Eadm. p. 90. R. H. The King ſends Duke Robert, and the Earl of Mortaigne Priſoners into England.

Our Saxons Annals alſo inform us, that Edgar Atheling being taken Priſoner at the Battel, was by the King preſently ſet at liberty, whither out of love or contempt I will not determine; but it is certain he lived all the reſt of his days at home in Peace.

But ſince we find no farther mention of this Prince in any of our Annals or Hiſtories, I ſhall here give you [5.] William of Malmeſbury's Character of him, viz. "That being contemned at Court for his eaſineſs "and ſimplicity, which (he thinks) muſt needs be great, ſince he "remitted to the King a Pound-weight of Silver (being his daily "allowance) for a Horſe in his younger years. He went to Jeruſalem (as hath been already declared) and having loſt all his Men in his return, received great favours from both the Greek and German Emperors, who, becauſe of the Nobleneſs of his Birth, would have allowed him an Honourable maintenance, but he refuſed it, out of too fond a love to his native ſoil; to which being returned at laſt, and having been often made the ſport of Fortune; He had (when our * Author wrote this) retired from Court, and paſſed his old age privately in the Country, without ever being Married, as we can find.

[5.] Ib. p. 89.

* Viz. About the middle or latter end of K. Henry the Firſt's Reign.

As for [1.] Robert de Beleſme, the King's mortal Enemy, he eſcaped by flight out of this Battle, and when he ſaw he could raiſe no more diſturbances, he at laſt made his Peace with the King, and was for a time reſtored to all his Paternal Eſtate, which he again forfeited by a new Treaſon, as you will find hereafter.

[1.] Idem. O. U. P. 823.

The [2.] King having thus ſubdued Normandy, and ſettled it in Peace, by the good Laws he made in ſeveral Aſſemblies of the Eſtates of that Dutchy, return'd into England in the Lent of the enſuing Year.

[2.] Idem Ib.

Anno Dom. MCVII.

But almoſt ſo ſoon as he arrived, [3.] He held a * Council of all the chief Men in the Kingdom at Windſor; yet nevertheleſs he delayed to diſpoſe of all the vacant Churches as he intended, becauſe the Pope being arrived in France, was about to hold a General Council at Troys in Champagne, to which the King and the Archbiſhop had ſent William Warelwaſt, and Baldwin the Monk, as their Envoys, to know the Pope's pleaſure in ſome Points of Importance (I ſuppoſe concerning the Homages of Biſhops) that ſo the King might the more ſecurely diſpoſe of theſe Vacant Sees and Abbeys.

[3.] Eadm. p. 90. * Curia. The King returns into England, and there holds a Council of all the chief Men of the Kingdom.

Alſo in [4.] the beginning of the Month of Auguſt, the King again Summoned a Great Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Nobles of the Kingdom, at his Palace at Weſtminſter, which laſted three days, (Archbiſhop Anſelm being at firſt abſent by reaſon of a late Sickneſs) where the great Affair concerning the Inveſtiture of Churches was ſufficiently debated between the King and the Biſhops; ſome endeavour'd (tho' in vain) to have the King confer them, as his Father and Brother had done before, and not according to the Pope's late Decree; but tho' he continued firm as to the point of Inveſtitures, yet he granted to the King that he might receive the Homages of the Biſhops ſhops and Abbots, which Pope Urban had forbad as well as the other; yet this Pope was willing to yield the one, that ſo he might oblige the King the more eaſily to part with the other. Anno Dom. MCVII.

Towards the end of the Council, the Archbiſhop came thither, and then the King granted and ordained, (in the * preſence of the People) that for the future no Perſon ſhould be Inveſted in any Biſhoprick, either by himſelf, or any other Lay-hand, by the delivery of the Paſtoral Staff, or Ring; whereupon the Archbiſhop alſo conſented that no Perſon Elected to be a Prelate ſhould be refuſed Conſecration, becauſe of the Homage he had done to the King. Theſe matters now being thus ſettled, all the Biſhopricks and Abbeys which were then Vacant were filled up by the King, with the Council and conſent of Archbiſhop Anſelm, and the * chief Men of the Kingdom. [5.] Idem ib. * Aſſante multitudine. * Procerum Regni.

Then [1.] the Archbiſhop, before the King, Biſhops and Nobility of the Kingdom, began to demand of Gerard Archbiſhop of York, a Profeſſion of his Obedience and Subjection to him, which he had not yet made ſince the time that he had been Tranſlated from Hereford to York; but the King himſelf declared, he did not think it neceſſary for the Archbiſhop now to renew that Profeſſion he had formerly made when he was firſt Ordained Biſhop, ſince, tho' he had changed Sees, yet he was ſtill the ſame Perſon; with which Declaration of the King's Archbiſhop Anſelm ſeemed to be ſatisfied for the preſent, provided Gerard would give him his hand, and promiſe to obſerve the ſame Subjection to himſelf and his Succeſſors, that he had profeſſed when he was made a Biſhop, which accordingly was done; then it was alſo Ordained, That thoſe who for the future ſhould be Elected to any Biſhoprick ſhould go to Canterbury, and there receive their Conſecration, which was obſerved by all the Biſhops that were then Ordained. [2.] For about this time William Biſhop of Wincheſter, Roger of Saliſbury, and Reinelm of Hereford, as alſo William Warelwaſt (the late Ambaſſadour) being Elected Biſhop of Exceter, as Urban was of Landaffe, went all to Canterbury, and were there Conſecrated by that Archbiſhop; but this Law did not hold long, as you will find hereafter. [1.] Id. Ib. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury demands a new Profeſſion of Obedience from him of York. [2.] Idem. P. 92.

To return to Secular Affairs. Nothing remarkable happened this Year, [3.] except that Edgar King of Scotland deceaſed without Iſſue, and Alexander his Brother ſucceeded to him, being a Prince of a much more Warlike Genius. [3.] C. S. C. Mailros.

This Year the King at a Great Council, held either at [4.] Chriſtmaſs at Weſtminſter, or elſe at Wincheſter the Eaſter following, (our Author not aſſerting the Time or Place) by the advice of Archbiſhop Anſelm and the Noblemen of the Kingdom, he redreſſed ſeveral Grievances and evil practiſes, by which Poor Men where oppreſſed, and for example-ſake began with his own Court; for in the time of the King his Brother, thoſe who followed the Court had this evil Cuſtom, that in the King's Progreſs they ſpoiled and Plunder'd all things that came in their way, without any reſtraint, ſo that the Country was laid waſt where ever the King travelled; for which cauſe all People when they knew of the King's coming, left their Houſes, and carried away what Proviſions they could, ſheltering themſelves in the Woods, and other by-places; but King Henry reſolving fully to cure this Malady iſſued out a Proclamation, That who ever Anno Dom. MCVIII. [4.] Eadm. p. 94. The King calls another Council, wherein he redreſſes ſeveral Grievances of his Subjects.

Anno Dom. MCVIII.

ſpoiled any Goods of thoſe that entertain'd them, or abuſed their Perſons, ſhould, if proved, have their Eyes put out, or their Hands or Feet, or other Members cut off, which ſevere Juſtice being executed upon ſome, deterred others from the like Villanies.

[5.] Id. Ib. Alſo [5.] the bad ſtate of the Coyn did very much trouble the People, which the King took care to have remedied with that ſeverity, that none could ever be pardoned that was convicted of having Counterfeited any Money, but he certainly loſt his Eyes and Teſticles; and becauſe the ſmall Money, or Pence, being broke in pieces, were afterwards refuſed, he ordained that no * Penny, or Half-penny, ſhould be whole, which was a great help and benefit to the poor ſort of People.

* Note, that in theſe Times Pence were ſo Coyned with a Creaſe through them that they might be broken (when Men wanted Change) into four parts.

And in [1.] Eccleſiaſtical matters, becauſe he ſuppoſed the Divine Offices were not perform'd as they ought by the hands of ſuch Prieſts who ſtill kept their Wives and Concubines, notwithſtanding the late Decrees of the Council held at London, the King reſolving to make a further Reformation in this matter, conſulted with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Great Men of the Kingdom, when they met at London, at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, how he might cure this Evil by his Royal Authority; wherefore Anſelm, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Thomas, Archbiſhop Elect of York, and all the Biſhops of England, being again met in a Council or Synod, with the conſent of all the Barons, in the Preſence of King Henry Ordained anew.

[1.] Idem Ib.

Another Council held where ſeveral Decrees are made againſt Prieſt's Marying, or keeping Women in their Houſes.

1. That all Presbyters, Deacons, and Sub-Deacons, ſhould live chaſtly, and ſhould not keep any Woman in their Houſes unleſs they were near Relations.

2. That all thoſe above mentioned, who kept their Wives, after they were forbid by the Council of London, or ſhould take new ones, if they intended to perform their Functions, ſhould put them away, ſo that they ſhould not ſo much as come into their Houſes, nor into their Company, unleſs it were upon ſome Lawful occaſion, and then it was to be out of their own Houſes, in the preſence of two, or more Witneſſes.

3. But if any of thoſe above mentioned, were accuſed by two or three Lawful Witneſſes, or the Common Report of their Pariſhioners, that they had broken this Law, if ſuch a one were a Presbyter, he ſhould purge himſelf by ſix ſufficient Witneſſes of his own Order; but if he were a Deacon with four; if a Sub-Deacon with two; and if he ſhould be found wanting in this Purgation, he ſhould be Judged as a Tranſgreſſor of this Decree.

4. But thoſe Presbyters, who ſhould prefer their Wives before the Service of the Holy Altar, ſhould forthwith be removed from all * Eccleſiaſtical Office and Benefice, and not be admitted into the Choir, but be looked upon as infamous.

* Officio & Beneficio.

5. But he who like a Rebel againſt, and a Contemner of this Decrees, ſhould preſume to keep his Wife, or Concubine, and yet would ſtill ſay Maſs, ſhould be Excommunicated, if he refuſed to make ſatisfaction.

6. The ſame Sentence alſo was to extend to all Arch-Deacons, and Secular Chanons, concerning their leaving off Women, and avoiding their Converſation, and they to be under the ſame Cenſures, if they tranſgreſſed.

7. Alſo

7. Alſo all Arch-Deacons and Deans, ſhould ſwear that they would receive no Money for tolerating any Tranſgreſſion of this Law, nor ſhould ſuffer any Prieſt, whom they knew to keep a Woman, to Sing Maß, or to put in Curates; and the Arch-Deacon, or Dean, that ſhould refuſe thus to ſwear, ſhould loſe his Preferment. Anno Dom. MCVIII.

8. And ſuch Prieſts that would leave their Wives, and chuſe to ſerve at the Holy Altar, ſhould however forbear forty days from Executing their Functions, and have Vicars in the mean time to ſupply their Places, and ſhould undergo ſuch Pennance as the Biſhops ſhould think fit to enjoyn them.

I have been the more exact in ſetting down this Statute, becauſe it is the firſt made by all the Eſtates of the Kingdom, that forbids Prieſts keeping either Wives or Concubines: Theſe Canons which Eadmerus mentions to have been now made at London, having been before only Ordain'd by a Synod of the Biſhops and Clergy of Rome.

Alſo this Year [2.] Hervy Biſhop of Bangor, having been driven out by the Welſh, was now become Abbot of Ely, of which Abbey being deſirous to make a Biſhop's See, he not only obtain'd the good will of his Monks by fair Promiſes, but alſo procured the King's Charter, for the advancement of that Church to be a Cathedral; yet ſince that of Lincoln was thereby to loſe a great part of its Juriſdiction, and that without the conſent of Robert the then Biſhop, this change could not be effected, it was therefore agreed between them, that that Church ſhould enjoy the Manner of Spalding for ever, in exchange for the Epiſcopal Juriſdiction over all Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Ely.

[2.] Eadm. p. 96. The Abbey of Ely made a Biſhop's See by the King's Charter.

And becauſe the Pope's conſent was alſo neceſſary for ſo great an alteration, Archbiſhop Anſelm wrote Letters to him, ſetting forth, that ſince the King, Biſhops and Chief Men of England, nay, and the Biſhop of Lincoln himſelf, had all conſented, that this Dioceſs being too large for one Man's care, ſhould have a new Biſhoprick taken out of it, whoſe See was to be at the place above mentioned: Wherefore he in all their Names deſired the Pope's Confirmation of it; but tho' his Anſwer to the Archbiſhop concerning this Affair is not ſet down by Eadmerus, yet the Manuſcript Hiſtory of Ely hath given us the Pope's Letter to King Henry, (which was ſent by Biſhop Hervey himſelf) wherein his Holineſs conſents to this Alteration, and with it alſo grants a Bull to the ſame effect. But as for the Charter of King Henry, which is there alſo recited, Mr. Selden, I think, does deſervedly impeach it of Forgery, and that upon theſe accounts; firſt, that the year of Pope Paſchal is there expreſſed before that of the Reign of the King himſelf; and next, that this Charter bears date Anno Dom. 1108. as in the Tenth year of this King's Reign, and as if it had been after the death of Archbiſhop Anſelm; whereas the Year of our Lord above mentioned was not the tenth, but the eighth Year of this King's Reign; nor did Anſelm die till the Year following, as you will ſee by and by. But we have enough other inſtances of the like Monkiſh Forgeries, therefore to return to Civil Affairs.

[3.] Id. Ibid. The Pope's conſent alſo neceſſary, for which the Archbiſhop wrote Letters.

The King having ſettled his Affairs in England, [4.] at the beginning of Auguſt he paſſed over into Normandy upon the news of the death of Philip King of France, to whom [5.] Lewis his Son (an active young Prince) ſucceeding, he threaten'd to invade King Henry's Dominions.

[4.] C. S. The King goes into Normandy upon the Death of King Philip.

[5.] H. H.

But

Anno Dom. MCVIII.

But whilſt [1.] he was in Normandy ſettling all things according to his mind, he upon ſome freſh Jealouſie commanded his Nephew William, Son to his Brother Robert, (whom he had committed to the care of Elias de St. Sidon) to be taken into ſafe Cuſtody, and appointed Robert Beauchamp, Viſcount d'Arches to do it; but when he came to Elias's Caſtle, the young Prince had by the means of his Tutor already made his eſcape; then Elias his Governour carried him to the Court of the King of France, and divers other Princes to ſollicite for aid and aſſiſtance in his behalf, but all to no purpoſe, for tho' many of the Normans favoured him, as being a handſome Perſon, and one of good Natural Parts; and that Robert de Beleſme upon the ſcore of the affection he had for his Father, endeavoured all he could to ſet up his Son, yet none of them, either Prince or Subject, would preſume at that time to make War upon King Henry on his behalf; and what became of this young Prince afterwards, we ſhall ſee anon.

[1.] O. V. P. 838. The King commands his Nephew William to be committed to ſafe Cuſtody, who eſcapes.

There [2.] was alſo this Year renewed the old Quarrel between the two Churches of Canterbury and York, concerning their Priviledges; for Gerard Archbiſhop of York being lately Deceaſed, Thomas the King's Chaplain, and Provoſt of Beverley, was Elected in his ſtead; who had not only deferred his Conſecration, becauſe he was unwilling to make that Profeſſion of Obedience and Subjection to Archbiſhop Anſelm, as his Predeceſſor had done, but had been dealing under-hand with the Pope to obtain a Promiſe of his Pall before the Conſecration, which produced many angry Letters between Anſelm and him concerning that matter; the former preſſing his coming to Canterbury, there to receive his Conſecration with all ſpeed poſſible, and then to perform thoſe things, that he ought. [3.] But the King interpoſing by his Letters commanded Anſelm to defer the Conſecration of Archbiſhop Thomas, till the Eaſter following; and then before that time the former being much indiſpoſed died, as you will ſee farther the next Year; ſo that this Buſineſs remain'd ſtill undecided. I have put all this Tranſaction here together, tho' it did not happen all at one time.

[2.] Eadm. p. 97. The whole Quarrel between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York again renewed upon the choice of a new Archbiſhop.

[3.] Idem. P. 101. Archbiſhop Thomas his Conſecration.

Anno Dom. MCIX.

King [4.] Henry having paſſed all this Winter in Normandy, came over into England a little before Whitſontide, and held his Court (which was never more ſplendid than ordinary) at Weſtminſter. Henry the Fourth, Emperour of Germany, having ſent Ambaſſadours with a mighty Noble Retinue to the King, to deſire his Daughter Mathilda in Mariage, which was conſented to, and all the Articles agreed upon; and the King alſo received an Oath from the Emperour's Ambaſſadour to perform them. But the Princeſs her ſelf being very young, continued in England till the Year following.

[4.] C. S. M. P. P. 64. The Emperour Henry IV. ſends Ambaſſadors to the King deſiring his Daughter to Wife.

But during this Year nothing happen'd that was remarkable in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, only [5.] Anſelm the Archbiſhop of Canterbury his Death, on the Twenty ſecond of May in the Seventy ſixth year of his Age. He was certainly a Prelate of great Learning, Piety and ſtrictneſs of Life, but, being bred a Monk, was ſo exceſſively Bigotted to the See of Rome, that he did all he could to advance its Grandeur, which procur'd him many Troubles both in this, as well as the former King's Reign, and therefore that See in Gratitude has Canonized him for a Saint.

[5.] Eadm. p. 97. Archbiſhop Anſelm dies, and his Character.

But

Anno Dom. MCIX.

But [1.] tho' the Archbiſhop of York Elect was in hopes, that by the Deceaſe of Anſelm, he ſhould thereby avoid making his profeſſing Subjection to the See of Canterbury, yet he therein found himſelf much miſtaken; for at a great Council held at London, immediately after the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, the King conſulted with the Biſhops, and chief Men of the Kingdom, what was to be done concerning the Conſecration of the Elect of York, and ſome Debate ariſing about it, whither it ſhould be performed without his making the ſaid Profeſſion or not, it was at laſt agreed on by all the Biſhops there preſent, (Sampſon Biſhop of Worceſter, Father to the Archbiſhop Elect, firſt giving his Vote againſt him) that he ſhould not be Conſecrated without making that Profeſſion, this being reported to the King, he thereupon commanded the Antient Priviledges of the Papal See to the Church of Canterbury to be read before him, which when he had heard, and was fully ſatisfied about it, he thereupon commanded the Profeſſion, which Archbiſhop Thomas was to make, to be dictated and written in his own Preſence, and cloſe Sealed up with his Seal, and ſo be kept ſecret till the Conſecration, which was ſolemnly performed the Twenty eighth of June following in St. Paul's Church, by Richard Biſhop of London, and ſeveral other Biſhops; but before the Archbiſhop was Conſecrated, the aforeſaid Profeſſion of Obedience was opened, and required by the Biſhops to be read aloud by him, which was done accordingly; and when the Conſecration was over, was delivered by the Biſhop of London to the Prior of Canterbury, to be kept as a perpetual Memorial; the Form of which the curious Reader may ſee in [2.] Eadmerus in Latin, and in [3.] Dr. Brady's Hiſtory in Engliſh, Tranſlated from that Author. About [4.] the ſame time alſo Hervy late Biſhop of Bangor, and Elect of Ely, was Conſecrated Biſhop of that Place, for tho' all things in order to it were agreed upon the Year before, yet having been forced to go to Rome on purpoſe to obtain the Pope's conſent, he could not till now be ſettled in it, and that too not without many difficulties.

[1.] Idem. P. 103, 104. The Elect of York is forced to make his Profeſſion of Obedience to the See of Canterbury.

[2.] Ibid. [3.] P. 264. [4.] Id. Ib. New Biſhops alſo Conſecrated.

This [5.] Year affords us nothing more remarkable in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, than that the Prieſts were now again forbid the Company of their Wives, tho' many of them hoped that by the death of Archbiſhop Anſelm they might have found ſome Relaxation from that ſevere Law; yet the King impoſed it upon them more ſtrictly than ever, and made them ſubmit to it, whither they would or not.

[5.] Idem. P. 105. The Prieſts again forbad the Company of their Wives.

But [1.] tho' the King held the poor Prieſts under this ſevere Diſcipline, yet he intended to be free himſelf; for having been perplexed by the late Archbiſhop Anſelm, he reſolved not to have another in haſt, and therefore kept the See of Canterbury Vacant for above four Years after.

[1.] Idem. Ib.

The [2.] ſame Year in May appeared a terrible Comet near the Milky-way, having its Tayl toward the South, which was ſeen for three Weeks, and then diſappeared. There alſo happen'd a Great Earthquake at Shrewsbury, and the River of Trent near Nottingham ceaſed running from Morning till Three of the Clock in the Afternoon, ſo that Men paſſed over its Channel dry-ſhod.

[2.] Id. Ib. Several Prodigies in England.

I hope it will not be impertinent if I relate the Account which an Author of good Credit gives us, of the reſtitution of Learning at the Univerſity of Cambridge, which happened about this time, when

[3.] Joffrid

Anno Dom. MCIX.

[3.] Joffrid Abbot of Crowland ſent over to his Mannor of Cottenham nigh Cambridge, Giſlebert his fellow Monk, and Profeſſor of Divinity, with three other Monks, who had followed him into England, who being throughly furniſhed with Philoſophical Theorems, and other antient Sciences, repaired daily to Cambridge; and having hired a certain Barn, made open Profeſſion of them, and in a ſhort ſpace drew together a great Company of Scholars; but in the ſecond year after their coming their number grew ſo great, as well from out of the whole Country, as the Town, that not the biggeſt Houſe nor Barn there, nor any Church there ſufficed to contain them; whereupon theſe Monks dividing themſelves into ſeveral Places, and taking the Univerſity of Orleance for their Pattern, read to their Scholars apart in ſeveral Companies.

[3.] Pet. Bleſ. Contin. Hiſt. Ingulph. Rer. Ang. Scriptor. Vol. I. p. 114. The Revival of Learning at Cambridge.

I ſhall not trouble my ſelf or the Reader, how theſe ſorted their Scholars into the ſeveral Claſſes of Grammar, Rhetorick and Logick, but ſhall for that refer you to the Author for further ſatisfaction; only I muſt remark, that they made uſe of the beſt Authors; as for Rhetorick, Reading Lectures in Tully and Quintilian; and for Logick in Ariſtotle, with the Commentaries of Porphyry and Averroes. It is alſo worth obſerving, that Giſlebert (chief of theſe Monks) upon every Sunday and Holyday Preached God's Word unto the People, tho' he were but meanly skill'd in the Engliſh Tongue; this ſhews that however Preaching might afterwards grow out of faſhion, it was then accounted a duty by the Monks, tho' perhaps it was to ſhame the Secular Prieſts, who were extremely lazy and ignorant in that Age, as well as in after Times.

But that the Study of antient Learning then flouriſh'd at Oxford as well as at Cambridge, and that there were Publick Schools for the Teaching the Sciences I refer the Curious Ready to Anthony a Wood's Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Univerſity of Oxon under the Years 1109, and 1122.

Anno Dom. MCX.

The [4.] King having the Year before betroathed his Daughter to the Emperour (as you have already heard) ſent her now over to him a little before Lent with a Noble Retinue, and a vaſt Portion in ready Money, for which England was made to pay very dear; Three Shillings being laid upon every Hyde of Land throughout the whole Kingdom.

[4.] F. W. H. H. The King ſends over his Daughter to be Married to the Empeperour.

This ſerves to reconcile the difference between Florence and Henry Huntington on the one ſide, and the Saxon Chronicle, and Matt. Paris on the other, about the time of this Affair: the two former placing it under this, and the latter in the preceeding Year; but the truth is, the Emperour's Ambaſſadours came over the laſt Year to demand her, and then the Mariage was agreed upon, but they were not Affianced till her arrival in Germany this preſent Year (as is alſo expreſſed by Matt. Paris) nor was it conſummated till four Years after, the Princeſs it ſeems not being till then mature for it, as you will find anon.

[5.] Chron. of Robert of Gloceſter.

This [5.] Year alſo King Henry Married Robert his Natural Son to Maud Daughter and Heir to Robert Fitz-Haimon (late Earl of Glouceſter) and then Inveſted him with that Earldom: [1.] The King alſo holding his Court, or Great Council at the Caſtle of Windſor, (which he new built) diſſeized Philip de Braüſe, William Mallet, and William Bainart, (all

(all great Barons) of their Eſtates, becauſe they had been treacherous to him, tho' our Hiſtorians do not tell us in what. Anno Dom. MCX.

The ſame [2.] Year alſo (Elias late Earl of Maine having been put to death by King Henry for Treaſon) Fulk Earl of Anjou, who had Married Elias his Daughter, immediately thereupon ſeized the Earldom whither the King would or not, which produced a War between them the Year enſuing. [2.] Idem Ib.

This Year [3.] King Henry did not wear his Crown, (that is, did not appear in State) neither at Chriſtmaß, Eaſter, nor Whitſontide, according to the uſual Cuſtom of thoſe Times, and as he would have done, if the Great Council conſiſting of the Biſhops and Noblemen of the Kingdom, had then aſſembled as they were wont to do, at ſuch Feſtival Solemnities. Anno Dom. MCXI. [3.] C. S. The King omits wearing his Crown at the great Feſtivals.

In [4.] the Month of Auguſt following, the King paſſed over again into Normandy, to proſecute the War with the Duke of Anjou, who had now got Poſſeſſion of the Earldom of Maine againſt his will; ſo that all this Year nothing happened, but betraying and burning of Towns, and ſeveral other Devaſtations that were committed in thoſe Parts, needleſs here to be recited. [4.] Idem Ib. H. H. The King goes over again to proſecute the War with the Earl of Anjou.

Yet I cannot omit a moſt wiſe and Politick action of this King which happened this Year, and that was this; many Poor Flemmings had come over into England, in the Reign of King William his Father, as alſo lately in his own, being compell'd to ſeek refuge here, for their Habitations were deſtroyed, great part of the Sea-Coaſts of Flanders having been overwhelmed by the Sea ſome years before; by whoſe coming in ſuch great Numbers, England ſo ſwarmed with them, that they became a burthen to the Nation, whereupon the King at firſt Planted them in the waſt parts of Northumberland; but finding they might do more good in Wales, to reſtrain the Welſh, whom he had not long before ſubdued, [1.] he tranſplanted them thither with their Goods and Families, giving them all the Country of Rhos, lying about Pembroke and Haverford-weſt, for their Habitation, which had been not long before Conquered from the Welſh Princes, and there the Deſcendants of thoſe Flemmings have continued to this day, being quite different from the Native Britains, or Welſhmen, both in Language and Manners: and theſe Flemmings being an Induſtrious and ſtout People, proved afterwards a ſtrong Defence againſt the Inſurrections of the Welſh, and ſerve to confirm that excellent Roman Policy, of preſerving New Conqueſts by Colonies. [5.] W. M. F. W. P. 89. The Flemmings removed from the North into Wales. [1.] Camden's Britan. in Pembrokeſhire.

About this time alſo [2.] deceaſed Robert Earl of Flanders, who had been ſo famous in the late Expedition to the Holy Land, and his Son of the ſame Name ſucceeded him in that Earldom. [2.] H. H. Robert Earl of Flanders dies.

But [5.] Robert de Beleſme, the King's antient Enemy, being found privy to this Deſign, now fell again into the King's diſpleaſure, and being impeached for breach of Faith, and for not appearing at his Court, (tho' thrice Summoned,) as alſo for ſeveral other Miſdemeanours, which he could not deny, was by the juſt Judgment of the King's Court condemned, and all his Eſtate forfeited to the King [1.], who ſtill remained moſt part of this Year in Normandy; and before he returned into England, a Peace was concluded between him and Fulk Earl of Anjou, and he coming into the Territory of Alençon, there ſwore fealty to King Henry, and, doing him Homage, received from his hands the Earldom of Main; the Earl alſo betrothed his Daughter to William the King's Son, and the King further conferred upon him the Earldom of Eureux, tho' at the ſame time he received into favour Almeric de Mont-fort, whoſe Right that Honour was.

This [3.] Year the King kept his Chriſtmaß, Eaſter and Whitſontide, in Normandy, being ſtill detained by ſome Affairs, and about Midſummer he ſent over Robert de Beleſme into England to be kept cloſe Priſoner in the Caſtle of Warham, where he continued all his life. But he was not to be pitied, having been a turbulent, faithleſs and cruel Man, [4.] as appears by his thruſting out the Eyes of his Godſon a little Boy, who was delivered to him as a Hoſtage by his Father, and that only for ſome ſmall offence the ſaid Father had committed.

But tho' [5] K. Henry had now made Peace with all the Neighbouring Princes, yet Americ de Valerie, and other great Noblemen, who were Homagers to the Earldom of Beleſme, relying upon the ſtrength of the Town of that name, and the multitude of its Dependants, preſumed to hold it out againſt the King, and gave him ſome ſmall diſturbance; but he immediately marched againſt it with all the Forces of Normandy, and Fulk Earl of Anjou, Theobald Earl of Blois, with other Great Men, coming in unexpectedly to the King's aſſiſtance, they ſo Inveſted the Town, that within three days they took it by Aſſault.

Thus King Henry having at laſt totally ſubdued Normandy, and made Peace with all his Neighbours beyond the Seas, returned into England Victorious, and Governed this Kingdom and that Dutchy in great Tranquility for five years enſuing.

His Landing here was not till the Month of July, but what the King did after his return does not appear, and therefore it is to be ſuppoſed he ſpent it in diverſions which he might now very well afford to take, having endured ſuch great fatigues in his late Foreign Expeditions.

I find not any thing conſiderable to have happen'd this Year, [1.] but that the City of Worceſter was wholly deſtroyed by Fire, together with the Monaſtery and Caſtle.

This

This Year the [2.] King prepared a great Army againſt Wales, being provoked by ſome Incurſions which had been made by thoſe of the North and South upon the Territories of Hugh Earl of Cheſter, and Gilbert Sirnamed Strongbow, Earl of Striguil (or Chepſtow) to whom the King had given all Caerdiganſhire, and whoſe Lands in South-Wales, Owen ap Cadogan, a great Nobleman of that Country, had then much moleſted and ſpoiled; wherefore theſe two great Lords had highly excited the King to this War; as alſo becauſe Griffyth, Prince of North-Wales, pretended not to owe any Service, nor had for a long time paid any Tribute to the King, wherewith he was ſo incenſed, that he ſwore he would utterly deſtroy the People of North-Wales and Powis-Land, and Plant them with new Inhabitants; ſo dividing his Army into three parts, he gave the Command of the firſt (conſiſting chiefly of Weſt-Country Men) to Gilbert Earl of Striguil, which was to march againſt South-Wales, whilſt Alexander King of Scots, and Hugh Earl of Cheſter, with the Forces of Scotland, and the North of England, marched againſt North-Wales; and the King himſelf followed with the main Body, conſiſting of all the Forces of the middle parts of England.

Anno Dom. MCXIV.

[2.] F. W. H. H. Dr. Powel's Chron. P. 172, 173.

The King raiſes a great Army, and invades North-Wales.

So ſoon as the News of this Expedition arrived in South-Wales, [3.] Meredyth ap Blethyn a great Nobleman of that Country, (who had been accuſed for one concern'd in the late Incurſions) being terrified with the King's great Preparations, came and ſubmitted himſelf to his mercy; but Owen ap Edwin, another Welſh Lord of thoſe parts, who was alſo accuſed of the ſame crime, fearing to commit himſelf to them that were ſo greedy of his Lands, fled to Griffyth ap Conan into North-Wales; whereupon the King turned all his Forces that way, coming himſelf as far as Murcaſtel, whilſt the King of Scots marched up to Pennant Bachwy; but the People fled to the Mountains and Woods, and carried all their Victuals and Cattel along with them, ſo that the King could not follow them; and ſuch of his Men as entered the Country were either ſlain or wounded in the Streights of the Mountains: then the Scotiſh King ſent to the Prince of Wales to come and yield himſelf to the King, and promiſed him the King's Peace, but he would give no credence to thoſe Promiſes, and therefore refuſed to come in.

[3.] Idem Ib. Meredyth ap Blethyn ſubmits to King Henry.

The Welſh upon the King's approach fly to the Woods and Mountains, and their Prince refuſes to ſubmit to him.

Then [4.] the King, becauſe he would not return without doing ſomething, ſent to Prince Owen ap Edwin to come to him, and leave the Welſh Prince, as one not able to defend himſelf, but was about to make Peace with the Scotiſh King, and the Earl of Cheſter, yet for all this Owen durſt not truſt the King, until ſuch time as his Uncle Meredyth came and adviſed him not to ſlight the King's Gracious Offers, but to make his Peace before Prince Griffyth ſhould prevent him. Thereupon Owen hearing this, came voluntarily to the King, who received him Graciouſly, telling him, That ſince he had truſted to his word, he would not only perform that, but alſo prefer him and all his Family, and he ſhould enjoy his Lands without any Tribute. Then Griffyth ap Conan Prince of North-Wales, ſo ſoon as he heard this, ſent to the King to make Peace, and he (not being able to come at him) was fain to grant it, tho' upon the Payment of a good round Sum of Money; and ſo this mighty Expedition ended with no great damage to either party; this Reconciliation was chiefly procured by the cunning

[5.] Eadm. p. 109. The King is at laſt perſwaded to make a new Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

But to come to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, [5.] the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, having been now full five years vacant, the King was at laſt prevail'd upon by the Pope's Admonitions, as alſo by the Prayers of the Monks of Canterbury, and others, to Summon the Biſhops and * Chief Men of England, to meet at Windſor to take their Advice about the making a new Archbiſhop; where Faricius Abbot of Abingdon, was at firſt mentioned as fit for that Place, and Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter, and the Prior, and ſome of the Monks of Canterbury were likewiſe ſent for to Court to concur in the Election; but the Biſhops and divers of the Great Men were more inclined to chuſe ſome Biſhop or Chaplain of the King's out of the Secular Clergy; and when it was objected, that it was never known from the time of St. Auguſtine, that any but a Monk had (except once) been choſen Archbiſhop, the minds of the Biſhops changing on the ſudden, they agreed in the Election of Biſhop Ralph above mentioned, and unanimouſly deſired the King's aſſent to confirm him Archbiſhop; with which he declared he would readily comply, provided the Monks with the Magiſtrates and People of Canterbury were willing; upon which there was no delay, for their good will was preſently asked, and they were found to agree on him alone; ſo the whole matter being referred to the People, they all with one voice approve the Election.

* Principes.

[1.] Idem Ib. Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter Elected Archbiſhop.

Thus was [1.] Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter with great Joy Elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the conſent of all Men; being a Man highly beloved for his affability and good humour. Matt. Paris alſo relates, that the King Inveſted him with the Archiepiſcopal Staff and Ring, which muſt needs be an errour, for the King had already renounced that Right in the late Archbiſhop's time; but this is certain, [2.] that in June following he went to Canterbury, and being there pompouſly received by the Clergy and Laiety, was Conſecrated by the Biſhops, who came thither for that purpoſe.

[2.] Idem Ib. P. 110.

[3.] Idem Ib.

This Election being over, the [3.] King reſolved to go into Normandy, about Affairs of great moment, but before he went he ſupplied all the Vacant Abbeys; tho' they might have been better filled, had he pleaſed to have choſen ſome of thoſe Abbots out of the Engliſh Natives, and not all Strangers; and it had been well if the King had not had ſuch an averſion for the former, as that if he were an Engliſh Man no Vertues could promote him; but if a Foreigner pretended to the leaſt ſhew of merit, by the help of his Friends he was advanced to the Higheſt Honours: this the Author laments as a Judgment of God, and as the effect of very evil Times.

The [4.] King having thus diſpatched his Affairs, took Shipping and paſſed into Normandy, to prevent the attempts which the French and ſome others of his Neighbours were then about to make againſt him.

[5.] Idem Ib. P. 111. Ernulf Conſecrated Biſhop of Rocheſter, and the Prodigy that then happen'd.

Not [5.] long after his departure the new Archbiſhop went to Rocheſter, there to Inſtall Ernulf Abbot of Peterburgh in that See. And our Author relates a great Prodigy to have happen'd that day, viz. the River Medway (which runs by Rocheſter) fail'd on a ſudden; ſo that between the Bridge and the Caſtle it became ſo ſhallow, that great multitudes of Men and Boys waded over the River on Foot, the water ſcarce reach-reaching to their knees; this laſted from Midnight till the Night following, as many who ſaw it teſtified to our Author. But that it was no miracle, appears from this, that the ſame defect was obſerved in the River of Thames, whoſe waters failed ſo much, that for the ſpace of two days, they were ſcarce two foot deep; and this was obſerved not only in the South, but North parts of England, where the River of Were failed in like manner at Weremuthe, as did alſo divers other Rivers.

Anno Dom. MCXIV.

But to ſay ſomething more of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, Thomas Archbiſhop of York being lately deceaſed, Thurſtan the King's Chaplain was at Wincheſter Elected Archbiſhop in his ſtead, of whom you ſhall hear more hereafter.

As [1.] for Foreign Affairs I find nothing to have happened conſiderable this Year, except the conſummation of the Mariage between the Emperour Henry and Mathilda the King's Daughter, who was at the ſame time alſo ſolemnly Crowned Empreſs at Mentz; which ſhews the Errour of thoſe Hiſtorians, who make her to have been Married to him five years before, which is not at all likely, ſhe being then but nine years of age, and now not above fourteen.

[1.] F. W. The Mariage conſummated between the Emperour, and the Lady Mathilda.

This Year proved very quiet and peaceable in [2.] England, ſo that our Hiſtorians are forced to fill it up with Accounts of the Weather: the Winter proving ſo ſevere, that moſt of the Bridges of England (being then of Wood) were broken by the Froſt; but King Henry ſtaying all this Year in Normandy, the main thing he did whilſt he continued there, was, that he cauſed all the chief Men of that Dutchy to ſwear Fealty to his Son William, as his Lawful Succeſſor, being then but Twelve years of Age, and ſo the King returned into England in July following.

[3.] But not long after, hearing that Rees ap Theodor (or ap Tudor) Son to the late Prince of South-Wales, was harboured and protected by Griffyth ap Conan, Prince of North-Wales, he ſent for the Prince by Civil Letters to come to him; and being arrived, the King Courted him with fair words and great Preſents, to ſend him ſo ſoon as he return'd home, the Head of young Prince Rees, which Griffyth (being overcome by the King's Preſents) promiſed to do: and as ſoon as ever he came to his Palace at Abberfraw, he inquired for Griffyth ap Rees, and learning where he was, ſent certain Horſemen to bring him to his Court; but as they drew pretty near to the Houſe where he was, he had notice given him of their coming, and with much ado eſcaped to the Church of Aberdaron, and there took Sanctuary; then the Meſſengers returned, and declared to the Prince what had happened, at which he was ſo much offended, that he commanded him to be pulled out by force; but the Clergy of the whole Country withſtood it, and defended the Liberties of the Church. That Night ſome that pitied to ſee an innocent young Prince thus perſecuted, conveyed him away out of North-Wales to Stratywy in South-Wales, where he was compelled for the ſafety of his own life to rebell againſt the King, and ſo muſtering all the Power he could to him, he made War againſt the Flemmings and Normans for ſome time, as you will find hereafter.

Nor

Anno Dom. MCXV.

Nor did the Year produce any great Alteration in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; only [4.] Pope Paſchal now ſent the Pall to the new Archbiſhop Ralph by Abbot Anſelm, Nephew to the late Archbiſhop of the ſame name, who was therefore joyfully received by the preſent Archbiſhop: and Anſelm bringing the Pall in a Silver Box, the Legate came to Canterbury, and the Archbiſhop went out barefoot to meet it, attended by all the Monks of Chriſt-Church, and St. Auguſtines: then the Pall being laid upon the High Altar, was from thence taken and put upon the Archbiſhop's Shoulders, who having firſt made an Oath of Fidelity and Canonical Obedience to the Pope, was preſently Enthron'd, and having there Conſecrated Theobald Biſhop of Worceſter (with the aſſiſtance of Richard Biſhop of London, and of divers other Biſhops) the Solemnity ended.

Anno Dom. MCXVI.

But [5.] this Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at St. Albans; the Spring following his Affairs again requiring his Preſence in Normandy, and not knowing what might befall him in this Expedition, and beſides being reſolved to ſecure the Succeſſion of the Crown in his own Family [1.] he therefore Summon'd a Great Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots, and * Chief Men of the Kingdom at Salisbury on the Twentieth of March, that he might appoint his Son William Heir of the Kingdom, and ſecure the Title to him; then all the Nobles (or Chief Men) perceiving the King's mind, readily did Homage, and ſwore Fealty to him, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other Biſhops, and Abbots ſwearing firſt, that if he ſhould out-live his Father, they would (laying aſide all other Claims whatſoever) put him in poſſeſſion of the Crown and Kingdom, and that when he ſhould be King, they would faithfully ſerve him.

The Reader may obſerve, that Polydore Virgil, and from him both Stow and Speed's Chronicle, commence the beginning of our High Court of Parliament from this Aſſembly, and that without citing any Authority for it. But I ſhall ſay no more of this grand miſtake in this place, becauſe I have already confuted it in my Introduction to this Volume. But to return to the Hiſtory.

The Error of certain Modern Authors who date our Parliaments from this Aſſembly.

So ſoon [3.] as ever the King left England, and had arrived in Normandy about Eaſter, there aroſe a bloody War between Him and Lewis King of France, the occaſion of which was thus; Theobald Earl of Blois Rebelling againſt that King (tho' his Sovereign) was therein aſſiſted by King Henry his Uncle, who ſending him both Commanders and Souldiers, reduced the French King to great Extremities; but he was even with the King of England, as you will ſee by and by, tho' in the mean time he was forced through the neceſſity of his Affairs to oppreſs the Kingdom with Grievous Taxes and Exactions. But

But [4.] Sugerius Abbot of St. Denis in his Life of King Lewis the Groſs, gives us a much more particular account of the cauſe of, and proceedings in this War, between King Henry and that Prince, than any other Writer, being to this effect: that when the former had vanquiſhed his Brother Duke Robert, and thereby wholly ſubdued Normandy, he and the French King mutually agreed, that whoſoever of them firſt recovered the Town and Caſtle of Giſors out of the hands of Payn a Valiant Nobleman (who took his Sirname from that Place) he ſhould raze that Caſtle to the Ground within four days, which the French King had a great deal of reaſon to deſire, becauſe it ſtood ſo conveniently upon the River Epte, that being a Frontier, it not only gave King Henry an eaſie entrance into France, but alſo kept the French from Invading Normandy, on that ſide; but when he had now long deferr'd demoliſhing this Caſtle according to the Agreement, King Lewis ſent divers Meſſages to him to put him in mind of it, but he ſtill ſlighting them, France proclaim'd War againſt King Henry, and thereupon gathered together a great Army, and with the Joynt Forces of Robert Earl of Flanders, Theobald Earl of Blois, the Earl of Nevers, and the Duke of Burgundy, with other Noblemen, Invading Normandy, marched as far as a place called Plancas (the French name I know not more than that it was a Caſtle near the River) where the King of England's Army being drawn up on the other ſide of the River Epte, the French King ſent a Meſſage by ſome of his Noblemen, whereby (after upbraiding him with breach of his promiſe) he required him forthwith to demoliſh that Caſtle, or elſe to fight with him hand to hand; but King Henry thought the Caſtle too conſiderable to be deſtroyed, nor did he like to venture his Perſon without any juſt cauſe; ſo he only ſent him back word, that he would not decline to defend himſelf, when a fit place and opportunity offer'd; at which anſwer King Lewis being incenſed, both French and Normans marched to the River, but neither Party (for fear of the other) durſt paſs it, and ſo they retreated; the Normans to the Caſtle of Giſors, and the French to that of Chaumont: but the next Morning early the French paſſing the River near Giſors, and the Normans Sallying out from thence, there was a ſharp engagement between them, and (as this Hiſtorian relates) the Normans were repulſed to the very Town, where the French were like to have entered the Gates with them; but it ſeems they were defeated of their Intention, for (according to Polydore Virgil) the Normans within, making a briſk Sally, beat the French back with conſiderable loſs; which is moſt likely, ſince they did not ſo much as Beſiege the Place again at that time: but tho' this proved the beginning of a ſharp and bloody War, which laſted for near three years, between theſe two Kings and their Confederates, to the great damage of both Kingdoms, but more to the French, as the Reader will find hereafter; yet their Authors endeavour to conceal it.

But it is now time to look back into England, and ſee what has been done there ſince the King's departure, for no ſooner was his Back turned, [5.] but Griffyth ap Rees, Prince of Wales, (who had entred into a War againſt the King the year before) aſſembling his Welſhmen, laid Siege to ſeveral Caſtles in Wales, ſome of which he took, burnt and razed to the Ground, and others he very much endangered; ſo that being encouraged with theſe petty Succeſſes, and having encreaſed ſed his Forces, he made Inroads into the Countries of Roſſe and Dyvet, ſpoiling and robbing all places where he came; wherefore the Normans and Flemmings conſulting how they might remedy the miſchief, reſolved to call together all the Welſh Lords of thoſe parts that continued ſtill faithful to the King, ſuch as Owen ap Rytherech, and Rytherech ap Theodor, with ſeveral others, (whoſe Names would be tedious to recite) and propoſed to them, that if they meant to continue faithful to the King of England, they muſt by turns with their own Men guard the Caſtle of Caermarthin, which they all undertook to do, each of them a Fortnight in his turn: But Prince Griffyth having intelligence by his Spies that the Caſtle was but weakly Mann'd, came ſuddenly before the Town with his Forces, and giving a great Shout, Owen ap Caradoc (whoſe turn it was then to keep the Caſtle) Salli-ed out toward the place where the Shout was given, and thinking his Men would have followed him, and fought as he did, he found himſelf much miſtaken for they all ran away. But Owen fighting manfully was ſlain, and the Town taken and burnt, except the Caſtle, and that was much defaced. Then Griffyth return'd to his wonted place with a rich Booty: Whereupon a great Company of luſty young Fellows came in to him, and ſerved him, thinking all was their own. He afterwards alſo went and took in ſeveral other Caſtles, all which he burnt and deſtroyed.

[1.] Idem Ib. The Welſh in Cardiganſhire Rebell.

But when the Men of Cardigan heard of Griffyth's ſucceſs, they ſent to him, and choſe him for their Leader, and he was well received by ſeveral of the Welſh Gentry, who had been driven out of Dyvet by the Normans and Flemmings; and tho' King Henry had reduced this Country to his Subjection, yet moſt of it revolted: but as for the Caſtles in thoſe parts, which were held by Earl Gilbert's Men, he took them, and ſlew all that were therein; but thinking to take another place called Aberyſtyth, he ſent for Succours from another Caſtle adjoyning, and they coming thither unknown to Griffyth, the Normans ſent ſome Men to a River, near which the Caſtle ſtood, to Skirmiſh with the Welſhmen, and intice them over the Bridge, which they having paſſed, the Engliſh who were on the other ſide fled towards the Caſtle on purpoſe, and the Welſhmen perſuing them to the Hill-top, an Ambuſh of Horſemen, that lay under the Hill, got between the Welſhmen and the Bridge; and then the Engliſh who had before fled, turn'd again upon the Welſh, ſo that they being encompaſſed on either ſide, were moſt of them cut off, but the reſt ſeeing a greater number of Armed Men than they looked for, retreated and quitted the Country with Griffyth their Leader.

The Welſhmen are repulſed at Aberyſtyth.

[2.] Id. Ibid. The King ſends Robert his Baſe Son againſt the Welſh.

When [2.] the King heard of theſe Devaſtations, he perſwaded Owen ap Caradoc (the Welſh Lord above mentioned) to joyn his Forces to thoſe he ſhould ſend under the Command of his baſe Son Robert; whereupon Owen ap Rytherech, and Lhywarch ap Trahaern (another Welſh Lord) with all their Men marched to meet the King's Son, making the whole Country flie before them: And Gerard, Steward of Pembroke, was likewiſe upon the march with all his Men (conſiſting chiefly of Flemmings) to meet the above ſaid Robert, who hearing Owen was gone out with a ſmall party of about a Hundred Men to ſcoure a Wood, where certain Welſhmen retreated with their Cattel, and thinking it a fit opportunity to be revenged on him for his former injuries,

Gerard

Gerard and his Party perſued him to the Wood; which Owen was made acquainted with, and tho' they were the greater number, yet for all that he would not flie, ſince he took them to be the King's friends; but ſo ſoon as the Flemmings drew nigh, and began to ſhoot at his men, they would fain have perſwaded Owen to retire, which yet he ſcorning to do, becauſe they were but Flemmings, turned upon his Enemies; but he paid dear for his raſhneſs, for upon the firſt onſet Owen was ſhot to the heart and ſlain; whereupon his Men fled, and brought word of it to Lhywarch ap Trahearn and his Followers, who being jealous of the King's Men that they could not truſt them, tho' they were alſo in the King's ſervice, returned to their own Country, and ſo there was for the preſent an end of theſe Welſh Commotions. Nor do we hear any more of this Griffyth ap Rees for ſeveral years after; the Welſh being (I ſuppoſe) employed the year following in Civil Broils among themſelves, wherein many being ſlain, their Engliſh Neighbours thereby enjoyed the greater quiet; but theſe actions being too ſmall to be particularly taken notice of, I refer the Reader that deſires farther ſatisfaction to Caradoc's Chronicle publiſhed by Doctor Powel.

Anno Dom. MCXVI. Owen ap Rytherech treacherouſly ſlain by Gerard Steward of Pembroke.

[3.] Let us now look back to the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this year; at a Common * Council of the Biſhops, Abbots, and Chief Men of the whole Kingdom lately held at Salisbury (as you have already heard) the old Controverſie between Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Thurſtan Archbiſhop Elect of York, concerning Superiority, was again renew'd; for the latter being admoniſhed by the former to make his Profeſſion of Obedience to the See of Canterbury, He anſwered he would willingly receive his Conſecration, but could by no means make the Profeſſion his Predeceſſor had done. Ralph not having patience to hear what was, or might be ſaid on this Subject, the Diſcourſe broke off abruptly, and the difference remain'd ſtill undetermined; yet Thurſtan preſently ſent to Rome to try to obtain a Diſpenſation for not making his Profeſſion, but could not then prevail with the Pope to grant it. In the mean time the King taking notice of the obſtinacy of Thurſtan, and that he preſumed too much upon his favour, declared, that unleſs he would make ſuch a Profeſſion as his Predeceſſors had done, and own the Superiority of the Church of Canterbury, he ſhould never be Conſecrated, nor enjoy the Archbiſhoprick of York; wherefore in a great heat he renounced it, aſſuring the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury that he would never ſo long as he lived pretend to claim any Title to it; yet for all this he ſoon changed his mind, and followed the King into Normandy, hoping to re-obtain his Biſhoprick without the Profeſſion required; but without any ſucceſs.

[3.] Eadm. p. 117. A Council held at Saliſbury, where the old difference between the Archbiſhops Canterbury and York is again revived.

* Eadmerus places this Council under the former Year, but I rather follow Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden, who with more probability place it under this.

During [4.] this Controverſie Abbot Anſelm (the [5.] ſame that had formerly brought over the Pall to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury) came into Normandy with the Pope's Letters to be his Legate in England; which, ſo ſoon as it was known here, all the Biſhops, Abbots and Lay-Nobility, much admired at, and being Summoned to London by the Queen to Treat in a Common Council about this and other matters, it was reſolved by all there preſent, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (whom this buſineſs chiefly concern'd) ſhould go to the King, and acquaint him with the antient Customs and Liberties of the Kingdom; and that if the Legate still persisted in these Innovations, the Archbishop should go to Rome and procure the Pope to take them off. So the Archbishop in compliance with their desires went over, the King being then at Roüen, where he found the Legate waiting for leave to come into England: but the King not suffering any prejudice to be done to the antient Customs of this Nation, kept him in Normandy, and would not permit him to go any further.

The Resolution of the Council concerning the Pope's Legate.

Anno Dom. MCXVII. The [1.] King spent all this Year in those Parts by reason of a Confederacy which was now set on foot against him between the King of France, and the Earls of Flanders and Anjou, who all conspired to dispossess him of Normandy, and settle William, Son to Duke Robert therein: And it was carried on so far, that many of the Great Men of that Country quitted their Allegiance, and took part with them; but King Henry was so well assisted by the Earl of Bretaigne, and Earl Theobald his Nephew, that tho' the King of France, and Earl of Flanders Invaded Normandy with a very powerful Army, yet hearing of the approach of King Henry with the joynt Forces of England, Normandy and Bretaigne, they stayed only one Night, and so march'd off next day upon the news, without striking a stroke.

[1.] C. S. H. H. A new Confederacy of the King of France and other Princes against King Henry.

I find our Chronicles and Histories so very Barren of matter this Year, that they do not tell us what was done further, either in England or Normandy; and therefore they are forced to fill it up with Prodigies and strange things done in foreign parts.

Only the Saxon Chronicle informs us in general, that notwithstanding the King's late good success against the King of France, not only England but Normandy was grievously oppressed by heavy Taxes, and the quartering of such an Army, as the necessity of his Affairs now forced him to keep on foot.

England and Normandy grievously oppressed with Taxes, and Quartering of Soldiers.

This Year affords nothing considerable in Ecclesiastical matters in England, more than that King Henry [2.] founded a rich Abbey for Black Chanons at the Town of Cirencester in Glocestershire, which was Dedicated to St. Mary and St. James, but is now ruined, so that nothing but the Church is left; and that remains at this day, and is the Parish-Church of that antient Town.

[2.] Vid. Monast. Ang. Tom. 2. p. 89.

Also as to the Ecclesiastical Affairs of foreign parts this Year produced little, [3.] only Ralph Archbishop of Canterbury, who having the Year before undertook his Journey to the Pope concerning Abbot Anselm's Legantine Power, was much hindered in his way by a dangerous Indisposition; and tho' at last he with much ado got to Rome, yet durst he go no further, because there was War at that time between the Emperour and the Pope; the former having driven his Holiness as far as Beneventum; so that the great distance and danger of the Journey being considered, the Pope would not willingly permit the Archbishop to undertake it; therefore all that he could do, was to send Messengers to him to know his pleasure, yet could obtain nothing more from him but a Bull of Confirmation of all those antient Privileges of the See of Canterbury which his Predecessors had ever enjoyed, (yet without specifying what they were) which so soon as the Archbishop had received, he presently returned back to the King, who was still in Normandy.

[3.] Eadm. p. 119, 120. The Archbishop of Canterbury goes to Rome.

About

About the ſame time [4.] the Clergy of the Church of York by their Deputies, made ſuch earneſt application to the Pope for the reſtitution of their Archbiſhop Thurſtan, without making any Profeſſion to the See of Canterbury, that at laſt they obtained his reſtitution by the Pope's Bull, wherein there is a Clauſe, that it was not his intention to prejudice either of thoſe Churches, yet reſerved the farther hearing of all differences between them to his own deciſion.

Anno Dom. MCXVII.

[4.] Idem. P. 121. Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York is reſtor'd by the Pope without making any Profeſſion of Obedience to him of Canterbury.

This Year [5.] the War between the Kings of France and England raged more violently than in the laſt, it being renewed by Almeric de Montfort, (Siſter's Son to William Earl of Eureux) who now again demanded that Earldom of King Henry, but he refuſing to grant it him, he took up Arms againſt the King, and excited almoſt all France to do the like; whereupon the Governour of Eureux, William Pointel, delivered the City to him, and the Biſhop with his Clerks and Retinue were forced to depart thence. There joyned alſo with him Robert de Gournay, Stephen Earl of Albemarle, and many others, who rebelled againſt Henry, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh William, Son of Duke Robert in his Father's Dutchy. To theſe alſo came in Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who entered that part of Normandy called Tellau, and burnt I know not how many Towns, the King and his Normans being Spectators; he fortified Bures, and becauſe he ſuſpected moſt of the Normans, he put a great Gariſon of Stipendiary Britains and Engliſh into it; when Earl Baldwin coming before it, and provoking the Gariſon to fight, was there dangerouſly wounded, and returning home ſometime after died without iſſue. Theſe Rebells received likewiſe aſſiſtance from the King of France, and Duke of Anjou; ſo on both ſides they Plundered the Country, took and burnt ſeveral Caſtles and Towns.

Many other Norman Lords Rebell with Intention to ſet up William Son to Duke Robert.

On the [1.] fifth of October, there was a Council Summoned at Roüen, where King Henry conſulted concerning the Peace of the Country with Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other Barons he had there aſſembled; where likewiſe Geoffrey Archbiſhop of Roüen Treated about the State of the Church, with his four Suffragan Biſhops, Richard of Bayeux, John of Liſieux, Turgis of Auranches, and Roger of Conſtance, with many Abbots. Serlo Biſhop of Seez was not at this Council, being excuſed by reaſon of his great Age and Infirmities; and Audin Biſhop of Eureux excuſed himſelf as being employed againſt the Common Enemies of the Country.

[1.] Idem. P. 846. A great Council held at Roüen.

The [2.] War ſtill continued to rage in Normandy, and every day almoſt brought the King News of ſome conſiderable Norman Nobleman, or Caſtellan's revolting from him, amongſt whom Euſtace de Breteüil, an Illegitimate Son of William Earl of that place, was one, who had Married Juliane one of King Henry's Natural Daughters. He demanded great things of his Father-in-Law, and becauſe the King would not grant them, he Fortified four Caſtles againſt him; yet ſome of theſe repenting of what they had done, came and ſubmitted themſelves, and made their Peace with the King. The firſt was Robert Son of Aſcelin Goell, whoſe Example many followed; then the King ſent to Almeric, offer'd him his Earldom of Eureux, and invited him to accept of his favour, but he refuſed it; However the Noblemen of England, who were of Norman Extraction, and faithfully adhered to the King, were Richard Earl of Cheſter, Ralph de Conches, William de Warenne, and the Sons of Robert Earl of Mellent, Waleran and Robert, with divers others too many to be here recited.

[3.] W. M. p. 164. H. H. Queen Matilda dies.

Let us now ſee what was done in the mean time in England [3.] where the King received a very great loſs by the death of his Queen Matilda, who Deceaſed this Year at Weſtminſter on the Thirtieth of April, and was Buried in the Abbey-Church thereof; tho' Thomas Rudborn in his Hiſtoria Major relates, that ſhe was buried in the Cathedral at Wincheſter; However Monuments were ſet up in her Memory in other Churches alſo.

Her Character.

She was a Princeſs endued with all the good Qualities requiſite to a private Perſon, as well as a great Queen, being humble, charitable, and devout, neither tranſported with proſperity, nor caſt down by Adverſity, as Henry Huntington in the Epitaph he gives of her in Verſe deſcribes her to be; her only fault (in William of Malmesbury's opinion) was her being too bountiful to Strangers, eſpecially Monks, who could ſing skilfully the Church-Service, by which as well as other needleſs Liberalities, ſhe often ran in debt, and by her exacting Officers, wrack'd and oppreſs'd her poor Tenants to pay it.

[4.] Eadm. Ibid. The Death of the Earl of Mellent.

About the ſame time alſo [4.] died Robert Earl of Mellent, the King's Great Counceſlor and Favourite, an Enemy to the Engliſh; by this Nobleman's inſtigations (as it is ſuppoſed) King Henry would never beſtow any Eccleſiaſtical Preferment on an Engliſh Man. I have nothing elſe to remark concerning Engliſh Affairs, but that the Kingdom continued to be ſtill cruelly oppreſs'd by great Taxes to carry on the War abroad.

[5.] Id. Ib. The Deceaſe of Pope Paſchal.

As for Church-Affairs, there happened nothing worth taking notice of but [5.] the death of Pope Paſchal the Second, to whom ſucceeded John of Cajeta, a Monk of Mount Caſſine in Italy, by the name of Gelaſius; yet he ſat but one year, and is reckoned by ſome as an pope.

Anno Dom. MCXIX.

All this Year Normandy was haraſſed with War, [1.] which ſtill continued as fierce as ever, between the two King's, Lewis and Henry, from whom ſeveral of his Great Men ſtill continued to revolt and go over to his Enemies, which proved a great mortification to him; but as misfortunes ſeldom come alone, ſo alſo the King about this time met with divers other ill ſucceſſes: for [2.] Engeram de Chaumont taking with him a ſmall Body of reſolute Men took the ſtrong Caſtle of Andely Sur Seine by ſurprize, by which means he reduced all the Country from the River of Epte to the Town of Pont St. Pierre; upon the ſaid River Seine, to the Obedience of the King of France; and not long after, when King Henry together with Theobald Earl of Boloigne marched to relieve the Caſtle of Alanſon in Maine, the King being met with in his way thither by the Earl of Anjou, received ſuch a defeat, as he was obliged to retreat, and ſo the Caſtle was forced to Surrender.

[2.] Suger. in vita Lud. Groſſi. p. 308. The Caſtle of Andely ſur Seine taken.

The King is defeated by the Earl of Anjou.

Not long afeer this the King's Fortune began to change for the better; for [3.] Baldwin Earl of Flanders, the King's bitter Enemy, invaded Normandy, and Beſieged the Caſtle of Ou, which tho' he took, yet receiving there a ſlight Wound in the Head, it ſo inflamed through his own Intemperance, that he not long after deceaſed, being ſucceeded by his Nephew Charles, Son to the King of Denmark, who ſoon made Peace with King Henry.

[3.] Idem ib. Baldwin Earl of Flanders dies of a ſlight wound.

But

Anno Dom. MCXIX.

But that which moſt weakened the French King's Intereſt, was, that Fulk Earl of Anjou being allured by the great and advantageous offers that King Henry made him, began now to hearken to a Treaty of Peace, which was at that time ſet on Foot, and not long after perfected to the King's great ſatisfaction; a Marriage being concluded between William the King's only Son, and the Earl's younger Daughter.

The Earl of Anjou makes Peace with King Henry.

In order to which [4.] Ordericus Vitalis informs us, that in May following the young Prince came over from England into Normandy, whereupon his Father ſent Ambaſſadors to the Earl of Anjou to conclude the Peace already propoſed, inviting him kindly to his Court, and he coming thither a little after, a firm Peace and League was made between them; and in the Month of June the Prince was Married at Liſieux to the Lady above mentioned, and then the King by the Earl's Mediation received into favour William Talvace, the Son of Robert de Beleſme, and reſtored to him all his Father's Eſtate in Normandy, tho' not in England.

[4.] O. V. P. 851. Prince William arrives in Normandy, and is Married to the Earl of Anjou's Daughter.

This Affair being over, [5.] King Henry marched up and down Normandy to revenge himſelf on his Enemies, taking and burning their Caſtles and Towns; he then alſo Beſieged Eureux, and after he had taken and burnt it down with the Cathedral, he reduced all that remained in thoſe parts under his Dominion.

[5.] Idem. Ib. K. Hen. reduces many Towns and Caſtles in Normandy.

While both Fire and Sword thus raged in the Bowels of Normandy, [1.] the King of France Invaded it on that ſide toward France, and came as far as Andely upon the River Seine, ſaying, he wiſhed he could meet the King of England in the open Field; which he hearing of, ſoon gratified his deſire, and marching up towards him, came into the Plain of Brenville near the Mountain Guarelive with Five Hundred Horſe, amongſt whom were the King's two Natural Sons, Robert and Richard, (expert Soldiers for their years) and three Earls, Henry d'Ou, William de Warren, and Walter Giffard, with many others of like Note.

[1.] Id. Ib. The King of France Invades that Province.

Then [2.] King Lewis ſeeing the War was now likely to come to a deciſion, drew out Four hundred Horſe, commanded by William, Duke Robert's Son, who was to make the firſt Onſet, after which both Armies joyned Battel, wherein the French were routed, and many perſons of Quality both Normans and French taken Priſoners. This is Ordericus's account of this Battel; but what Henry of Huntington relates ſeems much more ſatisfactory, and which being the laſt great action of this King's life, I ſhall here give you more at large.

[2.] Id. Ib. The King of France's Army commanded by William, Son to Duke Robert, is routed.

The [3.] King of France had appointed William Son to Duke Robert his Lieutenant-General, ordering him to advance before with a conſiderable Detachment, whilſt he himſelf in Perſon with the main Body of his Army brought up the Reer. King Henry had divided his Forces into three parts, placing his chief Nobility in the Avant-Guard, he himſelf lead the ſecond Diviſion, in which were the Troops of the Houſhold; whilſt in the third, he placed his baſe Sons, being all on foot, with the chief power of the Engliſh Infantry. The Battel being begun, the Avant-Guard of the French preſently broke, and diſperſed that of the Norman Nobility; who falling foul upon that part in which King Henry himſelf was, that was alſo ſoon broken; but tho' the King's Forces thus fell foul upon each other, yet they ſoon rallied, and it was ſharply fought on both ſides, for when their Spears were were broken they fought it out with their Swords; then William Criſpin, a Norman Baron, aſſaulting the King ſtruck him twice upon the Head, and his Helmet, tho' too ſtrong to be pierced, yet was ſo beaten into his Head, that blood followed; but the King ſo well handled his Adverſary, that both Horſe and Man came down to the Ground, and he was there taken Priſoner at the King's feet: then the main Body of Foot in which the King's Sons were, and which had not yet ſtruck a ſtroke, advanced ſo furiouſly with their Pikes, that the French not daring to venture the Charge, turned their backs and fled. The King having thus gained the day, remained ſtill in the Field, till ſuch time as ſeveral French Noblemen being taken Priſoners, were preſented to him; whereupon he returned to Roüen, and here ſolemnly gave God thanks for his Victory; but yet it was a good while e're the King could recover his late bruiſe in the Head.

[4.] O. V. P. 884. How it came to paſs that there were no more Milites, and that ſo few were killed.

But tho' [4.] Ordericus tells us there were but Nine hundred Milites, or Knights, in this Battel, it is to be underſtood that on both ſides theſe Milites there ſignifie Military Tenants or Feudataries, being all Men of Quality, and of theſe only three were killed, the reſt were ſo well armed, that they could not run any great hazard in that Age, when the moſt dangerous Weapons were Swords, with Bows and Arrows. King Lewis his Standard was here taken, and King Henry bought it of him that took it for Twenty Marks, which he kept as a token of the Victory. His Horſe alſo was taken, but that was ſent back next day, with his whole Furniture; and Prince William ſent likewiſe his Couſin William (the Son of Duke Robert) his Horſe which he had loſt, with many other Preſents; ſo full of Honour and Courteſie were Princes to each other (tho' Enemies) in thoſe Times.

King Lewis's Horſe and Standard taken.

[5.] Idem. P. 886. The King of France raiſes a great Army in France upon an Anathema being pronounced againſt all that ſhould refuſe to attend the King, who again invades Normandy afreſh.

When [5.] King Lewis returned to Paris, by the advice of Almeric de Montfort (who was not at this fight) he reſolved to ſend to all the Biſhops and Pariſh Prieſts of the Kingdom, that they ſhould iſſue out their Anathema's againſt all their Pariſhioners who were fit for War, if they failed to attend the King whenſoever he ſhould order them to march againſt the Normans. Whereupon there aſſembled a great Army from divers parts of France, which being joyned to the Forces the King had ready before, they marched into the very heart of Normandy, committing great Ravages as they paſſed along. With this Army the King laid Siege to Breteville, or Breteüil, which is in the Center of that Durchy; the Governour whereof was Ralph de Guader, a Lord of Bretaigne, who valiantly Sallied out and fought with them, commanding alſo the Gates of the Caſtle to be ſet open, but none durſt enter, ſuch was the courage of thoſe that defended it; but at three of the Gates there was ſo ſharp and obſtinate a Conflict, that many fell on both ſides.

King Lewis is repulſed at Breteul.

King Henry, ſo ſoon as he heard the French were returned into Normandy, ſent his Son Richard with a Supply of Two hundred Knights or Horſemen to Ralph de Guader, which coming to the knowledge of the Enemy, the Courage of the Aſſailants began to fail them, and the brave Governour going from Gate to Gate, encouraged his Soldiers, often changing his Armour, that he might not be known.

[1.] Id. Ib. The French return upon King Henry's approach.

Then [1.] the King follow'd his Son's and thoſe he had ſent before, with a numerous Army, and reſolved to fight the main Body of the French, but they deſpairing to take the Town, were forced to return into into France, carrying back nothing (beſides the Goods they had Plundered) but Ignominy and Blows.

William de Chaumount, Son-in-Law to the King of France, being extremely concerned at this bad Succeſs, in his return home with his Soldiers aſſaulted the Caſtle of Tilyers, where Gilbert the Caſtelan ſuddenly Sallying out upon them, took William Priſoner, with divers others, and put the reſt to flight; upon which many of the Norman Barons, who had before revolted, now again ſubmitted themſelves to the King.

But as to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs: [2.] In the midſt of October following, Pope Gelaſius came to Rheimes, having before Summon'd a General Council of all the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of the Weſtern Church, to which alſo went ſeveral Engliſh Biſhops, as you will ſee further by and by.

[2.] O. V. P. 858. Pope Gelaſius Summons a Council at Rheimes.

At this [3.] Council the King of France with his Barons appear'd, and made great complaints againſt King Henry, for that being his Vaſſal he had made War againſt him, and committed great ſpoils up- "on his Subjects: That he had againſt his conſent ſeized upon "Normandy, being a Fief of his Kingdom: That he had againſt all "Law and Right taken, and ſtill detain'd Priſoner Duke Robert, who "was his Liege-Lord, and Elder Brother. And then (the better to raiſe their compaſſion) he preſented to them the young Prince William "his Baniſhed Son: And farther complain'd that the King had alſo "incited Earl Theobald a Vaſſal of France to rebell againſt him, and "make War upon his Kingdom. Then all the French Biſhops there preſent, juſtified what their King had ſaid; but when Geoffrey Archbiſhop of Roüen, with all the Norman Biſhops and Abbots roſe up to make King Henry's Defence, they could not be heard; ſo the Council broke up on the ſudden in ſome confuſion.

[3.] Idem Ib. At which the King of France with his Biſhops and Barons appear'd, and make great Complaints againſt King Henry.

The Council breaks up in ſome confuſion.

Not long after [4.] the Pope came into Normandy, and met King Henry at Giſors to mediate a Peace; where his Holineſs told him, that by the Law of God, every man ought to enjoy his own Right, and that it was his deſire, and the requeſt of the whole Council, that he ſhould ſet Robert his Brother at Liberty, and reſtore him and his Son William to their Dukedom. To this the King anſwered, "That he did not take "the Dutchy from his Brother, but only ſecured his Father's Inhe- "ritance, which was by him ſquander'd away on diſſolute fellows: "That himſelf had been called into Normandy by the Biſhops to pre- "vent the deſolation of the Church; and that what he did was not "out of choice, but by the great Perſwaſions and Invitations of the "Norman Clergy and People, to preſerve that Country from utter "ruin. With this Anſwer (which was much to the ſame effect, as the Norman Biſhops would have given in the Council to the King of France) the Pope was well ſatisfied, and approved of what King Henry had done, and farther ſaid, He had heard enough of the Duke and his Son.

[4.] Idem Ib. The Pope comes into Normandy to meet King Henry, whom he perſwades to Surrender that Dutchy.

The King's Defence of Himſelf to the Pope.

But [5.] William of Malmesbury adds, that at this Interview the King was ſo liberal of his Preſents to the Pope and his Cardinals, that they ever after held him for a moſt Eloquent Orator, and all his actions to be very juſtifiable: So that leaving theſe unfortunate Princes to ſhift for themſelves, the Pope made it his buſineſs to ſtrike up a Peace between the two Kings, but it not being concluded till the following year, I ſhall defer the further mention of it till then. Yet

Anno Dom. MCXIX.

Yet I cannot here omit a ſtory related by the ſame [1.] Author to have happened at this meeting, which tho' of no great moment, yet ſhews us at what a height Learning was then in England, (viz.) that two Youths, Sons to the late Earl of Mellent, diſputing Syllogiſtically with ſome of the Cardinals, they ſo gravelled them, that they were forced to confeſs, there was more learning in theſe Weſtern parts than they had before believed.

[2.] Eadm. Lib. 5. P. 123. The death of Pope Gelaſius. Calixtus ſucceeds him; which cauſes a Schiſm at Rome.

Pope [2.] Gelaſius above mentioned (who had ſucceeded Paſchal) held the Chair but a ſhort time, for he died this year, at the Abbey of Cluny, whereupon the Cardinals, who had followed the late Pope into France, choſe Guido Archbiſhop of Vienne in his ſtead, who changed his name to Calixtus, whilſt the Emperour and his party ſtill acknowledged Burden Biſhop of Brachara in Spain (whom he had before ſet up as Lawful Pope by the name of Gregory) which Schiſm ſo confounded Men's minds in England, that ſome were for the one, and ſome for the other, whilſt divers maintain'd that neither of them were Lawfully Elected.

The Pope retires into France, and holds the Council of Rheimes.

[2.] Idem. P. 124.

But this Year this Pope being forced by the Emperour to reſide in France, he held the Council at Rheimes, (as hath been already related) where was a great appearance of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and Princes of divers Kingdoms and Provinces, with a numerous multitude of Clerks and Plebeians. [3.] To this Council the King ſent the Norman Biſhops and Abbots, and all the Engliſh Biſhops that were then with him in Normandy; viz. William Biſhop of Exeter, Ralph Biſhop of Durham, Bernard of St. Davids, and Urban of Landaff; but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury being Indiſpoſed, and hindered by other buſineſs, could not go thither.

[4.] O. V. P. 858. The King forbids the Engliſh Biſhops to make any Appeals at this Council.

But tho' the King gave the Biſhops leave to attend this Council, [4.] yet he forbad them making any Appeals thither; declaring the liberty he gave them in theſe words, Go, ſalute the Pope in my name, and only hear his Apoſtolical Precepts, but bring none of his new Inventions into my Kingdom. Which ſhews this King to have been, though an Obedient, yet no Bigotted Son of the Church of Rome.

[5.] Eadm. p. 125. Thurſtan Archbiſhop Elect of York is Conſecrated by the Pope.

About the ſame time alſo [5.] Archbiſhop Thurſtan asked leave of the King to go to the General Council, yet could he not obtain it, until he had given his Faith, that he would procure nothing from the Pope prejudicial to the See of Canterbury, or receive Epiſcopal Conſecration from him. But when he came thither, being forgetful of his promiſe, by Bribing the Roman Courtiers, he obtained his deſire, and was Conſecrated Archbiſhop by the Pope himſelf, notwithſtanding the King by a ſpecial Meſſenger had before given him notice of the difference between the Archbiſhops Ralph and Thurſtan, and on that account joyn'd with the former in a requeſt to his Holineſs not to Conſecrate him, nor to command nor ſuffer any other to do it; for if he did, the King would not admit that Archbiſhop to come into any part of his Dominions, nor would he alter his Reſolution tho' he were Excommunicated for it.

Notwithſtanding K. Henry's deſires to the contrary.

[1.] Idem Ib.

Our [1.] Author being himſelf a Monk of Canterbury, may be pardon'd if he is ſomewhat partial in this Relation, and when he gives us the reaſon why the Pope now Conſecrated Archbiſhop Thurſtan, viz.

viz. that when the King had by his Envoy moved his Holineſs not to Conſecrate him, nor permit any other, except the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to perform it: The Pope's Anſwer was, Let not the King your Maſter believe, that I will act otherwiſe in this Affair, than as right reaſon requires, for I am not ſo carried away by my own will, as that I ſhould any ways depreſs the juſt Dignity of the See of Canterbury. On which fair Anſwer the Envoy too much relyed, for the day before the Council met, he found the Pope reſolved to Conſecrate him, and that the Archbiſhop Elect was now ready to receive his Holineſs's Benediction (i.e. Conſecration at his hands) but then John Archdeacon of Canterbury (on behalf of that Archbiſhop) again challenged the Conſecration of the Archbiſhop of York to belong to his Maſter; to this the Pope replied, We will do no Injuſtice to the Church of Canterbury, yet (ſaving its Dignity) ſhall perform what we have reſolved. And ſo preſently proceeded to the Conſecration. Anno Dom. MCXIX.

To which [2.] Thomas Stubbs in his Chronicle of the Church of York adds, that Archbiſhop Thurſtan being Summoned to this Council by the Pope, he alſo ſent Letters to King Henry, commanding him to give him leave to go, which he at laſt (though unwillingly) conſented to; whereupon Thurſtan went to the Pope and found him at Tours, and ſtaying with him for almoſt half a year, he ſo well made his Intereſt, that at the Council at Rheims he obtain'd Conſecration at his hands, many Biſhops aſſiſting at it; which was the eaſier obtain'd, becauſe Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury did not appear there in Perſon, neither ſent any excuſe; only when he heard it, he wrote an Epiſtle to the Pope, complaining of the Injury his See had received by his Holineſs's late Conſecration of Thurſtan, with which the Pope not being ſatisfied, anſwered the Archbiſhop's Letter, which you may ſee at large at the end of Stubb's Chronicle, but the Pope's anſwer I do not find there; only this much is certain, that neither this Pope, nor any other, ever thought fit again to renew their Predeceſſor Pope Alexander's Injunctions, for the Archbiſhop of York's making the Profeſſion of Canonical Obedience to the See of Canterbury. But we ſhall now return to Eadmerus's Relation of what followed after this Conſecration.

[2.] Decem Scriptores. Coll. 1715.

[3.] Idem. Coll. 1735.

But when the [4.] King had certain notice of what the Pope had done, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed that he forbad the Archbiſhop of York from coming into any of his Dominions; yet not long after King Henry and the Pope meeting again at Giſors, to conſer about this and other matters, the Pope then conſented, that the King ſhould enjoy all the Rights and Cuſtoms his Father had uſed in England and Normandy; and particularly that no Perſon at any time ſhould be ſent as his Legate into England, unleſs the King himſelf had ſome ſpecial cauſe or complaint, that could not be decided by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other Biſhops of the Kingdom, and ſhould deſire the Pope to ſend a Legate on purpoſe; but this Agreement was not long obſerved by his Succeſſors.

[4.] Idem Ib. The King is highly diſpleaſed with what the Pope had done.

The Pope grants the King the Privilege not to receive any Legate from Rome unleſs he deſired one.

Then [5.] the Pope deſired the King to be Friends with Archbiſhop Thurſtan for his ſake, and to reſtore him to the Archbiſhoprick to which he was conſecrated. But the King anſwered, He had engaged his Faith not to do it ſo long as he lived. The Pope replyed, If he would do what he required, he would abſolve him from that Engagement. The King ſaid, He would conſider of it, and acquaint him with his Reſolution. Thus they parted, and the King by his Envoy ſent him this Anſwer, That whereas his Holineſs ſaid, that as he was Pope, and could abſolve him from the Oath he had made; if contrary thereunto he would receive Thurſtan for Archbiſhop of York, it ſeemed not agreeable to the juſtice and Honour of a King to conſent to ſuch an Abſolution.

And declines the Pope's Abſolution from his Oath.

Whence you may obſerve, that the trick of the Pope's abſolving Princes from their Oaths, was not then ſo eaſily ſwallow'd by our King's, as it was afterwards, as you will find by ſome of his Succeſſors.

[1.] Idem Ib. P. 126. Archbiſhop Thurſtan refuſed to come and receive his Archbiſhoprick upon the Terms the King required.

But becauſe the Pope ſo earneſtly deſired that Thurſtan might be admitted to his Archbiſhoprick, the King at laſt yielded it ſhould be ſo, provided he would come to Canterbury, and profeſs due Obedience and Subjection in writing to that See, as divers of his Predeceſſors had done before him; but if he refuſed it, the King ſolemnly profeſſed he ſhould not be Archbiſhop of York, ſo long as he was King of England: And this (ſaid the King) I have promiſed and pledged my Faith to make good. Then the Archbiſhop of Canterbury having for this time carried his Point, returned into England, and came to his See about the beginning of January; but Archbiſhop Thurſtan ſtill followed the Pope: ſo the King kept to his reſolution, and would neither admit him for Archbiſhop of York, nor ſuffer him to come into his Dominions, and Thurſtan was as ſtout as he, and refuſed to return upon thoſe Terms.

[2.] Idem. P. 131, 132. The King of Scots deſires that Eadmerus ſhould be Elected Biſhop of St. Andrews which is done accordingly.

Soon [2.] after the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's return into England, Alexander King of Scotland ſent him a Letter, deſiring him to ſend Eadmerus (then a Monk of Canterbury, and the Author of the Hiſtory from whence we borrow this Relation) that he might be Ordained Biſhop of St. Andrews; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſent him thither, and on the Feaſt of St. Peter and Paul he was Elected to that See by the Clergy and Laiety of that Kingdom, the King himſelf giving his conſent, and he was then alſo inveſted (or put in poſſeſſion) of that Biſhoprick tho' without receiving the Croſier or Ring from the King's hand, or doing him Homage; but when he was to be Conſecrated, he would receive his Conſecration from none but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as Primate of all Scotland; and nothing leſs would ſatisfie him than his going thither on purpoſe for it: but the King perceiving that he was of the like rigid temper with his Maſter Anſelm, (whoſe perpetual Companion and Director he had been in his Exile) was very deſirous to be rid of him, and make him weary of that Place, which was brought about by the ſubtle contrivance of ſome of the Scotiſh Biſhops, as you may there ſee at large, and ſo Eadmerus being only Biſhop Elect returned again to Canterbury to his Convent: yet afterwards repenting of what he had done, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive Letter to K. Alexander, wherein he ſeems willing to have ted ſomething of his former ſtiffneſs, if he might have been received as Biſhop; but the King was ſo imbitter'd againſt him, that he would never again admit him, tho' the Archbiſhop of Canterbury wrote alſo in his behalf.

The King and he differ, and upon what Points.

[3.] Idem. Pag. 138, 139, 140. Eadmerus returns to Canterbury without Conſecration: yet after would have ſubmitted to the Scotiſh King, but he would not receive him.

I have thought fit to inſert this, tho' principally relating to a private perſon, in honour to his memory, to whom we have been ſo much beholden in this preſent work for his exact account of the Eccleſiaſti-

cal and Civil Affairs in the Reign of this King, as well as that of his Father and Brother. Anno Dom. MCXIX.

The Reader may alſo obſerve the manner of the Election of the Biſhop of St. Andrews in that Age to have been by the Biſhops and Nobility, and that the King of Scotland was then too jealous of the Rights and Priviledges of that Kingdom, to admit of any Primacy or Juriſdiction of the See of Canterbury over that of St. Andrews, tho' it was not then advanced to be an Archiepiſcopal See; for [4.] the Archbiſhop of York alſo claimed the Primacy over that part of Scotland, tho' the King would not allow neither of that demand.

[4.] Idem. P. 132.

The Pope (as you have heard) having inclin'd the minds of the Kings of England and France to a Peace, they both met on a ſtated day at Giſors to Treat of it, where it was ſoon concluded, both Parties being equally weary of War. The Articles of this Peace were but few, (viz.) That all Caſtles and ſtrong Holds taken in this War ſhould be mutually reſtored, and the Priſoners on both ſides ſet at liberty without Ranſome; but becauſe King Henry thought it a diminution of his Royal Dignity to do Homage in Perſon to the King of France for the Dutchy of Normandy, he made William his Son to do it, who then received the Inveſtiture of that Dutchy from the hands of that King; and not long after all the chief Men of Normandy did Homage and took an Oath of Fealty to Prince William (being now about ſeventeen years old) as Duke of that Province. Anno Dom. MCXX.

[5.] O. V. P. 866. The Kings of England and France conclude a Peace, and on what Terms.

Here we may obſerve an Errour in [1.] Dr. Brady's Hiſtory, which, from a ſingle paſſage in Malmesbury miſunderſtood, makes this Prince to have done Homage to the King of France ſix years before; but this could not be, for that Prince was not at that time twelve years of Age, and therefore too young to ſwear Fealty. But if the Doctor had been pleaſed to read but a line further in this Author, he would have found that this Homage was made at the ſame time when this young Prince maried the Daughter of the Earl of Anjou; which yet too is an Errour in Malmesbury, for the Kings of England and France being then at War, the latter would not have received his Homage at that time, tho' it had been offer'd, and therefore it could not be performed until this year.

[1.] P. 246. A miſtake in Dr. Brady's aſſigning the Time of this Homage.

The War being now ended, and all things quiet in Normandy, the King reſolved to return into England, from whence he had been abſent near five years; wherefore he commanded a numerous Fleet to be got ready, and ordered a great many of the Military Men that had ſerved him faithfully in the late War to attend him into England, to be rewarded according to their reſpective Merits. And ſo ſoon as the Fleet was ready in the Port of Barbfleet (now Barfleur) the King with a vaſt Retinue ſet ſail on the Twenty ſixth of November in the Evening, and Landed in England the next Morning. [3.] But his Son Prince William, with Richard his Baſe Brother, Richard Earl of Cheſter, and ſeveral others of the young Nobility, choſe rather to go over by themſelves in a new Ship appointed for that purpoſe, which proved very unfortunate to them; for the Captain and the Seamen being got drunk would needs ſet Sail in the Night, and ſo ran the Ship upon a Rock, not far from the Shore, where they were all loſt: Yet Prince William might have been ſaved, had it not been for his too great affection for his Natural Siſter the Counteſs of Perche; for he with with ſome others being got into the Long-Boat, and hearing his Siſter cry out to him to have pity on her, and take her in, he commanded the Boat to be rowed back, and no ſooner were they come up to the Ship, but ſo many leaped out into the Boat in hopes to ſave their own lives, that it ſunk down to rights with all that were in it, and many of their Bodies were never found afterwards; ſo that in the Ship and Boat above an hundred and forty Perſons were drown'd, moſt of whom were young Noblemen and other Perſons of Quality, who choſe to come over in this Veſſel to wait upon the Prince; and there only eſcaped one Man (a Butcher) who ſaved his life by climbing up to the Main-maſt, and being taken up by a Veſſel that paſſed that way, gave a full Relation of all this Tragical Story.

This is looked upon by many of our Hiſtorians as a juſt Judgment of God upon theſe young Noblemen in this Ship, ſeveral of them being polluted with the horrid Sin of Sodomy; which I take notice of by the way, that if the Readers obſerve ſuch Sins to reign in their own times, tho' they may be very ſorry for it, yet they may not think Mankind grown much worſe than it was ſix hundred years ago.

[4.] R. H. How the King received the News of the loſs of his Children.

The King being ſafe arrived in England, [4.] did not receive the ill News of the loſs of his Children till the third day after, but believed they had Landed in ſome other Port; and tho' at the firſt hearing of it he fainted away, yet after a while recovering himſelf, he very well diſſembled his Grief, and bore this misfortune with wonderful patience.

[5.] Col. 1013.

But the loſs of this young Prince was not very unhappy for the Engliſh Nation, if that be true which [5.] Bromton's Chronicle relates from William of Malmesbury, (tho' we cannot find it in his Hiſtory) that he had ſuch an averſion to the Engliſh, that he threatned, If ever he came to be King, he would make them draw the Plough like Oxen.

[1.] O. V. P. 871. The King beſtows the Widows and Daughters of thoſe who were drown'd among his Courtiers.

All the advantage that the King gain'd by this ſad and fatal accident was, [1.] that having the Perſons, Honours and Eſtates of the Heirs of moſt of the Great Men caſt away now in his power, he diſtributed them very prudently; for he Married their Widows, Daughters and Siſters to his Courtiers and Military Officers, and beſtowed on them their Patrimonies, by which means he very much eſtabliſhed his Intereſt in England.

Nothing was done in Eccleſiaſtical matters worth the noting, except that this year [2.] Richard Belmeis Biſhop of London Founded a Rich Priory for Black Chanons Regular, at Chiche in Eſſex, to the Honour of St. Oſithe.

[3.] C. S. Eadm. Lib. 6. P. 136. The King by the advice of his Great Council reſolves to Marry the Daughter of the D. of Lovain.

King Henry [3.] now kept his Chriſtmaſs at Bramton, and preſently after, by the advice of a Council of the Biſhops and Chief Men of the Kingdom aſſembled at London, at the Feaſt of Epiphany, he reſolved to Marry Adeliza the Beautiful Daughter of Geoffrey Duke of Lovain, in hopes of having Iſſue Male, but he was deceived in his expectation, for ſhe never proved with Child by him: This Mariage was Conſummated at Windſor preſently after Candlemaſs, and ſhe was Crowned Queen by Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury the day following.

[4.] Dr. P's Chro. P. 184. The Welſh Invade Cheſhire.

But tho' all things were now quiet in England, [4.] yet the Welſhmen would not be long at reſt, for Griffyn Prince of North-Wales, being encouraged by the death of Richard Earl of Cheſter, (one of them who lately periſhed perished with the young Prince) sent his Son into Cheshire, where they burnt two Castles, killed I know not how many Men, and made great Spoils: whereupon the King raising a Potent Army marched into Wales, but when he came as far as Snowdon, the Prince of North-Wales submitted himself, and by giving large Presents, with a Thousand Head of Cattel and Hostages, appeas'd the King's displeasure; and so the Army return'd home without any considerable damage on either side.

Anno Dom. MCXXI.

Whereupon the King enters Wales, and Prince Griffyn submits, and makes his Peace.

But I cannot omit here taking notice of an Accident that chiefly procured this Peace: [5.] King Henry going with a small Body through a narrow Lane between two Mountains, whilst the main Body of his Army marched a further and plainer way about, the Welshmen who kept this narrow way where the King was to pass, having the Advantage the Ground, fell furiously upon his Men, killed some, and wounded divers more, and King Henry Himself was hit upon the Breast with an Arrow, but tho it was repell'd by his Breast-Plate, yet he was therewith so discouraged, that he immediately sent to the Enemy for a Parley, which at last ended in a Peace.

[5.] W. M. Pag. 89*b*. An Accident the chief cause of this Peace.

As for Ecclesiastical Affairs, there happened little considerable [1.], only Thurstan Archbishop of York having the year before obtain'd a Bull from the Pope to King Henry and Ralph Archbishop of Canterbury, wherein he threatned within one Month to put the whole Kingdom under an Interdict, and to Excommunicate the King himself, unless the Archbishop of York were restored to his See without any Exaction of Obedience from him. This matter came to be Treated of in a Council or Convention of some of the Great Men of the Kingdom who went to receive the new Queen at Dover, where after a full discussion of the Priviledges of the Church of Canterbury, tho' it was very well understood (says my Author) how little the Pope's late Decrees suited with God's Honour, yet lest the punishment threaten'd in the Pope's Letter, might affect the King or the Archbishop of Canterbury, Thurstan was at last permitted to return into England, and to reside at York, on this condition, That he should not Celebrate Mass out of his own Dioceſs, until he had made satisfaction to the See of Canterbury, which this Archbishop would never perform; so that by his constancy in this Affair, back'd by the Pope's Bull, he freed his Church from that Subjection to the See of Canterbury, which had been impos'd upon it by Archbishop Lanfranc during the times of the three last Bishops.

[1.] Eadm. Lib. 6. P. 136. Thurstan Archbishop of York is by the Pope's threats restored to his See.

Pope [2.] Calixtus by the help of an Army having taken his Anti-Pope Gregory, and thrust him into a Monastery, being now secure of the Papacy, sent his Legates over all Europe with notice of his success, and gave to one Peter, a Monk of the Order of Clugny (of a Noble Roman Family) a Legantine Power over France, Britain, Ireland and the Orcades; whereupon King Henry sent the Bishop of St. David's to conduct him into England; but when he arrived, the King told him, That the Authority of his Legateship could not be confirm'd without the consent of the Bishops, Abbots and Chief Men in a General Assembly of the whole Kingdom: and further, That he could not part with the Antient Customs of England, granted by the Pope, of which one of the chiefest was, That England was free, and not subject to any Legantine Power. With which Information, and some rich Presents

Who is not admitted to act, but is presently sent back.

Anno Dom. MCXXI. ſents he departed, not offering to Execute his Commiſſion in this Kingdom.

As for Foreign Affairs I find little conſiderable, only that [3.] Fulk Earl of Anjou being now return'd from Jeruſalem, ſent to the King to demand his Daughter the Widow of the late Prince William, and ſhe was ſent over to him accordingly.

[3.] C. S. The Widow of the late Prince William is ſent over to her Father.

Anno Dom. MCXXII. King Henry now kept his Chriſtmaſs at Norwich, the reſt of the year produced little worth noting, [4.] only the King taking his Progreſs after Michaelmaſs into the North parts of England, went from York as far as the Antient City of Caerliſle, (called in Latin Luguballia) and liking its Situation, ordered a Wall with Towers to be built about it, Fortifying it with a Caſtle, and from thence he returned to York; and after hearing and deciding ſeveral Differences between the Citizens and the People of the Adjacent Country, he return'd back again into the Southern Parts.

[4.] Idem. S. D.

Nor was there any great change in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs this year, only [5] Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury died about the end of October; he was a Prelate of great affability and good nature, yet cenſured as a Man not grave enough in his Converſation (being more given to Jeſting than became a Perſon of his high Character) yet for all this he knew very well how to inſiſt upon the Priviledges of his See, of which our Author [1.] gives this remarkable Inſtance (tho' it happened the year before) that when he was about to Crown the new Queen, whilſt he ſtood before the Altar ready to begin Maſs, he ſaw the King ſitting on his Throne, with his Crown on his Head, and knowing he had not put it on, and that no other ought to have done it whilſt he was near the place, he went immediately to him, and asked him, Who it was had put the Crown upon his Head? At which the King being a little ſtartled, anſwered, That it being a matter of no great concern, he had not minded it. Then reply'd the Archbiſhop, Who ever put it on, he had no right to do it, and as long as it continues thus upon your Head, I ſhall not perform the preſent Ceremony. Then replied the King, If (as you ſay) it was not rightly put on, do what you think good, I ſhall not at all contradict you. Upon which the Archbiſhop took the Crown off (he himſelf untying the Stays wherewith it was faſtened under his Chin) which thoſe that ſtood by beholding, they deſired him to deſiſt, and to place the Crown again upon the King's Head, which he at laſt conſented to; and ſo having ſung Maſs he performed the Ceremony of the Queen's Coronation. I have given you this Relation, that the Reader may obſerve in what Subjection the Kings of England were in thoſe days to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who could thus preſume to take the Crown from off the King's Head, only becauſe he had put it on without his leave and aſſiſtance.

Anno Dom. MCXXIII. [2.] This Year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Dunſtable, whither came to him Ambaſſadours from the Earl of Anjou, demanding the repayment of his Daughter's Portion, becauſe Prince William her Husband deceaſed before the Mariage was Conſummated; but the Earl not receiving the ſatisfaction he expected, not long after, to be revenged on the King, Married her Elder Siſter to William, Son to Duke Robert, on whom he alſo beſtowed the Earldom of Mans, promiſing him his aſſiſtance to obtain his Father's Inheritance.

Then

Then [3.] King Henry went to Woodſtock, where he had newly built a Palace, and incloſed a Park (the firſt of that kind in England) in which as he rode between Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, and Robert Bloet Biſhop of Lincoln, the latter ſunk down from his Horſe in a Swoon, but the King alighting took him up in his Arms, and made him to be carried home, where he ſhortly after died. He was a Prelate of a looſe life, and of no very good Character for any thing.

[3.] Idem Ib. The ſudden death of Robert Biſhop of Lincoln.

The King to prevent the Attempts of his Enemies, immediately diſpatched his Baſe Son Robert, and Ranulph Earl of Cheſter into Normandy with great Forces to ſecure all places of Strength, till he himſelf could be there; [4.] after which He went to Portſmouth, and ſtayed there till Whitſunday was over, waiting for a Wind to carry him into Normandy, to prevent the ill deſigns of his Nephew William who had now underhand brought divers of the [5.] King's greateſt Friends over to his Party; for ſome Months after Walleran Earl of Mellent, with Robert his Brother, Earl of Leiceſter, who had been both bred up in the King's Court, and uſed like his own Children, rebelled againſt him, (but the reaſon is not told us, tho' perhaps it was) in hopes to better their condition by ſetting up William Son to Duke Robert; with theſe joyned Almeric de Montfort Earl of Eureux, and William de Romare, with ſeveral Norman Barons, who all conſpired to drive the King out of that Dutchy.

But [1.] ſo ſoon as he arrived at Roüen, he muſter'd his Army, and took and burnt a Town of the Earl of Mellent's called Bryon, all except the Caſtle, which was too ſtrong to be taken; from thence they marched to another Town of his called Pontodomer, which he alſo burnt with all the Country for twenty Miles round; but the King was not able at firſt to take the Caſtle of that place, it being very well Fortified, yet after he had Beſieged it for about ſeven Weeks, he took it by the means of a high Tower of Wood, which he built before it. Some other of the Caſtles which Earl Walleran and Hugh de Montfort and other Barons had Fortified againſt him, he likewiſe took; others he was forced to leave untaken, becauſe of the frequent Invaſions made by his Nephew William, who chiefly relyed upon the Aſſiſtance of Fulk Earl of Anjou his Father-in-Law; but the King much more feared the Treachery of his own Subjects, than the Invaſion of Strangers; by reaſon of which Foreign diſturbances, England was this year cruelly oppreſſed with Taxes, which were now impoſed upon all ſorts of People, for the carrying on the King's Wars abroad.

[1.] S.D. Col. 249. The King takes ſeveral Towns and Caſtles in Normandy from the Rebells.

The only conſiderable Eccleſiaſtical Affair that happen'd this year, was, [2.] that the King before his going beyond Sea, Summoned a Great Council of his Nobility at Glouceſter on Candlemaſs-day, where appeared all the Biſhops, Abbots and Barons of England, at which he commanded them to chuſe whom they pleaſed for Archbiſhop of Canterbury, promiſing that he would confirm their Election; whereupon the Biſhops conſulting together reſolved among themſelves, that they would never more have a Monk to be Archbiſhop, (I ſuppoſe for ſome Inconveniencies they had obſerved to have follow'd it) but the Prior and Monks of Canterbury did all they could to oppoſe their Election of an Archbiſhop, tho' to no purpoſe, for the Biſhop of Salisbury (who Governed at that time all England under the King) was too hard for them; ſo four of the Secular Clergy being propoſed, the Choice

Choice fell upon a certain Chanon Regular, called William Carboil, Prior of St. Oſithes at Chiche, (a late built Abbey) then the King confirmed the ſaid Election (as he had promiſed) and all the Biſhops of England acknowledged him for their Archbiſhop, but moſt of the Earls and Barons with the Monks rejected him: Upon this Henry the Pope's Legate (who was lately come over about the Peter-pence) interpoſed, and ſaid, That tho' it was unjuſt, for One who was no Monk to be ſet over thoſe that were, yet ſince the King by reaſon of the great Power the Biſhop of Salisbury had with him, would not alter the Choice, it was better for them to comply. Then Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York offer'd to Conſecrate him, but the Archbiſhop would not conſent to it, unleſs he would own him for Primate of all England, which the other refuſing, the Archbiſhop was Conſecrated by the Biſhop of London, and five other Biſhops at Canterbury.

Not [3.] long after which the new Archbiſhop went to Rome to obtain his Pall, being accompanied by Bernard Biſhop of St. David's, and ſeveral Abbots. About the ſame time alſo Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York arrived there to maintain his Cauſe againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who now renewed the Old Claim of Canonical Obedience; but the Pope at firſt refuſed to give Audience to the new Elected Archbiſhop, becauſe he had been choſen againſt the conſent of the Monks; tho' ſhortly after That prevail'd there which commonly does elſewhere, viz. good ſtore of Gold and Silver: So the Pope being pacified, beſtowed upon him the Pall: than he took an Oath of Subjection to the Pope upon the Heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, and ſo he return'd home with his Holineſs's Benediction, tho' without prevailing in the main buſineſs he went about, (viz.) the Superiority over the Archbiſhop of York, which was not diſpatched; for the Bulls or Priviledges of former Popes being now demanded to be produced, by which the Archbiſhops of Canterbury claim'd it, thoſe that came with him could only ſay that they had been burnt in the great fire that had lately conſumed their Church; ſo they produced only Tranſcripts of them, which not being looked upon as Authentick, and the Archbiſhop of York producing certain Original Bulls of Priviledge granted to his See, which were better accepted; ſo the Cauſe being like to go for him, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury went away without ſtaying to receive the Pope's final Determination.

Anno Dom. MCXXIV. C. S. H. H. [4.]

All this Year [4.] King Henry ſpent in Normandy, by reaſon of the great Quarrels which were then on foot between him and the King of France, and the Earl of Anjou, as alſo thoſe Earls and Barons who had lately revolted from him, againſt whom he had this year extraordinary good ſucceſs, which happen'd thus:

On the Twenty fifth of March Walleran Earl of Mellent had occaſion to go from his Caſtle of Belmount to another called Watteville, being accompanied by Almeric, the King of France's Steward, the Earl of Eureux, Hugh Fitz-Gervaſe, and Hugh de Montfort, with many other Noblemen and Knights; of which William de Tankerville King Henry's Chamberlain having notice, and getting together all the Forces he could out of Adjacent Caſtles, he marched forth and engaging with them drew them into an Ambuſh, whereby their whole Forces were routed, and all the ſaid Earls together with Hugh de Montfort, and many other Norman Barons, with above Eighty Knights

Knights were taken Priſoners; and being all brought to the King, he committed the Earl of Mellent Priſoner to the Caſtle of Roüen, but afterwards he was brought over into England, (as you will find the next year but one:) Then the King went and took in all the Caſtles and Strong Places which either the ſaid Earl or his Conſederates had held out againſt him; but ſome of them who had eſcaped came in, and obtained their Pardons of the King. Anno Dom. MCXXIV

[5.] But if we look into England we find nothing here but troubles and complaints, for about the beginning of December, the King's Juſtitiary Ralph Baſſet, and many Barons held a Council at a place called Hundehoge in Leiceſterſhire, (but where it was I know not) and there they cauſed above Forty four Thieves to be hanged, beſides ſix others, who loſt their Eyes and Privy Members; tho', as ſome Perſons of credit reported, many innocent Perſons ſuffered amongſt them; which is not unlikely, if what our Author relates be true, that the poor people were now againſt all right miſerably oppreſs'd, being firſt robbed of their Eſtates, and afterwards of their Lives; for thoſe that had any thing to loſe, were deprived of it by great Taxes, and thoſe that had not, were ready to die with hunger; there being this year a very great Famine in England, partly from the unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather, which produced a ſcarcity of all ſorts of Grain, and partly by reaſon of the bad Money which was now become ſo common, that a Man who had a Pound of it, could not therewith buy twelve Penniworth of Commodities. [5.] C. S.

[1.] As for Foreign Affairs, Alexander King of Scots, after Eighteen year's Reign in great Domeſtick Troubles, died this year, being ſucceeded by his Brother David, Earl of Northampton, who held that Kingdom in as great quiet as the other had met with diſturbance. [1.] C. S. C. M.

[2.] In Eccleſiaſtical Affairs there happen'd nothing conſiderable, only that Pope Calixtus the II. deceaſing about the beginning of the Year, he was ſucceeded by Honorius the Second, who ſate in the Popedom but a ſhort time. [2.] Chron. Thom. Wikes.

[3.] King Henry continuing ſtill in Normandy, and the corruption of Coin increaſing in England, the King ſent over ſtrict Commands, that the Penalty of the Law ſhould be ſeverely inflicted upon all that were found Guilty thereof; whereupon Roger Biſhop of Salisbury (then the King's Juſtitiary) commanded all that were Convicted of that Crime (who were a great many) to be brought to Wincheſter at Chriſtmaſs, where every one of them had their Right-hand and Teſticles cut off; which Puniſhment did for the future more deter Men from committing that Crime, than the fear of death it ſelf would have done. Anno Dom. MCXXV. [3.] C. S.

[4.] But the ſame year produced a very remarkable Accident in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, for Pope Honorius now ſent over John de Creme Presbyter Cardinal, as his Legate de Latere into England; who, coming to Normandy, and there obtaining the King's leave to paſs over hither, not long after his arrival held a General Synod at London, where he ſeverely enveighed againſt the Mariage of Prieſts, ſaying, That it was an horrid Sin for a Prieſt to riſe from the ſide of an Harlot, and then to make the Body of Chriſt; yet the next Night after (having ſaid Maſs that very day) he himſelf was taken in Bed with a Whore. Henry of Huntington, who was himſelf a Secular Prieſt, and the Son of a Prieſt, [4.] H. and living at this very time, (after having made an Apology for being ſo bold with the Fathers of the Church) is the firſt Author that gives us this Story at large; and concludes, That the thing was too notorious to be denied, neither ought to be concealed. In which he is alſo followed by Roger Hoveden, Matt. Paris, and Ranulph Higden; and the two laſt were Monks themſelves; ſo this Hypocritical Cardinal was forced to return with much more ſhame, than he came hither with honour, tho' he had before by his Legantine Power (with the conſent of the Synod) made divers Canons for the Reformation of the Clergy, (of which this concerning Prieſt's Mariages was one) but they being moſt of them the ſame with thoſe that had been before Ordained in Archbiſhop Auſelm's time, need not be repeated; only I ſhall remark that * Gervaſe of Canterbury adds, concerning this Legate's Extraordinary Power here, that it was a thing never heard of ſince the firſt coming of Auguſtine, till this preſent William, that the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, who were look'd upon as Patriarchs, ſhould be made ſubject to the Authority of a Legate from Rome.

Anno Dom. MCXXVI

King Henry ſpent the greateſt part of this year in Normandy, but what he did there all the Summer our [5] Hiſtorians do not tell us, only that about Michaelmaſs he returned into England, bringing over along with him the Empreſs Mathilda his Daughter, whom, being now become a Widow by the late death of the Emperour Henry the Fifth her Husband (who deceaſed in the flower of his Age) the King was reſolved to Marry to ſome Foreign Prince, the better to ſtrengthen his Intereſt abroad.

[5.] C. S. H. H. The King returns into England, and brings over his Daughter the Empreſs along with him.

The King alſo brought over with him Priſoners, Waleran Earl of Mellent, and Hugh Earl of Montfort, the former of whom he committed to Walling ford Caſtle, and the latter to that of Windſor. Then Almeric de Montfort with divers others of the King's Enemies finding it in vain any longer to oppoſe him, made their Peace, and thereupon were reſtored to their Eſtates.

[1.] Idem Ib. David King of Scots Viſits the King. Duke Robert is committed to the Cuſtody of Earl Robert, the King's Son.

[1.] Almoſt ſo ſoon as the King return'd, David King of Scots came to make him a Viſit, whom the King received very Honourably, and ſpent all this year in England; and by his advice, together with that of the Empreſs, he took his Brother Duke Robert out of the Cuſtody of Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, and committed him to Earl Robert his Baſe Son, who kept him cloſe Priſoner firſt in the Caſtle of Briſtol, and afterwards in that of Caerdiff, till his death; which is all I can find conſiderable that was done this year.

Anno Dom. MCXXVII.

[2.] C. S. W. M. The King makes all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons of England ſwear to the Succeſſion of the Empreſs Mathilda. * Saxon Chr. Thanes.

The [2.] King now kept his Chriſtmaſs at Windſor, where, beſides David King of Scots, there appeared all the Chief Men of both Clergy and Laiety in England; but fearing he ſhould have no Iſſue by his new Queen, and being deſirous to ſecure the Crown in his own Line, he cauſed all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and * Barons to ſwear, That if he ſhould die without Iſſue Male, they would receive his Daughter Maud the Empreſs for their Queen: the firſt that ſwore to the Succeſſion was William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, next were the Biſhops, and then the Abbots; the firſt of the Lay-men was David King of Scots, and then Stephen Earl of Mortaign and Boloign, King Henry's Nephew by his Siſter Adela; then Robert Duke of Glouceſter, between whom and Stephen there was great Emulation, who ſhould ſwear firſt; the former claiming the Precedence as being the King's Son, the other as his Nephew lawfully begotten all the Clergy and Nobility being thus bound by Oath, the Council was diſſolved. Anno Dom. MCXXVII.

King's

Then [3.] the King paſt his Lent and Eaſter at Woodſtock, where he received the ill News of the death of Charles Earl of Flanders, who was murthered by ſome of his Nobles, as he was at his Devotions in the great Church of Bruges; and (which was worſe) that Lewis King of France had conferred that Earldom upon William Son to Robert Duke of Normandy, in right of his Grand-mother Maud Queen of England; and that in conſideration thereof he had reſtored to the French King all thoſe Territories which he had formerly beſtowed upon him, (viz.) Pontois, Chaumont and Mante, and all the Country now called Veuxin Francois; and beſides what elſe the King had given him with Jane half-Siſter to his Queen in Mariage; At which News [4.] the King was ſo much diſturbed, that he thereupon Summon'd a Council at Weſtminſter towards the end of May, to conſider what was beſt to be done in this Affair; and William Archbiſhop of Canterbury held a Synod of the Clergy at the ſame place.

[3.] H. H. Charles Earl of Flanders murther'd in the Church at Bruges.

[4.] H. H. The King thereupon Summons a Great Council.

After the [5] King had kept his Whitſontide at Wincheſter, he ſent his Daughter into Normandy, attended by Robert Earl of Glouceſter, in order to be Married to Fulk Son to the Earl of Anjou, where ſhe was not long after Betrothed to him by the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and in Auguſt following the King went over himſelf to be preſent at the Conſummation of the Mariage; which being done without the advice and conſent of the Biſhops and Nobility, (none being privy to it but Robert Earl of Glouceſter, Brian Son to Alan Earl of Richmond, and the Biſhop of Liſieux) cauſed great diſcontent as well among the Engliſh as Norman Nobility, and gave juſt occaſion for ſome to Prognoſticate, that after the King's death they would fall off from the Oath they had ſworn to her; but the King did it Politickly, to ſecure his Intereſt with the Earl of Anjou, againſt his Nephew William now made Earl of Flanders.

[5.] C. S. W. M. P. 995. b. The King ſends over his Daughter to be Married to Fulk Son to the Earl of Anjou.

Which cauſes great Diſcontent among the Nobility.

In Eccleſiaſtical [1.] Affairs this was the moſt conſiderable, that William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as Legate to the Pope, Summon'd a General Synod of all the Biſhops, Abbots and Religious Perſons throughout England, beſides a great multitude of inferior Clergy and Laymen * of all ſorts, who met at London, ſo that there was a very full Aſſembly; Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York was to have been there, but excuſed himſelf for ſome reaſons he gave in his Letters; and Randulph Biſhop of Durham was taken Sick by the way. This Council was held on the Thirteenth of May, wherein, by the Common conſent of the Biſhops, there were divers Canons made, the Principal of which were theſe:

[1.] C. F. W. M. A General Synod held at London.

* Tam divitum quam mediotrium.

1. That no Eccleſiaſtical Benefices or Dignities ſhould be Bought or Sold.

2. That none ſhould be made a Dean or Arch-deacon, unleſs he were a Presbyter.

From whence it appears, that before this Decree it was uſual for Lay-men to enjoy thoſe Dignities. There were alſo divers other Canons made in this Council, but ſince they are only to enforce thoſe of former Synods concerning the Celebacy of the Clergy, or ſome other Duties enjoyn'd them, or elſe about the Habits of Abbeſſes and Nuns, I will Anno Dom. MCXXVII. will paſs them by, only I cannot omit taking notice that it was now Ordain'd, That no Perſon whatſoever ſhould give or receive Tythes without the conſent of the Biſhop of the Dioceſs.

Now before this Canon it was uſual for Lay-Patrons to annex their Tythes to what Churches they pleaſed, tho' out of their own Pariſhes, which was forbid by this Decree, without the conſent of their Dioceſans.

The King confirms its Decrees.

This Council having ſate three days, was diſſolved, after its Decrees had been confirm'd by the King's Aſſent.

Anno Dom. MCXXVIII. King [2.] Henry continued all this year in Normandy to watch the motions of Earl William his Nephew, whom the King of France ſupported to the utmoſt of his Power; wherefore to be even with him, King Henry marched with a great Army into France, and that King not having Forces ſufficient ready to aſſiſt him, he ſtayed at a place called Eſparne for the ſpace of eight days with no more diſturbance, than if he had been in his own Kingdom, and then returned into Normandy; ſo that at laſt the French King was compell'd not to ſend any more Succours unto Earl William.

[2.] H. H. R. H. King Henry Invades France, and Quarters in it without any moleſtation.

This Prince [3.] now growing inſupportably cruel and harſh to his new Subjects, they ſet up Theodoric Landgrave of Alſacia againſt him, (who alſo pretended a Title to that Earldom) to whom many Towns revolted, and amongſt them Aloſt (now Ælſt in Flanders) which William Beſieged, and having routed the Forces of the Landgrave, who came to relieve it, and that the Caſtle of that Place was juſt ready to be Surrendered to him, he was with a Lance wounded under the Ball of the Thumb near the Wriſt, which, preſently turning to a Gangrene, [4.] killed him within five days at the Abbey of St. Bertin, near St. Omers: He was a Man of Great Courage, but too Parſimonious for a Prince; ſo that to avoid his Father's Vice, Prodigality, he ſeems to have run into the contrary Extreme; he is therefore in the Belgick Hiſtories, Sirnamed Miſer; in him expired all the Legitimate Iſſue of Duke Robert; but he had two Baſe Sons, Richard who was long ſince killed Hunting in New Foreſt, and William who was afterwards ſlain in the Holy Land.

[3.] Idem Ib. William Earl of Flanders uſes his Subjects very harſhly, who thereupon revolt to the Landgrave.

The Earl dies of a ſlight Wound in his Wriſt.

[4.] C. S.

Upon the death of this Prince the K. of France deſiſts from troubling King Henry.

This Prince being ſuddenly taken off in the very flower of his Age, it ſo far diſappointed the King of France's deſigns, that he left off farther troubling the King, by whom we find nothing more done this year, only that he continued ſtill in Normandy, for which I rather follow the authority of the Saxon Chronicle, and Henry of Huntington, than that of William of Malmesbury, who is not often ſo exact in point of time.

Anno Dom. MCXXIX. The [5.] King thus continuing in Normandy, ſent over for the Earls Waleran and Hugh above mentioned, who were kept cloſe Priſoners in England, and ſome time after having taken Pledges of them for their future quiet Behaviour, he permitted the latter to return into France, and to Waleran the King was ſhortly afterwards throughly reconciled, and for the ſake of his Father, the late Earl of Mellent, not only reſtored him to all his Lands (except one Caſtle) but alſo to his Favour; which ſhews that the King was not ſo implacable but that he could forgive injuries; This Nobleman having been one of the chieſeſt of thoſe who had rebelled againſt him ſome years before.

[5.] C. S.

The King ſends for the Earls Waleran and Hugh, and gives them their Liberty, and is alſo reconciled to the former.

And

Anno Dom. MCXXIX.

And now [1.] the King having ſetled his Affairs in Normandy much to his own ſatisfaction, returned into England about Harveſt, where I find little or no alteration in Civil Affairs; and therefore [2.] William of Malmesbury having ſcarce any thing elſe to write, is fain to give us a ſtrange Relation, how long Hair came again to be left off in England, which notwithſtanding the ſtrict Prohibitions formerly made, was now come in faſhion again; And becauſe it ſhews us, that there is nothing new that has not been in uſe heretofore, I ſhall here give you the Story of in Brief. A certain Knight who was very proud of his fine long Head of Hair, dream'd one Night, that ſomething had ſtrangled him with it, with which Dream he awaking very much diſturbed, had the next day his Hair cut ſhort, in which Mode he was preſently followed by moſt of the Nobility and Gentry of England; yet notwithſtanding about a year after the ſame exceſs ſo far prevailed, that all who looked upon themſelves as Well * Bred Gentlemen, did now vie with the Women in the length of their Hair, † which when it fail'd, they helped it out with borrowed Locks or Borders; ſo that it ſeems even the King's own Faſhion of ſhort Hair did not long continue.

[1.] Id. Ib. The King returns into England.

[2.] P. 99. b. A Relation how long Hair came to grow out of Faſhion.

* Curiales.

But tho' this [3.] year affords little of Civil, yet it gives us ſomewhat of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; for the King not long after his return gave order to William Archbiſhop of Canterbury to Summon a General Synod of all the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Deans, Arch-Deacons, and other Clergy-men, to be aſſembled at Michaelmaſs to Treat about Religious Matters; and being met at Weſtminſter, it was there decreed, That all Arch-Deacons and Prieſts ſhould quit their Wives before St. Andrew's day, or elſe be abſolutely deprived of their Offices and Livings; but through the too great eaſineſs of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and other Biſhops this Conſtitution came to nothing; for the Execution of this Law being left wholly to the King, he taking Money of moſt of thoſe Arch-Deacons and Prieſts permitted them to go home again, and keep their Wives as they did before.

[3.] C. S. H. H. Another General Synod Summon'd where Prieſts are forbid to keep their Wives.

But it comes to nothing, and the reaſon of it.

As for other Eccleſiaſtical Matters of leſs moment, [4.] this year Robert D'oyley, the Second of that Name, a Baron of Norman Extraction, built a Rich and ſtately Monaſtery at Oſeney near Oxford, for Chanons of the Order of St. Auguſtine; this Church is now quite ruin'd, but upon the Deſolation of Abbeys it was intended by King Henry the Eighth for the Cathedral of the new Biſhoprisk of Oxon he then Founded, but it was afterwards removed to Chriſt-Church, then Dedicated to St. Frideſwide.

[4.] Vid. Annal. de Oſeney in Bib. Coton. & M. A. T. 2. p. 136. Oſney Abbey Founded.

Alſo about this Time (tho' I cannot find the exact year) [5.] William Warelwaſt Biſhop of Exeter having cauſed the antient Colledge, conſiſting of a Dean and four Prebendaries at Plimpton in Devonſhire, to be diſſolved for their looſe Lives, he (to make the Church amends) not long after Founded at the ſame Place, and richly endow'd a Priory of Chanons of St. Auguſtine's Order.

[5.] Vid. M. A. T. 2. P. 6. As alſo a rich Priory at Plimpton.

As for Foreign Affairs this year, Lewis Sirnamed the Groſs, King of France, cauſed his Son Philip to be Crowned King, and to reign with himſelf; for now growing in years, and being alſo very unweildy by reaſon of his great Corpulency, he was reſolved by degrees to diſcharge himſelf of the Burthen of Government, and place it in his Son's hands.

[1.] O. V. The King of France cauſes his Son Philip to be Crown'd King.

This

Anno Dom. MCXXX.

This year produced little worth the noting in Civil Affairs, only King Henry kept his Chriſtmaß at Worceſter, and his Eaſter at Woodſtock; where Geoffrey de Clynton a Baron was accuſed of Treaſon. Then the King went over into Normandy about Michaelmaſs, and there ſtayed till that time Twelve-month, and in the mean while all things remain'd quiet at home, for we do not read of any Wars or Diſturbances that then happened, or any thing conſiderable in Civil or Eccleſiaſtical Matters in England.

[2.] C. S. H. H. The King goes over again into Normandy.

Therefore we ſhall now take ſome notice of Affairs abroad. [3.] This year at Rome began a greater Schiſm than ever had been yet known, for Pope Honorius lying at the point of death, before the breath was quite out of his Body, one Faction of the Cardinals choſe Geoffrey Cardinal-Deacon of St. Angelo, whom they called Innocent II. and preſently after the Pope's Interment, another party of them choſe Peter a Presbyter Cardinal, which was done by the means of his Brothers, who were the Richeſt and moſt Powerful Noblemen in all Rome: theſe having Elected and Conſecrated him, called him Anacletus, who thereupon preſently drove Innocent out of Italy into France, where he was owned for Pope by the Kings of France and England, whilſt the other was ſupported by the Romans, and alſo by the King of Sicily; ſo that [5.] as William of Malmesbury (who lived at that time) tells the Story, it was a very difficult matter for the Laiety to diſcern which of theſe two was rightly Elected.

[3.] W. M. p. 99. b. A great Schiſm at Rome, by reaſon of two Popes being choſen at once.

Pope Innocent owned in France and England.

This year in June the King return'd into England, bringing over with him the Empreſs his Daughter, who was lately parted from her Husband by reaſon of ſome private Quarrels that had happened between them. Not long after her return a great Council of all the Clergy and Nobility was held at Northampton, where they all renewed the Oath of Fealty which they had already taken to her, and then by their advice, ſhe was ſent back to her Husband, who now deſired her Company, and being joyfully received by him, ſhe within leſs than two years bore him a Son called Henry, who was afterwards King of England, as you will find in due time.

Anno Dom. MCXXXI.

[5.] W. M. p. 100. a. C. F. W. The King returns again into England with his Daughter, being then parted from her Husband, but ſhe is ſoon ſent back to him.

Nothing elſe happened this year conſiderable abroad, only [1.] Philip the young King of France, who had been Crowned by his Father, (as you have already heard) riding out through the Suburbs of Paris, was killed by a fall from his Horſe, by occaſion of a Hog that ran between his Legs, which cauſing him to ſtumble, he flung the young Prince, and ſo bruiſed him with his Heels that he died that night. Not long after which the King his Father, to comfort himſelf for ſo great a loſs, cauſed his Second Son of the ſame name with himſelf, to be Anointed and Crown'd at Reims by the hands of Pope Innocent the Second, who then held a Council there againſt Peter Leon the Anti-pope.

Anno Dom. MCXXXII.

The King kept his Chriſtmaß at Dunſtable, after which was a great Council held at London, where divers matters were Treated on, but not of any moment; yet before I proceed further, I cannot omit taking notice of a great miſtake of William of Malmesbury, and the Continuator of Florence of Worceſter, in ſuppoſing King Henry to have gone this year into Normandy, and as a confirmation of it, they tell us of a great Eclipſe of the Sun which then happened; and this indeed ſhews us the Error of their Account, for it falling out upon the third third of Auguſt, could not (as may appear by an Aſtronomical Calculation) have happen'd this year on that day, and therefore we muſt place it under the next. Anno Dom. MCXXXII.

But it is certain that this very year [3.] the greateſt part of the City of London was again burnt, ſo that a Man may admire not ſo much how often it hath been burnt, being (till of late) almoſt all of Wood, but how ſoon it was again rebuilt, which may make the laſt great Fire in our Times as well as the ſpeedy rebuilding of this City the leſs wonderful. [3.] C. F. M. P. The greateſt part of London Burnt.

Nothing happened obſervable in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, only the [4.] King Founded a Church and Epiſcopal See at Caerliſle, to which he layed the Countries of Cumberland, Weſtmorland, and part of Northumberland, and appointed Athulf his Confeſſor, then Abbot of St. Oſwald's Abbey, the firſt Biſhop thereof. [4.] Vid. Monaſt. Angl. Vol. 2. The Church and See of Caerliſle Founded.

Alſo this year [5.] Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York Founded a Rich Abbey for the Ciſtertian Order in Yorkſhire, and Dedicated it to the Bleſſed Virgin. The Place was at firſt a meer Deſart, and was upon the Foundation of the Monaſtery called Fountains from divers Springs or Fountains there ariſing. [5.] Idem. T. 1. P. 733. The Abbey of Fountains Founded.

King [1.] Henry being now much indiſpoſed, kept his Chriſtmaſs at Windſor, but ſometime after recovered his Health. I cannot omit here taking notice of what [2.] Rad. de Diceto mentions under this year, tho' I find it in no other Author, and therefore ſomewhat doubt the truth of it, but it is that K. Henry hearing in March of the Birth of his Grandſon Henry, Son to his Daughter the Empreſs, he was ſo well pleas'd with it, that Summoning together the Chief Men of his Kingdom, he appointed his ſaid Daughter and her Heirs to be his Succeſſors and obliged them all to take an Oath to obſerve this Ordinance; which if it were ſo, the People of England were twice ſworn to the Succeſſion; but I ſhall ſubmit the belief of this to the Reader's Diſcretion. Anno Dom. MCXXXIII. [1.] H. H. [2.] Abbr. Chron. The King makes all the Chief of the Kingdom again ſwear to the Succeſſion of his Daughter and her Heirs.

But this is more certain [3.] that the King having paſſed his Eaſter in his New Palace at Oxford, and having ſome time after beſtowed the Biſhoprick of Ely upon Nigel, Nephew to Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, and that of Durham on Geoffrey his Chancellor, about the end of Summer he reſolved to paſs over into Normandy, and [4.] in the beginning of Auguſt went on Ship-board, on which very day, being the third of Auguſt (or the fourth of the Nones) as moſt of our Authors place it) there happened ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, that William of Malmesbury (tho' he be miſtaken in the day in placing it on the firſt of the Nones; yet could not be ſo in the Obſervation he made of it, when he tells us he ſaw the Stars that appeared about, or near the * Sun, which muſt needs be very terrible to thoſe who were not wont to obſerve ſuch unuſual Events; and the next day but one early in the Morning, happened ſo great an Earth-quake (which began with a horrid noiſe under Ground, that (as our Author relates) the Houſe in which he then was ſeemed to be thrice liſted up, and as often ſink down again into its place. I thought theſe things worth the obſerving, ſince the former of them is rarely ſeen to ſo high a Degree, and the latter ſo ſeldom happens, if at all, in England. [3.] C. S. The King beſtows ſevaral Biſhopricks, and then goes for Normandy. [4.] W. M. p. 100. b. A ſtrange Eclipſe happens whilſt he is on Ship-board. * Circa Solem. Which is follow'd by a great Earth-quake.

Yet the King was not to be diſcouraged by theſe ſeeming Prodigies from paſſing into Normandy, from whence he never again return'd, tho'

Anno Dom. MCXXXIII. tho' he often intended it, but was ſtill hinder'd by ſome croſs Accident or other; after the King's arrival there, for above three years following, we find little worth the noting to have happened either in England or Normandy, nor any War to detain him there, (eſpecially ſince he often reſolved to return) and we ſhould be much to ſeek for the cauſes of his long ſtay, did not Henry of Huntington aſſure us, that he was ſtill kept againſt his will by divers unnatural Quarrels, which happened between him and his Son-in-Law, the Earl of Anjou, which were chiefly raiſed by the unquiet humour and Intrigues of his Wife, the King's Daughter.

The reaſon of the King's long ſtay in Normandy.

Anno Dom. MCXXXIV. The next year produced nothing remarkable in England, except the Death of Duke Robert, the King's Elder Brother, (Sirnamed Curt-hoſe, from the ſhort Boots or Hoſe he uſed to wear) who deceaſed in the Caſtle of Caerdiff in Glamorganſhire, and was Buried at Glouceſter, having lived Twenty ſix years a Priſoner. I ſhall not mention the loſs of his Eyes by the means of a Red hot Baſon, ſuppoſed to have been drawn over them, upon his endeavouring to eſcape, when he was at firſt committed to a freer Cuſtody, becauſe I do not find it in any Author before the Manuſcript Annals of Richard of the Devizes, from whom perhaps Roger of Wendover, and out of him Matt. Paris Tranſcribed this Story: nor is it likely that Ordericus Vitalis would have omitted ſo remarkable and aggravating a Circumſtance, out of the Speech which he relates the King of France made againſt King Henry, in the Council of Reims, or that Henry Huntington in his Treatiſe de Contemptu Mundi, (lately Publiſhed by Mr. Wharton at the End of his Second Volume of Anglia Sacra) tho' he mentions ſeveral Cruelties of this King, would ſay no more of this, than that he kept his Brother cloſe Priſoner as long as he lived; and therefore I only look upon it as a malicious Lye, raiſed by the Monks of after-times, to move compaſſion towards this unfortunate Prince; and out of hatred to King Henry's memory, who had dealt hardly with him, and had alſo ſhewn himſelf no great Bigot to their Church: and indeed it ſeems as improbable, as that of the ſame Author of this Prince's now dying with diſcontent, becauſe the King his Brother had ſent him a Scarlet Robe, whoſe Capuce or Hood being too little for himſelf had been torn in the putting on, which being again ſewed up, the Duke tho' blind perceiv'd it by his feeling, which made him fall into ſo great a Melancholy, that he ſtarved himſelf to death, for being made to wear his Brother's caſt Clothes. A likely Story! as if the King was ſo frugal as to defraud his Servants of his Clothes, and ſhould think it worth while to ſend his Brother a torn Coat out of Normandy into England, to ſave the Charges of buying him a new one here.

[5.] M. P. The Death of Robert Duke of Normandy, The Story of his Eyes being put out, an untruth.

A Character of this Prince. But leaving ſuch trifling Stories, let us come to ſomething more uſeful, and give a Character of this Prince, who was but of a middle ſtature, yet certainly of great courage, which was one of his beſt Qualities, and for which (as our Hiſtorian relates) he was to have been made King of Jeruſalem, as you have already heard; yet had he alſo great faults, for he was very unkind and unjuſt to his Brother Henry, before he was King, defrauding him of the Money which his Father had left him, and not permitting him to enjoy ſo much as thoſe Territories which he himſelf had Mortgaged to him: He was alſo very inconſtant, and eaſily altered from Love to Hatred, not being able to diſtinguiſh Flatterers from Friends, ſo that he beſtowed great part of his Lands and Revenues upon Baſe and unworthy Fellows, and had almoſt made away all the Demeſnes of his Dukedom; therefore it is no wonder if he were forſaken by moſt of the Nobility of his own Country, being neither feared by his Enemies, nor beloved by his Friends; ſo that if King Henry had not interpoſed, that Dutchy would have been a prey to any that would have ſeiz'd it. I have no more to ſay concerning this unfortunate Prince but that by his Dutcheſs Sybilla, Daughter to the Earl of Converſana in Italy, he had one Son called William, of whom we have already treated ſufficiently. Anno Dom. MCXXXIV.

This year alſo whilſt [1.] King Henry ſtayed in Normandy, his Daughter the Empreſs was brought to Bed of a Son, whereupon the King made the Archbiſhop of Roüen, with the Earls and Barons of Normandy to ſwear Allegiance to his Daughter Mathilda, and her Son Henry, for ſo was the young Prince called, after the name of his Grandfather. [1.] Idem Ib. The Empreſs Mathilda deliver'd of a Son.

This was the laſt year of this King's Reign, and he being ſtill in Normandy, all things remain'd quiet in England. [2.] But the Welſhmen made a freſh Invaſion on the Engliſh Territories, for this Summer Cadwallader and Owen Guyneth the Sons of Griffyth ap Conan Prince of North-Wales, (being young Princes of great courage) reſolved to expell the Normans and Flemings out of their Country, and entering Cardigan, they deſtroyed and burnt the whole Country, taking many Caſtles belonging to Norman Noblemen, ſome of which they razed to the Ground, and ſo return'd home Victoriouſly; after which, towards the end of this year, they made another Invaſion with Six thouſand Foot, and Two thouſand Horſe, well armed, and Griffyth ap Rees Prince of South-Wales, and Howel ap Meredyth Lord of Brecknock, and his Sons, with other Welſh Noblemen, came in to them and ſubdued that whole Country to Aberteivi, driving out the Foreigners, and placing the old Inhabitants in their rooms. Againſt theſe Stephen Conſtable of Aberteivi, Robert Fitz-Martyn, with the Sons of Gerald, and William Fitz-John advanced with all the Forces of the Normans, Flemings and Engliſhmen that were then in Wales, or the Marches thereabouts: But after a cruel and bloody Fight near the Caſtle of Aberteivi, the latter were put to flight, and the Welſhmen perſued them ſo cloſe, that beſides Three thouſand ſlain upon the ſpot, a great many more were drown'd in the River Tewy, or elſe taken Priſoners; after which Victory the Princes Owen and Cadwalladar return'd home with a very rich Booty in Horſes, Armour, and other things. Anno Dom. MCXXXV. [2.] Dr. Powel's Chron. The Welſh Princes Invade the Engliſh Territories. The Engliſh driven out of great part of Wales.

I find nothing worth noting that happen'd this year in England, but only from an Antient * Manuſcript-Chronicle of the City of London, I ſhall add what is omitted in our Printed Hiſtorians, that a Fire beginning near the Bridge was ſo violent, that it not only conſumed St. Paul's Church, but burnt as far as that of St. Clement Danes; how much it extended in breadth our Author does not tell us; but it is certain, that as to its Length it much exceeded that horrid Conflagration in the year 1666. * Lib. de Antiquis Legibus. [3.] O. V. P. 900. H. H.

But to return to the Affairs of Wales, from whence we have a little digreſs'd.

[3.] The King having now received the ill News of the late Inſurrections of the Welſh, he thrice endeavoured with a ſelect number of Bow- King Henry reſolves to return into England, but is diverted by ſeveral Diſputes with his Son-in-Law the Earl of Anjou.

Anno Dom. MCXXXV.

men and other Soldiers to come for England, but was ſtill diverted by his Son-in-Law, Geoffrey Duke of Anjou, who coveted the great Treaſures of his Father-in-Law, and demanded Normandy in preſent; affirming, That it was part of the agreement he had made with him, when he Maried his Daughter; he alſo deſpiſed the King's Admonitions and Advice, and ſo far provoked him, that he had thoughts of taking his Daughter from him, and carrying her into England, for the Duke had then ſhut up Roſcelin, Viſcount of Beaumont in the City of Mans, tho' he was Son-in-Law to King Henry.

[4.] Idem.

[4.] Wherefore he ſpent all the reſt of this Summer in quieting ſeveral petty diſturbances in Normandy, that were raiſed by thoſe of that Prince's Faction, (needleſs to be here recited) which when he had done, he came about the end of November to a Place called the Caſtle of Lyons, near Roüen: But not long after his arrival, [5.] going a Hunting in the adjacent Foreſt, and coming home with a good Stomach, he took a Surfeit of Lampreys, which tho' he always loved, yet never agreed with him.

The King takes a Surfeit of Lampreys, and falls Sick.

[5.] H. H. O. V. p. 901. W. M. p. 100. b.

The next day he fell very Sick, and when he found himſelf to grow worſe and worſe, he ſent for Hugh Archbiſhop of Roüen to come to him; being alſo attended by his Natural Son Robert Earl of Glouceſter, William Earl of Warren, and divers other Noblemen and Great Commanders, who asking him concerning his Succeſſor, He made anſwer, That he left all his Territories (as well on that as this ſide the Sea) to his Daughter, by a lawful and perpetual Succeſſion, tho' without making any mention of her Husband, having been lately ſo highly diſoblig'd by divers Affronts he had received from him.

His Laſt Will and Teſtament.

Before he died, he commanded his Debts, and all Servants Wages to be paid. All Forfeitures and Mulcts to be forgiven; All Exiles reſtored to their Country; And that all whoſe Eſtates had been unjuſtly ſeized, ſhould peaceably enjoy them again. [1.] He alſo directed his Son Robert, who had the Cuſtody of his Treaſure at Falais, that he ſhould diſtribute Sixty Thouſand Pounds amongſt his Servants, and Stipendiary Knights and Horſemen.

[1.] O. V. Ibid.

[2.] W. M. Ibid. The King Deceaſes.

[2.] The King having thus made his Will, and done all things that were neceſſary for a Chriſtian Prince, Deceaſed on the firſt of December at Midnight, (the ſeventh day of his Sickneſs:) immediately after, his Body was removed to Roüen, whither many of the Nobility carried it on their Shoulders by turns, and there being Imbowel'd, and the Entrails Buried in the Church of St. Mary du Pres, it lay for ſome time till it could be thence conveyed to Caën, to remain there till the Seaſon would permit it to be Tranſported and Buried in England, as He himſelf had appointed it.

I cannot here omit ſome remarkable Circumſtances related by Gervaſe of Canterbury, concerning the manner of Imbalming this King's Body, which ſeem very Barbarous; for he relates that they cut great Gaſhes in his fleſh with Knives, and then Powdering it well with Salt, they wraped it up in divers Tann'd Ox-hides, to avoid the intolerable ſtench of it, which was ſo infectious, that a Man who was hired to open his Head (which was done with no better a Tool than a Hatchet) died preſently after; ſo that our Author wittily obſerves, that this was the laſt Man of many that this Prince deſtroyed.

The rude manner of preſerving this King's Body, and the ſtrange Infection that proceeded from it.

It

It may not now be amiſs to give you from [3.] William of Malmesbury a ſhort view of this Prince's Reign, and in what poſture Affairs than ſtood in relation to Foreign Princes. In the beginning of his Reign, he was on ill Terms with Robert Earl of Flanders, upon the account of a Pention of three hundred Marks per Annum, which had been paid by King William and his Son of the ſame name, to this Prince's Father and Grand-father, in conſideration of the Aſſiſtance which the latter of theſe had given towards the Conqueſt of England; but the preſent Earl being return'd from Jeruſalem, imperiouſly demanded that Penſion as a Due; However the King wiſely return'd this Anſwer, That it was not uſual for the Kings of England to pay Tribute to the Earls of Flanders; yet if he would leave it to him, he would beſtow it on him as a Friend and Kinſman when opportunity ſerved; but not if he exacted it as his Due. With which Anſwer the Earl was forced to be content, and lived in Amity with the King ever after; but Earl Baldwin his Son, when he would not obſerve the ſame meaſures, but endeavoured to put William Son to Duke Robert in Poſſeſſion of Normandy, he there received a Wound, whereof he not long after died: And as for his Succeſſor Charles of Denmark, the King and he lived in very good Correſpondence.

[3.] p. 99, 100. A ſhort view of this King's Reign; and in what terms he was with his Neighboring Princes; and particularly with the E. of Flanders.

If we conſider [4.] the State of France during his time, we ſhall find King Philip (being much addicted to his Pleaſures) to have given King Henry very little or no diſturbance; but his Son Lewis (Sirnamed the Groſs) carried himſelf more variouſly, and expreſs'd a more uncertain Conduct, acting at firſt like a Friend, but afterwards as an inveterate Enemy on the account of Theobald Earl of Blois the King's Nephew, whom he maintain'd againſt King Lewis, which ended in a cruel and violent War, in which King Henry at laſt got the better, as has been already related.

[4.] Id. Ib. How the French Kings carried themſelves towards him.

But to come nearer home, [5.] as for the Welſh Princes King Henry had commonly much better Succeſs in his Expeditions againſt them than his Brother William; and in the laſt he made, concluded an honourable Peace with the Prince of North Wales.

[5.] Idem. P. 89. b. His Succeſs againſt the Welſh.

As for [1.] Murchade King of Ireland, and ſome of his Succeſſors of leſs note, they were wholly devoted to King Henry's Service; and when Murchade did for ſome time carry himſelf unkind toward the Engliſh, he was ſoon brought to terms only by the King's forbidding their Trading thither; for indeed (ſays my Author) what could Ireland do without the Commodities of England? Since the People living lazily, and without Foreign Trade, muſt without the help of this Kingdom be in want of many Neceſſaries.

[1.] Idem. P. 91. a. The great Reſpect that was ſhew'd him by Murchade K. of Ireland.

This was the ſtate of Ireland in thoſe times, as well as for many ages after.

And farther to ſhew what great [2.] reſpect and honour Foreign Princes had for King Henry, our Author relates, that Paul Earl of the Orchades, (who held thoſe Iſlands as a Feudatory to the King of Norway) ſo much Courted King Henry's Friendſhip, that he ſent him ſeveral Preſents of Exotick Animals, which the King put into his Park at Woodſtock, where he kept ſuch Creatures.

[2.] Idem Ib. The great Honour that was paid him by other Foreign Princes.

Alſo Siward King of Norway in his Paſſage to the Holy Land paſſed his Winter in England, and ſhewed the King very great reſpect. And (which is very remarkable,) though he were ſometimes obliged to be abſent out of England for three or four years together, by reaſon of his Wars in Normandy, yet the King of Scots being his Relation and Confederate, England did not feel any Foreign Invaſion, or Domeſtick Rebellion or Inſurrection during his whole Reign, except ſome petty Incurſions made by the Welſh, which were not much to be valued: by which long Peace not only during his own but alſo in his Father's and Brother's Reigns, it made England become a place of refuge to the diſtreſs'd and afflicted of Foreign Nations, who made it their Sanctuary. Theſe were the Felicities of this King's times; and as for his Misfortunes, they need not be repeated, ſince you may obſerve them from the Hiſtory of his Reign; nor had I related theſe paſſages, but that they are not noted by our Author under any particular years, and are ſuch things as he did not think fit to place in the Body of the Hiſtory, but only as an Epilogue to it.

A Character of King Henry the Firſt.

Having now concluded the Life and Reign of this great Prince, I muſt not leave him without giving you his Character from William of Malmesbury and Others who lived in his time: He was in the firſt place a Prince of vaſt Natural Parts and Eloquence, and had alſo a great deal of Courage, yet ſuch as might conſiſt with Prudence; being cautious to undertake, but firm and reſolute in going through the moſt dangerous Enterprizes, whereby he avoided unneceſſary Wars: He was a ſevere Revenger if very much provoked, and conſtant as well in his Hatred as Friendſhip: As he humbled his Enemies to the loweſt degree, ſo he advanced his Friends and Favourites even to Envy; witneſs Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, whom from an ordinary Pariſh-Prieſt, or Curate, at a Town in Normandy, he firſt made his Chancellor, than a Biſhop, and laſt of all his Chief Juſtice over England, as well whilſt he was preſent as abſent: He was alſo a rigid Exacter of Juſtice, ſeverely puniſhing Thieves, and Counterfeiters of Money, whom he diligently ſought out, and never pardon'd when diſcover'd; and it was one of the Glories of his Reign, that he commanded all Counterfeit Money, and all that was broken or defaced, tho' of good Silver, (yet which would not be received in Payment) to be melted down: He alſo corrected the falſe Ell or meaſure uſed by Tradeſmen, ordaining the length of his own Arm as a Standard over all England. Nor was He neglectful of other matters, appointing his Courtiers, where ever he ſtayed, how much they ſhould take from the Country-People Gratis, and what Prices they were to pay for all Proviſions, puniſhing Tranſgreſſors with grievous Mulcts, nay ſometimes with loſs of Life. In the beginning of his Reign, that he might deter the guilty by the terror of Examples, he was more prone to detruncation of Members; but afterwards to Pecuniary Mulcts to increaſe his Revenues; which ſevere Juſtice made him both feared by the Nobles, and beloved by the Common People: So that in all his Reign, there was but one Conſpiracy againſt his Life, and that was by one of his Bed-Chamber, who was alſo the Keeper of his Privy-Purſe, and he being Convicted and Executed, deterr'd others for the future from the like Treaſons. But that which is yet more ſtrange, tho' He paſſed the greateſt part of his Reign in Normandy, there was never but one Rebellion raiſed againſt him here, and that in the beginning of his Reign, which was ſoon quelled.

As

As for his Perſon he was of a middle Stature, his Hair Black and thick toward his Forehead, his Eyes clear and ſweet, Broad Cheſted and pretty full of Fleſh: As to his Humour, he was Affable, and when free from Buſineſs, he was of a very pleaſant Converſation; ſo that certainly he was one of the braveſt Kings that ever Reigned in England, whither one conſiders him in War or Peace: But not being without faults, he is noted to have been much addicted to Women, and by them he had ſeveral Natural Children, of whom I ſhall give you an account by and by; tho' moſt of them were begotten before he was Married to his Queen: He was alſo too ſevere in his Puniſhments (eſpecially towards thoſe that killed his Deer) which he made worſe than Death it ſelf, by putting out of Eyes and Amputation of Members; yet he Executed no Nobleman for Treaſon againſt him, tho' he impriſon'd divers during life, and alſo put out the Eyes of Robert Earl of Mortaign his Kinſman for having rebelled againſt him; but as for doing the like to his Brother Robert, I have ſaid enough of that already; and if the ſame Authors that tell us of the blinding the former Earl, had alſo known that he had done as much to his own Brother, we need not doubt but we ſhould have heard enough of it; but as for his keeping him in perpetual Priſon, it was no more than what reaſon of State and ſelf-preſervation prompted him to, after he had deprived him of his Dukedom.

A Deſcription of his Perſon.

But that for which he is moſt blamed, is, the ſeverity of his Taxes, which ruined many Families, and his too great Partiality towards the Normans, and unkindneſs to his Native Engliſh Subjects; preferring the former only for their Country, and deſpiſing and neglecting the latter, meerly becauſe they were Engliſhmen.

To the firſt of theſe Charges it may be offer'd in his excuſe, that it muſt be conſidered, he was almoſt perpetually in War, either with the King of France, or ſome other Foreign Princes, and it required great Sums of Money to make a conſtant Defenſive War againſt ſuch powerful Neighbours; and perhaps it was likewiſe made much worſe, by the Knavery and corruption of his Inferior Officers.

As for his preferring Strangers before Natural Engliſhmen, tho' it muſt be confeſſed, he had done better if he had been leſs partial, yet we muſt alſo remember, that tho' he was himſelf an Engliſhman by Birth, yet was he a Norman by Deſcent, Acquaintance and Education, and having from his Youth been converſant with few or none but Normans, it is no great wonder if thoſe near about him (as Robert Earl of Mellent in particular) would never adviſe him to advance Engliſhmen to any conſiderable Employments either Eccleſiaſtical or Civil, how well qualified ſoever they might be for them. And now having given you this King's Character, I ſhall alſo give you a ſhort account of his Children.

He had by his Queen Matilda, only one Son named William, who was drown'd as you have already heard, without Iſſue, and one Daughter, commonly called in old French, as well as old Engliſh * Maud Empreſs, becauſe ſhe was firſt Married to the Emperor Henry the Fifth; and then her Second Husband was Geoffrey Plantagenet Earl of Anjou, by whom ſhe had Henry the Second, afterwards King of England; and two other Sons Geoffrey and William, who both died without Iſſue.

* I have given her the Latin Name of Matilda becauſe this does not ſound ſo well.

He

He had alſo ſeveral Natural Sons, the chiefeſt of whom were theſe, Robert (created Earl of Glouceſter in the ninth year of his Father's Reign) by Neſta, Daughter of Rees ap Theodor Prince of South-Wales; Richard begotten of the Widdow of one Anskil, a Nobleman of Oxfordſhire, who was drown'd with Prince William; Reginald created Earl of Cornwall in the Fifth year of King Stephen, was begotten of Sybil Daughter of Sir Robert Corbet of Alceſter in Glouceſterſhire. He had beſides theſe three other Natural Sons, who either lived but a little while, or elſe did nothing remarkable, and therefore ſeem not worth the naming: He had alſo Four Natural Daughters, who were Married to ſeveral Earls, and other Noblemen of France and Normandy, but the moſt famous were Maud, Married to Conan Earl of Bretaigne; and Elizabeth Married to Alexander King of Scots. But if the Reader has a mind to know the Names of the reſt, I refer him to William Gemeticenſis for his further ſatisfaction.

Lib. 8. C. 29.

I have no more worth noting concerning this Prince's Reign, but to give ſome account of his Taxations, as alſo of the Laws made in his Reign; but to begin with the former.

The Taxes raiſed in this King's Reign, were as follow:

The Extraordinary Taxations of this King are not particularly noted, nor is it ſaid how they were impoſed; but in the Fourth year of his Reign, Florence of Worceſter relates it was not eaſie to declare what miſery England ſuffer'd by reaſon of the King's exceſſive Exactions; the ſame we find alſo in the Saxon Chronicle.

In the Sixth year of his Reign his Impoſitions were General and Cruel, according to Eadmerus's report; and beſides other Rigorous Exactions from the Clergy, he ſet a particular Sum upon every Pariſh-Church, and forced the Incumbent to pay it; or, according to the Hiſtorian, to redeem the Church.

In the Eighth year of his Reign, he had for the Mariage of his Daughter Matilda to the Emperor Henry the Fifth, three Shillings of every Hyde of Land in England, which upon a juſt value at this day would be equal to Eight hundred twenty four thouſand, Eight hundred and fifty Pound, (according to Dr. Brady's Computation.

In the Sixteenth year, by reaſon of the King's Neceſſities England was oppreſſed with frequent and various Payments and Exactions: But I find no Scutage paid unleſs it were comprehended under other Gelds and Exactions.

Beſides theſe his Taxes, it appears by the Laws attributed to this King, that he had a conſtant Annual Land-Tax, (which is there called Danegeld) of Twelve-pence upon every Hyde to be paid at certain times, a Forfeiture being ſet upon ſuch as did not duly pay it.

I ſhall now proceed to the Laws made or confirm'd in his time. I need not here repeat the Great Charter of Liberties which he granted at his Coronation to the Clergy, Nobility and People of England, having given it you at large in the beginning of his Reign; nor do I find any other Laws of his beſides that Collection which Mr. Lambert hath given us in his Archaionomia, and are alſo Printed at the end of Mr. Wheelock's Edition of Bede; And ſince they contain a Digeſt or Body of the Engliſh Laws and manner of Proceedings in Criminal as well as Civil matters, I have here Tranſlated the moſt conſiderable of them, which concern either the King's Prerogative, or the Liberties of of the Church, Nobility and People; or the manner of Tryal in Civil as well as Criminal Cauſes; and for the reſt I refer the curious Reader to the Latin Original, which he will find in the Authors laſt mentioned; but thoſe that may be moſt worth your Peruſal are theſe that follow, which have been extracted out of the Red Book of the Exchequer compared with Mr. Selden, and Mr. Lambert.

Paſſing therefore over the four Chapters which contain little conſiderable, except the manner of Tryal, and diſpatching of Civil Cauſes: As alſo the Fifth Chapter which gives Rules for Pleadings, and Judgments as well in Eccleſiaſtical as Civil Courts.

I proceed to the Sixth, which Treats of the Diviſion of the Kingdom of England into the Provices of Britain or Wales, into Weſt Saxony, and into the Provinces of the Mercians and Danes, according to which there is alſo declar'd a threefold Partition of the Law of England, there being formerly one Law in Weſt Saxony, another in Mercia, and a third called Danelage, in all which tho' they acknowledge one Supreme Empire in the Royal Majeſty, yet in many things they differ, as in other they agree.

The Seventh Chapter Treats of the General Pleas of Courts, when and how they ought to be made.

In which it is Ordained, That the General Pleas of Counties ought to be held in certain Places, and at certain Times, and not to be delayed or put off, unleſs the King's own urgent occaſions, or the common profit of the Kingdom may require it, where ought to be preſent the Biſhops, Earls, Vice-domini, (i. e. Judges under the Earls) Vicarii, (i. e. Sheriffs;) Centenarii, (i. e. Hundreders) Aldermen; Præfecti, (i. e. Magiſtrates) Præpoſiti, (i. e. Head-Borough Barons, Vavaſors, Tungreves, (i. e. Officers of Towns) and all other Owners of Lands ought to be preſent, to prevent the Impunity of evil Men, and the Subverſion of Juſtice: But the Scyremotes and Burghmotes, ought to be aſſembled in the Hundred, or Wapentac twelve times a year, with other Particulars, belonging to theſe Courts too long here to be recited.

The Eighth is, That all Freemen, as well Houſholders as their Followers or Dependants ſhall meet twice a year at the Hundred-Court, to ſee if their Decenaries or Tythings be full or not; or in what manner they increaſe, or decreaſe, and requires that there ſhould be over every nine Men a tenth, and over the whole Hundred one of the better ſort, called the Alderman, who ought to ſtudy to promote the Laws of God and Man.

In Mr. Selden's Copy here follows this Clauſe: [Becauſe nothing ought to be taken, or exacted from any one, unleſs by Right, and by the Law of the Land, and by the Juſtice and Judgment of the Court, without deceit; as it is Ordained by the prudent conſideration of our good Predeceſſors, and the Nobles of the whole Kingdom, and approved of by the General Aſſembly of the * Servants of God, and of the holy † Elders and Wiſe-men of the whole Monarchy.]

* i.e. the Clergy.
† i. e. the Biſhops.

The other Copy proceeds: [For it is Ordained by the Provident Order for the Common Good, that every one who deſires to be counted worthy of the right of a Freeman, ſhall from the twelfth year of his Age be entered in ſome Hundred, Tything, or Franc-pledge; but Mercenaries, or Hirelings ſhall be obliged by a double Pledge; That

That every Lord only retain ſuch, who may be lyable to Juſtice, ſo that if they offend he may make them anſwer for it, or may himſelf render an account of them.]

The reſt concerning ſuch Strangers, who might viſit their Friends, yet were to be brought to Juſtice, if they offended, as alſo againſt receiving Strangers beyond three Nights without giving ſecurity for them, or receiving another Man's Servant without a Teſtimony of the Neighbours; I do ſlightly touch upon, becauſe already mentioned in the Laws of King Edward.

The Ninth Chapter is of the quality or nature of Cauſes, ſome of which are redeemable by Fine, and others not, which belong only to the Royal Prerogative, then follows a diviſion of Cauſes into ſimple or mixt; ſo that all Cauſes ought to have ſuitable methods of Proceſs, according to the different Times and Perſons, and that every Cauſe ſhould be determined in the Hundred, County, or * Halimote, or Court of thoſe Lords, that have Socam Curiæ, (i. e. Suit of Court.

The reſt concerning the differences of Cauſes according to the different nature of offences, I omit, only the concluſion of this Law is remarkably, that no * Weak, or wicked Perſon ought to be a Judge, but ſome of the † Chief Men according to their ability; who ſhall not Judge a Man's Perſon but his Deeds, according to the Law of the Country.

* Stultus.

† Optimates.

The Tenth is concerning the King's Right, or Prerogative, which is thus expreſſed; Theſe are the Rights which the King of England alone hath above all Men in his own Kingdom, whilſt the good Inſtitution of Peace and Security is retain'd, (viz.) the Breach of the King's Peace, given either by his * Hand, or Writ, Danegeld, the Plea, or Proceſs concerning contempt of his Writs, or Precepts, as alſo concerning his Servants, whereſoever killed or injured; alſo Treachery and Treaſon, with all ſorts of Contempts, as ſpeaking evil of him, Caſtellatio trium ſtannorum, (which I know not how to Tranſlate) alſo the Pleas of Outlawry and Theft (then not puniſhable by death) Murther, falſifying of his Money, Burning [Houſes] Ham Sacna [i.e. Aſſault made on a Man in his own Houſe.] Foreſtal, [i.e. Lying in wait in the High-way.] Fyredering, [I ſuppoſe finding of Goods.] Flemenefirm, [perhaps the aiding of Out-law'd Perſons.] Premeditate Aſſault, Robbery, Strethrech, [that is, treſpaſs upon the King's High-way.] Seiſing on the King's Land, on Money, Treaſure-Trove, Shipwracks, Maris Algarum, (i. e. of Sea-weeds, or Plants.] Rapes, Treſpaſſes in Foreſts. Alſo the relief of his Barons; Whoſoever ſhall fight in the King's Houſe, or whoſoever Hoſtia, (i. e. in the King's Hoſt or Army.] Breaks the Peace, whoſoever ſhall omit to maintain Burghote, Brighote, and Firdfard, [i.e. the repairing of Caſtles and Bridges, and appearing at a Muſter.] Whoſoever keeps or maintains an Excommunicated or Out-law'd Perſon. Alſo Burgbreche, [i.e. he who violates the King's Pledge or Surety.] Whoſoever ſhall run away in a Land or Sea-fight, unjuſt Judgment, defect of Juſtice, and Wreſting of the King's Laws. All Hereſtrets, [perhaps the King's High-ways are here meant.] And all Gwalſtows, (i. e. Places of publick Execution,) are wholly the King's. Moreover the King in his Soca or Court, ought to be to all Men, * that are Summon'd to appear as well towards all Strangers,

* In thoſe Times our Kings gave Men Protection by giving their Hand before Witneſſes.

* Omnibus Ordinatis.

Strangers, as poor and abject perſons, inſtead of a Kinſman and Advocate, if they have no other.

Theſe are the Royal Pleas of the King, nor can belong to Sheriffs, Apparitors, or other Officers, unleſs they are Farm'd out by expreſs Grants.

The Eleventh is of the Pleas of the Church, belonging to the King, which ſince they relate only to what part of the Fines the King was to have together with the Biſhop for certain Eccleſiaſtical offences, ſuch as Man-ſlaughter in a Church, with-holding of Tythes, Peter-pence, and Firſt-fruits, Adulteries, Perjuries, falſe Teſtimonies, Killing of Men in Holy Orders, Working on Holy Days, Man-ſlaughters, Marriages of Widdows within Twelve Months after the death of their Husbands; Harbouring Out-lawed and Excommunicated Perſons, I but ſlightly mention, as being tedious, and alſo in great part already repeated among the Laws of King Edward.

The Twelfth declares what Pleas or Proceſs againſt any Man may be ſatisfied by paying of the Were, [That is, the ranſome of his Life, and what by payment of a Wite, that is, a bare Fine or Mulct.] Some of which cannot be ſatisfied at all by Money, ſuch as are Houſe-breach, and Burning of Houſes, notorious Theft. Eberemorth, [i.e. down-right Murther.] And Lawfordſwic, [i.e. betraying of the Lord.] And breach of the Peace, or of the Church, or that given by the King's hand. But theſe that follow may be ſatisfied by a Hundred Shillings, (viz.) Grith-breach, [i.e. Simple-breach of the Peace.] Stret-breach, Foreſtale, Burg-breach, Hamſokne, Flemen-farme; all theſe may be ſatisfied by a Were: theſe are the chief heads of this Law, the reſt I paſs by.

The Thirteenth is, what Pleas put Men in the King's * mercy; which are theſe, breach of his Peace, given by his Hand, Contempt of his Writs, and whatſoever tends to the contumely or contempt of his Perſon or Commands; as alſo concerning his Servants ſlain in any City or Caſtle, or any where elſe: Alſo Treachery and Treaſon, making of Caſtles without Licence, Outlawry, &c. thoſe that do thus are in the King's mercy, and forfeit their * Free Land if they have any. Then follow Thefts and Murthers if the Party come not in within ſeven days: Alſo * Counterfeiters of Money ſhall loſe their Hand, without any Redemption. Whoſoever ſhall give unjuſt Judgment ſhall pay an Hundred and twenty Shillings, and ſhall loſe the Office of a Judge, unleſs he redeem it of the King; alſo the concealment of Goods or * Chattels belonging to the King was to be counted as Theft; alſo Violence offer'd to a Virgin or Widdow, fighting in the King's Houſe: He that breaks the Peace in the King's Hoſt ſhall loſe his Life, or compound for it: Alſo he that fails to perform Burghbote, or Brigbote, or Fridfare, ſhall forfeit an Hundred Shillings, which he incurr'd, unleſs Eleven out of Twelve ſound for him. The reſt of the Forfeitures is againſt thoſe who keep or maintain Out-law'd or Excommunicated Perſons, and whoſoever ſhall forſake his Lord or fellow Souldier in a Land or Sea-fight, all whom ſhall loſe their Lives, and the Lord ſhall ſeize upon their Money and the Land which he gave them; but if they have Bockland, [i.e. Freeland] it ſhall fall to the King.

* i.e. To be Fined or Amerced.

* Bocland.

* Falſarii.

* Captalia.

The Fourteenth is concerning Reliefs; which begin with thoſe of an Earl, and thence deſcend to the King's Thanes, and then to that of the middle Thane, which having been already repeated in the Laws of King Cnute, and being much the ſame with that in the former Volume, I ſhall not repeat, but refer the Reader to it.

The Fifteenth is concerning Danegeld, (viz.) Twelve-pence for every Hyde per Annum; this if it be not paid at the times appointed, ſhall be ſatisfied by a Wite.

The Sixteenth is concerning the Peace of the King's Court, which ought to be obſerved for the diſtance of four Miles, three Quarters in Length, and nine Acres and odd Feet, from the Gate of his Palace, where he reſides.

The Seventeenth is concerning Pleas of Foreſts, (viz.) thoſe concerning Encloſures made in the Foreſt, or of Eſſarts and cutting, or burning of Woods, alſo concerning Hunting, carrying of Bows and Arrows in Foreſts of the expeditation of Dogs (that is cutting out the Balls of their Feet that they ſhould not run) not appearance at the Foreſt-Courts, the letting in Cattle into Foreſts, ſlighting of Summons, the coming with Dogs, the finding the Skin or Carcaſs of a Deer.

The Eighteenth is de Lada, or the Purgation of Crimes. A Frenchman being appealed, may ſwear himſelf off by a Sixfold Purgation (i.e. by Six Witneſſes) but an Engliſh Freeman by a threefold Lada, (i.e. by Ordeal of a hot Iron weighing three Pounds.)

The Nineteenth declares that there are ſeveral things, the Judgment of which belongs to the King's Court, and not to the Sheriff or his Officers without particular Writ.

The Twentieth is concerning Socna, Thol, and Theam, of which the King has partly the Judgment of Cauſes in his own Socna, or Court, or elſe had granted it to others; which Juriſdiction is diſtinguiſh'd into what was under the Heads of Mannors, and of Hundreds and Burroughs, under the Sheriffs of Counties; and it declares that Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, and all others of inferior Dignity, had within their own Mannors or Juriſdictions, Sac, [i.e. tryals of Pleas] concerning Tranſgreſſions within the Mannor and Soc (i.e. Suit of Court of the Tenants within the Mannor) and alſo Thol, (that is, liberty of Buying and Selling) and Theam, (that is, power over their own Villains) and Infangtheof, that is, the priviledge of Trying and Judging of a Thief taken within the Mannor or Royalty. What follows being tedious and obſcure, I ſhall not take upon me to Tranſlate, only it here appears, that all theſe great Priviledges and Royalties whatſoever were derived from the King, tho' afterwards they might deſcend by Succeſſion, or be alienated by Purchaſe or Exchange.

The One and twentieth is concerning ſeveral kinds of Cauſes, of whoſe Forfeitures the King has a ſhare, viz. in all Cauſes as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil; as alſo in thoſe concerning the King's Servants, as Eccleſiaſticks and the Tenants of Barons, as over * poor and inconſiderable Men, whither the King has wholly or only in part the Socna, or Suit of Court; among which are Adultery and Homicide committed in the Church, Breach of the Peace, or of Holy Orders, or of Chriſtianity, or Legality, where it it puniſhable by the Secular Power.

* Acefalos.

The Two and twentieth is of Grithbrech, and Ham Socna. Which having nothing very material, I wholly paſs by.

The

The Three and twentieth is concerning Offences in Foreſts, for which a Man is puniſhable in the Court of his Lord, unleſs he be taken within the Foreſt.

The Twenty fourth is concerning Fiſcal Judges; the Fiſcal Judge, (who was I ſuppoſe the ſame with the chief Baron of the Exchequer) had the obſervance or over-ſight of Legal Juſtice over all the Barons, who had particular Franchiſes, and whatſoever was done againſt their Perſons: for no Man could claim a Forfeiture to himſelf, but only to his Lord: The reſt I omit, as not to the purpoſe, or elſe obſcure.

The Twenty fifth is concerning the Priviledges of the Noblemen of England: If there ariſe a Plea between the Tenants of any of the Barons, that have Socna (that is Suit of Court) let the Plea be handled in the Court of his own Lord, of common right; if it be between the Tenants of two Lords, having ſuch a Socna, let the party accuſed anſwer in the Court of his own Lord, as of common right.

The Six and twentieth is of the Plea of Theft: Which ſince it is obſcure and of no great moment, I paſs by.

The Seven and twentieth is of the Liberty of a Vavaſour, (or meſne Tenant.)

Alſo Vavaſours who have Free-land may hold Pleas, which belong to Wite or Were, over their own Tenants in their own Lordſhips, and ſo likewiſe over the Tenants of others, if they are there detain'd, or charg'd in the Fact.

The Eighth and twentieth is concerning giving right Judgment, where 'tis declared that in all Actions the Judgment of the Judges ought to be unbiaſſed; for poor Men are worſe oppreſſed by wicked Judges, than by the moſt cruel Enemies: the reſt containing the qualification of Witneſſes, and how they are to be Examined, ſince it contains nothing material, I omit.

The Twenty ninth is who ought to be the King's Judges.

The King's Judges, or the * Barons (i.e. Free-men) of the County, who have Free-lands in it, are thoſe by whom the Cauſes of particular Perſons ought to be tryed by an alternate Proſecution or Tryal; but Villani [i.e. meer Villagers or Country-men] or Cocſeti [or rather Coſcetti [i.e. next Cottagers] or Perdigni, [i.e. Vile and Indigent Perſons] are not to be numbered among the Judges of the Laws; whence it is that they neither can forfeit their own or their Lord's Money in the Hundred or County-Court. The reſt concerning their Appearance, and the Forms of Proceſs in thoſe Courts, I omit; only this is remarkable, that by this Law no Namium, or Diſtreſs, for any Cauſe ariſing in the Hundred-Court, was to be carried out of that Hundred.

* Barones.

The Thirtieth is of the Liberty of Noblemen or Gentlemen, in Pleas of Counties, [i.e. County-Courts] by which it is declar'd that if a Baron of a County have a Cauſe againſt the Sheriff, thoſe that held of the Baron were not to be tried in the County-Court unleſs for Theft.

The One and thirtieth is of Capital Pleas.

In Supreme and Capital Pleas, one Hundred or County-Court may be Judged of two, but one alone may not Judge two Counties; if between Judges there are divers Opinions, and ſome affirm it to be one way, and ſome another; let the Sentence of the better ſide prevail, and according to that which is moſt agreeable to Juſtice. All Biſhops, Earls and other Magiſtrates ought to be preſent at the County-Court, who may there determine the Laws of God, and Secular Matters by due conſideration, where none ought to deny the Records of the King's Court; in other Caſes a Man might deny the matter by Men who were Cogniſant of it, and no body was to be found Guilty by a ſingle Teſtimony.

* Advocet aut contradicat. † Ejuſdem Provinciæ.

If any Man ſuſpects his Judges, he may appeal, or * deny the Fact: every Man is to be Judged by his Peers of the † ſame County; all Foreign Judgments were to be abrogated, whatſoever is done againſt Perſons abſent in any place or matter, or what is not done by proper Judges, ſhall be wholly void, and no Witneſſes were ro be received, againſt which any Objection lay. And it farther declares that in Weſt Saxony thoſe that were choſen for Witneſſes, and not named Judges, were Advocates; which is a plain diviſion of the Freeholders into Judges and Jury.

The Two and thirtieth is, That no Man may Judge his own Lord.

* Judicium celebrare.

No Man may preſume alone, or can be compell'd by any other to * give Judgment, nor ſhall any of the Chief Men ſuffer by the Judgment of the leſs; no Man may Judge his own Lord, or give Judgment upon him whoſe Liege he is: the reſt being obſcure, I paſs by.

The Thirty third is of handling a Plea.

If any Man in his own Court, or in any other place of Judging Cauſes, have a Plea to be diſpatched, let him call together his Equals and Neighbours, that he may give them ſuch a Gratuitous Juſtice, by an unforced Judgment, as cannot be gain-ſaid; for the defect of Juſtice, and the violent forſaking of right, are thoſe things which bring Cauſes into the King's Court, or the Juriſdiction of other Superior Lords; the reſt being obſcure and of no great moment, I let alone.

The Thirty fourth is of handling a Plea in a juſt Judgment: If any Man for anger, hatred, fear, love, or covetouſneſs, or for any reſpect to the King, ſhall Judge unjuſtly, or ordain that which is not Law, let him pay an hundred Shillings, and be deprived of all honour of being a Judge, unleſs he ſo redeem himſelf to the King, as that he ſhall be in his mercy: the reſt concerning the Laſh-lites or Mulcts appointed by Danelage, for this, or that Crime, and alſo for thoſe who ſhall Impeach, [i.e. queſtion or deny] a Judgment rightly given, I deſignedly omit.

The Thirty fifth is concerning Overſeuneß to the King, (that is, the contumacy or contempt of the King's Command) which offence is rated at ſeveral Sums, according to the quality of the Perſon, and greatneſs of the offence.

The Thirty ſixth is concerning thoſe who have not, or elſe may loſe their Overſeuneß [or right of Fines] which ſince it is obſcure, and not material, I alſo paſs by.

The Thirty ſeventh is concerning the unlawful cutting down of a Wood, which (omitting the reſt that goes before) is here called Wudheth, that is the cutting of Wood in the King's Park or Foreſt, which ſhall be ſatisfied by Twenty Manſes, (that is, about Fifty Shillings of our Money) unleſs an expreſs Prohibition ſhould require more; but out of a Foreſt or Park, it was but Five Manſæ.

The

The Thirty eighth is of Scheld-wite, of which ſince Sir Henry Spelman hath not given us any ſignification, I will not take upon me to determine what this offence was.

The Thirty ninth is concerning the Forfeiture for ſhedding of blood, which in ſome places was only incurr'd by them that were Actors in it, but in others by Acceſſories. It alſo relates to the breach of a Park, or Pound, here called Pundbreach, which if done in the King's Court, the Penalty was a full Wite or Mulct, if elſwhere, Five Marks; but lays it down as a general Rule, that in all Cauſes there ought to be conſider'd the difference of Place, Time, Perſon and Event.

The One and fortieth is, That every one ought to have his own Overſeueneß, or Forfeitures upon contempts.

The meaning of which is, That every Lord hath the full Overſueneſs or Forfeitures from his Tenants, according to the place of his Reſidence and manner of the Offence: the reſt chiefly relates to Eſſoins, the Particulars of which I need not here mention; only this is remarkable, that the Law ſtill continued, that every Lord ſhould keep ſuch Servants as may be lyable to Juſtice, and alſo his whole Family under his own Pledge, that if he were accuſed of any matter, he might anſwer it in his own Hundred, where he ſhould be compell'd to anſwer according to Law: If he alſo be accuſed and flie, let his Lord render to the King the Were of that Man; and if the Lord be accuſed that he fled with his conſent, he ſhall Juſtifie himſelf by the Oath of Five Thanes, and he himſelf muſt be the Sixth.

The Forty ſecond is concerning Summons.

And contains the Penalty of him, who ſhall omit or neglect to deliver the King's, or any other Lord's Summons to another, either on purpoſe, or through forgetfulneſs, &c.

The Forty third is that none being Impleaded by the King may firſt anſwer to another.

The meaning of which is, that no Body being impleaded by the King is compellable by Law to anſwer another, until he had firſt ſatisfied him who is the Chief Lord. The reſt being tedious and obſcure, I omit: The Sum of it being no more than that a Man ſhall firſt anſwer that Lord of whom he holds in chief, or under whom he reſides.

The Forty fourth is of the Pledges for their Lords; which provides, that Tenants ſhall not anſwer their Lords in any Suit till they have ſatisfied them what they have loſt by being Pledges for their Lords, unleſs it be in Caſes of Contumely towards them.

The Forty fifth contains many things concerning Inculpations or Caſes wherein Men may be excuſed from Appearance, and ſhews many Cauſes in which it is neceſſary to anſwer according to Law, upon a ſingle Summons, and where not, needleſs to be recited.

The Forty ſixth is of thoſe that are Impleaded by their Lords. If any Man ſhall be Impleaded by his Lord either by his own or another Man's ſuggeſtion, let him be Summon'd to appear at ſeven days notice, in the ſame County, to anſwer all ſorts of Pleas, &c. needleſs to be recited at large.

The Forty ſeventh is concerning Criminal or Capital Cauſes, as concerning Theft, Murther, and betraying a Man's Lord; as alſo Robbery and Outlawry, or Houſe-breach, and burning of Houſes, and falſifying Coyn as alſo that in all Criminal and Capital Cauſes, no Man Man must look for Council, but being Impleaded must presently deny it without any seeking for Council, of whatever Nation or condition he is, &c.

From whence we may observe the Antiquity of that Law of denying Council in all Tryals of Life and Death.

The Forty eighth is, when Persons may make use of Council.

In all other Causes every Man may and ought to make use of Council; for if any one being Impleaded by the King's Justice, and shall go to Council, and does not plead in * discharge of the offence, he shall Pay twenty Marks. The rest I omit as needless to be inserted.

* Ad Inculpationem.

The Forty ninth, fiftieth, fifty first and fifty second, containing only divers rules concerning Pleadings and Summons to the hundred, and other Courts, and not appearing there; as also concerning Distresses, giving Security or Pledges to answer Justice, being only matters of Form, and now quite absolete, I pass by.

The Fifty third is concerning superseding or delaying to appear at the County-Court, and the Forfeitures due thereupon, as also concerning Pleas there brought.

The Fifty fourth is of the Dividend among Partners of a Sum of Money in Trade.

If several Men shall become Partners, so as that they have put their Money into a Common Stock, and they will depart from that Society, and Community, let them bring before Witness whatsoever they have in Common to be equally divided, that if need be, they may swear upon the Holy Evangelists, that they have no more; as for what is already acquired, they may divide it among them, according to right, and that * Arbitrements shall be as firm as Judgments themselves.

* Justitia Amicitiæ.

The Fifty fifth is concerning the Priviledge of a Lord over his † Tenant.

† In hominem suum.

It is lawful for every Lord to Summon his Tenant to do him right in his own Court, and if he be Resident at some remote Mannour of the same Honour, he shall answer there, if the Lord shall so Summon him.

The Fifty sixth is much to the same purpose, viz.

In what Court a Controversie shall be determined between any one and his Farmer, who is not his Leige-Man, especially in such things as belong to the Farm, all which shall be determined in the Court of that Lord of which the Land is holden; the like concerning Shepherds, Stewards and other Servants, either of the Lord or his Tenants.

The Fifty seventh is concerning the Complaints of Neighbours against each other.

And if they are made between those that are Equals, they may meet at the division of their Lands, and he who first complained shall first have right done him; or if it must go further, let them go to the Court of their own Lord, if they have one and the same, and that Jurisdiction be his, but if otherwise they may go to the Hundred-Court if there be need; the rest being tedious I pass over, as I do also

The Fifty eighth concerning a Vagrant, who was to be brought before the Justice or Judge of that place, &c.

The

The Fifty ninth and Sixtieth being concerning the Countermanding of Pleas once begun, how much time was to be given for it, and in what Caſes, and by whom it was to be done, ſince they are only matters of Form, and are now obſolete, I omit, as I do alſo

The Sixty firſt, concerning the Plea of any Lord againſt his Officer or Bayliff, and thoſe that are ſubject to him for the ſame reaſon, as being long, obſcure, and now out of uſe.

The Sixty ſecond is concerning the obſervation of the times for ſuperſeding the execution of Laws, viz. from the Advent of our Lord to the Octaves of Epiphany, and from Septuageſima Sunday till fifteen days after Eaſter, and on all Holy-days, and on the four Seaſons (or Ember-Weeks) and days of Lent, and other lawful Faſts on Fridays, and the Vigils of the Apoſtles: all theſe are no times of executing Laws, i.e. either of Swearing Fealty to the Lord, Agreements in Suits, Tryal by Battel, Hot-Iron, or Water, &c.

The Sixty third is concerning the Impleading by a Fiſcal Judge, that is, (I ſuppoſe) the Steward of a Mannor.

That is in what Cauſes the * Fiſcal Judge may Implead any one concerning Socna or Suit of Court, without any Accuſer, and how the accuſed may purge himſelf by the Oath of his Neighbours; all which ſince it is obſolete and not material, I omit. As I do alſo the Sixty fourth concerning in what places and in what caſes a Man may purge himſelf by his own Oath, and that of others; and when he muſt do it by a threefold Ordeal, (that is, by a Hot-Iron of three Pounds weight) from which according to the Law of Weſt-Saxony all Thanes and Presbyters were excepted: But all theſe being now out of date, I omit; only thoſe in Holy Orders were to purge themſelves by Oath of Five Prieſts beſides themſelves, &c.

* Suppoſed to be the Sheriff of the County, who then managed the King's Revenues ariſing there.

The Sixty ſixth is of letting a Thief eſcape.

If any ſhall let a Thief go Gratis, let him make ſatisfaction according to the Thief's Were, or let him deny it by a full Purgation, that he knew him to be ſo: and if any one did not follow the Hue and Cry, he was to pay a Fine to the King, unleſs he could clearly acquit himſelf.

The Sixty ſixth is concerning the Killing of a * Miniſter of the Altar.

* i.e. A Prieſt or Deacon.

If any ſhall Kill a Miniſter of the Altar, let him be Out-law'd from God and Man, unleſs he repent by a due ſatisfaction, and make agreement with his Kindred, or purge himſelf by his Werelada (that is, by thirty Compurgators) and that within thirty days, &c. if a Miniſter of the Altar ſhall kill another Man, or be accuſed for any enormous evil action, let him be deprived both of his Orders and Dignity, and let him go on Pilgrimage, as the Pope ſhall enjoyn him. But if he will purge himſelf, let him do it by a treble Purgation, and unleſs he perform this within thirty days, let him be Out-law'd, &c. If a Man ſhall abuſe one in Holy Orders either by Blows, Bonds or otherwiſe, let him make amends to him, according to right, and make ſatisfaction to the Biſhop according to the Dignity of his Function, and pay a full Munbreach (that is, a Fine for the Breach of the Peace) or he may deny it by a full Purgation: If any Man being condemned to die deſire to be profeſſed (i.e. a Monk) let it never be denied him; but if any one ſhall deny him, let him make ſatisfaction to the King with One hundred hundred and twenty Shillings; or if he deny it, he ſhall purge himſelf by Oath with Six Witneſſes, that he did not do it, the reſt being tedious I omit. But this may be enough to ſatisfie the Reader of the great Priviledges that Church-men had in thoſe days above Lay-men, if they commited Homicide, as well in the Tryal, as manner of the Purgation.

The reſt of the Penalties for beating or impriſoning one in Holy Orders, I let alone, as not much to our purpoſe.

The Remainder of theſe Laws I paſs by,and ſhall only take notice of the time and manner then uſed of Purgation by Ordeal.If any one ſhall be lawfully accuſed by the Sheriff, or the King's Juſtice, of Theft, Burning, Robbery, or the like, and is to have a threefold Lada or Purgation, then ought he on a convenient day to have thirty Compurgators ready, whereof none ſhall be culpable in any matter, and with fifteen of thoſe whom the Juſtice ſhall chuſe, the party himſelf (being the Sixteenth) ſhall ſwear as the Judge ſhall direct. By the Mercian Law there were to be thirty five Compurgators, and by the Dane Law forty eight.

The Sixty ſeventh is concerning the Lada or Purgation of a Man not infamous,with other things not much to our purpoſe,which I omit.

The Sixty eighth is concerning the Were, or ſatisfaction for a Freeman ſlain,which I alſo paſs by,becauſe ſo often repeated;only ſhall take notice, that altho' every Prieſt, however born, was to be accounted of equal Dignity with a Thane, yet if he were killed, and ſatisfaction to be made for it, it was to be done only according to his Birth,that is, if he were born of a Thane, a Thane's Were ſhould be rendered for him, and ſo if he were deſcended of a Villain: the like Were was to be obſerved in Clergy-men as well as Laicks, that the Line of deſcent was ſtill to follow the Father, and not the Mother's ſide. The reſt concerning the Weres to be paid for Clerks according to their different Orders, and the ſeveral Penances that were to be perform'd for the killing of a Monk or Clerk, tho' by chance, or againſt a Man's will, or his own Father or Mother by the like accident, I ſhall let alone: As I do alſo the Sixty ninth and Seventieth, which are Concerning the different Weres, Wites and Manbotes that were to be paid by the Law of Weſt-Saxony, to the Kindred, or Lord of the party ſlain, according to their different Qualities, becauſe repeated in former Laws, which were not then alter'd.

The Seventy firſt is concerning Homicide.

If any one by Poyſon, Charms, Looks, Actions, or any ſort of Witchcraft, ſhall commit Homicide, whither it were prepared or intended for that party, or any other, if it prove mortal it ſhall by no means be redeemed, but ſuch a one ſhall be delivered to the Friends of the Party ſlain, that he may be left to their mercy and judgment; but if the caſe would admit of mercy,it was to be left to the Judgment of the Biſhop, and if he were admitted to mercy, he was to anſwer for the Were, the Wite, and the Manbote of the dead perſon, and then was tofind Sureties for his own good Behaviour, &c.

From the Seventy ſecond,concerning the ſeveral kinds of Homicides; As likewiſe from the Seventy third,concerning the Puniſhment and Penances of a Biſhop, Presbyter, Monk, or any other in Holy Orders, as alſo of a Laick who ſhall kill another, I ſhall only obſerve that thoſe thoſe Laws, tho' of an Eccleſiaſtick nature, were yet Ordained by the ſame Civil Authority as the reſt of this King's Laws.

The Seventy fourth is concerning the Purgation of thoſe who were ſlain unjuſtly, and without Judgment, whom their Kindred might purge or clear according to antient Law by a Werelade, (that is) by a full Purgation, according to the rate of the Eſtate to which he was born, needleſs here to be repeated.

The Seventy fifth is concerning Mens murthering of their Lords: If any one ſhall kill his Lord, if he be taken, he ſhall no ways redeem himſelf. The Latin Original being here either obſcure or tedious, I ſhall not undertake Literally to Tranſlate, it amounting to no more than this, that the Guilty party was to expiate his crime by cruel torments ending in death ſelf. The reſt concerning the puniſhment of a Lord or Maſter that ſhall kill his Servant, I omit, and paſs to what is moſt conſiderable in this Chapter, viz.

If a Frenchman who has no Kindred, ſhall be murthered privately, the King ſhall have as the price of his murther, Forty Marks of Silver from the Hundred where the Body is found, unleſs the Maleſactor be rendered to the King's Juſtice, or that ſome Body ſhall prove the party ſlain to be an Engliſhman, by the Judgment of the Hot-Iron, or elſe that it ſhall appear otherwiſe by other pregnant Circumſtances.

From whence the Reader may obſerve, that this Law concerning Engleſcherie was not made by King William the Conquerour (as ſome would have it) but was the ſame Law revived, which you will find among thoſe of King Cnute, concerning a Dane found murthered, and where the murtherer could not be found; which was now in King William's Reign changed to a Frenchman, and ſuch a one who being unknown had no Friends to proſecute his Death: You will alſo find a Law to the ſame purpoſe among thoſe of the ſame King, tho' not ſo fully as is here expreſs'd.

The Seventy ſixth concerning the different Weregilds, that were to be paid according to Men's Eſtates or Qualities, I omit, leſt I ſhould prove too tedious; and ſo I do (for the ſame reaſon)

The Seventy ſeventh, concerning the ſatisfaction that was to be made for the Life of a Freeman, or Servant, which was always to be reckon'd according to the Quality of the Father, and not of the Mother.

The Seventy eighth is concerning the manner of Manumiſſion of a Servant or Slave; but ſince it is already ſet down in the Laws of King William, it is needleſs to be repeated here.

Only this is remarkable, that if any will make himſelf a Servant, he ſhall do it before Witneſſes in the Halemote, or Hundred-Court, that ſo the Party may not afterwards deny it, and that it may be diſtinctly known of all what condition Men are of, whither free or ſervile; becauſe many powerful Men, will (if they can) defend their Servants ſometimes as free, ſometimes as ſervile, according as it may be moſt for their advantage.

The Seventy ninth is concerning the Ranſome that was to be paid for one ſlain whoſe Father was alive: If any one ſhall ſlay his Godſon, whoſe Father is alive, he ſhall be doubly guilty, and the amends ſhall encreaſe according to his Were, and as his Manbote does in reſpect ſpect to the Lord: But if he were the King's Godſon, ſatisfaction ſhall be made by his Were to the King, as well as to the Kindred, &c. But if any Man ſhall ſlay the King's Meſſenger, who carries his Writ, he ſhall be in his * Mercy: but if any one ſhall commit Homicide in the Church, that cannot be ſatisfied, for every Man may proſecute him, unleſs the King ſhall pleaſe to grant him his Life, and it muſt be on theſe conditions, that he make ſatisfaction to God, and afterwards pay the Were to his Kindred, and a Manbote to his Lord, and a Wite to him to whom it belongs, viz. the King. Which plainly ſets forth the three ſorts of Mulcts that were to be paid upon all Homicides, tho' without any malice prepenſe.

* i.e. How to be puniſh'd.

The Eightieth is concerning Homicide in the King's Court, Army, Town or Caſtle.

Whoſoever ſhall kill a Man in any of theſe, ſhall be in the King's Mercy, both for Eſtate and Members; if an aſſault be made upon any Man in the King's High-way, he ſhall make the King a hundred Shillings ſatisfaction: the reſt upon this Subject, as alſo the Penalties of Stretebrech, (i.e. Treſpaſſes by ſhutting up, or turning the King's High-way) I purpoſely omit.

The Eighty firſt is concerning keeping the Peace in Drinking, Giving, or Buying, all which being obſcure and not material, I paſs by; as I do alſo the Eighty ſecond, concerning thoſe who are ſworn Enemies, how and when they may aſſault each other, for the ſame reaſons.

By which Law it ſeems that Family-Quarrels and Feuds were ſtill permitted in ſome Caſes, as they were in the Saxon times.

The Eighty third is, That it is lawful for every one to defend himſelf againſt him that aſſails him in any place or buſineſs, except againſt his own Lord; who is to be born with, and not to be killed, &c.

But as for thoſe Caſes in which a Man may demand ſatisfaction of his Enemy, which are mentioned in this as well as the former Law, I paſs them by, as I do divers other things of no great moment.

The Eighty fourth is concerning Beating, by which Law he may in ſome Caſes be guilty who is beaten, as well as he that ſtrikes, ſo that neither the Malefactor may pride himſelf in his Impunity, nor the Perſon affronted ſhould grow inſolent by too great an amends; for where one will not, two can never fight.

The Eighty fifth is, That every one ought to free him, whom he has brought into danger.

Whoever ſhall bring another into any danger or inconvenience, ought to free him by defending him, or by making amends for him, or by participation of the danger; but all Men cannot aſſiſt others by their Interceſſion, yet what cannot be ſo done, is eaſie to be diſcovered either from the cauſe or the perſon, For all Capital and Criminal matters are ſo abſolutely forbid both to Superiors and Inferiors, as that not only the Author of the Crime himſelf is to be puniſhed, but whoever was conſcious of, or adviſing or conſenting to it, in any wiſe, by giving, receiving, or returning any thing, ſhall be ſubject to the like puniſhments: and no body can warrant another in any of theſe things; if a Servant ſhall commit Homicide with three other men, it ſhall be wholly imputed to thoſe that are free, and it ſhall be the ſame where a Freemen commits Theft with Servants or Slaves.

The Eighty ſixth is that no Man ſhall revenge himſelf without Law.

It may be lawful for every Lord to complain to his Tenants and Friends, if any one do him injury, but not to take revenge without Law; nor ought it to be required of the Lord if his Servant ſhall offend without his aſſiſtance or command, eſpecially if he be gone from him, the reſt I omit.

The Eighty ſeventh is concerning the offence of lending of Arms.

Whoever ſhall lend his Arms to another to ſlay any one, ought to pay a ſhare of the Weregild for the party ſlain; he who ſhall lend his Sword ſhall give a third part; he who ſhall lend his Lance ſhall pay half; but he who ſhall lend his Horſe, ſhall pay the whole Weregild. Yet nevertheleſs it may be lawful for one to lend his Arms to another, if he do it without any ſuſpition, or intention of ill. The reſt containing ſeveral Caſes of the ſame nature being tedious, I omit, as I do alſo the Weregilds that were to be payed, where a Man was killed by a Lothe, (that is, by any Company above ſeven) as I alſo do theſe Cauſes which occur, where a man was kill'd by a Company under Seven.

The Eighty eighth is concerning Chance-medley, in what Caſes men may be killed by the Arms or Weapons of another without his intention: But becauſe it is long, and contains a great many particular Caſes, in ſome of which the Slayer was to pay the whole Were of the party ſlain, and in others not, I refer the Reader to the Law it ſelf.

The Eighty ninth is concerning one who kills any of his Kindred.

Which, ſince it only mentions how this offence was to be puniſh'd by the Salick Law, I likewiſe omit.

The Nintieth is concerning one who is killed by Chance, going about to part thoſe who are fighting.

He that thus ſlays him ſhall render his Weregild, altho' he did not begin the Quarrel; the reſt concerning Chance-medleys, whereby any man is killed by a Croſs-bow ſet to ſhoot wild Beaſts, or by falling into a Well, or Pit dug by another, and where the Perſons that layed the Weapon, or dug the Pit were to pay a Weregild, I deſignedly omit, referring the Reader to the Original, where he will find divers curious Caſes of this kind, ſome of which are Law at this day, and others not.

The Ninety firſt is concerning the Payment for Murther.

If any Frenchman or Norman, or other Foreigner ſhall be killed, and the Fact appear Murther, and the Murtherer be unknown, and ſhall flie, and be not rendered to the King's Juſtice within ſeven days, to undergo the Law, then Forty ſix Marks of Silver ſhall be paid for him, of which Forty belong to the King, and Six to the Kindred of the party ſlain.

Note, Theſe Forty ſix Marks (as appears by this Law) were to be raiſed out of the whole Hundred in caſe it were done in the open Fields, and the Alderman of the Hundred was to ſtand engaged for it, till it could be raiſed upon each Inhabitant: But if it were done in a private Houſe, Mannor or Encloſure, then thoſe Forty ſix Marks were to be raiſed by the Sale of the living and dead Stock found upon the Ground, as far as it would go.

The Ninety ſecond is much of the ſame Subject.

That if any one being wounded, go into another Hundred and ſhall there die, and it prove Murther, his Weregild ſhall be paid where he died: The reſt being intricate, and not very material, I omit; only it is there ſpecified, that antiently a Man was ſaid to be murthered where the Man-ſlayer was unknown, but now the Title is given, where ever or howſoever the party is found, altho' it may be known who did the Murther: nor ſhall any thing be paid for ſuch private Murther of an Engliſhman, but only of a Frenchman, and if there want evidence to prove him an Engliſhman, he ſhall be accounted a Frenchman: And altho' the Malefactor implores the King's Mercy, nevertheleſs the Fine for the Murther ſhall be paid, as we have already noted.

From whence you may obſerve the Partiality and Severity of this Law concerning Engleſcherie, which was not abrogated till the Fourteenth of King Edward the Third: if the Reader would ſee more concerning this Law, he may conſult Bracton, Lib. 3. Tract. 1. pag. 15.

The Ninety third is concerning the Amends that are to be made for all Wounds and Maims, in which Law are expreſſed the particular Payments that were to be paid for all Wounds, or Maimes whatſoever from Head to Foot, which are much to the ſame effect with thoſe in King Alfred's Laws in the former Volume.

The Ninety fourth is concerning the Fines that are to be paid for Blows or Bruiſes without effuſion of Blood, which being not material I omit, as I do the reſt of this Law concerning Wounds, with which theſe Laws of King Henry conclude.

And I have been the more particular in the recital of theſe, becauſe the Reader may thereby ſee the chief Heads both of the Criminal Law and forms of pleading in thoſe times, as alſo to convince thoſe of the contrary who believe that the Laws of England were conſiderably changed by William the Conquerour, or his Sons, from what they had been under the Engliſh Saxon Kings: nor were they more ſevere to the Engliſh Natives, and more favourable to Strangers, after, than they were before that time.

This Body of Laws above mention'd, ſeem to be reduced into this Form by ſome Lawyer or Monk of that Time, as the Common Law then in uſe, for I do not find them to have been formally Enacted by any Great Council, nor yet Granted by any Charter: For as to this King's Charter of Liberties I have omitted it here, becauſe it is recited at large in the beginning of this Reign, and is alſo to be found in Latin in the Appendix N°. 2.

But before I leave this King's Reign, I cannot omit a remarkable Miſtake of Dr. Brady, who in his * Hiſtory Treating of this King's Taxations, and citing theſe Laws, ſays, He had a conſtant Annual Land-Tax called † Danegeld of Twelve-pence upon every Hyde, to be paid at

* Pag. 270.

† This was firſt given to repell the Danes.

at certain times, and a Forfeiture ſet upon ſuch as did not duly pay it.

But I muſt here differ from the Doctor; for this Tax was not conſtantly paid; but only upon Extraordinary occaſions of Foreign Invaſions, or Wars with Scotland, as appears by the Authority of the * Black Book in the Exchequer, though the Doctor contrary thereunto, will have it to have been conſtant and Annual, which the Laws of this King, which he cites in the Margent, will by no means warrant.

VOL. II. Book IV.

King STEPHEN.

[1.] O. V. P. 573. The Honours which Earl Stephen had obtain'd by the favour of King Henry.

STEPHEN Earl [1.] of Boloign, Nephew to the late King Henry by Adela his Fourth Siſter, was the Third Son of Stephen Earl of Blois, and by the Favour of the King his Uncle, was advanced to be Earl of Mortaign in Normandy; beſides, he had many Lands and Honours beſtowed upon him in England, where his Intereſt was very conſiderable, not only on the Account of his own Perſonal merit, but alſo by his long acquaintance with the Biſhops and Nobility, all which he thought were encouragements enough for him to try for the Crown of England, before ever the Empreſs Matilda, or the Earl of Anjou her Husband could be aware of his deſign, [2.] who were at this time detain'd from going over, by reaſon of ſome urgent affairs at Home; Whereupon Earl Stephen a bold and popular Man, being highly beloved for the Gentleneſs of his Temper, and great Affability, laying hold on this opportunity, privately took a light Ship at Witſands, and ſoon Landing, made what ſpeed he could to London, where being joyfully received by the Citizens, who had a great value for him, he managed his Intereſt ſo well with thoſe Biſhops and Great Men who were then in England, that he procured a Great Council to be forthwith aſſembled, in which chiefly by the Intereſt of his Brother Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter (who brought over the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as alſo the Biſhop of Salisbury to his Party) he got himſelf to be Elected on the Second of December, and Solemnly Crowned King at Weſtminſter on the Twenty ſixth of the ſame Month, Being St. Stephen's

Anno Dom. MCXXXV.

[2.] W. M. Hiſt. Nov. L. 1. P. 108. H. H.

Earl Stephen goes privately into England, and is there by the Favour of the Biſhops and Great Men choſen, and afterwards Crowned King at Weſtminſter.

Stephen's day, by William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, as he firſt of all took the Oath of Fidelity to the Empreſs, ſo he likewiſe was the firſt that ſwore to King Stephen, all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons there preſent following his Example, notwithſtanding their former Oaths to the Daughter of the late King, doing him Homage at the ſame time: yet (if [3.] William of Malmesbury may be credited) there were not very many of them preſent at his Coronation, there being beſides the Archbiſhop only the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Salisbury; no Abbots, and but a few of the Lay-Nobility; ſo that there was never ſeen a ſmaller appearance at ſuch a Solemnity.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVI. The Biſhops Earls and Barons ſwear Fidelity to him.

[3.] P. 101. a.

An [4.] Anonymous Author of this King's Life (who lived Co-temporary with him) makes his Election to proceed his Coronation ſome Weeks, and that in the mean while he ſuppreſſed ſeveral Lawleſs men, who took the opportunity of an Interregnum, to ſpoil and lay waſt the Country; after which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury being moved to Crown him King, made ſome Objections againſt his performing it, repenting (it ſeems) of what he had already done, becauſe the Empreſs, to whoſe Succeſſion the whole Kingdom had ſworn, was alive; But at laſt K. Stephen's Agents over-perſwaded him, by ſeting forth that the former Oath of Fealty to the Empreſs was violently extorted from the Barons of England by King Henry, who was ſo ſenſible of this, that he repented of it, when he was at the point of death; and that the Archbiſhop ought not to refuſe to Crown a Perſon whom London the Head of the whole Nation had willingly received, and was beſides ſo well capacitated for the Crown by his own Perſonal merit, and by the Right of being ſo nearly Related to it; and who if he were once Crowned, being a Man Warlike and Valiant, would ſoon reform and ſettle the Kingdom at that time much diſturbed and out of order.

[4.] Vid. Script. Norman. p. 928 What he did between his Election and his Coronation.

Idem. P. 929. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury is hardly perſwaded to Crown him.

This, if true, as we have no reaſon to diſtruſt it, being written by an Author who lived in thoſe days, lets us ſee that all thoſe of King Stephen's ſide, ſuppoſed they had ſtill a Right to make any Prince of the Blood Royal (whom they ſhould think moſt fitting) their King.

But this is certain, [5.] that before he was Crowned, he made large promiſes of reforming whatever was amiſs in his Uncle's Reign, his Brother the Biſhop of Wincheſter engaging his Faith on his behalf; beſides which, at his Coronation, he took a much ſtricter Oath than what had been formerly taken by his Predeceſſors, which chiefly conſiſted in theſe three Articles.

[5.] H. H. Earl Stephen makes large promiſes of his good Government, and takes a ſtricter Oath at his Coronation, than what his Predeceſſors had done.

"Firſt, That after the death of any Biſhop he would never keep a "Biſhoprick void for his own advantage, but preſently conſent to a "Canonical Election, and Inveſt the new Biſhop in it.

"Secondly, That he would not retain the Woods of any Clerk "or Layman in his hands, as King Henry had done, who every year "impleaded, or vexed them, if either they hunted in their own "Woods, or if for their own occaſions they ſtubbed them up, or diminiſhed them: for there had been (ſays our Author) ſuch a wicked ſort of Proceſs ſet on foot of late, that if the King's Officers ſaw any Rich Man's Wood that lay near the King's Foreſts, they would return it as waſted or cut up, whither it were ſo or not, that ſo they might make him fine ſoundly for it, tho' without any reaſon or Juſtice.

Thirdly,

Anno Dom. MCXXXVI.

Thirdly, That he would for ever releaſe Danegelt, which his Predeceſſors were wont to raiſe upon Occaſion.

[1.] Idem Ib. Whatſoever the King ſwore to, he did not long obſerve.

[1.] There were alſo ſome other things which this King ſwore to obſerve, tho' theſe are the chief; yet whatſoever they were (Will. of [2.] Malmesbury relates) he kept few or none of them.

[2.] P. 101, 102. The Reaſons that induced the Biſhops, and Nobility to agree to his Election.

But ſince perhaps it may at firſt ſeem very ſtrange if not unaccountable to the Reader, that theſe Biſhops and Lay-Nobility, who agreed to this King's Election, ſhould ſo notoriouſly violate the Oaths they had before moſt ſolemnly made to the Empreſs Matilda, by placing another in the Throne; it will doubtleſs appear leſs wonderful, if you conſider, that the Perſon they had before ſworn to, was a Woman, and Married to a Foreign Prince, who was utterly a ſtranger to the Laws and Cuſtoms of this Kingdom; nor was ſhe her ſelf much better, having lived moſt of her time abroad; whereas Stephen was an Active and a Valiant Prince, very affable, and long converſant in England, and thereby well known to the Biſhops, Nobility and People; beſides, (if Rad. [3.] de Diceto, and * Gervaſe of Cant. may be credited) Hugh Bigot, the late King's Steward, coming now into England, depoſed upon Oath before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that King Henry lying upon his Death-bed, by reaſon of the late unkindneſs between him and the Empreſs his Daughter, diſinherited her, and appointed his Nephew Stephen Earl of Boloign his Heir; which Depoſition (whither true or falſe I ſhall not take upon me to determine) ſo wrought upon the too credulous Archbiſhop and the reſt of the Biſhops and Lords then preſent, that they All agreed to ſwear Fealty to him.

[3.] Col. 1340. * Pag. 13.

Yet that there were alſo other cogent Reaſons which mov'd them to act thus at this time, we find in the above cited [4.] Anonymous Author, that moſt of the Nobility did not only find it neceſſary, immediately to Elect a Valiant and worthy King for the common benefit and peace of the Kingdom, but that they ſuppoſed it to be their Right, and ſpecial priviledge, that upon the Death of their King, they might provide another of the Royal blood to ſucceed him: Though that which prevail'd with them moſt of all, was the large promiſes that Earl Stephen made to reform all thoſe Abuſes which had been practiſed in his Uncle's Life-time; beſides all which (as [5.] William of Malmesbury tells us) he had often heard Roger Biſhop of Salisbury (who was a chief promoter of this Election) declare, that he had never taken his Oath to the Empreſs, but on this condition, That the King ſhould not beſtow her again in Marriage out of the Kingdom, without his and the reſt of the Nobility's conſent; whereas none were made privy to her late match, but Robert Earl of Glouceſter, Bryon Fitz-Count, and the Biſhop of Liſieux; this our Author ſays, he relates, not that he believed what the Biſhop then ſaid, but only that he accommodated himſelf to the preſent times.

[4.] G. R. S. P. 928. The Relation of the Anonymous Author moſt probable concerning this matter.

[5.] P. 99. b.

However, whither he believed it or not, it is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that ſhe loſt very much of her Intereſt by being Married to a Foreigner out of the Kingdom, and that without its conſent; nor do I mention this, to excuſe the perjury of thoſe who agreed to this Election, which was made without any neceſſity; ſince Women, were never by any Law of this Kingdom excluded from the Crown: and as for Earl Stephen, he was as much a Foreigner by Birth, as the Earl of Anjou, and therefore it may be ſuppoſed, that it was the particular

Intereſt

Intereſt of the Biſhops, veiled under the ſpecious Title of the Good of the Church, rather than any conſideration of the publick Good, that now moved them to ſlight the Oath they had ſo ſolemnly taken; but to return again to our Hiſtory. Anno Dom. MCXXXVI.

The firſt thing [1.] the new King did after his coming to the Crown, was to perform the Obſequies of the late King, whoſe Corps he met at Reading, where it was ſolemnly Interr'd in the Abbey-Church, which King Henry had Founded; William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and many of the Biſhops and Lay-Nobility attending his Funeral.

[1.] W. M. Ib. H. H. The Corps of the late King Henry is Buried at Reading.

Sometime [2.] before or after, this King Stephen ſeized upon the vaſt Treaſure his Uncle had amaſs'd together in the Caſtle of Wincheſter; which was ſoon delivered him by one William, King Henry's Treaſurer, and amounted to more than 100000 Marks, an incredible Sum in thoſe days. [3.] From whence the King preſently went to Oxford, where he again by Oath confirmed thoſe Covenants, which he had already Sworn to God's Holy Church, and to the People at his Coronation, being the ſame with thoſe I have already recited. Thus King Stephen's Entrance on the Throne proved very eaſy and peaceable; but as the diſcord between him and the Biſhops, and ſome of the Lay Nobility began to increaſe, ſo his Reign ſtill proved every year more unquiet and turbulent, and at laſt it ended in a cruel Civil War, which never ceaſed till a little before the Death of this Valiant, and but too Ambitious, Prince.

[2.] W. M. Ib. King Stephen Seizes on the Treaſures of late King his Uncle.

[3.] H. H. R. H. The new King goes to Oxford, and there by his Charter confirms thoſe Covenants he had before Sworn to.

Whilſt [4.] the King continued at Oxford, there came a Meſſenger to him with the News, that the King of Scots upon a pretence of coming peaceably to make a Viſit in his Journey to Carliſle, and from thence to Newcaſtle, had treacherouſly ſeized upon both thoſe ſtrong places; upon which Intelligence the King not at all concerned, only ſaid, Very well, then what he has thus Treacherouſly taken, I will Manfully recover; ſo making what ſpeed he could, he raiſed a great Army, and marched againſt the Scots; but upon the two Kings approaching near each other, a Treaty was propoſed, and they meeting together at Durham, on the 5*th* of February, a Peace was concluded upon theſe Conditions: That ſince King David would not take an Oath of Fealty himſelf to King Stephen, becauſe of that which he had formerly taken to the Empreſs his Neice, yet that he ſhould command Henry his Son to take the Oath, and do the King Homage for the Territories he held of him: Then the King of Scots alſo ſurrendred Northumberland and Newcaſtle, but Stephen gave him leave to retain Carliſle and Doncaſter, and farther granted to Prince Henry the Town and Honour of Huntington, as an Augmentation of his Dignity and Revenue.

Upon the King's approach a Peace is concluded with the Scottiſh King. Jo. Hag. Col. 312. Ric. Hag. Col. 258. And upon what Conditions.

Then [5.] the King returning from the North, by the end of Lent kept his Court the Eaſter following at Weſtminſter, with greater ſplendour and magnificence than had been uſually ſeen in his Uncle's Reign; but in Rogation week it was generally reported that he was Dead, upon which Rumour Hugh Bigot ſeized the Caſtle of Norwich, and would reſtore it to none, unleſs to the King himſelf, who ſoon after recovering, went down thither on purpoſe to receive it.

[5.] Idem. The King upon his return from the North falls dangerouſly Ill.

Sometime [1.] after Eaſter, Robert Earl of Glouceſter came into England, whoſe Prudence King Stephen chiefly feared: The Earl whilſt he remained in Normandy had various thoughts what was beſt to be done in ſo nice and difficult an Affair; for if he owned King Stephen, he ſhould act contrary to the Oath he had formerly taken to his Siſter; and if he ſtood out, he ſhould neither do her nor his Nephews any good, but rather a prejudice: King Stephen not being as yet to be oppoſed, all the Noblemen of England having ſworn Fealty and Recognized him, and he having alſo poſſeſſed himſelf of the late King's vaſt Treaſure in Money, beſides a great quantity of Gold and Silver plate; with all which he could raiſe what Mercenary Souldiers he pleaſed out of Flanders and Bretaign, not to mention thoſe he found ready to fight for him in England.

[2.] Id. Ib. The Earl does Homage, and Swears Fealty to him.

Theſe [2.] conſiderations made Earl Robert not only come preſently over into England, but alſo to do Homage, and ſwear Fidelity to the new King, yet under a certain condition, viz. So long as he ſhould preſerve his Dignity entire, and obſerve the Covenants made with him. For (it ſeems) he knowing already the King's fickle Diſpoſition, thought good to provide againſt the Inſtability of his Nature, and therefore the Earl for ſome time diſſembled the ſecrets of his heart; That is, in plain Engliſh, though our Author minces the matter for his Patron's Credit, to break his Oath, ſo ſoon as he had a fit opportunity for it, as you will find by the event.

[3.] Id. Ib. All the Biſhops renew their Oath to the new King, upod his.

Not [3.] long after the Earl's arrival, all the Biſhops again Swore Fealty to the King in a Council, or Synod, held at Oxford, on this Condition, viz. ſo long as he preſerved the Liberty of the Church, and the Power of its Diſcipline; and the King himſelf alſo Swore again to them, according to the Tenure of a Charter which he then gave them under his Seal, and which our Author has there given us in theſe Words.

† Meſcheningas.

In Richard Hagulſtad's Chronicle follow alſo the Names of the Witneſſes, viz. William, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all the reſt of the Biſhops of England, together with the Chief Earls and Barons, whoſe names are needleſs to be here repeated. And [5.] William of Malmesbury here tells us, that it would be tedious to ſet down their Names, not only becauſe the Witneſſes were many, but alſo becauſe the King ſo violated almoſt all things that he had there granted, as if he had done it on purpoſe to ſhew the Kingdom, that he had Sworn only to break his Oath. But this Author, though a great Enemy to King Stephen, (as may appear by his inſtancing in many particulars, in which he tranſgreſſed his Oath to the Biſhops and Clergy) yet ingenuouſly confeſſes, That thoſe things were not to be ſo much imputed to himſelf, as to his Evil Counſellors, who gave him to underſtand, That he never need want Money, ſo long as the Monaſteries abounded with ſuch great Riches.

[5.] Ib. King Stephen afterwards broke all the Articles of this Charter, and on what Inducements.

I ſhall only obſerve from this Charter, that this King being ſenſible of his want of any other Title, places his whole Right to the Crown in his Election by the Clergy and People, his Coronation by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Confirmation of the Pope; and indeed he was the firſt King of England, who ever craved the aid of the Pope's Bull to give ſtrength to his Title.

The Reader may likewiſe here obſerve, how many Articles of this Charter concerned the Priviledges of Eccleſiaſticks, and for how few of them the Laiety were at all the better; by which you will find, not only who had the greateſt hand in making this, as well as the former Charter, but alſo in ſetting up and putting down Princes, as often as they pleas'd in thoſe times; yet notwithſtanding all thoſe fair Conceſſions, many of the Noblemen of England, of Norman Extraction, ſoon after repenting of the Oath they had taken, perfidiouſly Rebelled againſt him.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVI.

[1.] G.R.S. p. 933. Divers Noblemen Rebel againſt the King, and Robert de Bathenton firſt of all Fortifies his Caſtle againſt him.

For [1.] about this time Robert de Bathenton, a debauch'd Norman Baron, having Revolted, Fortified his Caſtle of the ſame Name, and being Summoned to the King's Court, he at firſt made a ſhew as if he had repented of his raſhneſs, and that he would deliver it up; upon this the King ſent to receive it from his hands; but inſtead of that, he deceived the Meſſengers, and making them drunk by the way, ſlipt from them betimes in the Morning, and getting back to his Caſtle, new Fortified it; whereupon the King Marched againſt it with his Army, and Beſieged it. And now Robert finding himſelf unable to hold out, endeavoured to make his eſcape over the Wall, but being taken by the Centinels, he was by the King's Orders there Hanged up in ſight of thoſe within the Caſtle; who, for fear of undergoing the like fate, immediately ſurrender'd it.

[2.] Id. p. 934. Earl Baldwin de Redvers, alſo Rebels, and Fortifies Exeter Caſtle, which is taken.

But [2.] he who gave the King one of the firſt and greateſt Diſturbances, was Baldwin de Redvers, Earl of Devonſhire, and Lord of the Iſle of Wight, who had now Fortified and Victualled his Caſtle of Exeter againſt him, to the great Terror and Oppreſſion of the Citizens, who ſending to the King for Aid he ſpeedily Marched to their Relief, and ſitting down before the Caſtle, it was after Three Months Siege ſurrender'd to him for want of Victuals, or rather (as our Author relates) for want of Water, the Well in the Caſtle being ſtrangely dried up on the ſudden, ſo that the Beſieged were forced to deliver it upon this condition, that they might go away with their Baggage whither they pleaſed.

[3.] Id. p. 935. Id. H. H. Earl Baldwin flies into the Iſle of Wight, and being there Subdu'd, is forced to leave the Kingdom.

But [3.] as for Earl Baldwin himſelf (being not then in the Caſtle, but ſomewhere in the Country adjacent) he retired into the Iſle of Wight, with deſign to keep it againſt the King; but he purſued him ſo cloſe, that he Beſieged him in his Caſtle there, and quickly driving him from thence, not only took that Iſland from him, but alſo all his other Lands and Eſtate, and expelled him the Kingdom; who preſently thereupon went over to the Duke of Anjou, and was by him kindly received. But as for all other Offenders, in this, as well as in the former Rebellion, they were by the Advice of ſome treacherous Counſellors then about the King, not only pardoned, but alſo left to enjoy their Eſtates; which too great Lenity, not long after gave freſh encouragement to the ſame Perſons, as well as many others, to raiſe freſh Rebellions.

[4.] Id. Ib. The firſt breach of the King's Oath in the renewing the Pleas of Foreſts.

The [4.] King puff'd up with this Succeſs, went to Hunt at Brompton near Huntington, and held freſh Pleas concerning the Woods of his Noblemen, that is, concerning their Hunting in them; and ſo firſt broke that Oath he had lately made to God and the People, which Action very much Alienated their Affections from him.

[5.] Dr. P's Chron. The Welſh take Arms, and Invade the Borders.

Nor [5.] did any thing elſe conſiderable happen this year, but an Inſurrection of the Welſh, who taking the advantage of an unſettled Government, under the Conduct of Cadwallader, and Owen Gwyneth, Sons of Griffith ap Conan, Prince of North-Wales, Muſtered up the Forces of their whole Country, and Marched againſt the Normans and Flemmings of Cardigan, deſtroying and burning the whole Country, with the Caſtle of Walter Eſpec (or rather de Bec as it is in the Manuſcript Welſh Chronicle in the Exchequer) as alſo the Caſtle of Aberiſtwyth, which was very ſtrong and well Mann'd; where came alſo to their Aſſiſtance Howel ap Meredyth, and Rees ap Madoc of Brecknock, and the Princes above mention'd. Towards the end of the ſame year they returned again into the Engliſh Borders with Six thouſand Foot, and Two thouſand Horſe well Armed, and were again joyn'd by the two Welſh Lords laſt mention'd, who with many others ſubdued the whole Country to Aberteivi, placing again the old Britiſh Inhabitants therein, and driving out the Foreigners; which Actions the Norman Noblemen in thoſe parts not being able longer to endure, there joyn'd againſt the Welſhmen Stephen, Conſtable of Aberteivi Caſtle, Robert Fitz-Martyn, and the Sons of Gerald, and William Fitz-John with all the power of the Normans, Flemings and Engliſh, that were in Wales, or the Marches thereabouts: there was a cruel and Bloody Fight near Cardigan, but at laſt the Engliſh and Normans were forced to quit the Field, above three thouſand of them being ſlain on the ſpot, with two of the King's Barons, Robert Fitz-Roger, and Pain Fitz-John, beſides a great number drowned by the fall of a Bridge over the River Tend, and all the reſt were taken and carried away Priſoners. After this great Victory, the Princes Owen and Cadwallader over-ran the whole Engliſh Territories, and return'd home with a great deal of rich Booty: nor do we find that this part of the Country was ever again recovered to the Engliſh Dominion all this King's Reign.

of

Anno Dom. MCXXXVI.

And gaining ſeveral Advantages over the Engliſh and Normans, drove them out of great part of South-Wales.

We [1.] ſhall now look back upon the Affairs of Normandy, where almoſt ſo ſoon as King Stephen was gone over into England, the Norman Barons being not privy to his deſigns, ſent for Theobald Earl of Boloign, his Elder Brother, to come immediately into Normandy, who meeting them at a place called Newburgh, they at firſt offered to receive him for their Duke; but before matters could be concluded between him and them, they received an Account by a certain Monk, who came to them as an Envoy from King Stephen, that the Engliſh had received him: and made him King: whereupon the Norman Barons preſently changed their minds, for having Eſtates in both Countries, they were reſolved to have but one Prince; at which the Earl was very angry, that he, being the Elder Brother, ſhould not only be defeated of the Kingdom of England, but alſo of this Dutchy, and therefore left Normandy to ſhift for it ſelf, and returned into France, whither his own Affairs then called him.

[1.] O. V. p. 902. What was done in the mean while in Normandy.

Theobald Earl of Boloign endeavours to obtain that Dutchy.

Whilſt [2.] the Country remain'd in this unſettled condition, Geoffrey Earl of Anjou, as ſoon as he heard of the death of his Father-in-law King Henry, ſent away the Empreſs his Wife into Normandy in the beginning of December the laſt year, where ſhe was joyfully received by one Guiganalyas, a Man of mean Birth, but of great Power, who looked upon her as his Lawful Lady and Miſtreſs, and having had the command in thoſe Parts in the late Reign, quickly reduced Argentune, Damfront, and ſeveral other ſtrong Places to her Obedience.

[2.] Id. P. 903. The Earl of Anjou ſends the Empreſs his Wife into Normandy, where ſhe is received by ſome of the Nobility.

Then [3.] the Earl her Husband following her not long after, together with Talvace Earl of Pontieu, and a Great Army of Anjovins, was received into Seez, and other Places, but whilſt they ſpoiled the Country, and robbed the Churches, the Normans riſing upon them on the ſudden, put them to the rout, and killed Seven hundred of them; then Earl Geoffrey, receiving Intelligence that the Nobility of Anjou had rebelled againſt him, was forced to return home, where being detain'd by Domeſtick Tumults he went not then into Normandy; but whither he left the Empreſs his Wife there behind him, or not, I do

[3.] Id. Ib. The Earl her Husband follows her with a great Army, but is diverted by a Domeſtick Inſurrection.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVI.

I do not find, only they kept the Places they were already poſſeſt of.

[4.] O.V. p. 905. The Earl of Anjou again Invades Normandy, but being Wounded is forced to return home.

[4.] Normandy continued undiſturbed all the reſt of this Winter, and the Summer following from any Foreign Invaſion; but in September the Earl of Anjou return'd into that Province with a great Army, being alſo accompanied by William Earl of Poictou, and other French Noblemen, who then took divers Caſtles and Towns, as Monſtral, Liſieux, and other Places; but ſometime after Earl Geoffrey being Wounded in the Foot at the Siege of a ſmall Caſtle, and receiving alſo a Deſeat from thoſe Noblemen that took King Stephen's part, the Earl was forced to return home to be Cured of that Hurt: the reſt of the year paſſed in Burning of Towns, and divers Skirmiſhes between Roger de Conchis a Norman Baron, who acted for Earl Geoffrey, and Gualleran Earl of Mellent, who ſuſtain'd the King's party in that Country, in which Bickerings ſometimes the one, and ſometimes the other had the better.

[5.] W.M. H.H.

[5.] Alſo our Engliſh Hiſtorians relate what the Norman omit, viz. that Earl Baldwin de Redvers upon his expulſion out of England on the account of his late Rebellion, went over to the Earl of Anjou, and highly ſtirr'd him up to this laſt Invaſion of Normandy, for which alſo he wanted not the Entreaties of his Wife the Empreſs; but as for what * William of Walſingham relates, that Robert Earl of Glouceſter then Surrendered to him the County of Falaiſe, that could not be, for that Earl was now in England, and went not into Normandy till the next year, as you will find anon.

* Typodigma Neuſtriæ.

King Stephen being all this while detain'd in England by the Scotiſh Invaſion, as well as Domeſtick Inſurrections, it was no wonder if Normandy in the mean time ſuffer'd very much, not only by a Foreign Invaſion, but by home-bred diſſentions.

[1.] G.R.S. p. 929. William A.B. of Canterbury dies, and his Character.

[1.] As for Eccleſiaſtical affairs nothing happened here, only William Archbiſhop of Canterbury dying about the end of December, that See continued Vacant above two years: this Archbiſhop was a Prelate of great outward ſtrictneſs of Life, but very covetous, having hoarded up vaſt Sums of Money, and dying without any Will, the King ſeized it all to his own uſe, as was the Cuſtom of thoſe Times, tho' indeed it was contrary to the King's late Charter.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVII.

King Stephen goes into Normandy with divers of the Nobility.

[2.] W.M. Ib. P. 101. b. Robert Earl of Glouceſter being like to be Surprized, comes no more to Court.

King Stephen being highly concern'd for the Succeſs of his Enemies in Normandy, had long reſolved to go over thither as ſoon as he could, that he might reduce it under his Dominion by force; and to that end [2.] paſſed over thither in March, a little before Eaſter, Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln, and many others of the Nobility accompanying him; then Earl Robert having privately ſounded ſome of their minds, whom he knew to be moſt tenacious of the former Oath they had taken to the Empreſs, and having reſolved on what he afterwards put in Execution, went to Sea on Eaſter-day, and Landed in Normandy; where, by the contrivance of William de Ipre, the King endeavoured to ſeize Earl Robert by a Wile; but he having notice of the deſign from one that was privy to it, eſcaped, and came not again to Court (tho' often invited.) For ſeveral days after, the King was very much concerned that his deſign had miſs'd of its effect, and he thought to put off, or at leaſt to extenuate the fault, by confeſſing it, making Oath according to a form preſcribed by the

Earl

Earl, that he would never for the future, conſent to any ſuch wicked contrivance: howevet the King would not beſtow his Friendſhip upon one whoſe Power he always ſuſpected; and therefore tho' he ſtill treated him civilly to his face, yet behind his back he uſed very ſharp expreſſions againſt him, and * fleeced him of his Poſſeſſions as much as he could, whilſt Earl Robert alſo eluding one artifice with another, diſſembled his mind, ſuffering the King peaceably to return into England, tho' whilſt he remained in Normandy he did not neglect his own advantage. Anno Dom. MCXXXVII.

* Vellicaret.

This is William of Malmesbury's account of Earl Robert's Tranſactions with the New King, which whither it be not too much in his Patron's favour we will not determine at this diſtance of time, yet we may obſerve from all the Earl's crafty proceedings, that all along neither he himſelf, nor the reſt of his party ever took an Oath of Allegiance to King Stephen, but with a reſolution to break it, ſo ſoon as they had an opportunity. Such brittle things are Oaths, when either Intereſts or pretence of Conſcience, ſhall prompt Men of different Principles, to take, and then break them as ſoon as they are able: But notwithſtanding all the cunning contrivance of this Politick Earl (who as yet thought fit to continue Neuter), King Stephen carried on the War ſo ſucceſsfully in Normandy, that he fruſtrated the deſigns of his Enemies, and took ſeveral Caſtles, and had the better of them where ever he came.

Some Obſervations upon this Earl's crafty Proceedings.

But ſince our Engliſh Hiſtorians have left but a ſhort and Summary account of this year's Tranſactions in Normandy, we will from [3.] Ordericus Vitalis gives you a fuller Relation of what then happened. About the end of March King Stephen arrived there, at which the People, who were then very much oppreſſed, were extremely pleaſed; yet not long after ſome of the Noblemen of that Province preſumed to rebell againſt him, to ſubdue whom he was fain to hire ſome Flemiſh and French Mercenaries, by whoſe Aſſiſtance he put his Affairs into ſo good a poſture, that in May he had a Conference with Lewis King of France, which ended ſo much to the King's Advantage, that he received the Inveſtiture of the Dutchy of Normandy from the French King's hands, and made a League with him upon the ſame Terms as King Henry had done before.

[3.] P. 909. A Fuller Account of this Year's Tranſactions in Normandy.

King Stephen is Inveſted in that Dutchy by the King of France.

After [4.] this King Stephen being now more ſecure marched againſt the Lord of Rabelle (a Norman Nobleman who was then in Arms) and not only took ſeveral Towns from him, but alſo reduced ſeveral Caſtles to his own Obedience.

[4.] Id. Ib. After which he reduces ſeveral Rebells.

Not [5.] long after the Earl of Anjou being now recovered of his late hurt, again Invaded Normandy with four hundred Knights (that is, Feudatary Tenants) who with their Followers made a conſiderable Body of Horſe, beſides Foot; with which Army the Earl did great miſchief to the Country, taking ſome Towns, and burning others; in the mean time the King did all he could to oppoſe him, and having muſtered together a ſufficient Army, marched to Beſiege the Town of Argentune, hoping to find Earl Geoffrey there; but as ſoon as the King came before it, there happened ſo great a Quarrel between the Normans and Piccards (being then both in the King's Service) that they fell to Blows among themſelvs, and many were kill'd on both ſides, which ſo diſturbed the whole Army, that many Officers with their Troops deſerted ſerted the King without taking any leave; and this ſo broke his meaſures, that finding there was nothing elſe to be done, he made a Truce with the Earl for two years, each ſide being to keep what they had got: But this Agreement did not hold out the time prefixt. For,

The King is forced to make a Truce with the Earl.

[1.] Id. p. 911. The King is ſtill diſturbed with freſh Rebellions there.

[1.] Notwithſtanding this Truce the King was ſtill diſturbed by ſome petty Rebellions of the Norman Nobility, who from their reſpective Caſtles Plundered the Country round about, againſt whom the King marching with his Forces, ſoon reduced thoſe Places to his Obedience. Having thus ſettled Normandy as well as he could, and appointed William de Romer, and Roger le Viſcount Governours of it in his abſence, he ſet Sail for England, whither he was called by freſh Troubles, being inform'd of a Plot, that was privately carried on by ſome of the Engliſh, to murther all the Normans upon a day agreed on, and then to deliver the Kingdom to the King of Scots: this being diſcovered to the Biſhop of Ely, was by him communicated to the reſt of the Biſhops and Noblemen to whom the King had committed the care of the Realm in his abſence, and many ſuffer'd, or elſe fled out of the Kingdom upon that Account.

[2.] David King of Scots Invades England, yet a Truce is made between him and K. Stephen.

We ſhall now look back upon what has been Tranſacted in England during the King's abſence abroad, where in [2] the mean time David King of Scots, unmindful of the Treaty He had ſo lately made, and ſtill inſiſting on the Oath He had formerly taken to the Empreſs his Niece, raiſed a great Army, and prepared to fall upon Northumberland; but the greateſt part of the Earls and Barons of England were in a readineſs upon the King's Command at Newcaſtle to aſſiſt him with all their Forces, in caſe He ſhould Invade the Kingdom; wherefore a Truce was propoſed by Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York, who waited on the King of Scots as far as Roxburgh for that purpoſe, which being accepted of by him till the Chriſtmaſs following, after forty days ſtay, the King and his Army returned home: Yet this Truce did not laſt long, becauſe King Stephen refuſed to beſtow Northumberland on Prince Henry, Eldeſt Son to the Scotiſh King, as he demanded.

[3.] Id. Ib. Euſtace the King's Eldeſt Son does Homage for Normandy.

Soon after the late Peace with the King of France, and Euſtace, the King's Eldeſt Son did Homage for Normandy, and by this means He prevented the Deſigns of his Enemies. Theobald Earl of Blois perceiving himſelf defeated in his Pretences to England and Normandy, (which as the King's Elder Brother he then laid claim to) was at laſt prevailed with to deſiſt from his Pretenſions, upon the payment of Two thouſand Marks yearly Penſion; which the Earl of Anjou, Husband to the Empreſs of Mathilda, obſerving, thought it beſt for him to make a Truce with King Stephen; for He ſaw at preſent that there was no reſiſting him, as well by reaſon of his great numbers of Men as the vaſt quantities of Monies which ſtill remain'd of the Treaſures left by King Henry: So that (as ſome Authors relate) being forced to yield to neceſſity, for the Annual payment of Five thouſand Marks, he agreed that King Stephen ſhould quietly enjoy the Crown; but yet if he ever made ſuch an Agreement, it did not continue long, as you will find hereafter.

[4.] Dr. P's Chron. Gryffith Princ. of South-Wales dies.

But now to give ſome Account of the Affairs of Wales; there died this year [4.] Prince Gryffith ap Rees ap Theodor, the Pillar of South-Wales, being being made away by the treacherous practices of his Wife Guenlhian, Daughter to Griffith ap Conan, Prince of North-Wales, who alſo himſelf deceaſed about the end of this Year, after he had Reigned Worthily for Fifty Years, and eſcaped many great dangers both in Ireland and Wales: He had ſeveral Children by divers other Women beſides his Wife; but Owen, Sirnamed Guyneth, his Eldeſt Legitimate Son, Succeeded in the Head-Principality, though the reſt of his Territories were diſtributed among all his Sons, according to the Cuſtom of Wales. Prince Owen in the very beginning of his Reign Invaded the Engliſh Territories in South-Wales, and took and razed the Caſtles of Eſtrade, Merey, with ſeveral others, and burnt the Town of Caermarthyn, there being ſmall Reſiſtance made either by the Engliſh or Normans, by reaſon of the King's abſence in Normandy.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVII. As alſo Griffith Prince of North-Wales, who is Succeeded by Owen his Son.

The [5.] King being returned into England a little before Chriſtmaſs, kept that Feaſt at Dunſtable, and after that a Court, or Great Council, at the ſame place; and preſently after he was welcom'd with a freſh Rebellion, Bedford-Caſtle being held againſt him by Milo de Beauchamp, for the King of Scots, becauſe King Stephen would have taken the Government of that place out of his hands, and given it to another; whereupon the King Marched down, and Beſieged it on Chriſtmaſs Eve, nay, even on Chriſtmaſs day it ſelf, notwithſtanding its Holineſs, and he preſs'd it ſo hard, that he took it in a ſhort time, the Beſieged not being able to hold out long againſt him.

[5.] Con. Flor. G. R. S. p. 937, 938. H. H.

But [1.] ſo ſoon as he had done there, a much greater Buſineſs called him into the North parts, where a dangerous War was now commenced; for William Son of Duncan, Nephew to David King of Scots, with part of that King's Army, then Beſieged the Caſtle of Weark in Northumberland, but not being able to make it Surrender, the King himſelf, and his Son Henry, went thither with the main Body of his Army, and endeavoured to take it by divers Engines and Various Aſſaults, yet all to little purpoſe; for thoſe that were within defended themſelves ſo bravely, that the King, though he had Beſieged it Three Weeks, and loſt many Men before it, was at laſt forced to raiſe the Siege: [2.] and ſo leaving the Town marched farther into Northumberland, which he laid waſte with Fire and Sword (not ſparing the very Churches) and alſo deſtroyed the Inhabitants without any diſtinction of either Age or Sex; for (as all our Hiſtorians relate) he ſlew the Infants hanging at their Mother's Breaſts, and the Prieſts before the very Altars.

About [3.] Candlemaſs, King Stephen, attended by a great Number of Earls and Barons, and a powerful Army of Horſe and Foot, arrived in thoſe parts; but as ſoon as the King of Scots heard of it, he made what haſte he could to return home.

Then [4.] the King of England paſſing the River Tweed (to be even with him) laid waſte moſt of the Borders of Scotland; but the King of Scots having now retreated into his own Dominions, Encamped his Army within a certain Bog, not far from Roxburgh, which had but one paſſage into it, and there lay watching for ſome advantage to fall upon King Stephen's Army by Night, if he entred that Town, in which the Scotiſh King had privately left a ſtrong force, and cunningly commanded the Townſmen to open their Gates to K. Stephen if he ſhould come that way; but the King being forewarned of the deſign, as also of the Treachery of some of his Nobility, who Conspired upon the first Engagement to Betray him; and likewise considering that a great part of his Men were unwilling to bear Arms any longer, and that Provisions began to fail, he declin'd going to Roxburgh, and thought best to return with his Army into the Southern parts; but another more urgent reason than all these was, because he had heard, that many Noblemen of England taking hold of this Opportunity had Rebelled, and Fortified their Castles against him, alledging (for a pretence) that he had broken his Coronation-Oath touching the Forests, and other Liberties granted them by his late Charter; but indeed it was because the King had refused to grant them such Castles and Lordships as they had desired of him, as you will hear more at large, when I have related the next Invasion which the Scotish King not long after made upon England, in this manner.

King Stephen being hindred by Domestick Rebellions returns into the South.

[5.] Iidem. Ib. The King of of Scots again Invades Northumberland.

[5.] No sooner was King Stephen gone into the South, and the Feast of Easter over, but the King of Scotland again Invaded and laid waste the Sea-Coast of Northumberland, and did the like also in the Bishoprick of Durham, all along between that Town and the Sea; but a report being raised, that great Forces were coming against him from the South parts of England; the Scotish Army presently quitted their Quarters, and their King Retreated to Norham, which he Besieged, and endeavoured to take by all means possible; and whilst he was employed in this Siege, he sent part of his Army under the Command of William Son of Duncan (his Nephew abovementioned) into Yorkshire, where he carried all before him, and Routing a great Party of English at a place called Clitherton, Killed many, and took more Prisoners, after which without any resistance he destroyed the Country, sparing neither Age nor Sex; only some, whom they thought most fit for Service, were carried away Captives.

And Routs a great Party of English.

That King looses many Waggons, and his Son Henry is Routed.

[2.] While these things were acting in the Bishoprick, about Rogation-Week some Soldiers Sallying out of the Town of * Weark, took many Waggons laden with the Victuals and Baggage belonging to the King of Scots, and also falling upon his Son Henry, and a Party that were with him, routed them, and either Wounded, or took Prisoners a great many of them; at which bold Actions the King being highly provoked, again marched to Weark, and laid Siege to it the second time, but with no better Success than before, the Place being very strong; [3.] therefore quitting that Enterprise, he increased his Army and went towards Yorkshire, being assisted by Eustace Fitz-John, a Baron of the North of England, and Lord of the Castle of Alnwick, who now declared for him, because King Stephen not long before had taken from him the Government of Bamborough Castle; upon which King David leaving the Siege of Weark to be continued by Two of his Thanes or Barons, marched to Bamborough Castle, but not being able to take it, he surprised and Killed about a Hundred Men near that place; and having deſtroyed all the Country round about, and alſo the Town of Melford, he repaſſed the Tine, and entred the Biſhoprick, and there ſtayed for ſome time, expecting the coming up of the reſt of his Army, which, when it was altogether, was very ſtrong, conſiſting of above 26000 Men; on which the King grew ſo confident, that he threatned to lay waſte the greateſt part of England; and ſo leaving Durham, and deſtroying all the Country where-ever he went, he paſſed over the River Teys, and began to do the like in that part of Yorkſhire adjoining to it.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII. Then Marches back into the Biſhoprick of Durham, which he lays waſte.

Then [4.] Archbiſhop Thurſtan (the King's Lieutenant in thoſe parts) with William Earl of Albemarle, Walter de Gaunt, Walter Eſpec, and many other Barons and Chief Men of that Country (whoſe Names we need not particularly mention) Aſſembling together at York, conſulted what was beſt to be done in this Exigency; for King Stephen, being now taken up with ſeveral Rebellions in the Southern parts, could not come to their Aſſiſtance; therefore theſe Noblemen's hearts had certainly failed them, and they had never dared to make reſiſtance with ſo few Men as they had, if the Archbiſhop had not encouraged them as well by his perſuaſions as advice; for he having made them a long ſpeech with great exhortations to reconcile themſelves to God by a true Repentance, and promiſing to accompany them himſelf in this Expedition if his health would permit, ſent them home to raiſe what Forces they could; who returning with their Men within a ſhort time to York, were alſo further encouraged by the arrival of Bernard de Baliol, whom King Stephen had ſent with a ſtrong Party of Horſe to their Aſſiſtance: Hereupon the Archbiſhop Ordained a Three days ſolemn Faſt, during which time they made earneſt Supplications to God for a happy Succeſs; after this the Archbiſhop himſelf being carried in a Litter becauſe of his great Age and Infirmities, led the Army till they came to a Town called Treſc, from whence they ſent Robert de Bruce, and Bernard de Baliol to the King of Scots, who was then waſting the Biſhoprick, to deſire him to ceaſe from his Barbarity, and if he would do ſo, they promiſed to obtain from the King their Maſter the Country of Northumberland for his Son Henry; but the Scotiſh King, with his Nobles, inſtead of complying, deſpiſed their Entreaties, and defied them; therefore Robert Bruce renouncing the Homage which he had formerly done the King, and Bernard the Fealty which he had Sworn to him when he was his Vaſſal, they returned to their Companions; ſo that all the Noblemen of that Province, with ſome others of Nottingham and Derbyſhire, obliged themſelves by mutual Oaths not to forſake each other in this Expedition, but ſtrenuouſly to Live and Die together.

[4.] Id. Ib. Archbiſhop Thurſtan, with the Earl of Albemarl, and ſeveral others, reſolve to raiſe an Army againſt the King of Scots.

Bernard de Baliol, comes with a freſh Party of Horſe to their Aſſiſtance.

Robert Bruce, and Bernard de Baliol, renounce their Homage to the King of Scots.

But [5.] the Archbiſhop of York being diſabled by Sickneſs, as well as old Age from Marching any farther with the Army, appointed Ralph Biſhop of the * Orcades Chief Commander in his ſtead, who immediately led the Engliſh Forces towards the Humber, near which they Encamped expecting the coming of the Scots; and it was not long before they learned from their Scouts, that King David and his Army had paſſed the River Teys, and were making great Marches to meet them; and paſſing by the Town of Alverton (now called North-Allerton in Yorkſhire) they came betimes in the Morning to an open Plain, [5.] Id. Ib. H. H. The Archbiſhop of York being diſabled by Sickneſs, appoints the Biſhop of the Orcades Chief Commander in his ſtead.

* Note, That the Orcades were not then under the Dominion of the Kings of Scotland.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII. Plain, called Cutun Moor, about Two Miles from that place, where ſome of them in the middle of the Field erected a certain Machine made of the Maſt of a ſmall Ship, which they called the Standard, and on the top of it they placed a Silver Pix, in which was (as they ſuppoſed) the Body of Chriſt, and on each ſide of which they hung the Banners of St. Peter and St. John of Beverlie, and St. Wilfred. This Engine (though ſuperſtitious enough) was yet of great Uſe, not only to animate the Spirits of the Soldiers, but (being alſo ſeen all over the Field) to make them more Reſolute in their Defence of it; and if by any Accident they ſhould be diſperſed from each other, then that was to ſerve as an Enſign where they were to Meet and Rally again.

The Army ſets up a certain Maſt which they call the Standard.

[1.] Id. Jb. The Scotiſh Army approaches them, whereupon the Biſhop of the Orcades makes a ſharp Oration againſt the Scotch. And then Abſolves the Army from their Sins.

But [1.] they had ſcarce got themſelves in a readineſs to Fight, when word was brought that the Scotiſh Army was now very near them; whereupon the Engliſh being drawn out in order of Battle, the Biſhop of the Orcades made them a long and invective Oration againſt the late Scotiſh Barbarities, for which I refer the curious Reader to H. Huntington, and R. Hoveden; all that I ſhall take notice of from it is, that at the Concluſion he Abſolved all thoſe from their Sins, who ſhould happen to fall in this Battel; which made the Engliſh the deſperate in Fighting, for nothing can give the Courage a keener edge, than to whet the Quarrel with the Cauſe of God.

[2.] R. Hag. ib. The Engliſh Army is drawn up in Battel-Array.

Now [2.] the greateſt part of the Horſe alighted, the better to Fight on Foot; the choiceſt of whom being mingled with the Archers were placed in the Van Guard, but moſt of the Chief Commanders and Barons were drawn up in the main Body about the Standard, the reſt of the Army lying round them as near as poſſible, whilſt the remaining Body of Horſe, with the Horſes of thoſe Soldiers who had alighted, retired further off, that ſo they might not be frightned with the noiſe and ſhouts of the Scots.

The Order of the Scotiſh Army.

So likewiſe on the Enemie's ſide, the King himſelf and almoſt all his Soldiers alighted, their Horſes being kept at a diſtance; near the Front of the Battel were the Galloway men, and in the middle the King with his Scotiſh Soldiers and Engliſh Auxiliaries, many of whom being of the Empreſs's Party, now join'd with the Scots againſt their Native Country, but the reſt of the Barbarous Multitude were diſperſed about the Field: Now whilſt they Marched on in this Order to Fight, and ſaw the Standard not far off, their Hearts began to be ſtruck with a panick Fear, but for all that they obſtinately went forward, until the Battel was begun, which laſted not above Two Hours, for many of the Galloway Men, who were but lightly Armed, being ſlain at the firſt Onſet, the reſt ſoon flung down their Arms and fled, not being able to endure the Showers of Arrows, and force of the Engliſh Swords; then the Body of Lothian Men (their Leader being ſlain by an Arrow) likewiſe diſperſed, though the King and the reſt of the Nobility did all they could to Rally them, and ſome of them came back again to his Royal Standard (which was a Dragon) and made up a freſh Body: but the King perceiving they were not ſufficient to renew the Fight, commanded them to fling away their * Tokens, and mix themſelves with their Enemies, which they immediately did, and ſo ſafely paſſed through the Van Guard of the Engliſh, moſt of of them flinging down their Arms and ſhifting for themſelves as well as they could; but the King in his flight kept on his Armour, till being got out of danger he came to a poor Man's Cottage, and there he left it becauſe it was a burthen to him; yet he made no very great haſte, that ſo he might the better in his March pick up thoſe that had fled: at length he arrived ſafe at Carliſle, though much concerned for Earl Henry his Son, who was left behind; but he tarried there two days, and on the third he likewiſe received him in ſafety. Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII. Is much concerned for Earl Henry his Son, who at laſt returns ſafe.

[3.] In the mean time the Engliſh purſuing the Scots, killed a vaſt number of them, beſides a great many that were taken Priſoners, for (as ſome of our Hiſtorians ſay) there were above Ten thouſand Scots miſſing when they were Muſtered at their return home; but of the Engliſh Forces there were but few killed, all the reſt getting large Spoils, and having placed the Enemie's Colours which they had taken from them, in the Churches of ſeveral Saints, they returned home in Peace. But their ſudden departure tended very much to the prejudice of the King's Affairs, as you will ſee by and by. [3.] Id. Ib. The Engliſh purſue the Scots, and kill a great Number of them, and carry home a great deal of Plunder.

This is the Account (omitting the long Speeches) that Richard Prior of Hagulſtald, and * Ailred Abbot of Rievalle, give of this famous Battel and Victory obtain'd by a ſmall Army of Engliſh, over a much greater of Scots, where their King Commanded in Perſon; and is by thoſe Authors laſt mentioned, called the Battel of the Standard, the reaſon of which Title the Story it ſelf ſufficiently declares. * Col. 321, 322.

But Hector Boetius, and Buchanan, make a quite contrary Relation of this Year's War, and that King Stephen repented of the late Agreement he had made, and therefore raiſed all the Forces he could, reſolving to recover Northumberland; and that thereupon the Scots gathering together an Army in haſte, and joining Battel, had the worſt of it, but yet that their loſs was not very great, for repairing that Affront, by many light Skirmiſhes, they only gave up that part of Northumberland, which was ſeized upon by the Engliſh immediately after the late Victory; but King David, that he might put a ſpeedy end to the War, thought it better to drive the Engliſh out of Northumberland with all his Forces, or elſe wholly to loſe it by an Honourable Death; and therefore he ordered Soldiers to be raiſed all over Scotland, and a very great Army to be drawn together; that not long after this Archbiſhop Thurſtan going to the King (then at Roxburgh) begged Peace, and ſo for a while ſtopped his fury by obtaining a Three Months Truce on this condition, That the Engliſh ſhould yield up all Northumberland to his Son Henry; which Truce when King David found not to be obſerved by the Engliſh, he fell ſuddenly upon thoſe who held that part of Northumberland, and made a great ſlaughter of them, and that King Stephen upon hearing the great loſſes he had received, forthwith Aſſembled his Army, and marched with it as far as Roxburgh, but it being there told him, That his Nobles began to Rebel againſt him, he immediately returned without doing any thing. The Scotiſh Hiſtorians give a different but falſe Relation of this Battel.

In which Relation there are many great miſtakes: For firſt King Stephen did not begin this War with King David, with whom he had much rather have been at Peace; nor did he ever give up any part of Northumberland to him, and therefore could not make War to recover what; This Relation confuted.

Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII. what was already in his own Poſſeſſion; nor was the Victory gained by the Engliſh over the Scotch ſo inconſiderable as they would have it, as appears by what we have already related, as alſo by the effects of it; they being now driven not only out of part, but out of all Northumberland which they had before laid waſte with Fire and Sword; a Method that Princes never take when they look upon a Country as their Own already.

As for what follows of King David's ſecond Invaſion of Northumberland with a potent Army, and Archbiſhop Thurſtan's attending that King at Roxburgh to deſire Peace, it was not in this, but in the Year Precedent, as we have already ſhewn; neither was there any ſuch condition then agreed to, that the Engliſh ſhould deliver up Northumberland to Prince Henry, and therefore the Engliſh could not break the Truce in not delivering it without their King's Conſent; 'tis true, King David did again Invade Northumberland, and made a great ſlaughter there; and it is alſo as true, that he then ſuffer'd a total Defeat, which the former of theſe Authors wholly conceals: and as to King Stephen's raiſing an Army, and marching with it as far as Roxburgh, and then returning back all of a ſuddain without doing any thing: It was not in this year neither, but in that preceeding, upon the News of the freſh Inſurrections in England abovementioned.

A farther Confutation of Buchanan.

Nor is Buchanan any whit leſs miſtaken, when ſpeaking of this Battel near Allerton, he makes the Earl of Glouceſter to have Commanded the Engliſh forces, and that after a ſharp Engagement (the loſs at firſt being pretty equal on both ſides) the Engliſh ran away, and many of their Nobility were taken Priſoners, and among the reſt the Earl of Glouceſter their General: This is all a very notorious falſehood, for there never was but one Battel near Allerton, in which the Scots were utterly routed (as you have already heard;) nor could the Earl of Glouceſter be their General, nor then be taken Priſoner, ſince he was never truſted by King Stephen with any Command under him, he being always on the ſame ſide with the King of Scots, even before he openly declared againſt King Stephen. Indeed Buchanan is leſs excuſable in this, becauſe he might (if he had pleaſed) have conſulted our Engliſh Hiſtorians, who all with one conſent aſſert the contrary. It is true, he is ſomewhat more ingenuous, when he confeſſes that the War being renewed the Year following, the Scots again marched into England, and being fluſhed by their late Victory, engaged anew with the Engliſh, but giving them Battel too precipitantly at the River Teys, they paid dear for their Raſhneſs, in thus ſlighting their Enemy, who by a terrible ſlaughter compell'd them to quit Northumberland: Though the real Truth is, there was but One ſet Battel fought between the Engliſh and the Scotch in the laſt Two Years, viz. that of the Standard abovementioned; and as to what he ſays farther concerning King David's ſecond Invaſion upon this Defeat given him by the Engliſh, and Archbiſhop Thurſtan's ſuing for Peace (and for which he cites William of Newburgh, tho' he ſays no ſuch thing); I have already proved it to be miſplaced, ſince it was not after, but before this Battel, that theſe things happened: Neither did Queen Mathilda go at the King her Husband's Command to King David her Uncle to ſue for Peace; however it muſt be confeſſed, that Peace was afterwards made by this Queen's Interceſſion, though at firſt first much against the Inclinations of the King her Husband, as you will find when I come to treat of the next Year's Transactions. This much I thought fit to let the Reader know, to shew the great Ignorance and Partiality of the Scotish Historians in the Relation of their Wars with England. But to return again to our History. Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII.

So [4.] soon as the news of this great Victory reached King Stephen's Ears, he was very much pleased with it, and the more because he had heard that William de Albemarle, and Robert de Ferrars had behaved themselves very Gallantly in the late Battel; whereupon he made the former Earl of Torkshire, and the latter of Darbyshire; in which Families those Honours continued for divers Generations.

[4.] De Bello Standardi. col. 323. King Stephen is much pleased with the News of this Victory, and bestows Titles of Honour on the Chief Commanders.

But [5.] to return to the Affairs of Scotland; notwithstanding this Defeat, the King of Scots no sooner had heard that the English Forces were returned home, but recruiting his shatter'd Army, he again Marched into England, and laid fresh Siege to the Town and Castle of Weark*, trying by all sorts of Engines to take it; but the Townsmen so well defended themselves, by breaking the Engines and killing many of the Scots, that they grew weary of the Siege; yet having the whole Country round about in their power, they so block'd up the place, that it could receive no Relief any way.

[5.] Id. Ib. Upon the Retreat of the English the King of Scots again Invades England, and Besieges the Castle of Weark, though in vain.

* Called by this Author Carrum,

In [1.] the mean time Albert Bishop of Ostia, the Pope's Legate, being arrived in England, and going into the Province of York to Visit and Reform what was there amiss, went to the King of Scots, whom he found at Carlisle with the Bishops and Barons of that Kingdom, where he endeavoured to make Peace between him and King Stephen; but it was to no purpose, for he could scarce obtain a Truce that he should not again March into England before Martinmass: Then the Castle of Weark began to be very much streightned for want of Provisions, which increasing more and more, the Besieged, when they had Eaten up all their Horses, were at last forced to surrender it to King David, and he caused both Town and Castle to be Demolished.

[1.] Id. Col. 324. The Pope's Legate going into the North endeavours to make a Peace between the Kings of England and Scotland, but to no purpose.

But [2.] about the beginning of Winter, there was a Treaty of Peace set on foot between the Two Kings, by the means of Queen Mathilda, who being Neice to King David, as I have said before, did all she could to reconcile them; to which, though King Stephen himself was at first averse, because several of his Barons (who had sustained great Losses by the present War) perswaded him by no means to make Peace with the King of Scotland upon those terms; yet the Queen at last prevailed with her Husband to consent to a Peace, though it was not concluded till the Year following.

[2.] Id. Ib. Yet a Peace is at last concluded by the Mediation of the Queen Mathilda, Neice to the King of Scots.

I have already told you, that the King being at the same time pressed with divers Rebellions in the Southern parts of England, had not Leisure to prosecute the War against Scotland in Person, as otherwise he would have done; I shall therefore (from [3.] William of Malmesbury) give you a more perfect Account of the causes of these Commotions, and what Success they met with: You must know that several of the Young Nobility having been advanced under the late King, the greatness of their Minds, or their own youthful boldness prompted them to commit many unlawful things, and being not contented with what they had got, they very confidently asked the King, some of them for Mannors, others for Castles, and, in short, whatever whatever they had a fancy for; which when the King denied to grant them, alledging that it would be a diſmembring of his Kingdom, and that Others, who had alſo deſired the ſame things were already in poſſeſſion of them; theſe Noblemen ſo very much reſented it, that preſently flying to Arms, they Fortified their Caſtles, and took great Spoils in the adjacent Countries; yet the King was not at all diſcouraged with this their Defection; but ſometimes Subdued one, and ſometimes another; and being too merciful, always made an end rather to his own Loſs than the Prejudice of thoſe who had Rebelled againſt him: for after a great deal of labour and trouble beſtowed to no purpoſe, all that he got by his Clemency, was a temporary diſſembled Peace, though he often obliged them (but too late) by giving them thoſe very Honours and Caſtles which they had at firſt deſired. From whence we may obſerve, That as too great Cruelty, ſo likewiſe an over-great Clemency may be equally Prejudicial to a Prince, eſpecially whoſe Government is unſettled.

[4.] Il. Ib. Upon the report of Robert Earl of Glouceſter, and the Empreſs's deſign to come over, many Noblemen Rebel.

But [4.] what made theſe Noblemen more greedy to ask, and the King more eaſy to give, was a Report at that time ſpread all over England, viz. That Robert Earl of Glouceſter (then in Normandy) was coming over to take his Siſter the Empreſs's part, and having not long before renounced his Homage, had then alſo ſent the King a Defiance; but before his Arrival ſeveral of the Nobility had begun to Rebel: For [5.] H. H. In which William Talbot leads the way.

[5.] William Talbot at that time held the Caſtle of Hereford againſt the King, but he by a cloſe Siege ſoon reduced it to his Obedience; alſo William Lovell held the Caſtle of Cari; one Paganel that of Ludlow; William de Mohun that of Dunſtar; Euſtace Fitz-John that of Melton in Yorkſhire; William Fitz-Allen that of Shrewsbury; which laſt the King quickly got by force, and Hanged ſome of thoſe that were taken therein; which one Walkelin, who held the Caſtle of Dover, hearing of, he delivered it up to the Queen, who was then Beſieging it; but [1.] the King hearing of theſe Rebellions, received the News with a great Preſence of Mind, and was often wont thus to expoſtulate concerning thoſe who had Rebelled; Since (ſaid he) they have Choſen me their King, Why do they now forſake me? By the Birth of God (which was his uſual Oath) I will never be called an * Abdicated King; and he was as good as his word; for to his death he courageouſly kept that Crown, which the prevailing party of the Kingdom had ſet upon his Head.

[1.] W. M. p. 102. The King's Speech upon the News of theſe Inſurrections.

* Rex Ejectus.

But [2.] (as the ſame Author and others relate) one great reaſon of the haſty Revolt of theſe Noblemen, was the King's late Seizing upon the Perſons and Eſtates of ſome of their Order, upon ſlight ſuſpicions of their Diſloyalty; to this may be added the extraordinary Favour he ſhewed to William of Ipre, a Flemming, and thoſe of his Nation, which the Engliſh Nobility interpreted as a Contempt of themſelves; whereupon the Noblemen abovementioned ſent over word to the Empreſs, that within Five Months ſhe ſhould have the whole Kingdom delivered up to her: So that we ſee nothing could diſoblige the Engliſh Nobility ſo much as Arbitrary Proceedings, and the unneceſſary Preferment of Foreigners to high Commands and great Eſtates.

[2.] Il. Ib. Other Reaſons why many Noblemen now Deſerted the King.

But

Anno Dom. MCXXXVIII.

[3.] But he who now, and all along indeed, gave the King the greateſt trouble was, Robert Earl of Glouceſter, who not long after Whitſontide had ſent over Meſſengers out of Normandy to the King, by whom (according to an Antient cuſtom of that Age) he renounced his Fealty, and Surrender'd up his Homage, alledging as he thought a ſufficient Reaſon for it, to wit, that he had not only ſeized the Kingdom contrary to the Oath he had taken to the Empreſs, but had likewiſe broken the Faith which he had ſworn to himſelf; and that if he had done him Homage, it was contrary to the Oath which he had already taken to his Siſter, therefore now repented of it; beſides the Anſwers of divers Religious Perſons (whom he conſulted) did very much excite him to it; for they told him, that he could not paſs this preſent life without Ignominy; nor hope to obtain that to come, if he violated the Oath he had already made to ſo near a Relation: He alſo got the Pope's Sentence, requiring him that he ſhould rather obey that Oath which he had formerly taken by his Father's Command, than this more late One to the preſent King.

[3.] Il. Ib. Earl Robert renounces his Allegiance to King Stephen.

Theſe are the Reaſons our Author gives, why Earl Robert his Patron broke his Oath of Allegiance to King Stephen; which, whither they are ſufficient to excuſe him, or not, I ſhall not take upon me to determine; but only obſerve, that tho' the Clergy then (as well as any time ſince) have been the greateſt cauſes of Alterations, and Revolutions in Governments, yet the double dealing of the Pope is moſt remarkable in this Affair; for after he had by his Bull approved of, and confirm'd King Stephen's Title, yet he could now grant another, declaring that Earl Robert was not bound by the Oath he had taken; and indeed the Pope might as well have abſolved All the Biſhops and Nobility of England of their Oaths for the ſame Reaſon.

The Pope's double dealing in this Affair.

[4.] But the King deeply reſenting the Earl's bold Defiance, immediately ſeized upon all his Great Eſtate in England, and razed ſome of his Caſtles, but thoſe of Briſtol and Slede remained ſtill untaken, which were not only in a condition able to repell his Enemies, but alſo they did very much diſturb the King by their frequent Excurſions.

[4.] Il. Ib. The King ſeizes on Earl Robert's Eſtate, and razes his Caſtles; tho' ſeveral of the ſtrongeſt remain untaken.

[5.] I have nothing further to remark under this Year, but that Alberic, Biſhop of Oſtia, the Pope's Legate, in December held a General Synod of all the Biſhops and Clergy of England at Weſtminſter, where were preſent Eighteen Biſhops, and about Thirty Abbots, with a great multitude of both Orders: one of its chief Affairs was, to ſelect a fit Perſon into the Church of Canterbury, than vacant, by the deceaſe of William its late Archbiſhop: But Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York, being very weak, ſent thither the Dean of his Church, together with ſome of his Clergy, to Repreſent him.

[5.] Il. Ib. The Pope's Legate holds a Synod at Weſtminſter.

[1.] Richard, Prior of Hagulſtad or Hexham, has given us the Canons of this Synod, which ſince they wholly belong to Eccleſiaſtical matters, or elſe are but ſuch as had been already made by former Councils, I purpoſely omit, only ſhall take notice of Two of them; the former of which Ordains, That no Perſon ſhall claim any Eccleſiaſtical Benefice by Paternal Inheritance, or appoint a Succeſſor therein: And by the Other it is Ordained, That if any one ſhall kill, impriſon, or lay violent hands upon any Clerk, Monk, or Nun; And as for any other Eccleſiaſtical Perſon, (unleſs being thrice Summon'd he make ſatissatisfaction) he shall be Excommunicated; nor might any besides the Pope himself absolve him, unless it were at the point of Death; but if he died impenitent, his Body was to remain unburied.

By vertue of which Decree, many Bishops, Priests and Monks thought they might commit what Crimes they pleased, without being at all lyable to the Civil Power, which caused Great Disturbances in after-times.

[2.] Id. Ib. Theobald Abbot of Bec is there chosen Archbishop of Canterbury.

[2.] In this Council likewise, (after some Debates about filling the Vacant See of Canterbury) Theobald Abbot of Bec in Normandy was by the Pope's Legate, and all the Bishops of England, Elected Archbishop; but [3.] Gervase of Canterbury places his Election immediately after the breaking up of the said Council, and makes it to have been perform'd not only by the Bishops, but by Jeremy, Prior of Canterbury, and some of the chief Monks of that Convent.

[3.] Col. 1348.

[4.] O. V. P. 915. The various successes of affairs in Normandy, where the War broke out before the Truce was expired.

[4.] Before we conclude this year it is fit we look back into Normandy, and see what King Stephen's Enemies had been doing there, whilst he was employed in England: for before the Truce between the King and the Earl of Anjou was expired, Reginold, Base Son to King Henry, took up Arms for his Sister the Empress, and joyned his Forces with Baldwin de Redvers, Stephen de Mandeville, and others of the King's Enemies, who made a fresh Insurrection in the County of Constantine; whom when Roger le Viscount went to resist, he fell into an Ambush they had lain for him, and was there slain; this ill Accident was followed by divers other petty Insurrections, and taking and Plundering of Castles and Towns, not sparing any Places either Sacred or Prophane, no not in the Holy Time of Lent.

[5.] P. 916. Waleran Earl of Mellent passes over thither with some Forces, but to little purpose.

[5.] In May following Waleran Earl of Mellent, and William de Ipers Captain of the Flemings, came over with them, and other Forces into Normandy, in order to settle that Province, which then laboured under great Disturbances, but to little purpose; for Roger de Conchis the Head of the opposite Party so well defended himself that they could do him little prejudice, only the miserable Country being Burnt and Plundered, suffer'd extremely by both Parties.

[1.] Id. Ib. The Earl of Anjou returns into Normandy, and having brought over Earl Robert to his Party, takes Caën, and Bayeux.

Whereupon many Bishops and Noblemen of that Province desert the King.

[1.] For in June, tho' the two years Truce between the King and the Earl of Anjou was not yet expired, yet laying hold on these Disturbances he return'd into Normandy with an Army, and by Prayers and Promises now prevail'd with the Earl of Glouceſter, openly to espouse and take up Arms for his Sister the Empress's Interest, so that by his Assistance the Cities of Bayeux and Caën, together with many other Places, were taken either by Force or Surrender: which Successes encouraged many Bishops and Noblemen of Normandy to Rebell against King Stephen, because they knew the Earl to be very powerful not only there, but in England, as having a great Estate, and many strong Places under his Command in both Countries; therefore tho' the Earl of Mellent did all he could to oppose this almost general Defection of the Normans, and hired Foreign Troops to reduce them to Obedience, yet it was to little purpose; for his Forces not being strong enough to Besiege Caën (which Earl Robert then kept) all that could be done was, to waste the Country that lay in the Enemie's power, and to fight them in some petty Rencounters, tho' with various success; this I thought fit to mention, since Normandy had continued hitherto under the King of England's Dominion.

This

This Year [2.] immediately after Chriſtmaſs, the King Beſieged the Caſtle of Slede belonging to Robert Earl of Glouceſter, and took it in a ſhort time; ſome while after which, early in the Spring he again marched with his Army into Scotland, which he laid waſt with Fire and Sword, till at laſt the King of Scots was forced to make Peace with him, ſending his Son Earl Henry as a Hoſtage, whom the King carried along with him into England; and then went to the City of Worceſter, where being joyfully received by both Clergy and Laiety, He offer'd his Ring at the High Altar, and ſo marched preſently to the Siege of Ludlow Caſtle, which was then in Rebellion againſt him; and Earl Henry (being there preſent with him) was pulled from his Horſe by an Iron-hook let down from the Wall, and very narrowly eſcaped being taken Priſoner, but the King perceiving his danger, ran himſelf to his Succour, and reſcued him; yet notwithſtanding all his other Endeavours, the Reſiſtance which the Beſieged made was ſo vigorous, that he thought it convenient to leave the Place untaken, and march back to Oxford; where holding a * Court, or Great Council, of his Biſhops and Nobility, there happened a Buſineſs that afterwards gave him much diſturbance, and was very like to have coſt him his Crown by his unſeaſonably falling out with thoſe Biſhops, who had been the chief means of putting it upon his Head, and who were now too powerful for him in his Circumſtances to contend with.

The Caſtle of Slede is taken.

The King marches into Scotland, and forces that King to make Peace, and give his Son Henry as a Hoſtage for it.

The King Beſieges Ludlow Caſtle, where Earl Henry is like to be taken up with with an Iron-hook.

* Curia.

The King marches back to Oxford, and there holds a great Council.

The Original of which Quarrel [3.] William of Malmesbury having given us at large, I ſhall from him (who wrote not long after it) give you this ſhort account of.

[3.] P. 101. b.

[4.] Upon the Reports of Earl Robert's ſpeedy coming out of Normandy, together with the Empreſs his Siſter, ſeveral Noblemen (as we have already ſhewn) made an open Defection from the King, whereupon he reſolved to ſecure himſelf from their Inſurrections, tho' to the prejudice of many that were Innocent; for ſeizing upon divers of the Nobility at his Court on a bare Suſpition of their being in Confederacy againſt him, he contrary to his Royal Dignity committed them to Priſon, and thereby conſtrain'd them to Surrender their Caſtles, and ſubmit to what Conditions he pleaſed: There were likewiſe at that time two moſt Potent Prelates in England, viz. Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, and Alexander his Nephew, Biſhop of Lincoln; this laſt had lately built the Caſtle of Newark for the Defence of his Biſhoprick (as he pretended;) the Former alſo, who deſired to appear as Magnificent in Buildings as his Nephew, had erected one Caſtle at Shireburn, and another at the Devizes, taking in a great quantity of Ground, with Walls and Buildings; and had alſo begun a Third at Malmesbury in the very Church-yard, and had formerly procured of King Henry the Cuſtody of the Caſtle of Salisbury, which too he had Encloſed with a Wall; to which I may likewiſe add Nigel Biſhop of Ely, another Nephew of Biſhop Roger's, who all three lived in ſuch Secular Pomp and Grandeur, that they never came to the King's Court without vaſt Trains of Armed Followers, to the great ſcandal of their Epiſcopal Function, and terror to the King and his Subjects, as the Anonymous Relater of this King's Reign obſerves.

[4.] W.M. p. 102. a.

The occaſion of King Stephen's Quarrel with the Biſhops of Salisbury, Lincoln, and Ely.

The high and Pompous way of Living of theſe Biſhops give great offence to the Lay-Nobility.

With which Actions ſome of the Lay-Nobility, particularly the Earl of Mellent, being much diſpleaſed, they plainly told the King that the Bishops were now grown more intent upon erecting Castles, than on their Sacred Functions, and no doubt, but they were designed for his Destruction; and that when the Empress came over, they would not only take her part, but deliver them up to her, as being obliged to it by the memory of those favours they had formerly received from her Father; perswading the King to force them to deliver up their Castles: and he readily hearkening to their advice, took the first Opportunity to put it in execution, and it was in this manner.

[5.] Id. Ib. A Council held at Oxford.

[5.] About the end of June a General Council of all the Chief Men of the Kingdom was held at Oxford, where all the Bishops above mentioned appeared; William of Malmesbury reports he heard the Bishop of Salisbury say, He had no mind to the Journey, and undertook it with great Reluctancy, for that he could be of no use in that Council; which proved true enough, for it so happen'd, that the Retainers and Servants of that Bishop, and those of Alan Earl of Bretaign, quarrelled about taking up Lodgings, and from words it came to blows, upon which many were wounded, and one Knight killed, but the Bishops Men were superior in the conflict: Now the King taking advantage of this Riot, commanded the Bishops above mention'd to be Convened, that they might satisfie his Court for their Servants thus breaking the Peace, and the Satisfaction he required, was no less than the Delivery up of their Castles into his hands as a Security for their future Fidelity to him.

Where upon occasion of a Quarrel between the Servants of the Bishop of Salisbury, and Alan Earl of Bretaign, the King seizes the Bishops abovementioned, until they would Surrender their Castles into his hands.

They seem'd very willing to make him satisfaction, but they demurred as to the yielding up their Castles; [1.] whereupon the King commanded they should be kept Prisoners with great strictness, for fear of their escape; then Roger Bishop of Salisbury was carried away unbound indeed himself, but his Son Roger, Chancellor of England [2.] (whom he had got on Maud of Ramesbury his Concubine) was led in Fetters (with a Halter about his Neck) to the Castle of the Devizes, which Nigel, Bishop of Ely, (Nephew to the Bishop, who had fled thither from Oxford, when his Uncle was taken) then held out against the King; so that by this severe Treatment, the Castle of Salisbury, Shireburn, and Malmesbury, were delivered upon the first Summons; as was that of the Devizes too after three days Siege, the Bishop of Salisbury of his own accord without any force, resolving to fast until it was in the King's possession, that so he might the more incline his Nephew to yield, who otherwise perhaps would have defended it as long as he could; his Other Nephew Alexander Bishop of Lincoln purchased his liberty by the speedy surrend'ring of his Castle of Sleaford into the King's hands.

[1.] Idem. P. 103.

[2.] H. H.

[3.] H. H. A prodigious Treasure found in the Castles of Shireburn, and Devizes, which the King seizes to his own use.

[3.] In the Castles of Shireburn and the Devizes the King found such a prodigious quantity of ready Money, that sending great part thereof to Lewis King of France, he thereby not only obtain'd his Friendship, but also Constantia his Sister for his Son Prince Eustace, tho' the Mariage was not Consummated till the year following.

[4.] P. 199. A farther Account of this Action from Ordericus Vitalis.

[4.] Ordericus Vitalis tells this Story somewhat more at large, for he says, that Waleran, Earl of Mellent, and his Brother Robert, with Alan Earl of Bretaign, sought occasion of quarrelling with the Bishops, and that after the Fray, when the Bishops, Roger and Alexander were taken Prisoners, the Bishop of Ely escaped to the Castle of the Devizes, and Fortified it. And that the King hearing of it, was very angry, angry, and ſent William de Ipre a Fleming before with an Army to take the Caſtle, who carried Roger the Biſhop and his Son the Chancellor along with him, ſwearing that the Father ſhould not eat, until it was deliver'd to him; and not only ſo, but erecting a Gallows before the Caſtle-Gate, he threatened forthwith to hang the Chancellor Roger: and then Maud his Mother, who was in the Caſtle to redeem her Son from death, ſent to the King, and acquainted him, that ſhe would deliver the Keep or Chief place of Strength (which was in her power) and by that means forced the Biſhop of Ely to Surrender the whole Caſtle, in conſideration, that he might have Liberty to retire to his own See. Anno Dom. MCXXXIX.

[5.] This Act of the King's as it made a great noiſe, ſo it likewiſe ſerved to divide the Biſhops among themſelves; Hugh Archbiſhop of Rouen, a great Friend to, and Defender of the King's cauſe and Intereſt (being then in England) was of opinion, that it was but juſt the Biſhops ſhould be deprived of their Caſtles, which were not allowable by the Eccleſiaſtical Canons, that the Biſhops ought to be Evangeliſts of Peace, not Builders of Caſtles, to be as Sanctuaries for their evil and diſloyal Practices. But Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, King Stephen's Brother, then the Pope's Legate, affirmed, That if the Biſhops tranſgreſſed in any point, they were not to be tried in the King's Court, but to be Judged by the Canons, nor to be deprived of any thing but by a General Synod; and forthwith Summon'd the King his Brother to be preſent in the Council he intended to hold at Wincheſter, on the Twenty ninth day of Auguſt next enſuing.

[5.] Id. Ib. W. M. Ib. This Action of the Kings makes a great diviſion among the Biſhops.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter takes part with the injur'd Biſhops.

[1.] On which day appeared moſt of the Biſhops of England, with Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury (for Thurſtan Archbiſhop of York was excuſed, both in reſpect of his want of health, and preſent care in the defence of the Northern parts againſt the Scots;) then the Legate having firſt produced his Commiſſion from the Pope, made a Latin Speech to the Clergy, wherein he ſet forth, and aggravated "his Brother's late Fact, in that he had Commanded the Biſhop of "Salisbury to be taken Priſoner in the very Chamber of the Court, (or Great Council) "and the Biſhop of Lincoln in his Lodging; and "that the Biſhop of Ely fearing the like Treatment had avoided it, "by a ſpeedy flight to his own See; that it was an unheard of wick-"edneſs, that the King ſhould be ſo far ſeduced by Evil Councellors, "as to command his Subjects (eſpecially Biſhops) to be ſeized even "under the protection of his own Court, Exhorting the Archbiſhop "and all others to conſult what was needful to be done; telling "them, that for the loſs of his Brother's Friendſhip, or of his own "Poſſeſſions, nay even of his Head, he would not forbear to put the "Decrees of this Council in Execution.

[1.] Id. Ib. Who thereupon being Legate to the Pope, calls a Synod of the Biſhops and Clergy of England at Wincheſter, where he makes a Speech to them againſt the King.

"But the King not diſtruſting his Cauſe, ſent ſome of the Earl's into "the Synod, To know why he was called thither; to whom the Legate "immediately anſwered, That he who was guilty of ſuch a crime as "that Age never ſaw, being himſelf a Chriſtian, ought not to take "it amiſs, if he was called by the Miniſters of Chriſt to make ſatis-"faction; they might therefore tell his Brother, that if he would "take his Advice, by the help of God, it ſhould be ſuch, as neither "the Roman Church, the Court, nor Council of the King of France, "nor their Brother Earl Theobald, (a prudent Religious Man) ſhould "find " find fault with; which was, that he ſhould do well, either preſent-

" the Canons. The Earls when they had heard what was ſaid, went out, and not long after came back again.

[2.] Id. Ib. Alberic de Ver a Baron Learned in the Laws makes the King's Defence.

[2.] Then Alberic de Ver (Anceſtor to the Earls of Oxford) a Man well vers'd in all the variety of Civil Cauſes (who accompanied the Earls thither) brought back the King's anſwer, " and as much as he was able aggravated the cauſe againſt Biſhop Roger, (for Biſhop Alexander was then abſent) yet modeſtly enough, and without any reproachful Language; the Sum of his Diſcourſe was to this effect; " That the Biſhop of Salisbury had been many ways injurious to the " King, that he very ſeldom appeared at his Court, or Council; alſo " that his Men, or Retainers, preſuming upon his power, had moved " Sedition, and at Oxford, (as well as at other times and places) had " done violence to the Followers of his Nephew Earl Alan, and likewiſe to the Servants of Hervey of Lyons, who was of ſuch great " Nobility and high ſpirit, that tho' the late King Henry had often " requeſted him, yet he would never vouchſafe till now to come into England; ſo that the affront reflected upon the King himſelf in " reſpect to whom he came over: He further accuſed the ſaid Biſhop, " that he privately favour'd the King's Enemies, which appeared in " many inſtances, but moſt eſpecially in this, that when Roger Mortimer with the King's Troops, which he commanded, fled for fear " of thoſe that belong'd to Briſtol, he would not permit them to " Quarter one Night in Malmesbury; that it was the general diſcourſe, " that he with his Nephews, ſo ſoon as the Empreſs ſhould arrive, " would declare for her; he alſo added, that he was ſeized, not as a " Biſhop, but as the King's Servant, that had tranſacted the King's " Buſineſs, and received Wages for ſo doing: That the Caſtles were " not violently taken from them, but that they freely render'd them " to eſcape the accuſation of the Tumult they had raiſed in the " Court; that the Sums of Money which were found in the Caſtles " lawfully belong'd to the King, for that in the time of his Uncle " King Henry, the Biſhop had fraudulently diverted them from the " Exchequer, and that he had willingly parted with them and the " Caſtles as a Compoſition for the Crimes he had committed; and of " this (he told the Council) the King wanted not ſufficient Proof, and " therefore he adviſed, that the late Agreement between him and the " Biſhops might remain firm, but the Biſhop of Lincoln was only accuſed of an old grudge he bore to Earl Alan, and was therefore " made the Author of the late Tumult, and breach of the Peace committed by his Followers.

[3.] Id. Ib. The Biſhop of Salisbury's Reply.

[3.] To all which the Biſhop of Salisbury replied, " That he never " was the King's Servant, neither had he received his Wages; and " ſtoutly threatned, that if he could not find Juſtice in that Council, he would ſeek it in a Higher Court. Whereupon the Legate ſaid calmly, " It ought to be firſt enquired, Whither all thoſe things, of which the " Biſhops were accuſed in that Council, were true, before they could " be condemned; and therefore according to the practiſe in Secular " Courts; the King ſhould reinveſt them in thoſe Poſſeſſions *, otherwiſe whilſt remaining diſſeiſed, by the Law of Nations, they ought " not to Plead.

* Alioqui Jure Gentium deſſeiſiti, non placitabant.

So

Anno Dom. MCXXXIX.

So much having been ſaid on both ſides, at laſt upon the King's requeſt, the cauſe was adjourned to the next day, and then to the day following, until the Archbiſhop of Roüen came thither, who granted the Biſhops ſhould have their Caſtles reſtored, if they could prove by the Canons, that they ought of Right to have them; and ſuppoſe (ſaid he) that they have ſuch a Right, yet certainly the times being ſuſpicious, all the Great Men according to the uſage of other Nations, ought to commit their places of ſtrength to the King's diſpoſal, who is beſt able to defend them. Alberic de Ver added on the King's behalf, that if they preſumed to ſend any of the Biſhops or other Perſons out of England, to appeal to Rome, contrary to the King's will, and the Dignity of the Kingdom, their return would be very difficult: by this they underſtood, the King would not endure the cenſure of the Canons, and therefore the Biſhops thought it was moſt adviſable, to forbear pronouncing it, and that for two reaſons; firſt, becauſe it would be a raſh thing to Excommunicate their Prince, without the knowledge of the Pope: Secondly, becauſe they ſaw, or at leaſt heard, that ſome Swords were drawn not far from them.

The Buſineſs adjourned till the Arrival of the Archbiſhop of Roüen, who alſo undertakes to defend the King's Cauſe.

Therefore tho' they parted for the preſent, yet the Legate and Biſhops fail'd not to perform their Duty, by throwing themſelves at the King's Feet in his Chamber, and beſeeching him to be merciful to the Church, and his own Soul, and to conſult his Honour, ſo as not to ſuffer a breach to be made between the Secular and Eccleſiaſtical Powers; and that if he would reſtore to the Biſhops their Poſſeſſions, they would likewiſe paſs by all that he had done againſt them. But the King, tho' he did all he could to remove from himſelf the Odiouſneſs of this action, yet being hindred by the ill advice of thoſe about him, notwithſtanding his fair Promiſes, ſtill kept the Caſtles in his hands. Then about the latter end of Auguſt the Council was diſſolved without coming to any Iſſue.

The Legate and Biſhops throw themſelves at the King's Feet, beſeeching him to have mercy on the Church, and reſtore the Biſhops their Poſſeſſions.

But being denied the Council is diſſolved.

Theſe Diſputes between the King and the Biſhops, encouraged divers of the Barons to rebell, and [4.] William de Moiun (or Mohun) fortified his ſtrong Caſtle of Dunſtar, lying on the Sea-ſide, againſt which the King (preſently marched with his Forces, and finding that by reaſon of the great Strength of the Place, he was not able to take it by force, he raiſed the Siege, and left Henry de Tracy a Valiant Knight with ſome forces to block it up, who not long after taking above a hundred of the Gariſon Priſoners in an Incurſion they made to Plunder the Country, thoſe in the Caſtle being reduced to a ſmall number, William de Mohun the Lord of it, agreed to deliver the Caſtle upon conditions, that himſelf and thoſe that were with him, might quit the Country, and go ſome where elſe. Alſo Henry de Tracy had the like ſucceſs againſt William Fitz-Odo, a Man of a great Eſtate in thoſe parts, who alſo holding his Caſtle againſt the King, it was ſurprized by de Tracy, whilſt Fitz-Odo's Men were gone out to Plunder.

[4.] G.R.S. p.945. Theſe Differences encourage William de Mohun, and other Barons to rebell.

England being thus diſturbed in divers places by freſh Inſurrections and Rebellions, [5.] Earl Baldwin de Redvers (who had been formerly baniſhed by the King) Landed at Warham with ſome Forces, and was preſently after received through the treachery of the Governour into the Caſtle of Corfe, which being one of the ſtrongeſt Places of England.

England, Baldwin reſolved to fix himſelf there; to prevent which, the King immediately marched down with his Forces, but when he came thither, finding it too ſtrong to be taken in haſt, he raiſed the Siege, and return'd back to the more Inland parts of England, giving Orders, that ſtrict Guards and Watches ſhould be kept at all the Sea-Ports towards Normandy, to prevent the Landing of the Earl of Glouceſter, who was then every day expected with a great Army of Foreigners. And it was about this Time (as * Richard of the Devizes relates) that the Empreſs Matilda being alſo expected with Earl Robert, King Stephen to oblige the Great Men of the Kingdom to his Service, aſſembled them, and granted them new Earldoms and Baronies out of his own Demeſnes, or Crown-Lands; and alſo that he might be ſure of the Aſſiſtance of the † Commons, he granted to all ‖ Free Tenants that they might build Caſtles upon their Lands, and alſo allow'd them the liberty of Hunting and Hawking; whereupon the whole Council or Aſſembly being never like to receive a greater favour, willingly accepted it, and returned the King many Thanks for the Liberties now granted them.

[1.] But notwithſtanding all theſe Endeavours, the Earl hearing that the King was embroiled with thoſe Inſurrections, and being alſo much encouraged by thoſe of his Party in England, towards the end of September, he brought over his Siſter the Empreſs along with him, and Landed at Arundel, where they were kindly received by Adeliſa the Queen Dowager, to whoſe Husband that Caſtle than belonged; the Forces the Earl brought over with him were [2.] but very few to carry on ſo great War as was now to be undertaken, for they were no more than a hundred and forty Souldiers. Then after a few days ſtay to refreſh himſelf, the Earl committing his Siſter to the care of the Queen Dowager her Mother-in-law, marched away with no more than Twelve Knights (beſides their Attendants) quite through the Enemy's Country, as far as Briſtol, Brian Son to the Earl of Wallingford, meeting him half-way. [3.] But not long after, the Queen failing in her Promiſes, which ſhe had made them before their Arrival, grew weary of her Daughter-in-law, or rather was afraid to diſoblige the King by entertaining his Enemies.

For [4.] he being at the time of the Empreſs's Landing taken up with the Siege of Marlburgh-Caſtle, as ſoon as he received the News of it, immediately raiſed the Siege, and marched towards Arundel; but upon his Approach, the Queen Dowager being afraid leſt her Caſtle ſhould be taken, and her ſelf made a Priſoner, ſhe ſent the King word, that ſhe was ready to take her Oath, that ſhe was not the occaſion of the Empreſs, or her Adherent's Landing in England, nor had entertained them as his Enemies, but only as her near Relations and antient Acquaintance. With which Meſſage the King was not only pacified [5.] but ſhewed himſelf ſo generous an Adverſary, that he not only allowed the Empreſs his ſafe conduct to go whither ſhe pleaſed, but alſo ordered his Brother the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Waleran Earl of Mellent, to conduct her. Earl Waleran waited on her no further than Calne in Wiltſhire, but Biſhop Henry attended her to the end of her Journey. Then Earl Robert taking ſome Forces along with him, met the Empreſs at the Bounds the King had appointed, and carried her to Briſtol; [1.] from whence after two Months ſtay, (receiving ving in the mean while all Men's Homages that offer'd themſelves, and diſpoſing of the Rights of the Crown of England according to her will) ſhe went to Glouceſter, where ſhe was kindly received by Milo, who had the Cuſtody of that Caſtle under the Earl; and tho' he was lately Chief Conſtable to the King, yet had he a little before renounced his Allegiance to him, ſwearing anew to the Empreſs, and doing her Homage: ſo that the whole Country about Glouceſter, even to the very ders of Wales, partly by force, and partly through Inclination, before the end of this year ſubmitted to the Empreſs; tho' ſome Governours of Caſtles who ſtood upon their Guard, keeping themſelves as Neuters within their places of Strength, waited for the iſſue of theſe Affairs.

Anno Dom. MCXXXIX.

The Empreſs receives the Homages of all that would, and removes from Briſtol to Glouceſter, where ſhe is received by Milo late Conſtable to the King.

But to make ſome reflection upon what has been here related; perhaps it may ſeem a very odd piece of Policy in King Stephen, not only to give his Competitor the Empreſs a ſafe conduct to Briſtol, but alſo to appoint his Brother the Biſhop of Wincheſter to wait upon her thither; nor can I find the reaſon of it in any other Author, except [2.] the Anonimous Writer of this King's Actions, who ſays, that when the King was about to Beſiege the Empreſs in Arundel Caſtle, his Brother the Biſhop diſſwaded him from it, telling him, that this Siege would take up a great deal of time, that in the mean while the Earl of Glouceſter might over-run or perhaps ſubdue the greateſt part of England, and therefore it were better to give her leave to go to her Brother, and then the King might carry on the War againſt both of them at once; in which whither the Biſhop acted ſincerely, or deſigned by it to ruin the King, as being ſtill inſenced againſt him for his late harſh uſage of the Biſhops, or elſe might not have made his Peace under-hand with the Earl of Glouceſter and the Empreſs, our Author does not determine; but certainly this advice proved very fatal to the King's Affairs, as you may have already obſerved: and thus the Kingdom, which was before the Empreſs's coming over full of Tumults and Commotions, now fell into a cruel and violent Civil War.

Some Reflections upon the King's generous tho' impolitick Proceeding; and the Reaſon of it.

[2.] G. R. S. P. 947.

Not long after her arrival, Brian Fitz-Count, a Baron of great Birth and Eſtate, was thereby encouraged to rebell againſt the King, and to that end, declaring for the Empreſs he Victualled and Fortified the Caſtle of Wallingford; to Beſiege which the King preſently marched with a very great Force, but finding it too ſtrong to be taken without longer time, then he could at that Seaſon afford, he only order'd the Building of two Forts to Block it up to hinder the Gariſon's going out to Plunder, and then he marched on to Beſiege the Caſtle of Troubridge in Wiltſhire, and in the way thither, took the Caſtles of Cerne and Malmesbury, in which laſt Robert Fitz-Hubert the Governour was taken Priſoner.

[3.] Id. Ib. Brian Fitz-Count Rebells, and Fortifies Wallingford-Caſtle; the King marches to take it, but can do no more than build two Forts to Block it up.

Whilſt the King was engaged in this Expedition, Milo the late Conſtable laid hold of the Opportunity, and marching ſpeedily by Night from Glouceſter to Wallingford with a ſtrong party of Light-horſe, fell upon thoſe the King had left in the Forts to Block up the Caſtle, ſo that he either kill'd or took moſt of them Priſoners. And having met with this good ſucceſs he marched back towards Glouceſter, which he made the chief Seat of the War for that Part of England: Theſe actions happened ſometime before the Empreſs came to that City, whom Milo ſoon after received, and eſpous'd her Intereſt with as great heartineſs, as if he had been her Father; and ſhe in requital created him afterwards Earl of Hereford.

Who for his good Service is by the Empreſs made Earl of Hereford.

[4.] But we ſhall now look back on what the King has been doing all this while in the Weſt, where ſitting down before the Caſtle of Troubridge, tho' he Battered it with his Warlike Engines, yet it proved all in vain; and therefore finding it was not like to be eaſily taken, he was adviſed by thoſe Barons and Great Men that aſſiſted him in this Siege, immediately to riſe from thence, and to return towards London to recruit his Forces, leſt the Earl of Glouceſter ſhould lay hold of this opportunity to ſurprize him, and make him raiſe the Siege whither he would or not, and thereby expoſe himſelf to greater hazards; which advice the King followed, and only left in the Caſtle of the Devizes a Garriſon ſufficient to reſtrain the Excurſions of thoſe of Troubridge; ſo that theſe two Gariſons often Sallied out, and meeting Skirmiſh'd each other, and thus by their Frequent Plunderings and Burning of Houſes and Towns, the whole Countrey was laid in a manner deſart.

[4.] Id. P. 948. The King Beſieges the Caſtle of Troubridge, but after ſome time raiſes the Siege, and marches toward London.

[5.] Not long after this, Milo above mentioned having taken in many Caſtles and ſtrong Places about Glouceſter, was reſolved to attack the City of Worceſter, (which was then held for King Stephen) wherefore marching thither with an intent to Burn and Plunder it, upon the News of the Earl's approach great part of the People retired with their Goods within the Cloſe of the Cathedral: then the Enemy attacked a ſtrong Fortreſs on the South-ſide of the Town, but being beaten off from thence, they aſſaulted the North-ſide, where they enter'd and fired it in many Places, and burnt a good part of the City, tho' the greater part remain'd; here they got a very large Booty of the Citizen's Goods, as alſo of Oxen and other Cattle in the Countrey; they took alſo ſeveral Priſoners in the Lanes and by-Streets of the City, and coupling them together like Dogs hurried them away, ſo that whither they had or had not ſufficient for the ranſome ſet upon them, yet they were compell'd to pay ſuch Sums as by a forced Oath they had promiſed.

[5.] Con. F. W. Earl Milo goes from Glouceſter, and attacks the City of Worceſter, ſets it on Fire, and marches off with a Conſiderable Booty.

[1.] In November following the Earl of Worceſter came to the City, and when he ſaw how it was deſtroy'd, he was much grieved, and deeply reſenting the Injuries he had received from the Enemy, gathered together ſome Forces, and went to Sudely in Glouceſterſhire to be revenged upon John Fitz-Harold, who had now deſerted the King and gone over to the Empreſs's Party; there the Earl ſtayed two days doing all the miſchief he could, and carrying away many Men with their Goods and Chattles to Worceſter; but not long after, the King himſelf coming thither from Oxford with a conſiderable Army, beheld with great grief, what had already been told him concerning the Deſtruction of that City.

[1.] Id. Ib. The Earl of Worceſter when he ſaw the City ſo deſtroyed, in revenge Plunders all the Countrey about Sudely.

[2.] From thence after he had made William Fitz-Beauchamp (at that time Sheriff for Worceſterſhire) his High Conſtable, or Mareſchal, in the room of Milo, who had deſerted him, he returned to Oxford, and from thence to Salisbury, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs.

[3.] After which he came to Reading, and there lay a while to recruit his Forces, and then marched towards the Iſle of Ely, for he looked upon the Biſhop of that Dioceſs as his Enemy, ever ſince he had had retreated thither from the Devizes, and had ſtrongly fenced the Iſle with a Fortification of Wood and Turfes near the Water-ſide, which commanded the Landing-place; upon the King's arrival near it, he at firſt met with ſome oppoſition, but coming to Alherethe, and from thence making a Bridge upon Boats and Hurdles over the River, he made a ſhift to Land without any great difficulty; upon which Biſhop Nigel ſeeing he could not any longer defend the Iſle againſt ſo Powerful an Army, ſtole away in the Night to Glouceſter, and his Men run all away and hid themſelves in the Fens; and then the King ſeizing the Iſle, placed a ſtrong Gariſon in it, and without doing any Injury to the Monks, returned to Worceſter, from whence he not long after marched with a numerous Army to reduce Hereford, as he not long after did.

Anno Dom. MCXL. The Biſhop ſteals away, and the Iſle is Surrender'd.

[4.] But whilſt he remained at that Place, the Earl of Worceſter not forgeting the Injury his Citizens had lately received, went with a great Party of Souldiers and ſet upon Tewkesbury, but being not able to take the Town, he contented himſelf with Plundering and Burning the Magnificent Palace of Earl Robert, as alſo the Houſes of ſeveral others lying a Mile off, ſparing only the Goods belonging to the Church, and that at the Intreaty of the Abbot and Monks of Tewkesbury; here they alſo took abundance of Priſoners, and got a great deal of Plunder, but after a while all the Priſoners he had were releaſed and left at liberty to go home, which was at that time thought a very great favour, ſince it had been the uſual practice of the Souldiers to ſell the ordinary People for Villains or Slaves.

[4.] Con. F. W. The Earl of Worceſter ſets upon Tewkesbury, but not being able to take it, burns the Palace of Earl Robert lying near, and marches off with a great deal of Plunder.

[5.] But whilſt the War was thus furiouſly carried on in England, a Mariage was Celebrated in France by the Advice of the Barons of that Kingdom, between Euſtace King Stephen's Son, and Conſtantia, Siſter to the King of France, Queen Matilda, Mother to the young Prince, being preſent at it, with divers of the Nobility of both Nations; tho' inſtead of receiving any Portion with this Lady, King Stephen was fain to pay the King of France a great part of the Treaſure he had lately taken from the Biſhop of Salisbury; yet the King gain'd this Advantage by it, that his Son Euſtace was now Inveſted by the King of France in the Dutchy of Normandy, the new Duke doing him Homage for it, according to the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors.

[1.] About the ſame time Robert Fitz-Hubert a wicked and cruel Man, (many inſtances of which our Author gives us) treacherouſly ſeized the Caſtle of the Devizes; and declaring neither for the Empreſs, nor for the King, was about to ſend for more Souldiers out of Flanders, whereby he bragged he would take in all the Countrey from Wincheſter to London; but being not long after ſurprized and taken Priſoner by John Governour of Marlburgh Caſtle for the Empreſs, and by him given up to Earl Robert, he was by his Orders Hanged before the Caſtle of the Devizes, becauſe he refuſed to make his Men Surrender it for the Empreſs's uſe; being indeed neither obedient to her, nor true to the King, ſo that thoſe who did this Piece of Juſtice deſerved commendation, who thus freed their Countrey from ſo Bloody and Inſolent an Enemy.

[3.] Id. P. 953.

[4.] Alſo about the ſame time Hugh Sirnamed the Poor, Brother to the Earl of Leiceſter, having upon the Expulſion of Milo de Beauchamp, got Poſſeſſion of the Caſtle and Earldom of Bedford, by the King's Aſſent, being a looſe and careleſs Man, was ſurprized by Earl Milo, and not only loſt that Caſtle and Honour, but from an Earl fell to a Knight, and was not long after reduced to extream Poverty. I mention theſe Actions, becauſe it gives light to the ſtate of the Nobility at this time, when he who was poſſeſſed of the Chief Caſtle or Head of the Earldom or County, was looked upon as lawful Earl of it: But whither theſe things happen'd before or after the King's Impriſonment is hard to determine, ſince our Author does not aſcertain us of the Time.

[4.] Id. Ib. Hugh the Poor loſes the Caſtle and Earldom of Bedford.

But to return to Affairs of greater Moment.

[5.] About the middle of Auguſt the Earl of Glouceſter marched with his Army toward Bathe, which the King being inform'd of, he ſent a ſtrong party to hinder his paſſage thither, who meeting with the Earl, there was a ſharp Engagement between them, wherein many were taken Priſoners or killed out-right, among whom Geoffry Talbot (a Nobleman that often changed Sides) was one, who there receiving a Mortal Wound died ſoon after, ſo the King's Party obtain'd the Victory.

[5.] W. M. Ib. The Earl of Glouceſter in his March to Bathe is met by a ſtrong Party of the King's, who get the better.

[1.] About a Month after this, Earl Robert (by the perſuaſion of Rd. Puganel) taking along with him many Knights or Horſemen, belonging to the Earl of Warwick, beſides thoſe he brought with him from Glouceſter, and very many Common Soldiers, marched to Nottingham and took the Town by Surprize, (it being left without a ſufficient Gariſon) and not only Plundered it, but ſetting it on fire, burnt it to the Ground; tho' the Soldiers denied that it was done by them, therefore it is ſaid to have happened by this ſtrange accident: A Townſman being threatened with death by ſome of thoſe Plunderers, unleſs he would diſcover where he had hid his Money, he carried them down into a Cellar, and whilſt they were digging where he ſaid it lay, he locked the door upon them, and preſently ſet fire to the Houſe, in which near thirty of them periſhed, but the fire ſpreading further, the whole Town was laid in aſhes.

[1.] C. F. W. Earl Robert takes Nottingham, which is by a ſtrange Accident burnt to the Ground.

[2.] Alſo ſometime this Summer (tho' W. of Malmesbury does not tell us the Month) by the Mediation of Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Pope's Legate, a Treaty of Peace was ſet on Foot between the King and the Empreſs, for the latter of whom, the Earl of Glouceſter was appointed Commiſſioner; and for the King, his Queen, with his Brother the Legate, and Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury: they met at Bathe, and the Empreſs ſeemed then inclinable to Peace, offering to refer her ſelf to the Judgment of the Church; but the King thought it prudence to decline that Propoſal, and ſure he had juſt cauſe, the Biſhops and Clergy being at that time ſo highly incenſed againſt him; tho' our Author blames him for it, ſaying, that he only followed their Counſel who were deſirous of nothing leſs than Peace; ſo the Commiſſioners beſtowed their time and labour in vain, and parted juſt as they met, without coming to any Concluſion: then the War broke out again as fierce as ever, as has been already ſhewn. Anno Dom. MCXL.

[3.] About the laſt of September the Legate thinking it his duty to promote Peace (as much as he could) took a Voyage into France, to ſee whither he could not procure it by going over thither; his deſign was to conſer with that King, and Theobald Earl of Blois, (King Stephen's Elder Brother) about compoſing the Differences that were here in England, after which he returned about the end of November, bringing along with him ſuch Propoſals for Peace, as the Empreſs and Earl Robert allented to: I could have wiſhed our Author had told us in particular what they were, but they ſeem not to have been for the King's advantage, ſince he delayed his Anſwer from day to day, and at laſt wholly refuſed to agree to them.

[3.] Id. Ib. The Biſhop of Winchester to promote the Peace takes a Voyage into France.

But the King refuſes to agree to the Propoſals he brought over.

[4.] In ſhort, this unhappy War was ſpent in nothing but taking and retaking of Towns and Caſtles, Plundering and Burning of Houſes, not ſo much as ſparing the very Churches; and altho' the Archbiſhop with the reſt of the Biſhops thundered out their Excommunications againſt all Violaters of Perſons in Holy Orders, as alſo of Churches, and other Conſecrated Places, yet they had little or no effect; ſo that England, which was wont to be a refuge to thoſe that fled to it, was now reduced to this Extremity, that not ſo much as the Eccleſiaſticks could paſs from Town to Town in ſafety, for the great Swarms of Mercenaries from Flanders and Bretaigne, who being wont to live upon Plunder, came over hither upon the hopes of Spoil, [5.] and often taking the Innocent Engliſh Priſoners, forced them with cruel Torments to ranſome themſelves with Money; and the Earl of Glouceſter did what he could to hinder theſe Exorbitances, and did alſo perform all the Parts of a Courageous Soldier, and prudent Commander, taking in all the ſtrong Places he could: Nor was King Stephen wanting to diſcharge his duty, omitting no occaſion to repell his Enemies, and defend himſelf, but his endeavours failed of Succeſs, and all things grew worſe, and worſe for want of a due adminiſtration of Juſtice.

[3.] O. V. P. 921. W. M. P. 105. b. Ranulph Earl of Cheſter ſurprizes the Caſtle of Lincoln.

Where the King kept his Chriſtmaſs this year I find not, only it is certain this year produced great Changes in England, [3.] for King Stephen having about the end of the laſt left Lincoln (where he had ſpent ſome time) Ranulph Earl of Cheſter (who had Maried the Daughter of Earl Robert) together with William de Romare, laying hold of this opportunity, ſurprized the Caſtle of Lincoln, but the Citizens who much favoured the King, ſent to let him know, that both the Earls were very ſecure in the Caſtle, and not dreaming of his coming, they might eaſily be taken, in which deſign they would give him their utmoſt Aſſiſtance: Whereupon the King began his March preſently after the Chriſtmaſs-Holy-days; but before that time, the Citizens, upon the News of his coming to them, ſeized ſeventeen Men at Arms, that were got out of the Caſtle into the City, and made them Priſoners; whereupon the Earl of Cheſter in the Night quits the Caſtle, and going thence into Cheſhire, raiſed freſh Forces from that County, as alſo ſome Welſhmen under the Conduct of Morgan and Maradoc their Princes; he alſo applied himſelf to his Father-in-law Earl Robert, and to the Empreſs her ſelf, promiſing her all future fidelity, if he might but obtain their Aſſiſtance; for he was very ſolicitous about his wife's ſafety, whom he had left behind in the Caſtle; with theſe earneſt Entreaties the Earl of Glouceſter eaſily complied, and joyn'd what Forces he had of his own to thoſe of his Son-in-law, and not thinking them ſufficient, he raiſed more by the way, and ſo marched towards Lincoln; when the King (who had layn before the City from Chriſtmaſs to Candlemaſs) heard of their approach, he raiſed the Siege and marched towards them in Battel array; his Army (which was not great) conſiſted of a Main Body of Foot, headed by himſelf; one of the Wings conſiſting of Flemings, was led by William de Ipre a Nobleman of Flanders; the other of Bretons was Commanded by Alan their Earl, beſides a Body of Horſe Headed by Waleran Earl of Mellent, with whom were alſo William Earl of Warren, and Gilbert de Clare, with divers Noblemen of Norman Extraction.

The Earl of Cheſter quits the Caſtle, and goes into Cheſhire to raiſe more Forces, and brings the Welſh Princes to aſſiſt him.

The Earl of Glouceſter alſo joyns his Forces with Ea. Ranulph's, with which they march to Lincoln, the King raiſes the Siege, reſolving to fight them.

[4.] C. B. Col. 1039. How the Earl of Glouceſter's Army was drawn up.

[4.] The Earl of Glouceſter's Army was divided into three Bodies, the firſt whereof was Commanded by Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, the ſecond conſiſted of thoſe whom King Stephen had deprived of their Eſtates, the third was led by the Earl of Glouceſter himſelf, by which the Vant-Guard, conſiſting of Welſhmen, was Commanded by two Welſh Princes, Maradoc and Kaladar. H. Huntington and Roger de Hoveden here bring in the Earl of Cheſter making a long Invective Speech at the Head of the Army, full of Perſonal Reflections againſt Alan Earl of Bretaign, and the other chief Commanders in the King's Army, which is ſeconded by the Earl of Glouceſter in another much longer, ſetting forth all the Vices and Faults of thoſe Noblemen who were were of the King's Party, and (that they might not be behind hand with the other) he brings in one Baldwin Fitz-Gilbert an Eloquent Knight of the King's ſide, doing the like for him, becauſe he had naturally but a weak voice; but ſince we are not aſſured that theſe Orations were ever really ſpoken by thoſe whoſe names they bear, I ſhall omit giving you any further account of them, tho' of the bad Omens which they ſay befell the King before this Battel, I ſhall here give you a ſhort Relation from Henry Huntington, which is to this effect: That the Welſh firſt charging the Flemings and Britains, ſoon routed them, and that then the Earl of Cheſter furiouſly fell on the Earl of Mellent, who preſently fled, as did alſo moſt of the Noblemen and Soldiers on the King's ſide, and even one of the ſtouteſt of them, viz. William de Ipres, ſeeing it impoſſible further to aſſiſt the King, fled likewiſe, and ſo reſerved himſelf for better times: but the Main Body of the Army (in which the King himſelf was) conſiſting of Foot, being yet unbroken, all the Enemy's Horſe turned upon them, which begot a ſharp diſpute, till at laſt the King's Army was totally routed, except a ſmall Party where he himſelf was, who fought ſtoutly, defending himſelf with a Daniſh Battel-Axe, and ſo laid about him, that none durſt come near him, till that being broke with the force of his Blows, he then defended himſelf with his Sword, and that alſo breaking, he was knocked down on his Knees with a Stone thrown from an unknown Hand, which a valiant Knight (called William de Kains) perceiving, he immediately ran in, and took hold of the King's Helmet; yet for all this he refuſed to Surrender himſelf to any but the Earl of Glouceſter, who being hard by was called to take him Priſoner. The Earl for ſome time forgeting their former Quarrel, uſed him like a Kinſman, and tho' he was a Priſoner, yet omitted no Reſpect that was due to his Royal Dignity: With him likewiſe were taken Priſoners that Brave Knight (whom our Author ſuppoſes to have made the Speech for him), alſo Richard Fitz-Urſe, and William Martel the King's Sewer, who was forced to deliver up the ſtrong Caſtle of Shirburne for his Ranſome, with divers others who fought near the King's Perſon, and thought it would ſully their Honour to forſake him; but the Earls of Bretaign and Mellent, with moſt of the Men of Quality ſaved themſelves by flight.

Anno Dom. MCXLI.

A Relation of the Battel of Lincoln, where the King's Army is totally defeated.

And where he himſelf being knockt down, is taken Priſoner, with divers other Perſons of Quality.

The [5.] King being thus made Priſoner, was carried to Glouceſter, and there preſented to the Queen by the Earl her Brother, and from thence was conveyed to Briſtol, where he was a while kept in ſafe, but Honourable Cuſtody, (being only debar'd of his Liberty) but ſometime after, either through the ill will of ſome who were vexed, to ſee the Earl uſe the King better than they deſired he ſhould; or becauſe it was reported, that by bribing his Keepers, he had been found abroad in the Night beyond the Bounds of his Confinement, he was at laſt Fettered with Irons.

[5.] W. M. P. 106. a. The King is preſented to the Empreſs, and carried Priſoner to Briſtol.

Not long after the cloſe Impriſonment of the King, Nigel Biſhop of Ely (as the Manuſcript Hiſtory [1.] of that Monaſtery informs us) by the Aſſiſtance of the Empreſs, recovered the whole Iſle, and returning thither in Perſon, after two year's Exile, was received by the Clergy and Laiety with great Rejoycings; yet for all that he by the Counſel of ſome wicked perſons about him, again ſeiſed upon the Goods and Lands belonging to the Monaſtery; and alſo Coyned a new Groat of Silver with what Stamp he pleaſed.

[1.] Penes Doct. Gale. Nigel Biſhop of Ely returns to his own Church, and there Coyns new Money.

But

Anno Dom. MCXLI.

But the wiſeſt action the Empreſs performed after this Victory was in following the Advice of her Brother the Earl of Glouceſter, who uſed all means poſſible to bring over the Biſhop of Wincheſter to her Party, ſince he exceeded all the Prelates of England in Prudence, Riches and Power; for being then the Pope's Legate, 'twas very great odds, that which way ſoever he inclin'd, the Ballance would turn on that ſide: but he remain'd for ſome time very uncertain what to do, for tho' he had been much diſpleas'd with the King his Brother, yet it ſeem'd diſhonourable (having ſworn Allegiance to him) wholly to deſert him; but finding it very difficult to reſtore things to their former ſtate, he thought it ſafeſt to comply with the time, and make his Peace with the Empreſs.

[2.] G. R. S. P. 953. The Empreſs brings over the Biſhop of Wincheſter to her Party.

[3.] Wherefore upon her and the Earl of Glouceſter's earneſt Application to him, that he would without delay admit her to the Government over the Church and Kingdom (by which was meant her ſpeedy Coronation) as Daughter to King Henry, and one to whom both England and Normandy had ſworn Fealty: after ſome Treaty by Meſſengers, they at laſt agreed, and a Meeting was appointed on the open Plain near Wincheſter, upon the third Sunday in Lent, when the Empreſs ſwore ſolemnly to the Legate, that he ſhould wholly order and direct all the Great Affairs of both Church and State, and ſhould likewiſe diſpoſe of all Vacant Biſhopricks and Abbies, provided that he and the Clergy would inviolably obſerve their Fidelity to her, and receive her for their Lady and Miſtreſs. Then the Earl of Glouceſter with Brian Fitz-Count Marqueſs of Wallingford, (that is, Governour of that Caſtle) and Milo the late Conſtable, and ſome others, Swearing the ſame things on her behalf, the Biſhop, together with ſome other Prelates of his Party, acknowledged her for * Lady of England, and took an Oath of Fealty to her, that as long as ſhe obſerved Her † Compact with them, they would alſo keep their Fidelity to her. The next day ſhe was received into the City of Wincheſter, and attended to the Cathedral with a Solemn Proceſſion, the Legate leading her into the Church by the Right-Hand, and Bernard Biſhop of St. Davids by the Left, many Biſhops, Abbots, Barons, and Knights, being there preſent.

The Archbiſhop owned her for no more than Lady, not Queen.

This is William of Malmesbury's, and the Continuator of Florence's Account of this Great Tranſaction, wherein they both agree in their Expreſſions, by ſaying that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury acknowledged her only (in Dominam, i. e.) for Lady or Miſtreſs, but neither of them ſtyled her Queen.

But

Anno Dom. MCXLI.

But the Anonymous Writer of this Reign is more large, and expreſs in ſome Particulars, than our Author in the relation of this late Tranſaction between the Empreſs and Legate, [1.] as that he not only then deliver'd up to her the Caſtle of Wincheſter with the Crown, and that little Treaſure which remain'd there, but alſo cauſed her to be publickly proclaimed Lady and Queen in the Market-Place of that City, which is to be underſtood only by way of Courteſie, and vulgar Acceptation; for neither this Author, nor Ordericus Vitalis, who gives us much the ſame Relation of this Affair, do for all this Proclamation ever give her any other Title than that of Empreſs, or Dutcheſs of Anjou. But to return to our Hiſtory.

[1.] G. R. S. P. 953. Some other Particulars concerning the Legate's delivering up the Crown and proclaiming the Empreſs Lady and Queen.

The ſame Hiſtorian alſo relates, that King Stephen being thus taken, and kept cloſe Priſoner in the Caſtle of Briſtol, the whole Kingdom ſtood aſtoniſh'd, and many Noblemen, who before this ill ſucceſs took part with the King, now went over to the Empreſs as the ſtronger ſide; not to mention Alan Earl of Richmond, [2.] who (having been ſurprized by the Earl of Cheſter, at the Caſtle of Galclint) was by him kept Priſoner, till he had done him Homage, and had deliver'd up all the reſt of his Caſtles to his diſcretion; but he was forced to do what he did, whilſt others quitted the King without any conſtraint, among whom were Robert Doyley Governour of the City of Oxford, and the Earl of Warwick, Men more addicted to their Pleaſures than Military Atchievements. [3.] So that the Empreſs being now puft up with this good ſucceſs, ſhe left off her former Feminine mildneſs, and began to carry her ſelf with extreme Pride, and haughtineſs, eſpecially when ſhe had once poſſeſſed her ſelf of the Capital City of the Kingdom, as you will find anon; ſo that ſhe diſanulled all Grants made by King Stephen, even to thoſe who had come over to her from the King's party, and tho' the King of Scots her Uncle, and the Earl of Glouceſter, did all they could to perſwade her to the contrary, yet being wholly guided by her own will and humour, ſhe would not comply with their deſires, which when the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſaw, he held his Peace, and waited to ſee how things would work: But to return to Tranſactions of greater moment.

[3.] G. R. S. Ib. The Empreſs being elated with this good ſucceſs carries her ſelf haughtily and diſannulls all King Stephen's Grants.

[4.] On Apr. 9. following there was a General Synod of all the Biſhops and Abbots of England held at Wincheſter, in which the Legate preſided as the Pope's Legate, notwithſtanding the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was preſent: before the Council met, the Legate had a private Conference with the Biſhops, Abbots, and Archdeacons, each of them a part; the next day in a full Aſſembly he made a ſet Speech to them, "Setting "forth the cauſe of their meeting, which (in ſhort) was to conſult "about the Peace of the Kingdom; then minded them of the flou-"riſhing Eſtate thereof in the Reign of King Henry, and that divers "years before his death, he had taken an Oath of Fealty from En-"gland and Normandy, for the Succeſſion of his Daughter, and her "iſſue-male, but ſhe, being in Normandy at the time of his Deceaſe, "had delayed coming into England; ſo that for the preſent ſecurity "of the Nation, his Brother was Elected to Reign over them. [5.] All that were preſent either aſſenting to what he ſaid, or elſe by their ſilence ſeeming not to contradict it, the Legate proceeded thus: " We have alſo Summoned the Citizens of London (who in re-

" Men of England) and ſent them a ſafe Conduct; and he hoped they " would not defer coming beyond the next day, and therefore " they would wait for them. The Londoners came the next day (ac" cording to appointment) and being brought into the Council, ſaid,
" They were ſent from the † Community of London, not to make
" Debate and Contention, but to Petition, that their Lord the King

The Londoners with great difficulty are brought to grant the Empreſs admittance into the City.

[1.] But it was a matter of ſuch great difficulty to bring over the Londoners to the Empreſs's Party, that tho' this Council was held preſently after Eaſter, yet it was but a little before Midſummer, before they agreed to receive Her into the City.

[2.] Then there ſtood up a Chaplain to King Stephen's Queen, whoſe Name was Chriſtian, and offered a Letter from her to the Legate, who received and read it, but would not communicate it to the Aſſembly; then the Chaplain with great aſſurance read it himſelf, the ſum whereof was, " That ſhe earneſtly intreated all the Clergy, and by name the Biſhop of Wincheſter, her Lord's Brother, to reſtore him to " his Kingdom, whom wicked Men, tho' his Subjects, had caſt into

To this Suggeſtion the Legate gave much ſuch an anſwer, as he had before given the Londoners, who thereupon conſulting together, ſaid, They

They would communicate the Decree and Reſolution of the Council to their fellow Citizens, and comply with it as far as they could.

[3.] This done, many of the King's party were Excommunicated, as William Martel by name, who had formerly been his Cup-bearer, and was then his Sewer, whoſe Advice the King had followed in many things; but the true reaſon was, he had provoked the Legate in divers Particulars, as by intercepting and Plundering his Goods. After this the Synod was diſſolved, which ſate only three days; for the firſt meeting was on the fifth day of the ſame Week, which was Friday, and ended on the Monday following.

[3.] Id. Ib. Many of the King's Party Excommunicated in the Synod.

The Synod is diſſolved.

[4.] From Wilton the Empreſs went to Reading, where a great confluence of People reſorted to her, and Robert Doyley came in, offering her to reſide in the Caſtle of Oxford, which ſhe accepted, and went thither, and there received the Homages of that City, and the Country round about it; from thence ſhe went to the Monaſtery of St. Albans, where many of the chief Citizens of London met her, and treated about delivering the City to her, to which ſhe quickly came with a great Train of Biſhops and Barons, her Uncle the King of Scots alſo accompanying her; and being honourably received by the Londoners at Weſtminſter, in a Stately Proceſſion, ſhe ſtayed there ſome days to give Directions and Orders about the ſtate of the Kingdom; firſt of all providing for the Peace of the Church, (that is, of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons) ſo that the greater part of England now willingly owned her Authority, her Brother Robert acting all things for her Honour, and the Publick Benefit, bringing by fair means, or elſe by force, moſt of the Great Men to embrace her Intereſts; and if ſhe would have hearkened to his prudent Counſel, ſhe had not ſuffer'd ſo ſudden a Change of Fortune, which happened through her Own too much Severity and Wilfulneſs, the occaſion of which was thus.

[4.] C. F. W. The Empreſs removes to Reading, and from thence to Oxford, where ſhe receives the Homages of that City, and the Country adjacent.

[5.] Id. Ib. * Interpellavit Dominam Anglorum, Regina. King Stephen's Queen ſollicites the Empreſs for her Husband's Liberty, moved to it by many of the Chief Men of England.

[5.] Theſe Affairs being diſpatch'd, Mathilda King Stephen's Queen * ſtill ſollicited this new Lady of the Engliſh, being encouraged to it by divers of the Principal Men of England, that upon Hoſtages given, and all Caſtles delivered up to her pleaſure, the King her Husband might be releaſed, and reſtored to his liberty, tho' not to his Kingdom, and ſaid they would undertake to perſwade him to quit his pretence to it, and devote himſelf to the ſervice of God either as a Monk or Pilgrim. This Propoſal ſhe abſolutely refuſed with great haughtineſs, and thereby ſo highly incenſed the Queen, that when ſhe found ſhe could obtain nothing of her by fair means, ſhe reſolved to take other meaſures, which proved the ruin of the Empreſs's Affairs, as you will read hereafter.

The Empreſs refuſes the Propoſal with ſcorn.

[1.] At the ſame time the Citizens of London humbly deſired her, that they might live under King Edward's Laws, being much more gentle than thoſe of her Father, but ſhe following her own humour, would by no means conſent to this their reaſonable requeſt; and (which was worſe,) [2.] being not long after by them invited to come up to London, ſhe eaſily complied with their deſires; But tho' the Citizens rejoyced at her arrival (as hoping for better times) and applied themſelves to her, beſeeching that in conſideration of their great Loſſes by the Wars, ſhe would give them ſome eaſe in their Taxes, and other Duties, till the Times ſhould mend, yet ſhe was ſo far from granting any Relief, that looking upon them with a ſevere Countenance, ſhe she told them, that since they could bestow their Riches upon their late King, to support him against her, and had joyn'd with her Adversaries to her prejudice, she did not think it reasonable to spare them in the least; with which answer, the Citizens departed much more discontented than they were before.

[3.] Queen Mathilda finding no hopes of recovering her Husband's Liberty, destroys the Country about London.

But [3.] that which farther contributed to the ruin of the Empress's Affairs, was, that Queen Mathilda finding there were no more hopes of Reconciliation upon any other Terms than the giving up all that her Husband and Son could pretend to, was now resolved to make use of force to obtain what she looked upon as their Right; wherefore being already Mistress of Surrey and Kent, she sent over a strong Detachment to the other side of the River Thames, to Burn and Destroy the Countrey; which being done in sight of the Empress and her Party (who it seems were not able to hinder it) the Londoners were so mortified to see those Places laid waste, from whence they were used to receive most of their Provisions, that this (together with her late rough usage) made them repent their ever quitting of the King, and therefore they now resolved to return as soon as they could to their former Allegiance, and make a new Confederacy with his Queen, to deliver King Stephen out of Prison; the Empress all this while thinking her self secure, since the Legate and divers other Bishops and Barons were now come to Town, in order to her intended Coronation; this did rather encourage, than hinder, the Citizens from taking the first opportunity of rising against her, which William of Malmesbury sets forth more at large, viz. That [4.] the Londoner's Affections being now wholly turned against her, it was no easy matter to sweeten them, and again to reconcile them to her; therefore though Earl Robert her Brother did all he could by Promises and Threatnings to gain some of them to her Party, and to deter others from leaving it, yet it was all in vain; for the Londoners being disgusted by her former rigid Deportment, quite changed the face of her Affairs, for they privately conspired against her, and intended to seize her Person, with those that accompanied her; but they gaining Intelligence of it, resolved to retire privately out of the City; so the Empress her self, attended by her Uncle the King of Scots, the Legate, and her Brother Earl Robert, and the rest of the Noblemen of her Party, stole away from thence; yet no sooner was she gone, but the Rabble of the City fell upon the Goods she had left behind, and plundered them.

The Citizens being highly displeased, resolve to return to their old Allegiance.

[4.] W. M. Ib. Earl Robert does all he can to reconcile the Londoners to the Empress, but in vain.

The Empress, fearing to be Seized by the Londoners, steals away privately.

But as Misfortunes seldome come alone, so this Error of the Empress in returning that harsh Answer to the Londoners, was followed by another greater mistake in Politicks; for though she had still the Clergy pretty firm to her, yet she lost them likewise by falling out with the Legate, and it was upon this occasion:

[5.] Id. Ib. The Empress denies the Legate to grant Eustace his Nephew the Earldom of Mortaign; at which the Legate being offended, is reconciled to the Queen his Sister-in-law.

King [5.] Stephen, whilst Earl of Mortaigne, had Eustace his Eldest Son by Mathilda, Daughter and Heir of Eustace Earl of Boloign, which Match he obtained by the Recommendation of King Henry his Uncle, as the first of these Titles was also owing to his Favour; which Earldoms the Legate was very importunate with the Empress to have her confirm to Eustace his Nephew; But the Empress absolutely refusing it, the Legate was so offended at this unkind Repulse, that, though he was often Summoned, he came not for many days to Court;

Court; but in the mean time he had private Conferences at Guilford with the Queen his Sister-in-law, where he was eaſily prevailed with by her Tears and Promiſes of Satisfaction from the King her Husband, to procure his Delivery and Reſtoration; whereupon not long after changing ſides, he Abſolved all thoſe of the King's Party, whom he had before Excommunicated (the reſt of the Biſhops not being at all conſulted in it): He then alſo publiſhed throughout England great Complaints againſt the Empreſs, "As that ſhe would have taken and "impriſoned him; that whatever ſhe had Sworn to was not obſer-"ved by her, though the Barons had fully performed their Oaths "to her; and that ſhe knew not how to uſe with Moderation what ſhe "had ſo eaſily acquired. Anno Dom. MCXLI.

From which we may obſerve, that the Empreſs (as indeed moſt other Women) underſtood not the Arts of Government, nor how to treat People in a new and unſetled ſtate as her's than was, and (which was worſe) would not hear any good Advice: alſo that the Londoners (notwithſtanding her ſuppoſed Hereditary Right) did not think themſelves bound to receive her for their Queen, who refuſed to Govern them according to the juſt Laws of their former Kings. And laſtly, that the Church-men in thoſe days were as eaſie and free to break their Oaths of Allegiance, and to change their party, either for Advantage, or out of Diſcontent, as ever they have been ſince. But to return to our Hiſtory. Some ſhort Reflections upon the Empreſs's Conduct and Title.

[1.] The Empreſs when ſhe left London in ſuch haſte, went through Oxford to Glouceſter to conſult with Milo, her conſtant Friend and faithful Servant, in whoſe Company ſhe preſently return'd to Oxford again, and ſtayed there until her diſperſed Troops came thither to her, and then ſhe created this Milo Earl of Hereford, as a Remuneration of his former Signal Services; for he was (next to her Brother) her chief Support, ſince from him alone ſhe had received the Expences of her Houſhold from her firſt coming to Glouceſter, which was then near two years; And this our Author ſays he had from his own mouth. [1.] C. C. F.

[2.] The Earl of Glouceſter in the mean time went with a few Followers to Wincheſter, to try if he could compoſe theſe Differences by diſcourſing with the Legate; but not meeting with ſucceſs, he ſoon return'd to Oxford (where his Siſter the Empreſs had then taken up her Reſidence) And finding by her Brother's Relation, that the Legate had privately deſerted her Intereſt, ſhe marched to Wincheſter with ſuch Forces as ſhe could then get together, and was not without ſome difficulty received into the Caſtle, ſhe not daring to truſt her ſelf in the City, becauſe ſhe found their Affections much alienated from her by means of the Biſhop, who as ſoon as he heard of her coming ſlipt out of the Town at another Gate, and would not come any more into her Preſence, tho' ſhe ſent often for him to wait on her without delay; but he thinking that not very ſafe for him, deluded the Meſſengers with a cunning and ambiguous Anſwer, *that he would * prepare himſelf*; and ſo immediately ſent for all the Nobility that he knew favoured King Stephen: Upon this moſt of the Earls of England came in to him, who (as William of Malmesbury relates) were light young Men, that loved Tornaments on Horſeback more than Peace; and but very few continued with the Empreſs, the chief of whom were David King of Scots, [2.] W. M. P. 107. b. The Empreſs finding that the Legate had deſerted her, leaves Oxford, and goes to Wincheſter. The Legate hearing of her arrival, ſlips out of Town, and tho' ſent to, refuſes to come back. * Parabo me. The Legate Summons in the Earls and Barons of England to aſſiſt King Stephen.

Scots, with the Earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, and ſome few Barons.

The Empreſs Beſieges the Biſhop's Tower or Caſtle at Wincheſter, whereupon he marches to relieve it.

So ſoon as the Empreſs came to Wincheſter, ſhe Beſieged the Tower or Caſtle that was kept by the Biſhop's Men; to relieve which, the Legate brought not only the Earls above mentioned (with whom the Earl of Cheſter having now changed Sides joyned) but he had likewiſe ſent for the Londoners, who came down in great Numbers, ſo that by their aſſiſtance the City was Blocked up, and all Paſſages to it ſo cloſely Guarded, that no Proviſions could be brought into it without great difficulty; whilſt they within were thus ſtreightened, ſome fire was thrown from the Biſhop's Tower upon the Citizen's Houſes, becauſe they ſeemed more inclined to the Empreſs's than to his party; this took hold of the Nunnery within the City, and at laſt of the Abbey of Hyde, tho' without it, and burnt them both down to the Ground, together with the greater part of the City, and above Twenty Churches.

Wincheſter is Block'd up by the Biſhop's Forces.

By Fire thrown from the Biſhop's Tower the Abbey of Hyde, and a great part of that City are burnt to the Ground.

[3.] About the ſame time divers of the Empreſs's Party went about to Fortifie the Nunnery of Warwell, within Six Miles of that City, which would have commanded all the Country there abouts; to prevent which the Biſhop above mention'd ſent William de Ipre with a ſtrong party to diſlodge them from thence, who ſetting upon them drove them into the Church, [4.] and there refuſing to Surrender, the King's Men ſet it on fire and burnt it with the adjacent Monaſtery to the Ground.

[3.] C. G.

The Nunnery and Church of Warwell are alſo burnt with many of the Empreſs's Towns.

[4.] W. M. Ib.

[5.] But for all this the Biſhop not being able to take either the Caſtle or the City, growing weary of the Siege retreated from the Town, yet the King's Men having the Command of the Country, and daily Skirmiſhing with thoſe of the Empreſs's, (who often went out to fetch in Proviſions) therefore Earl Robert and her Councellors fearing the ill conſequences of another Aſſault, (which they were not able to undergo) thought it beſt for them to yield to neceſſity, and retire to another place before it was too late; ſo Earl Robert preparing all things for their departure, ſent his Siſter before with the greateſt part of the Army and beſt Troops, under the Conduct of her Brother Earl Reginald, who marched in great order, whilſt Earl Robert brought up the Rear with Two hundred undaunted Followers; but the King's Forces immediately perſuing him, he, to ſhew himſelf more careful of his Siſter's than his own Safety, and thinking it diſhonourable to flie, was ſet upon and taken Priſoner, whilſt the Empreſs with the reſt of the Noblemen eſcaping with great ſpeed, kept on their Journey as far as to the Caſtle of Lutgurſhal, but not finding her ſelf there neither in ſafety (as Brompton's Chronicle and John of Tinmouth in Hiſtor. Aurea) relate, ſhe removed to the Devizes, and from thence for fear of the King's Souldiers, was carried in a Herſe or Bier (like a dead Corpſe) to the City of Glouceſter; which Story ſince it ſounds very improbable, and is not found in W. of Malmesbury nor any other Author of that Age, I only mention, becauſe I would not be thought to omit any thing that other Modern Writers have thought worth mentioning.

[5.] C. F. W. W. M. Ibid.

Earl Robert with the Empreſs fearing an Aſſault, quit Wincheſter.

The Earl of Glouceſter is taken Priſoner in his Retreat.

The Empreſs is carried to the Devizes like a dead Corpſe, as ſome Hiſtorians relate.

[1.] But E. Robert (who was not at all daunted with theſe misfortunes) being firſt brought back to Wincheſter, and there preſented to the Queen, was ſent Priſoner to Rocheſter; and tho' he was tempted by large Promiſes, ſes, and urged likewiſe by Threats to leave his Siſter's cauſe, yet nothing could prevail with him to deſert her, nor would he enter into any Treaty for his Releaſe without her Conſent, or to the leaſt prejudice of her Intereſt: but [2.] within the ſpace of Six Months the King and he were both Exchanged upon even Terms, which was managed with that nice caution on both ſides, that it being moved that the King, becauſe of his Royal Dignity, ought to be firſt ſet free, yet Earl Robert doubting whither himſelf ſhould be then diſcharged, the Pope's Legate and Archbiſhop to ſatisfie him were both forced to engage that if he were not ſet free, they would ſurrender themſelves Priſoners; and farther likewiſe they engaged to obtain the Pope's conſent to it. Whereupon the King coming to Wincheſter, had ſome familiar converſation with the Earl, who was thereupon immediately ſet at Liberty, and each party were left to perſue the War with as great earneſtneſs as ever.

Anno Dom. MCXLI.

[2.] Id. P. 109. a. The King and the Earl are mutually releaſed.

[3.] Not long after which the Legate being now reſolved to perfect what he had begun, proceeded in his deſign totally to ruin the Empreſs, and by his Legantine Power Summon'd a Synod to meet Eight Days after the Feaſt of St. Andrew at Weſtminſter; but our Author tells us, that not being preſent himſelf at this Council, he cannot give us the Acts of it with that exactneſs as he had done the former, yet ſays in General, that the Pope's Letters to the Legate were openly read, in which he was blamed that he had not more ſtrenuouſly endeavour'd to reſtore his Brother, and exhorted him to uſe all Power both Eccleſiaſtical and Secular to do it.

[3.] Idem. P. 108. a. Another Synod Summon'd by the Legate, wherein he endeavours to reſtore his Brother to the Throne.

[4.] Then the King himſelf came into the Council, and complained, that his Subjects (to whom he had never denied Juſtice) had impriſoned, and reproachfully treated him to his great affliction. Then the Legate by his Rhetorick endeavour'd to juſtifie his own late actions, pretending he had received the Empreſs by compulſion and neceſſity, not out of favour, or good will; and at that Juncture of Time, when the King's Army was quite routed, and all the Lords of his Party were either fled, or ſtood expecting the Event, ſhe with her Adherents came to Wincheſter; and whatever Compact ſhe had ſworn to, or promiſes ſhe had made to preſerve the Rights of the Church, ſhe had wilfully broke them all. He further ſaid, "That ſhe and her Friends had contrived not only to deprive him of his Dignity, but his Life; but God in his great mercy had beyond her expectations and endeavours, ſo ordered things, that he eſcaped deſtruction; and the King his Brother being now freed from his Impriſonment, he therefore commanded them on the behalf of God and the Pope, that they ſhould aid the King to the utmoſt of their Power, Who was anointed by the free will of the People, and Aſſent of the Apoſtolick See; and that he would Excommunicate all Diſturbers of the Publick Peace, and that favoured the Dutcheſs of Anjou, for ſo he then ſtyled the Empreſs.

[4.] Id. Ib. The King himſelf appears at this Council, and complains of th' ill uſage he had received from his Subjects.

The Legate excuſes his joyning with the Empreſs.

And commands all Men under pain of Excommunication to obey the King his Brother.

But tho' our [5.] Hiſtorian not being preſent in this Council, cannot tell us exactly what was done in it, as in the former, yet he ſays in General, that the Legate's words were not grateful to all the Clergy, tho' none of them durſt contradict them, but out of fear and reverence they kept ſilence; only one Lay-meſſenger from the Empreſs forbad the Legate by the Fealty he had before ſworn to her, to act

"act any thing in that Council contrary to her Honour or Intereſt, "or to aſſiſt his Brother: He added alſo, That the Empreſs came in "to England by his Invitation; and that if ſhe had taken the King, "and kept him Priſoner, 'twas by his Approbation. All this the Meſſenger ſaid, and much more, with great ſharpneſs, not at all ſparing the Legate, but all his words could not move him to make any reply, or to ſhew any paſſion, much leſs to deſiſt from his intended deſigns.

[1.] O. V. P. 923. The Earl of Anjou again enters Normandy.

To conclude this Year with ſome Account of the Affairs of Normandy: [1.] when Geoffrey Earl of Anjou heard of his Wife's good ſucceſs in England, he went forthwith into Normandy, and then ſent Meſſengers to the Noblemen, requiring them peaceably to deliver up their Caſtles and ſtrong holds, which he ſaid belonged to him of Right: then in Lent following Rotrou Earl of * Mortain made Peace with him, and breaking the League he had made with the King, aſſiſted the Earl of Anjou. About Mid-lent following many of the Great Men of Normandy held a Council concerning the Publick Affairs, where divers of them, together with Hugh Archbiſhop of Roüen, agreed to make an offer to Theobald Earl of Blois of the Kingdom of England, and Dutchy of Normandy, but he like a wiſe Prince, refuſed thoſe Litigious Titles; but (if our Author may be credited) he made over all his Right in them to Earl Geoffrey on theſe Conditions, That he ſhould Surrender to him the City of Tours, which he ſaid belonged to his Fee, and ſhould alſo ſet at Liberty the King his Brother, and reſtore to him and his Heirs all thoſe Territories which had belonged to him in King Henry his Uncle's life-time. Upon which the Citizens of Verneüil, who were formerly very violent for the King, when they ſaw ſo many Places Surrendred to the Duke of Anjou, they began to relent, and delivered up both Town and Caſtle to Earl Geoffrey, and not long after the Townſmen of Nonen-court followed their Example.

* Not Mortaign in Normandy, but another Place of the ſame name in Picardy.

A Council is there aſſembled, where divers of the Great Men offer that Dutchy to Theobald Earl of Blois. Verneüil and other Places are Surrender'd to Earl Geoffrey.

Anno Dom. MCXLII.

From [2.] the Feaſt of Chriſtmaſs until Lent following, both Parties continued quiet, being more deſirous to keep their own, than Invade what was in the poſſeſſion of another; but then the King began to move, and the War to be renewed as fiercely as ever; the Empreſs alſo came to the Devizes, and there held a Council, in which it was reſolved, That ſhe ſhould ſend for her Husband the Earl of Anjou, who, perhaps, might prove more fortunate, and help her to recover her Son's Right in England: upon this there were ſome Perſons of Quality preſently ſent to him to deſire his ſpeedy coming over.

[2.] Id. P. 109. b. The War is again renew'd as fiercely as ever. The Earl of Anjou is deſired to come over.

Not long after Eaſter King Stephen being followed by his Queen, marched down to York, reſolving to Revenge his former Injuries in thoſe parts, and to that purpoſe gathered together great Forces, which quickly after he was obliged to diſband; for returning to Northampton, he was there taken with a grievous fit of Sickneſs that held him till Whitſuntide, ſo that he was given over for dead, but at laſt he recovered his health again.

The King upon his return from York is taken with ſuch a fit of Sickneſs that he was given over, yet recovers.

[3.] Id. Ib. Another Council called of the Empreſs's Party, where the Meſſengers deliver the E. of Anjou's Excuſe for not coming over.

And [3.] And now the Meſſengers being returned from the Earl of Anjou, another Council was held at the Deviſes, where they delivered the Earl's Anſwer to the Empreſs, and the Chief Men of her Party, which was to this effect: "That the Earl, as he was proud to "receive ſuch an Invitation from the Engliſh Nobles, ſo alſo he highly "eſteemed the Earl of Glauceſter's Friendſhip, whoſe Prudence, fide"lity,

" lity, and Courage, he had long ſince ſufficiently tried, and that if " he would come over he would Adviſe with him what was beſt to be " done to anſwer their requeſts, otherwiſe it would be but in vain to " ſend any body elſe. Wherefore the Earl was mightily intreated by all the Noblemen there preſent to undertake this Voyage, but he alledging the difficulty of the Journey, and the great hazard his Siſter might run, did all he could to decline it; but at laſt being prevail'd upon, he demanded certain Perſons to go along with him, who might aſſure the Earl of the fidelity of the Engliſh Nobility, that they would to the utmoſt of their power ſtand by, and defend the Empreſs, of whom he deſired greater Security for her ſafe ſtay at Oxford till his Return; wherefore he took Pledges of the Nobles that were to attend and Guard her there; all which being ſettled, he left them and took Shipping at Warham in Dorſetſhire, and ſoon arrived in Normandy, tho' not without ſome difficulty (by reaſon of a great Storm he met with in his Paſſage:) and came to the Earl of Anjou, who was then at Caën for the Earl taking advantage of the King's Impriſonment, had not long before conquer'd the greateſt part of Normandy, and was then buſied in gaining the reſt.

Anno Dom. MCXLII.

The Earl of Glouceſter is importuned by the Noblemen to go over and perſwade him to come hither.

The Earl is hardly perſwaded to undertake the Journey, yet yields at laſt, and goes.

The greateſt part of Normandy is conquer'd by the Duke of Anjou.

[4.] This troubleſome Affair detain'd the Earl much longer in thoſe parts than he expected, for the Duke made ſeveral difficulties, why he could not as yet go over into England, eſpecially becauſe of divers ſtrong Places holding out againſt him; but that the Earl might do what he could to remove this main Objection, he aſſiſted him in ſubduing no leſs than ten Caſtles in Normandy; yet all this could not procure the effect of his Ambaſſie; the Earl ſtill ſtarting freſh difficulties, why he could not go along with him, and at laſt could only be prevailed with to ſend over his Eldeſt Son Henry with his Uncle Earl Robert, by whoſe Preſence the Noblemen of England might be the more encouraged to maintain his Right.

[4.] Id. Ib. Yet Earl Robert cannot prevail with the Earl of Anjou to come over.

[5.] In the mean time the King taking his Advantage of the Earl's Abſence, had ſurprized the ſtrong Caſtle of Warham, then deſtitute of a ſufficient Gariſon; but the Earl being ignorant of this, ſet Sail for England (bringing the young Prince Henry Eldeſt Son to the Emperor over with him) and after a proſperous Voyage arrived in Warham Harbour, and there Landing with ſufficient Forces he reſolved immediately to take the Town, which he preſently did, but not the Caſtle, tho' he Beſieged it with all the Forces he could raiſe, to the end that he might draw the King thither to its Relief, from the Siege of Oxford Caſtle, where his Siſter the Empreſs than was; for he had not long before taken the Town and burnt great part of it, but could not take the Caſtle, by reaſon of its great Strength: in the mean time the King being now imploy'd in that Siege was not able to ſend any Relief to his Men in Warham-Caſtle, ſo they were at laſt forced to Surrender it; beſides, the Earl then took the Iſle of Portland, (which the King's Men had alſo fortified) together with another Caſtle called then Lullewarden, (now Ludworth Caſtle in Dorſetſhire): after which the Earl Summon'd all thoſe who were for the Empreſs to meet him at Cyrenceſter, that they might march together to Oxford for her Relief, and fight the King if he durſt abide their coming; but in their way thither, they received the joyful news of the Queen's Eſcape out of that Caſtle, and her ſafe arrival at Wallingford, whither the Earl with his Men immediately went according to the Empreſs's Orders, becauſe the Souldiers who were left in Oxford Caſtle had Surrender'd to the King, upon condition to go whither they pleaſed; ſo that the Chriſtmaſs-Holy-days approaching, all the Forces on both ſides went into Winter-Quarters.

[1.] Id. Ib. b. W. Malmesbury's Account of the manner of the Empreſs's Eſcape.

[1.] Our Author further tells us, he would have given us the manner of the Empreſs's Eſcape, had he himſelf certainly known it, and therefore only ſays in ſhort, that many of the Beſiegers running away for fear of the Earl's approach, the reſt that were left kept a more ſlender Guard about the Caſtle, of which the Empreſs being inform'd by ſome of the Townſmen, her Friends, eſcaped at a Poſtern, with only four Attendants, and paſſing the River (it being then a great Froſt) walked to Abingdon on Foot, and from thence was conveyed on Horſeback to Wallingford-Caſtle. Here William of Malmesbury concludes his Relation of this King's Reign, tho' he intended to continue it further, which it is pity he had not done, for the greater advantage of our Engliſh Hiſtory, that ſo we might have had a more certain account of the manner of her Eſcape, which as yet remains but dark: for the Author of this part of the Saxon Chronicle (* lately Printed) tells us in the beginning of Henry the Second's Reign, that ſhe was let down from a Tower by Ropes, and ſo made her Eſcape: but ſince ſo grave an Author as H. of Huntington (who wrote not long after the time when this was done) tells us expreſly, that the Empreſs eſcaped over the Thames, it being then Frozen, and a great Snow upon the ground, by Clothing her ſelf, and thoſe that attended her all in White-Linnen; and is therein alſo followed by Roger Hoveden, Bromton and Gervaſe of Canterbury's Chronicles, who all three lived in King Henry the Second's and King John's Reigns; I ſhall not ſet the Saxon Chronicle in Competition with their concurrent Authorities.

[2.] R. H. Another Synod at London, where a Canon is made againſt thoſe who ſhould lay violent hands on a Clerk.

[2.] This Year in the beginning of Lent, King Stephen was preſent at a Synod in London, which was held by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, (the Pope's Legate) wherein it was again Ordained, That whoever laid violent hands upon a Clerk, (that is one in Holy Orders) ſhould not be abſolved, unleſs by the Pope himſelf, and then only in his Preſence.

Which Decree, tho' formerly made in the Reign of King Henry, yet by reaſon of the violence that was lately committed upon the Perſons of Clergy-men during theſe Wars, it was now again reinforced, and that Clauſe of the Pope's Preſence being added to it, render'd the Perſons of all Eccleſiaſticks for the future inviolable.

[3.] H. H. King Stephen ſeizes Geoffrey de Mandeville, and for what cauſe.

[3.] Not long after this, King Stephen holding his Court at St. Albans, ſeized upon the Perſon of Geoffrey de Mandeville Earl of Eſſex, contrary to the ſafe Conduct he had given him; but all our Authors excuſe it, by ſaying, that he did this rather out of neceſſity than choice, and according to the Law of Nature; for unleſs he had acted thus, he might have been deprived of his Kingdom by the Earl's perfidious practiſes; wherefore before he could obtain his Liberty, he was forced to deliver up into the King's hands the Tower of London, together with his Caſtles of Walden and Pleſſi, which two laſt were then counted two of the ſtrongeſt Places in England.

Anno Dom. MCXLIII.

[4.] The Earl being thus ouſted of his Caſtles, was reſolved to be revenged of the King, therefore raiſing what Men he could, he did a great deal of miſchief in the Countreys through which he marhced; and going to the City of Canterbury, he ſurprized it before the Citizens were aware, and not only Plundered them, but did the like by the Churches; and ſetting fire on the Town, marched croſs the Countrey as far as Huntingtonſhire, where wanting a place of Strength for his Retreat, he ſeized upon the Abbey of Ramſey, and driving out the Monks made it a Gariſon, for which he was Excommunicated by the Biſhops; yet being a Man of greater Courage than Conſcience, he valued it not, but kept the Place till he was ſtrangely and ſuddenly taken off, as you will find the next year.

[4.] Id. Ib. Geoffrey de Mandeville afterward Plunders Canterbury, and ſets it on fire, and then marches off and ſeiſes the Abbey of Ramſey.

[5.] After this, ſome time this Summer, tho' I cannot tell in what Month, the King marched down into Wiltſhire, with a deſign to Fortifie the Nunnery of Wilton, to prevent thoſe that were of the Empreſs's Party in Salisbury from ſeizing it; upon which News the Earl of Glouceſter raiſing what Forces he could, immediately went thither in the Night, and ſetting the Town on fire (where the King with his Army than lay) put him into ſuch a fright, that tho' he Quartered in the Nunnery, he diſlodged, and left all his Plate and other Baggage behind him, and tho' the Night was very dark yet he hardly eſcaped with his Brother the Biſhop of Wincheſter; the Earl's Souldiers in the mean while killing and taking Priſoners many of the King's Men, and amongſt the reſt William Martel the King's Favourite, whoſe Redemption coſt three hundred Marks, beſides the Surrender of the Caſtle of Shirborn, then in his Cuſtody.

[5.] H. H. Ib. C. G. Col. 1358. The King goes down to Wilton where his Quarters being beaten up by the Earl of Glouceſter, he flies away in the Night, with the loſs of his Plate and Baggage.

Gervaſe of Canterbury places this Action under the year following, but I rather chuſe to follow Henry of Huntington, who puts it under this.

And as for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs there happened nothing worth our noting, only that the [1.] Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of Wincheſter went now to Rome to adjuſt their differences concerning the Legantine Power, which the Archbiſhop ſaid was an Incroachment upon his Right; but before they could arrive there, Pope Innocent died, and Celeſtine ſucceeded him, and he alſo deceaſed before the end of this year.

[1.] H. H. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Biſhop of Wincheſter go to Rome, and on what occaſion.

As to Foreign Affairs, theſe things are moſt worth our notice, that Normandy being almoſt ſubdued the laſt year, [2.] the Conqueſt of it was this year quite finiſhed, for Geoffrey Earl of Anjou having gather'd a great Army in the beginning of February, paſſed the Seine at Vernon, and Encamping before the City of Roüen, had it Surrender'd unto him by the Citizens the day following, being received into the Town with a Solemn Proceſſion; notwithſtanding which, the Souldiers of the Earl Warren ſtill held the Caſtle for the King, which Earl Geoffrey and Walleran Earl of Mellent, and other Norman Lords, (who had now made their Peace with him) preſently Beſieged, and tho' they made uſe of all their Engines, yet could they not ſuddenly take it, by reaſon ſon of the Strength of the Place, but at laſt Proviſions failing them, they were forced to Surrender upon Terms.

[3.] Ib. Ib. [3.] But all Things being ſettled in the City and Caſtle, the Earl having gathered a great Army, reſolved to carry his Conqueſts to the farthеſt Parts of Normandy, for the Earl of Flanders his Brother-in-law was now come to his Aſſiſtance with Fourteen hundred Horſe; whereupon the Duke undertook the Siege of the Caſtle of Driencourt, which was then held by ſome Stipendiary Souldiers of the Earl of Warren, who ſeeing they could not reſiſt him Surrender'd the Caſtle, tho' againſt their Wills. Then alſo Hugh de Gornay delivered up the Caſtle of Lyons, fearing leaſt Earl Geoffrey ſhould take away his Eſtate: thus all things were quiet in Normandy, and the whole Countrey reduced to Earl Geoffrey's Obedience, except the Caſtle of Arcques, which was ſtill Beſieged; upon this the Earl of Anjou took the Title of Duke of Normandy, and was no more under the Subjection of the Engliſh till this Earl's Son Henry ſucceeded King Stephen in the Throne; till whoſe Reign we ſhall ſay no more of the Affairs of Normandy, only that the Caſtle above mention'd not long after ran the ſame fate as the reſt of that Province had already done.

[4.] G. R. S. P. 962. An odd Account of the death of Milo Earl of Hereford.

[4.] I ſhall conclude this year with an Account of the death of Milo Earl of Hereford, which the Anonimous Writer above mention'd thus relates, viz. that a Quarrel ariſing between him and Richard Biſhop of Hereford, about certain Taxes or Contributions which he then Exacted from him, and others of the Clergy in his Dioceſs. But the Biſhop refuſing to pay it, the Earl at laſt ſent Souldiers to levy it by force; wherenpon the Biſhop Aſſembling his Clergy, Excommunicated the Earl and all his Aſſiſtants, and alſo laid an Interdict upon his Territories; At laſt the Earl becoming penitent for his offence, gave Security to make ſatisfaction, and ſo was reſtored to the Church; but on Chriſtmaſs Eve following he was unfortunately ſlain by one of his own Men with an Arrow, as he was ſhooting at a Deer, which is looked upon by this Author as a Judgment; But for the truth of this Relation I will not paſs my word, ſince it looks ſo like the fate of William Rufus, and is related by no other Author than this, and the Welſh Chronicle; yet thus much is certain, that this Earl's deceaſe went extreamly to the heart of the Empreſs, whoſe chief Councellor, Friend and Defender he was.

[5.] H. H. The King Beſieges Lincoln, but meeting with ill ſucceſs marches off.

[5.] This year the King Beſieged the City of Lincoln, but when he had juſt begun to build a Fort againſt the Caſtle (then under the Command of the Earl of Cheſter) the Enemies Sallied out, and ſtopping up the mouth of a Mine, ſmother'd near eighty Pioneers, who were then working in it; whereat the King being diſcouraged, marched off; nor had he much better ſucceſs elſewhere, ſo that this year paſſed without any great action done on either ſide.

The remarkable Deaths of Geoffrey de Mandeville, and Robert Marmion. [1.] C. G. Col. 1360.

Neither doth it afford any thing elſe remarkable, but [1.] the ſudden deaths of two Barons of great note, the firſt Geoffrey de Mandeville, who, after he had ſeized upon the Abbey of Ramſey (as you have already heard) Sallied out thence to Beſiege Burwell Caſtle, where having made a vigorous Aſſault, and being much heated in the Action, he withdrew to a Place not far off, to cool and reſt himſelf; and having pulled off his Helmet for that purpoſe, he was eſpied by a Souldier in the Caſtle, who preſently ſhot at him with an Arrow which pierced pierced his Skull, but the Wound being very ſmall, it was ſo long neglected, that he died of it within a few days; the like Fate alſo befell Robert Marmion about the ſame time, who had made a Gariſon of the Monaſtery of Coventry, which being aſſaulted by the Enemy, he Sallying out to repell them, was ſlain before its Gates, in the midſt of his own Souldiers. Theſe Accidents I thought fit to relate, as being look'd upon by the Writers of thoſe Times as Judgments upon Sacrilege. Anno Dom. MCXLIV.

[2.] The beginning of this year was wholly taken up by K. Stephen in repelling the Incurſions of Hugh Bigot, but in the Summer Robert Earl of Glouceſter, having lately built a ſtrong Caſtle at Farindon in Berkſhire, the King immediately marched thither with all the Forces he could raiſe, bringing alſo a ſtrong Body of Londoners along with him, who Beſieged this Caſtle with that briskneſs and vigour, that at laſt they took it by Storm, which occaſioned a great effuſion of Blood; whilſt Earl Robert with thoſe of his party lay not far off, expecting a Reinforcement, tho' to no purpoſe, and from this time the King's Fortune began to change for the better, however he met not with the like good ſucceſs in all Places. Anno Dom. MCXLV.

[2.] H. H. The King is taken up in repelling Hugh Bigot, and then marches to Beſiege the Caſtle of Farindon.

For the year following, [3.] the King having long Beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Wallingford, without being able to take it by force or Art, he built a Wooden Caſtle or Fort before it, which he called Crawmers, and thereby Blocked it up; at which Siege Ranulph Earl of Cheſter came in to him with his Forces, and made his Peace with the King, but notwithſtanding this ſhow of Friendſhip, it laſted not long. Anno Dom. MCXLVI.

[3.] H. H. C. G. Col. 1361. The King not being able to take Wallingford Caſtle, builds a Fort againſt it, to Block it up.

[4.] Whileſt the King ſome time after kept his Court at Northampton, he on the Twenty fifth of Auguſt, ordered the Earl to be ſeized, and committed cloſe Priſoner, and kept him ſo till he had Surrendered the ſtrong Caſtle of Lincoln, which he had formerly ſurprized, with all the other Places of ſtrength he had then in his Power, which being done the Earl was reſtored to his Liberty; but this gave him ſuch an implacable malice againſt the King, that he was reſolved to have them again, or be revenged whatever it coſt him; and indeed this Act brought the King into ſuch Extremities, that it may warn Princes either never to diſoblige great and powerful Men, or if they once do it, to put it out of their power ever to hurt them again.

[4.] Chron. MS. Ceſtriæ. Ranulph Earl of Cheſter is ſeized and committed cloſe Priſoner till he Surrender'd the Caſtle of Lincoln.

[5.] This year produced nothing more worth noting, except that Geoffrey Earl of Anjou having ſubdued all Normandy, and alſo quelled the Angevins who were then about to rebell, and being now in Peace, deſired to ſee his Son Henry, whom he had ſent four years before to his Uncle the Earl of Glouceſter; wherefore the Earl of Anjou ſent three Noblemen with a great Train into England, to bring over his Son, to which Earl Robert readily conſenting, accompanied his Charge to Warham, where he took Shipping; from which time they never ſaw each other more, [1.] for the Earl ſoon after deceaſed of a Feaver at Glouceſter, and was buried at Briſtol. He was certainly a Prince of great Prudence and Magnanimity, and of invincible Fidelity to the Empreſs his Siſter, to whoſe Intereſt his death proved ſo great a Blow that it could never recover it ſelf, till the return of her Son Henry into England, of which you will hear more anon.

Anno Dom. MCXLVI.

As to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, notwithſtanding the Civil Wars that now raged, [2.] Baldwin de Rivers Earl of Devonſhire about this time Founded and well Endowed a Monaſtery at Exceter, Dedicated to St. James, for Monks of the Cluniac Order, which was alſo confirmed by the Charter of the Empreſs Mathilda; upon the Seal of which (a Draught whereof I have ſeen) ſhe is ſtiled Regina Romanorum & Domina Anglorum; this ſhews that the Earl had then engaged in her party, and that ſhe did not account her ſelf abſolute Queen, but only Lady of the Engliſh, or elſe what need of this diſtinction in the Titles?

[2.] Mon. Ang. Vol. 1. p. 643. Earl Baldwin de Rivers founds a rich Monaſtery at Exceter.

Nor did this year afford any thing conſiderable in Foreign Affairs, only [3.] that the Pope hearing of the great Succeſs of the Saracens in the Holy Land, did now by the Preaching of Bernard, Abbot of Clarevalle, ſet on foot a new Cruſado; Conrade, Emperour of Germany, Lewis King of France, Frederick Duke of Swevia, Theodorick Earl of Flanders, Waleran Earl of Mellent, William Earl of Warren his Brother, with divers other Perſons of Great Dignity of the German, French and Engliſh Nations, taking the Croſs (the Mark of that Expedition) and not only Military Men, but divers Biſhops, Abbots and Monks taking upon them the ſame Sacred Enſign, prepared to go to Jeruſalem; but this Expedition tho' now reſolved on, was not undertaken till the next year, and then it proved as unfortunate as thoſe that had preceeded it.

[4.] The King having again poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſtrong City and Caſtle of Lincoln, was much ſatisfied and went thither in Perſon, and there held his Court, or Great Council; and to ſhew his Grandeur, wore his Crown at the Chriſtmaſs Solemnity, which no King before him durſt undertake to do in that City, being frighted by a certain Superſtitious Propheſie, foretelling death, or ſome great miſfortune to any Prince that ventured it, which the King not valuing at all, is therefore commended by our [5.] Hiſtorians for his Courage. But no ſooner had He departed thence, but the Earl of Cheſter came up thither with all his Forces to retake it; but he was repulſed, the chief Commander of his Forces being killed in the very entry of the North Gate of the Town, and he himſelf forced to retreat with the loſs of many of his Men, which gave the Citizens great cauſe of rejoycing. Nothing elſe happen'd remarkable, except [1.] that the Empreſs Mathilda being extremely mortified with the Deaths of Earl Milo, and her Brother Robert, and therefore deſpairing of Succeſs, in the beginning of Lent returned to the Earl her Husband, being then in Normandy, with whom ſhe continued till his Death; nor do we hear any more of her, till her Son Duke Henry came to the Crown.

[2.] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this time of War affords nothing at home; but Pope Eugenius coming this year into France, and holding a Council at Rheims, did there without the conſent of the greater part of his Cardinals ſolemnly deprive William Archbiſhop of York, of his Archbiſhoprick, becauſe he had been Nominated by the King before he was Canonically Elected, and the Chapter of York was commanded by the Pope to make a new Election, who choſe Henry Murdac Abbot of the Monaſtery of Fountains to be Archbiſhop: and William being a weak and pious Man, was forced to retire to

The Earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, the main Props of the Empreſs's Party, being both lately dead, it is no wonder if the War againſt the King was now carried on more remiſsly; ſo that I do not find any action of moment perform'd this year in England, neither did there happen any conſiderable alteration in the Church, [3.] only Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln, having contracted a Sickneſs by his Journey into France to viſit the Pope, deceaſed this year, and was Buried at Lincoln; a Prelate more famous in Hiſtory for his great Magnificence in Building, and Policy in Secular Affairs, than for thoſe more neceſſary Qualifications of a Biſhop, viz. Piety, Charity, or Learning.

[3.] H. H. Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln dies.

I cannot here omit [4.] the bad ſucceſs of that vaſt Army above mentioned, that went towards the Holy Land, of which great part periſhed by the Treachery of Emanuel the Greek Emperour, who ordered Chalk to be privately mingled amongſt the Meal that was ordered to make Bread for the Army; and after this, thoſe that remain'd, and arrived in Syria, being routed at the Siege of Damaſcus, the whole Army dwindled away to nothing, and the Emperour, as alſo the King of France, with all the other Princes were forced to return home ingloriouſly.

[4.] Id. Ib. The bad ſucceſs of the Army ſent to the Holy Land, great part of which periſhed by the Treachery of the Greek Emperour.

[5.] Duke Henry, Son to the Earl of Anjou and the Empreſs, came this year into England with a ſmall, but well choſen Army, (being no more than a hundred and forty Horſe, and three thouſand Foot) which excited the courage of many of their Friends; for after the deceaſe of the Earls Robert and Milo, (and the departure of the Empreſs into France) nothing could move the Noblemen againſt King Stephen, but the Duke's Preſence, to whom the Crown was of Right thought to appertain; ſo having ſecured Normandy by convenient Gariſons on the Frontiers, from the Invaſion of the K. of France, he took Shipping, But preſently after his arrival (finding he had not ſtrength ſufficient to make open War againſt the King) he took with him Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, Roger Earl of Hereford, Son of the late Earl Milo, and ſome others beſides thoſe he brought over with him out of Normandy, and went to David King of Scotland, his Great Uncle, who receiving him at Caërliſle with great honour and ſatisfaction, at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt enſuing Knighted him, and ſome other young Noblemen of his Retinue; which Solemnity being over, the King his Uncle, and himſelf, reſolved with their Joint Forces to Invade England, to prevent which, King Stephen marched into the North Parts, and came to York with a great Army, thereby the better to ſecure the Countrey and City, and there continued all the Month of Auguſt, the King of Scotland lying then at Caërliſle, not daring to Invade the Engliſh Territories; and thus after they had layn the whole Summer watching each other's motions, they Both of them return'd home without any Action.

Prince Henry finding no good to be done in England, returned before Winter into Normandy to his Father, who not long after ſurrendred to him that Dukedom, which he had lately Conquered.

[2.] C. N. The King of France being return'd from the Holy Land is diſpleaſed that the Earl of Anjou ſhould diſpoſe of Normandy without his conſent, and therefore joyns with E. Euſtace.

Lewis [2.] King of France being newly returned from the Holy Land, was much diſpleaſed that the Earl of Anjou, as Duke of Normandy, ſhould preſume to diſpoſe of that Dutchy to his Son without his Conſent; wherefore joining his Forces with thoſe of Earl Euſtace, Son to King Stephen, he Invaded Normandy with a Powerful Army, and Beſieged the Caſtle of Arques; to prevent the taking of which, the Earl of Anjou, and Duke Henry his Son, marched with another great Army of Anjovins, Britains, and Normans, but the Chief Men of both ſides ſeeing this Quarrel could not come to a deciſion without great effuſion of Blood, they perſwaded their Princes to make Peace; whereupon by the Interceſſion of Friends, the King of France was prevailed on to receive Homage from Henry, as Duke of Normandy, and ſo Earl Euſtace's Claim was now laid aſide: But whilſt Duke Henry remained there, conſulting with his Great Men, concerning his intended Invaſion of England, he received the News of the ſudden Death of his Father, who being lately return'd into his own Country, and there deceaſing, was immediately ſucceeded by the Duke his Son.

A Peace is made between the French King and the E. of Anjou, and he inveſts his Son Henry with the Dutchy of Normandy.

He being thus advanced, not long after Married Eleanor Counteſs of Poictou, and Dutcheſs of Aquitain, [3.] late Queen of France, from whom King Lewis her Husband had been newly Divorced, on ſuſpicion of Adultery with a young Saracen in the Holy Land; though a more plauſible pretence was found out, viz. as being Couſins in the Fourth Degree; yet King Lewis dealt ſo honourably with her, as to reſtore her all her own Territories, and gave her leave to return home in ſafety, and alſo provided for the two Daughters he had by her. Nor was the Dutcheſs her ſelf leſs pleaſed at this Divorce, though to the loſs of her Honour, ſhe having had no Affection for the King, who was too much in Years, and too ſtrict for one of her youthful and gay Humour.

[3.] R.D.HH. C.B. Eleanor Dutcheſs of Aquitain, &c. is Divorced from the K. of France, and for what cauſe.

Not [4.] long after her return home a Match was privately Treated on between her and Duke Henry, being then in the Eighteenth Year of his Age, and as much too Young for her, as her former Husband was too Old; who, when he heard how his late Queen had beſtowed her ſelf, was highly diſpleaſed, becauſe he found that thereby accrued ſo great an Acceſſion of Dominions to his Rival Duke Henry, and upon this account he ever after both hated and envied him, and did him all the prejudice he could, as you will find in the next Book, when King Henry ſucceeded Stephen in the Kingdom of England: Though indeed King Lewis could blame no body but himſelf for it, becauſe he might (if he had ſo pleaſed) have kept the Dutcheſs for his Wife with all her Faults.

[4.] Id. Ib. The Dutcheſs not long after her return Marries Henry Duke of Normandy.

But to be revenged of King Henry [5.] and to recover by Force what he had loſt by his own Weakneſs, he again joined his Forces with Earl Euſtace; and they with Robert Earl of Perche, Henry Earl of Champaigne, and Geoffrey Brother to Duke Henry (who had now upon Diſcontent joined with them) Invaded Normandy with a powerful Army, and Beſieged and took the Caſtle of New-Market, having already divided (in imagination) all Duke Henry's Territories amongſt themſelves; but he being then at Barbfleet, ſtraight marched againſt against them, and giving them a Diverſion, fell in upon the Norman Veuxin, then in the hands of the King of France, and there Burnt ſeveral Towns and Caſtles; after which the Duke leaving a ſufficient Guard to ſecure Normandy, marched back into Anjou, where he Beſieged and ſoon after took the Caſtle of Mount-ſorrel, which belonged to his Brother Geoffrey, who upon that was forced to make Peace with him on the beſt terms he could. In the mean time, the King of France taking this Opportunity of the Duke's abſence, again Invaded Normandy, and Burnt ſome Towns there, but not long after, through the Interceſſion of certain Monks, there was a Truce made between the King and the Duke, in order to a Peace.

Anno Dom. MCLII.

A Truce is made between the French King and the Duke.

But whilſt he was thus defending his Territories in France, [1.] King Stephen's thoughts were taken up in ſettling the Crown of England in his own Family; for which purpoſe having Summon'd Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all the Biſhops and Chief Men of England to a Great Council, he propoſed to them the Coronation of his Son Euſtace, and particularly required the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (to whom of Antient Right it belonged to Anoint and Conſecrate our Kings) to perform that Office; but he anſwered, That the Pope by his Letters had forbidden him to Crown or Anoint him, becauſe that he himſelf contrary to his Oath had uſurped the Kingdom; At which Repulſe all thoſe who favoured the Royal Party were highly incenſed, and thereupon the King and the Prince his Son, ſhut up all the Biſhops with their Primate in one Houſe, that ſo by threats and terrors they might extort from them what they could not obtain either by Money or intreaties; but the Archbiſhop made his eſcape, and got over the Thames in a Boat, and ſo fled to Dover, and from thence into Normandy, and thus the King's Deſign was utterly defeated: But yet to be revenged on him for his Obſtinacy, as alſo for his flight, the King ſeized all his Lands and Poſſeſſions; Henry Huntington relates this ſtory much after the ſame manner, tho' ſomewhat ſhorter, omitting the flight of the Archbiſhop in a Boat, which indeed is not very probable; but the Annals of the Abbey of Waverlie, as alſo Matthew Paris, ſay expreſly, that at this time the Earls and Temporal Barons of England ſwore Fealty, and did Homage to Earl Euſtace, Son to King Stephen; And tho' the former of theſe Authors places this Tranſaction under the year following, yet it is plain that it could be done at no other time than this above mentioned; and if ſo, then all theſe Authors may be in the right as to the matter of Fact, and the Earls and Barons might then ſwear Fealty to him, tho' all the Biſhops refuſed it.

[1.] H. H. C. G. Col. 1371. King Stephen endeavours to perſwade the Biſhops and Noblemen to Crown his Son Euſtace, but the A. B. of Canterbury with the Biſhops refuſe to conſent to it.

The Archbiſhop flies into Normandy.

[2.] Not long after this the King marched down, and took the Caſtle of Newbury, and from thence went to Wallingford, and Beſieged that; but not being able to take it, he raiſed a ſtrong Tower or Caſtle before it, by which means as well as by his other Fort called Crawmers, which he had built before, he cut off all Succours from the Beſieged; ſo that at laſt finding themſelves reduced to great want of Proviſions, they ſent word of their Condition into Normandy to the Duke, deſiring ſome ſpeedy Relief, or otherwiſe they muſt Surrender the Caſtle to the King.

[2.] Idem. Col. 1372. The King takes Newbury-Caſtle and Beſieges that of Wallingford.

bringing along with him no more than an Hundred and forty Horſe, and three thouſand Foot, and Landed about Twelfe-tide; and ſo ſoon as the News of his Arrival was ſpread abroad, all thoſe that had been of his Mother's party came flocking in to him, and now having got together a conſiderable ſtrength, he marched directly to Malmesbury, and ſitting down before it, took it, together with the Caſtle; only the main Tower, which proved very ſtrong, was kept by one Jordan, and he privately ſlipping out, gave the King notice of it, who thereupon muſtering what Forces he could, marched down towards Malmesbury, and came as far as Cirenceſter with an intention to relieve it; but Duke Henry went out to meet him; and when both Armies were got pretty near each other, the Weather proved ſo very Wet and Tempeſtuous, (and the Wind ſitting full in the King's face) that his Men were neither able to ſtand againſt it, nor to handle their Armes: whereupon the King finding it in vain to reſiſt Providence, returned back to London; in the mean time thoſe, who were in the Tower of Malmesbury, being diſappointed of the King's Aſſiſtance, Surrender'd it into the Duke's hands; after which Robert Earl of Leiceſter, took part with the Duke, furniſhing him for ſome time with all Neceſſaries; and afterwards no leſs than thirty ſtrong Caſtles (together with their Maſters) ſubmitted themſelves to Duke Henry.

He arrives in England with ſmall Forces, yet great numbers flock in to him.

He takes Malmesbury, whereupon the King marches with his Army againſt the Duke.

But being hinder'd by bad Weather he is forced to return to London.

[4.] But ſo ſoon as the Weather would permit, the Duke being reſolved to relieve his Men, (who were ſtill Blockt up in the Caſtle of Wallingford) marched thither with all his Forces, and laid Siege to the Caſtle or Fort of Crawmers (which King Stephen had built) and by caſting up a deep Trench before it, the Duke Beſieged the very Beſiegers; ſo that they could not receive any Succours from the adjacent Countrey; which when the King heard, he made what haſte he could to relieve it, but the Duke's Souldiers had ſurprized it on the ſudden, before he could arrive; and entering the Tower, they flung the King's Men down head-long from the top of it.

Which is afterwards taken.

[5.] Id. Ib. The Duke and King's Army lie encamped near each other, but a bad Omen hinders the King from fighting.

[5.] The Duke, having thus fortunately relieved this Caſtle, marched forward to meet King Stephen, and the two Armies were now encamped within a quarter of a Mile of each other; but whilſt the King accompanied with all his Earls and Barons was giving Orders for the drawing up of his Army, his Horſe on the ſudden rear'd up an end, and did ſo not only once, but twice or thrice, till at laſt he fell down backward, not without great danger of the King's Perſon: Then William Earl of Arundel, a Man of powerful Eloquence and Prudence made a Speech to his Majeſty, ſetting forth, "That they "ought to be warned by theſe Ill Omens, not to expect any good "Succeſs, if they now came to a Battel againſt the Juſter Cauſe, and "that there were ſo many Perſons nearly related in Blood, now ſet "againſt each other, that it was impoſſible for them to engage "without a Great and Unnatural effuſion of Blood; therefore he adviſed the King to ſend Meſſengers to the Duke to treat of a Peace. To which Propoſal all thoſe about him began likewiſe to hearken; whereupon it was reſolved by the King and the Chief Men of his Party, that he ſhould have a private Enterview with the Duke about it, and what could not be concluded between them, ſhould be referr'd to the Noblemen on both ſides; which Reſolution being brought to the the Duke by Meſſengers ſent on purpoſe, tho' he ſeem'd at firſt unwilling to come to any Treaty, yet being at laſt prevailed upon, he had an Enterview with the King near Wallingford, where (the River Thames being but narrow) they could diſcourſe together from the oppoſite Banks; and after a long and private Conference, they return'd each of them to their Several Camps; then a Ceſſation of Armes being agreed to, both Parties retreated for that time.

Anno Dom. MCLIII.

And at laſt at a private Enterview they agree upon a Ceſſation of Armes.

[1.] Earl Euſtace the King's Son was mightily diſturbed at this Treaty, which he knew muſt end ſo much to his prejudice, and Expoſtulated with his Father very ſharply about it, and ſeeing that would do no good, immediately left the Court, and marched into Cambridgeſhire, as if he would have laid waſte that Countrey; and being now grown deſperate, reſolved not to ſpare the Sacred Places any more than others; wherefore coming to the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, where he was treated with great Kindneſs and Reſpect but not receiving Money which he demanded for his Souldiers, He ordered them to go out, and ſeize upon their Corn that was then in the Fields; but when he ſate down at Table to Dinner, upon the firſt bit he eat, he fell into a Frenzy, and died preſently after, and was Buried at Feverſham, near his Mother. This is the Account that Gervaſe of Canterbury gives of this Prince's ſudden death, which whither it be true or no in all Circumſtances, as is there related, I very much doubt, ſince the Monks are accuſtomed to make ſuch terrible Judgments of the Deaths of thoſe who did them or theirs any Injury: Nor is this Relation found in any other Author of that time. But this is certain, and very remarkable, that this Prince, and [2.] Simon Earl of Northampton, a young Nobleman of no extraordinary good Character deceaſed one and the ſame Week; as did alſo about the ſame time Ranulph Earl of Cheſter in the flower of his age, a young Prince of great Valour, reported to have been Poyſoned by one William Peverel his Servant. He had ſince his laſt Impriſonment by the King ſided with the Duke, and was a great Encourager of his late coming over into England, yet had done nothing conſiderable for his Service. The ſudden Deaths of theſe three Gallant Men, being the chief Perſons of theſe contending parties, proved a great furtherance to the Peace, which was not long after concluded between the King and the Duke.

[2.] Id. Ib. H. H. As do alſo Simon Earl of Northampton, and Ranulph Earl of Cheſter ſuppoſed to be Poyſon'd.

But that which before proved the greateſt Affliction to King Stephen was [3.] the Deceaſe of Queen Mathilda his Wife, a Lady of Incomparable Prudence and Courage, to whoſe Conduct he chiefly owed his Liberty and Reſtitution to the Throne: She dyed in May, but a few Months before Earl Euſtace her Son.

[3.] C. G. Col. 1372. Queen Mathilda's death.

[4.] The late Truce being now expired, the War broke out again afreſh, and Duke Henry marched to Beſiege the Town and Caſtle of Stamford, and the former being ſoon taken, thoſe in the latter were ſo much ſtreightned, that they ſent to the King for Succour, who at the ſame time was laying Siege to the Caſtle of Ipſwich, which Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk then held out againſt him; but the King being loth to raiſe that Siege, and not able to ſend Relief to thoſe in the Caſtle of Stamford, they were forced to Surrender it: And the King in requital took the Caſtle of Ipſwich; then the Duke marched to Nottingham, and took that Caſtle after ſome few days Siege.

Anno Dom. MCLIII.

[5.] Id. Ib. Another Treaty ſet on foot by the A.B. of Cant.

[1.] H. H. Which is alſo further'd by the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

A great Council Summon'd at Wincheſter, where a Peace was agreed on, and on what Conditions.

[5.] Whilſt the ſtate of Affairs remain'd thus as it were in an equal Ballance, the King being (as I have ſaid) extremely afflicted for the loſs of his Queen and Son, was now more inclinable to hearken to a new Treaty of Peace, which was ſet on foot by Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who laboured all he could to bring the King and Duke to a final Agreement, diſcourſing often with the former alone about it, and ſending frequent Meſſengers to the latter. [1.] Alſo Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, who had been before ſo mighty prejudicial to the Nation, in making his Brother King, now moved with Repentance (when he ſaw the Kingdom almoſt ruined) contributed his utmoſt Aſſiſtance in giving the finiſhing-ſtroke to this great work of Peace: whereupon a Common Council was Summon'd by the King and Duke to meet at the City of Wincheſter, conſiſting of all the Biſhops and Noblemen of either party, who being there met accordingly, were joyfully received with a ſolemn Proceſſion; and there in the Preſence of a great Multitude of Spectators the King led the Duke by the hand, and at laſt a Peace was there concluded, on theſe Conditions:

Firſt, That King Stephen ſhould enjoy the Crown during his Life.

Secondly, That after his Deceaſe Duke Henry ſhould ſucceed him as his Lawful Heir. Then the King adopted the Duke for his Son, and he at the ſame time gave him Reverence in the preſence of them all, and acknowledged him as his Father, and Lord: [2.] Whereupon Earl William King Stephen's only Legitimate Son then remaining alive, did Homage to the Duke at his Father's Command.

[2.] C. G. Col. 1375.

After all theſe things were ſolemnly performed, and ratified by the mutual Oaths and Conſents of the King and all the Biſhops and Temporal Lords there preſent, a Firm Peace, which had been Baniſhed England for many years, was at length happily reſtored.

Then alſo as Roger Hoveden relates (for I find it in no other Author) the King appointed the Duke Juſtitiary of all England under himſelf; and all the Affairs of the Kingdom were determined by him, ſo that from that time the King and Duke continued unanimous all the reſt of this Reign, but it did not laſt long.

This Agreement above mention'd you will find recited, and confirmed by King Stephen's [3.] Charter or Declaration under his Seal in Brompton's Chronicle, directed to all his faithful Subjects of England; only the Order of the Articles or Conditions is ſomewhat inverted from what it is in our Hiſtorian.

This Agreement is extant, being by way of a Charter, and the Contents of it.

[3.] Col. 1037, 1038.

For the King in the firſt place there appoints Henry Duke of Normandy his Succeſſor, by Hereditary Right, and Grants and confirms the Kingdom of England to him, and his Heirs: In conſideration of which Honour, it is there recited, that the Duke paid the King Homage, and promiſed upon Oath to be faithful to him, and to preſerve his Perſon, and obſerve all the Agreements contain'd in this Charter.

And

And the King likewiſe Grants, That on his part, he has given the Duke his Oath to preſerve and maintain his Life and Honour againſt all Men in all Points to the Utmoſt of his Power. Anno Dom. MCLIII.

Then follows the Recital of the Homage, which Earl William the King's Son had already paid to the Duke, in conſideration of which, the Duke Grants, That he ſhould hold of him all the Lands and Honours, which he was then poſſeſs'd of either in England or Normandy, which not being to our preſent purpoſe, I omit.

[4.] From Wincheſter after a few day's ſtay, the King accompanied by the Duke, returned to London, where they were alſo received with Solemn Proceſſion, and all other imaginable Demonſtrations of Joy; after which they parted for ſome time, and tho' our Authors give us no Account, whither the Duke then went, yet it is moſt likely it was to keep his Chriſtmaſs among thoſe of his own Party.

[4.] C. G. Ibid. H. H. The King and Duke came to London, where they are joyfully received.

[5.] But theſe Princes ſoon met again at Oxford on the Thirteenth of January, where all the Chief Men of England by the King's Command, did Homage and ſwore Fealty to the Duke, ſaving that Allegiance they owed the King, ſo long as he lived; and it ſeems that the Aſſembly in which this was done, was a Great Council of the Kingdom, for our Author ſtiles it Conventus Magnificus; then they parted again for ſome time; but ſhortly after met at Dunſtable, where the good Correſpondence between them ſeem'd a little interrupted, becauſe the Duke took it ill, that all thoſe Caſtles which had been built for evil deſigns were not demoliſhed according to the late Agreement; and the King by his ſparing ſome of thoſe that belonged to his own party, had violated the League ſo lately made between them: And the Duke moving him on that Subject, received a Denial, which he much reſented; yet however, becauſe he would not diſoblige his new adopted Father, he reſolved for the preſent to paſs it by, and wait for ſome better opportunity.

Anno Dom. MCLIV.

[5.] Id. Ib. The two Princes meet again at Oxford, where all the Chief Men ſwear Fealty to the Duke.

They meet again at Dunſtable, where there is ſome miſunderſtanding by reaſon that all the Caſtles were not demoliſhed.

[1.] But after ſome time the King and Duke came to Canterbury, where they were again received with Solemn Proceſſion; then in Lent they had an Enterview with the Earl of Flanders, and his Counteſs at Dover, after which the King and Duke returned to Canterbury, where (as our Author relates) there was a Conſpiracy among certain Flemmings to have killed the Duke, but as it was going to be executed, Earl William the King's Son, who was privy to it, falling from his Horſe upon Barham-Down, broke his Leg, by which happy Accident, the Conſpirators were diſappointed of a Leader, and ſo the Deſign fail'd.

[1.] Id. Ib. The King and Duke come to Canterbury.

Where there is a Conſpiracy ſet on foot to kill the Duke, but by Will. the King's Son's breaking his Leg, it is defeated.

[2.] The Duke thus eſcaping the ſnares of his Enemies, preſently took his final leave of the King, and went over into Normandy, where he was received with great Joy and Satisfaction by the Empreſs his Mother, and by Eleanor his Dutcheſs, and all his Subjects, he having ſtayed above Twelve Months in England.

[2.] Id. Ib. The Duke takes his leave of the King, and paſſes into Normandy.

producing any evil effects: for the King being now better ſetled in his Throne than ever before, took divers Caſtles in the North that preſumed to hold out againſt him; one of the laſt of which was the ſtrong Caſtle of Drax near York, which he cauſed to be razed to the ground, as well as many others of the ſame ſort; from thence he was called away again on the ſudden to meet the Earl of Flanders being then newly arrived about the end of October; of whom when the King had taken his leave, and returned to Canterbury, he was quickly after ſeized with his old diſtemper of the Emroids, which came upon him with ſuch violence, that it ſoon put an end to his Life, as well as troubleſome Reign: he deceaſed on the Twenty fifth of October in the Monaſtery of Chriſt-Church, but was Buried at Feverſham by the Queen his Wife in the Abbey-Church of that Monaſtery, which he himſelf had Founded ſome Years before.

He is recalled to meet the Earl of Flanders, ſoon after which he falls ſick and dies at Canterbury.

A Character of this King.

I need not ſay much more of his Character, than what is already written of him in the beginning of his Reign; he had certainly many Princely Qualities, being Valiant, Affable, and Merciful to his Enemies, as alſo Liberal to thoſe that ſerved him: But to counterballance theſe Virtues, he was Ambitious above meaſure, not valuing the wilful committing of Perjury, and drawing almoſt the whole Kingdom into the ſame ſnare, provided he might gain a Crown; which ſhews he was no ſlave to his Word or Oath, and which alſo appears by ſeveral paſſages in his Reign: he was no great valuer of the Priviledges or Grandeur of the Biſhops and Clergy when they ſtood in his way, which procured him a great deal of Trouble and Ill-will, and which had almoſt coſt him his Crown; but notwithſtanding theſe faults, he was an excellent Husband, a good Father, and a true Friend; and had he mounted the Throne by an Undiſputed Title, would have been an excellent Prince, as even his Enemies allow; none Burthening their Subjects with fewer Taxes, nor Governing with greater Mildneſs and Clemency. But to conclude this Reign.

As to Foreign Affairs this Year, the moſt conſiderable was that [4.] David King of Scots deceaſed on the 24th of May at Carliſle; he was a Prince of great Piety, Charity, and Valour; inſomuch that Ailred Abbot of Rievalle in an [5.] Epiſtle to King Henry the Second, has written a great deal in his Commendation; he was Succeeded by Malcolm his Grandſon, then but a Youth of about Twelve Years of Age, being the Eldeſt Son of Henry, that Noble and Magnanimous Young Prince, who Died ſome time before his Father.

In Eccleſiaſtical matters, I find nothing to have happened conſiderable, except [1.] the ſudden Death of William Archbiſhop of York, who having been Elected ſome Years before, and Choſen by the Chapter of that Church, his Election was declared void by Pope Eugenius, purely becauſe he had been Nominated by the King, as being his near Kinſman: but that Pope Dying, and Anaſtaſius the Fourth ſucceeding him (who had always whilſt he was a Cardinal favoured William's Cauſe) as ſoon as he attained the Papal Chair (Henry Murdak whom Eugenius had made Archbiſhop

But he did not long enjoy this Dignity, for after he had been at York about a Month, and ſaid Maſs there on Trinity Sunday, he was ſeized at the end of it with a ſudden and violent Diſtemper, of which he Died in a few Days, and was Buried in that Cathedral; where he was looked upon as a Saint, and his Tomb reſorted to for the Miraculous Cures ſaid to be there done: but Gervaſe ſuppoſes him to have been Poyſoned in the Ablution of the Chalice by a Monk or Prieſt of the contrary Faction. Anno Dom. MCLIV.

There are no Laws extant of this King's, either becauſe they have been loſt, or that his Reign being very turbulent, and moſt things Tranſacted by the Sword, there was little, or no occaſion for making any New Ones.

Scutages or Subſidies granted to, or taken by this King, I find none; yet it appears from an Antient Manuſcript Copy of Florence of Worceſter, in the Library of Corpus Chriſti Colledge (Oxon), that he took Dane-gelt more than once, notwithſtanding his Charter to the contrary; but it could not be paid very often, ſince the Armies of both the Competitors being for the moſt part maintain'd by the Plunder and Spoil of their Adverſaries, or the Contribution of their Friends, the Nation became unable to pay Taxes.

VOL. II. BOOK V.

Containing the Reign of King Henry II.

KING Stephen Dying thus unexpectedly, Henry Duke of Normandy (who was in his Dutchy at that time) so soon as he had Notice of his Death, and could settle his Affairs, immediately came away for England, [1.] and Landed here on the 7th of December, and (as all Authors agree) was here received with Universal Joy by all Orders and Degrees of men, to whom the Prospect of a lasting and settled Peace (a Happiness which England had for some little time already tasted) was likely to prove a great Satisfaction; and therefore it is no Marvel, if having lately suffer'd so much for breaking the Course of Succession, which was setled by the Great Council of the Kingdom, no man durst now attempt the like Exorbitance, since he could not expect to find any Favourers or Abettors.

Anno Dom. MCLIV.

Henry Duke of Normandy, upon the News of King Stephen's Death, comes for England.

[1.] C. G. M. P. And is here receiv'd with Universal Joy.

As for King Stephen's only Surviving Legitimate Son William, he was but a Youth under Age, and of small Reputation, and less Experience; so that it is not to be thought much if he could scarce find any of the Clergy or Nobility forward to Engage in his Quarrel, and to Violate the late Agreement between his Father and Duke Henry; which shews the wonderful Providence of God, that when it pleases him to remove a Crown from one Family to another, it commonly takes off all Obstacles that might any ways hinder that great Design.

King Stephen's only Lawful Son meets with few that would venture to take his part.

[2.] But to return to our History; Duke Henry being thus Arrived in England, he was not long after solemnly Crown'd King at Westminster, together with Eleanor his Queen, by Theobald Archbishop of

[2.] C. B. King Henry's Coronation.

Anno Dom. MCLV.

of Canterbury, [3.] on the 19th Day of December with Loud Acclamations of all the People; Immediately after his Coronation, he retired to the Abby of Bermundſey, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs, yet he did not wholly ſpend it in Feaſting and Jollity, but in a ſerious Conſultation with the Chief men of the Kingdom, concerning its ſad and diſtracted condition, and the beſt means how to ſettle a laſting Peace; which they told him could not be done by a wiſer method than by expelling all Strangers out of England, and by putting the laſt hand to the deſtruction of thoſe Caſtles which had been Erected here during the Reign of his Predeceſſor; though moſt of them had been already demoliſhed.

(3.) C. G. He conſults with the Chief men of the Kingdom about the State and Welfare of it.

Now as for Foreigners, we need not think it ſtrange, if the Kingdom ſwarm'd with them; for the Reader may remember, That in the Reign of the Late King, many Strangers, and eſpecially Flemmings (whom he chiefly favour'd) were encouraged to come over hither, to ſerve as Mercenary Soldiers; but at their firſt Arrival, the principal thing they aimed at was ſpoil and plunder; yet being afterwards married, and ſetled here, and ſeveral of them having Lands given them by the King's Bounty, they were loath to leave their preſent Enjoyments; (4.) However theſe being looked upon as too dangerous Inmates for the Peoples quiet, they were all order'd by the King's Expreſs Command to leave the Nation at a day prefixt; which ſince they knew not how to avoid, they were forced to comply with, and accordingly went over in a Body under the Conduct of William d' Ipre as their Leader.

(4.) Id. Col. 1377. And by their Advice orders the Strangers, eſpecially the Flemmings, by a Day to leave the Nation.

This being perform'd; The next great Work was, according to the foregoing Advice of his Great men, to raze moſt of thoſe Caſtles which had been Erected ſince the Deceaſe of his Grandfather King Henry, excepting ſome few of the Principal, which were preſerved for the Strength and Defence of the Kingdom.

He demoliſhes the late Erected Caſtles.

(5.) C. B. Col. 1046. Recals the Crown-Rents and Lands.

(5.) Then King Henry finding the chief of the Lands and Revenues belonging to the Crown granted away, and (thro' the late King's eaſineſs or neceſſity to ſecure the Great men on his ſide,) divided amongſt them, He recalled all thoſe Grants, and commanded the Lands immediately to be reſtor'd to the Crown; and when ſome offer'd to produce King Stephen's Charters for them; King Henry's Anſwer was, That the Grants of an Uſurper ought not to prejudice a Rightful Prince; ſo that tho' theſe Noblemen were at firſt very loath and unwilling to reſign them; yet being afraid of the new King's Power, they were forced at laſt to ſurrender them.

(1.) Id. ib. * The Northern Nobility forced to ſubmit to the King's pleaſure in it, tho' very unwillingly.

Indeed almoſt all the South complied betimes; but the (1.) * North ſeemed more reſolute, and for a while ſtood it out with him, until the King going down into thoſe parts, cited William Earl of Albemarle, and other Noblemen to appear before him, who not without Delays and great Reluctance, were at laſt made to ſubmit to the King's good pleaſure, and to ſurrender all thoſe Lands and Demeſnes they had ſo long wrongfully poſſeſt: Among the reſt was that ſtrong Caſtle of Scarborough, which that Earl (laſt mentioned) had cauſed to be built on the top of a Rock, commanding the Sea with the Adjacent Country.

The K. goes to the South of England.

All things being thus peaceably ſetled in the North of England, the King return'd back into the South, where he alſo reſolved to take into into his hands the reſt of thoſe Caſtles, which ſome of the Nobility ſtill retain'd in their poſſeſſion, (who had been hitherto too powerful to be queſtioned), [2.] that ſo he might by this ſure means cut up the very Roots of all future Rebellions: To which end, not long after, he ſummoned a Common-Council of the Chief Men of the whole Kingdom, where he demanded of ſome of them, By what Right they held thoſe Caſtles which appertain'd to the Crown? Then Roger Earl of Hereford, Son to the late Earl Milo, being much ſtartled at theſe proceedings, fled privately from Court, and ſtrongly fortified his Caſtles of Gloceſter, and Hereford, and at firſt ſeemed reſolved to venture the worſt Conſequences of his Rebellion, rather than part with thoſe places: But at length by the perſuaſions of Gilbert Foliot, his Kinſman, (then Biſhop of Hereford) he reſign'd them into the King's hands, and thereupon was reſtored to his Favour.

[3.] But Hugh de Mortimer, a Potent Baron, who had before incited Earl Roger to rebel, tho he found he was forſaken by him, yet ſtill preſumed to hold out his ſtrong Caſtles of Coleburgh, Wigmore, and Bridg-north, againſt the King's Forces: But He dividing them into Three Bodies, ſent them all at once to aſſault thoſe places, which being vigorouſly attack'd, were quickly yielded up, and Earl Hugh was forced to deliver up the Caſtle of Bridg-north himſelf, (tho he there commanded in Perſon) and moſt humbly to implore the King's mercy, who accordingly pardoned him; it not being thought adviſable to uſe greater Severities, whilſt the Government was as yet but in its Infancy, and unſettled. Nor did the King ſtop here, [4.] but (contrary to his own Charter and Agreement with King Stephen) he deſpoiled his Son William Earl of Mortaign and Warren, of the Caſtle of Norwich, and all the Crown-Lands his Father had given him, except only ſuch as King Stephen had enjoyed by the Gift of King Henry his Uncle.

[3.] Id. Ib. Hugh Mortimer ſtands out againſt the King. But being vigorouſly attacked by his Forces, his Caſtles were ſoon took, and he himſelf forced to ſurrender Bridg-north. Upon which the King pardons him.

[4] G. N. He takes away Norwich Caſtle, and all the Crown-Lands from William, which his Father K. Stephen had given him.

[5.] After Eaſter a General Council or Parliament was held at Wallingford, wherein the King cauſed the whole Kingdom to ſwear Fealty to himſelf, and his Eldeſt Son William an Infant, and if he died without Iſſue, then to his Second Son Henry, who was born in the beginning of March before; but William not long after deceaſed.

[5] G. G. Col. 1378. A Parliament held at Wallingford. Wherein Fealty was ſworn to the King and his Sons. But adjourned to London, and and the Laws of St. Edward confirmed, &c.

Alſo in this very Council (being I ſuppoſe for ſome Reaſons adjourned to London) were confirmed the Laws of St. Edward, and the Ancient Cuſtoms of the Kingdom; and in which alſo (in imitation of his Grandfather King Henry I.) he granted that * Charter of Liberties inſerted in the [1.] Second Volume of * Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, that I ſhall here tranſlate from the Latin, which I have placed in the * Appendix.

'Cuſtoms, freely, quietly, and fully in all points, as King Henry my 'Grandfather gave and granted to them, and confirmed by his Charter: 'Teſte Richardo de Luci.

William of Newburgh's Account of the beginning of this King's Reign.

To this Charter, and to King Henry's other Legal Proceedings, I ſuppoſe William of Newburgh refers, when he tells us in the very beginning of this King's Reign, That King Henry revived the Vigor of the Laws that ſeemed in King Stephen's time to have been laid aſleep; and having ordain'd careful Miniſters of Juſtice in all the Borders of his Kingdom, who might either reſtrain the Boldneſs of Evil men, or do Right to thoſe that appeal'd to them, whilſt the King himſelf purſued his Pleaſures, or elſe was employed in the more weighty Affairs of State: And whenever he was informed that his Judges had acted leſs carefully or juſtly than their Duty required, he quickly remedied it by a due Correction of their Failings: Theſe hopeful beginnings of ſo Young a King were as grateful to the quiet and peaceable, as they were unpleaſant to thoſe that were wicked and injurious; who were now forced either to leave the Country, or at leaſt to ſeem honeſt, whatſoever they were in their hearts: whereby all men quietly enjoyed the Fruits of a long deſired Peace.

The King corrects the Judges for Failure in their Duties.

I will here, tho contrary to my uſual Method, ſet down a Foreign Eccleſiaſtical Affair, ſince it is not only very remarkable, but alſo ſerves to illuſtrate the following Tranſactions of this Year.

Nicholas Break-ſpear elected Pope, who took the Name of Adrian the Fourth

His Birth and Character.

Pope Anaſtaſius lately deceaſing, Nicholas Break-ſpear an Engliſhman, Biſhop of Alba, was elected in his ſtead, a little before the King came to the Crown, who took the name of Adrian the Fourth: He is ſaid to have been the Son of a Villain or Bondman, belonging to the Abby of St. Albans, and tho put to School there, yet by reaſon of his ſervile Birth was refuſed to be made a Monk of that Abby, as he himſelf and his Father deſired; upon which diſappointment he found means to go beyond the Seas, where he ſo improved in Piety and Learning, that he was not only by his Predeceſſor Pope ordained Biſhop of Alba, but was alſo ſent Legate into Germany, to convert the Country about the City of Worms to the Chriſtian Faith; in which Office he ſo well acquitted himſelf, that he was upon his return, made a Cardinal, and proved ſo Active and Stout a Pope, that he not only put the City of Rome under an Interdict, becauſe one of his Cardinals had been there wounded in a Tumult, but durſt alſo Excommunicate William King of Sicily, and made him yield to his own Terms: Yet this Pope held the Chair but four Years, and ſome odd days, and then deceaſed.

Is ordained by Pope Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Alba, and ſent Legate to Germany.

He puts the City of Rome under an Interdict, and alſo excommunicates the King of Sicily.

The Pope dies after four Years Reign.

[2.] About Michaelmas the King held a great Council at Wincheſter, wherein he treated with his Great Men about conquering the Kingdom of Ireland, and beſtowing it upon his Son William; which Deſign, becauſe it did not pleaſe his Mother the Empreſs, (who thought it too hazardous) was then laid aſide, but reſumed divers Years after; as you will find in due time.

[2.] G. N.

The King reſolves to ſubdue Ireland; but the Empreſs not approving of it, the Deſign is laid aſide.

Yet it ſeems this Project then advanced ſo far, that the King (againſt a fitting opportunity, ſhould it offer it ſelf) about [3.] this time ſent John of Salisbury (afterwards Biſhop of Chartres) and other Ambaſſadors to Rome to Pope Adrian, with Compliments and Congratulations, from whom they obtained a Bull, that by his Authority and Aſſent the King might reduce Ireland to his Obedience, for the Increaſe of the Chriſtian Religion, the correcting of their evil Manners, and the Propagation of Virtue among the People of that Iſland.

[3.] Gir. Cambrenſ. L. 2. C. 1.

Yet the King obtains a Bull from the Pope to reduce that Iſland to his Obedience.

By

By which ſpecious Pretences the Pope now claims a Temporal Power not only over Ireland, but all other Iſlands which have received the Chriſtian Religion, as of Right belonging to St. Peter and the Roman Church: Therefore he there farther commands all the People of that Iſland to receive the King honourably, and reſpect him as their Sovereign Lord, upon condition that he pay that Saint and his Succeſſors an Annual Tribute of one Penny out of each Houſe.

This Bull was not long after carried over into Ireland, and there publickly read in a General Synod at Waterford, by the ſaid John of Sarisbury, by whom alſo the Pope ſent the King a Gold Ring in token of his Inveſtiture.

I have given a more particular account of this Bull (which you may find at large in the above-cited [4.] Giraldus Cambrenſis, and * Radulph de Diceto, Imagin. Hiſt.) that you may from hence obſerve the Pope's Claim is not only to Ireland, but alſo to England and all other Iſlands, whenever he pleaſes to conceive that Religion and Good Manners are not there taught ſo well as they ought to be.

I can find nothing elſe to have happen'd this Year worth noting, [5.] but that the King, by the Advice of Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, made Thomas Becket (then only Archdeacon of that Dioceſs) his Chancellor, which I thought fit to mention, becauſe he will ſome years hence make a great Figure in our Hiſtory. Roger Hoveden places this Advancement under the Year 1157. but it is a Miſtake; for (as Mat. Paris alſo rightly obſerves) Thomas was made Chancellor in the firſt Year of King Henry's Reign.

[1.] King Henry having now ſettled all Affairs in England to his ſatisfaction, thought fit to leave it for a time; and a little before Candlemaſs paſſed over into Normandy, where after a Week's ſtay at Roüen, he had an Interview with Lewis King of France, and did him Homage for the Dutchy of Normandy, as alſo for Aquitain, Anjou, and Tourain, with their Appurtenances.

[2.] Then the King returned to Roüen, where Theodoric Earl of Flanders, and the Counteſs his Wife, the King's Aunt, came to make him a Viſit, as did alſo Geoffry the King's Brother, tho he ſtaid not long with him, becauſe he would not accept the Terms the King offered him for his Appenage; therefore he went into Anjou, which he would fain have kept as his own, but the King would not ſuffer it.

Who quickly after returned into England, yet ſtaid not long, [3.] but paſſing over again into France, made War upon his Brother Geoffry: The occaſion of which was this; Geoffry Earl of Anjou their Father, on his Death-bed left his Earldom of Anjou to his Eldeſt Son Henry, until he ſhould obtain the Crown of England, and then he was to deliver it up to his Brother Geoffry; and for a further Confirmation thereof, the late Earl made all his Great Men there preſent, to ſwear never to ſuffer his Body to be buried, until his Son Duke Henry had taken an Oath to perform his Laſt Will. This Oath Duke Henry took out of Reverence to his Father's dying Requeſt; yet as he took it unwillingly, ſo he quickly broke it; for as ſoon as he arrived in France, he ſent to Pope Adrian for a Diſpenſation of his Oath, which was preſently granted, being the firſt King of England who ever made uſe of ſuch a mean Evaſion. This Diſpenſation being once granted, he ſoon entred Anjou with an Army; and his Brother Geoffry not being able to make any great great Head againſt him, becauſe he wanted thoſe Forces which the King of France had promiſed him; he not only took from him the Earldom of Anjou, but alſo (through the good Conduct of Thomas his Chancellor,) the Towns and Caſtles of Chinon, Mirabel, and Loſdun alſo, which his Father had beſtowed upon him for his maintenance; (4.) ſo that being thus ouſted of all, he was forced to accept of a Penſion of a Thouſand pounds Engliſh; and Two thouſand pounds more of Anjovin Money from the King his Brother, which was indeed a great Sum in thoſe times.

(4) M. P. Who accepts of a Penſion from him. Note, One Penny of Anjovin Money was but a Fourth part of the value of a Penny Engliſh; for Hoveden in R. 1. p. 384. b. ſays, One penny Engliſh was to go in all Markets for four Anjovin pence. Princes ſeldom obſerve Oaths that are contrary to their Intereſts, &c.

Moſt of our Hiſtorians place this Quarrel between the King and his Brother Two years after; but I have rather choſen to follow Gervaſe of Canterbury, who, I think more truly places this War under this year; but let it have happened when it would, it affords us this Obſervation, that Princes ſeldom obſerve Oaths, when they are directly contrary to their Intereſts, much leſs when they are extorted from them by force, and againſt all Right, as this was; for it muſt be confeſſed to be a very unjuſt action in his Father, to diſinherit his Eldeſt Son of his Birth-right, only becauſe he was to have greater Dominions fall to him another way.

The King having ſtayed moſt part of this Year in France, and ſetled all things there to his mind, return'd again into England, where he ſpent the reſt of it.

The King returns to Engl. Anno Dom. MCLVII.

In the Summer following, the King having been provoked to it by the frequent Incurſions of the Welſhmen, (5.) was reſolved to do what he could to ſubdue North-Wales; and he was likewiſe prompted thereto by Cadwallader, Brother to Owen Prince of Wales, who had at that time baniſhed him his Country. Therefore the King having raiſed a Potent Army marched down to Weſt-cheſter, and Encamped near it; which when Prince Owen heard, he alſo got together what Forces he could, and with them went to the utmoſt Borders of his Dominions, Encamping at a place called Dinas Baſing, in Engliſh, Baſingweark, or Caſtle: The King thereupon chuſing the Flower of his Army, draws them out againſt the Welſh Prince; but as they were paſſing a Wood, (called Coed Eulo,) David and Conan Sons to the Prince, leading a ſtrong Body of men, fell upon the King's Forces by Surprize; who being ſtruck with the ſuddenneſs of the Aſſault, and penned up together in a narrow Streight, the Engliſh were put to Flight, and a great Number of them killed; And amongſt the reſt, fell Euſtace Fitz-John, and Robert Curcie, Two Barons of great Note: and though the King had eſcaped the danger, yet upon a Rumour which ran through the Army that he was Slain, it made (1.) a great Lord, Henry de Eſſex, who was the King's Standard Bearer by Inheritance, to fling down the Standard, and betake himſelf to Flight, which put the Army into great Confuſion; but upon the King's appearing again, it received freſh Vigour, rallied, and made a ſafe Retreat.

(5.) W. N. M. P. Reſolves to ſubdue North-Wales, for their frequent Incurſions upon him. Marches down to Weſt cheſter with a great Army. Owen with his Forces goes out to meet him. And his Two Sons ſurprizing them, killed a great Number of the Engliſh, and put the reſt to Flight.

Then the King being much concerned at this Defeat, removed his Camp to the Sea-ſide, intending there to give Owen the go by, and paſs into his Country; but the Welſh Prince foreſeeing this, preſently drew back to a place called Cil Owen, (that is in Welſh, the Retreat of Owen;) Upon which the King came back to Ruthlan Caſtle.

(1.) G. B. But upon the King's appearance they rallied, and made a ſafe Retreat.

(2.) After this there happened nothing conſiderable between the Two Armies, only Madoc ap Meredyth, Prince of Powiſland, being then on the King's ſide, and Commanding a ſmall Fleet of Ships, endeavoured to Land in the Iſle of Angleſey; but he having ſpoiled a Church, the Iſlanders got together, ſet upon them, and ſlew all thoſe that had been ſo adventurous as to Land; but in the mean time there was a Treaty of Peace concluded between the King and Prince Owen, upon condition, that he ſhould pay his accuſtomed Tribute, and reſtore his Brother his Lands again; ſo the King having new-built and fortified the Caſtles of Ruthlan and Baſingweark, (where he alſo Founded a Houſe for the Knights Templars, to ſerve as a further Bridle upon the Welſh) return'd into England with Honour.

(3.) But ſome time after the King's return, Henry de Eſſex was accuſed by Robert de Montfort, (a Baron of great Reputation) of Treaſon, for ſo cowardly flinging away the Standard in the late Fight with the Welſh: Which coming to be tried by Single Combat between them, Henry was vanquiſhed, for which he ought by Law to have loſt his Life; but the King ſpared that, (ſeeing Courage is not always in a Man's own power) and contented himſelf with ſeizing on his vaſt Eſtate, which was thereby forfeited; and as for the man himſelf, (being now looked upon as good for nothing,) the King cauſed him to be ſhorn a Monk in the Abby of Reading.

(4.) This Year alſo (but whither before or after his Expedition againſt the Welſh, is uncertain) the King demanded the Counties of Northumberland, and Cumberland of Malcolm King of Scots, which had been ſeized by David his Grandfather, and alſo made over to him by the Empreſs Mathylda, his Neice, and confirmed by this King's own Oath, before he came to the Crown: But being now not willing to ſtand to that Agreement, he demanded them again, affirming, he could not afford to part with ſo large a ſhare of his Dominions; whereupon (5.) Malcolm, perceiving King Henry was not to be contended with in this point, was fain to ſurrender thoſe Counties into his hands, together with the Towns of Carliſle, Newcaſtle upon Tyne, and the ſtrong Caſtle of Banborough; but he permitted King Malcolm ſtill to retain the Earldom of Huntington as his Ancient Right; which, lying almoſt in the midſt of England, the King of Scots could draw no other advantage from it, than what its bare Revenues afforded.

I know divers of our Hiſtorians place this Tranſaction in the Firſt Year of this King's Reign; but I rather chuſe to follow Roger Hoveden, and the Chronicle of Mailroſ, who both agree, that Malcolm came this Year to the King of England, at Cheſter, and there did * him Homage after the ſame manner as his Grandfather had done before to King Henry the Firſt, with a Salvo to all his Royal Dignities; by which Clauſe it ſeems as if the Homage were not for the whole Kingdom of Scotland, but only for Lothian, and thoſe other Lands which were anciently held of the Kings of England.

(1.) This Year alſo Richard, the King's Second Son, was Born at his Palace at Oxford, then called Beaumont, who, after the Death of his Elder Brother Henry, ſucceeded his Father in the Throne.

The Beginning of this Year the (2.) King ſpent in a Progreſs through England, and coming to Lincoln, he cauſed himſelf to be again Crown'd in a Subburb (called Wickford,) without the Walls, being hindered by ſome Superſtitious Propheſies from wearing the Crown in the After wards the King's Affairs called him again beyond the Seas; for (3.) Geoffry his Brother having been about Three years before choſen by the Citizens of Nants for their Lord, in the Room of Hoel Earl of Bretaigne, whom they had expelled; he had poſſeſſed himſelf of that City, together with the Country about it; but dying the ſame Year, lived not long to enjoy it. After his Death, Conan Earl of Richmond ſeized upon it, as next Heir-Male to the former Earl Hoel, who died without Iſſue. But the King hearing his Brother was dead, went over into France, and claimed Nants as Heir to his Brother; and to be even with Earl Conan, he gave Command that his Earldom of Richmond ſhould be ſeized into his own hands.

(4) Id ib. King Henry goes to Paris. Treaty of Marriage concluded between the King's Eldeſt Son Henry, and the King of France's Daughter Margaret.

After this, (4.) Henry took a Journey to Paris, where being Royally received by King Lewis, there was a Treaty of Marriage begun and concluded between the King's Eldeſt Son Henry, and the French King's Daughter Margaret, at that time both Infants; and for the greater ſecurity of this Marriage, the Young Princeſs was preſently delivered into King Henry's hands, and he committed her to the Cuſtody of one of his Barons; and at the ſame time by the means of Thomas Becket, the King's Chancellor, he obtained of King Lewis (who was a man of a ſoft and eaſy Temper,) a Power or Commiſſion for King Henry to enter Bretaign as his Lieutenant, and there either by fair means or foul to bring the Bretaigns, (who were then engaged in a Civil War among themſelves) under his Obedience; which the King performed, and thereby reduced the City of Nants with its Territories under his Dominion, to which he pretended a Right as Heir to his Brother, as before was ſaid; but I ſuppoſe this City and Territory was ſome time after reſtored to Earl Conan, upon his Agreement with the King.

King Henry as the King of France's Lieutenant, reduces Bretaign, and gets Nants under his Dominion. But reſtored to Conan upon an Agreement.

(5.) After his Return from this Expedition, the King of France, making a Pilgrimage to St. Michael's Mount in Normandy, was nobly received, and attended by King Henry during the Progreſs, who treated him as he came back in all the chief Cities of that Dutchy, with the like Ceremonies and Magnificence as had been obſerved to himſelf at Paris: Upon which King Lewis went home with great Satisfaction, and immediately after King Henry return'd into England; (1.) where he had not been long before he took a Journey into the North, to meet Malcolm King of Scots at Carliſle, (tho' our Authors tell us not for what) but they parted upon no very good Terms, and that was the reaſon why the Scotiſh King did not then receive the Order of Knighthood at his hands.

We have nothing further to remark under this Year, (2.) but that tho' there had been ſevere Juſtice lately Executed upon the Coiners of falſe-money, yet notwithſtanding they had ſo far Adulterated the Current Coin of the Nation, that it was all forced to be called in, and New Coined, which for ſome time proved a great loſs and inconvenience not only to the poor, but alſo to all Labourers and Farmers. This I take notice of, to ſhew, that this (though it has happen'd in our Times, yet) is no new Grievance, but what has been ſeen in the Reigns of one of the greateſt Princes that ever England had.

This

Anno Dom. MCLIX.

[3.] This Year K. Henry with his Queen Eleanor, kept their Chriſtmas at Falaiſe, and then paſſing over into England, they took a Progreſs as far as the City of Worceſter, where he cauſed both Himſelf and Her to be ſolemnly Crown'd upon Eaſter-Sunday; and coming to the Oblation, they there offer'd up their Crowns at the High Altar, publickly vowing never to wear them any more ſo long as they lived; which I ſuppoſe they ſtrictly obſerved: Nor do [4.] I find many of our Kings after him to have worn their Crowns at the great Feſtivals, as they uſed to do before.

[3.] G. N. R. H. The King and Queen crowned at Worceſter. And at the High Altar offered up their Crowns, ſwearing never to wear them more.

Not long after this the King reſolved upon another Expedition into France; and to that end raiſed a great Army by a new and eaſy method: For his deſign being to march as far as the City of Tholouſe, to ſubdue it with its Territories, he at firſt ſummoned the Forces of all England, Normandy, Aquitain, and the other Countries ſubject to him; but yet he carried with him in this Expedition no * Agrarian Soldiers (the ſame with our Train'd Bands now-a-days), nor yet any Burghers or Ruſticks, but made every Knight's Fee in Normandy to pay Sixty Anjovin Shillings; and in England and all his other Territories what he thought fit.

[4] G. N. Ib. K. Henry reſolves upon another Expedition to France, to ſubdue the City and Earldom of Tholouſe.

* Milites Agrarios.

But [5.] Gervaſe of Canterbury gives us a more exact Account of what was paid in England, than the former Author, who was a Foreigner, could; for he ſays, The Scutage that was raiſed here for this Expedition, amounted to no leſs than One hundred twenty four thouſand Marks, and from his other Dominions ſuch a Sum as had never been heard of before; with all which he hired a vaſt Army of Mercenaries; ſo that none but his chief Barons, and ſome other principal Knights accompanied him.

He takes a great Scutage of every Knight's Fee in England, and all his other Territories, and therewith hires an Army of Mercenaries.

[5.] Col. 1381.

King Malcolm alſo, then coming to King Henry upon his Summons, was forced to go along with him in this Expedition: Which was politickly enough done, for by this means he not only ſecured the Kingdom from any Invaſion during his Abſence, but alſo thereby created a Miſunderſtanding betwixt that Prince and the French King.

[1.] So ſoon as King Henry arrived in France, he openly laid Claim to the Earldom of Tholouſe, in Right of the Queen his Wife; and her Title ſtood thus: Her Grandfather, William Earl of Poictou, and Duke of Aquitain, going to the Holy Land, had mortgaged that City and Earldom for a great Sum of Money to his Brother Raymond, Earl of St. Giles, which Money he never paid, but left the Debt upon his Son Duke William, the Father of Queen Eleanor; and upon Non payment thereof, Alphonſus the Son of Raymond, and after him Raymond Son to Alphonſus, held and enjoyed the City and Earldom: But the King of France, upon his marrying of Eleanor, Daughter and Heir of the deceaſed Duke William, claimed and was going to poſſeſs himſelf both of that City and Territory; when at laſt the King and Earl Raymond came to this Compoſition, That upon the tender of ſuch a Sum of Money, the Earl ſhould marry the King of France's Siſter Conſtance, Widow to Earl Euſtace, Son to King Stephen, and thereupon ſhould be permitted quietly to enjoy the Earldom: But King Henry marrying this Dutcheſs after ſhe was lawfully divorced (as hath been already related) he had then the ſame Title as the King of France her former Husband had to this City and Earldom.

[2.] R. H. ib. G. N. The King of France putting himſelf into the City, ſecures it from being beſieg'd. Cahors taken.

[3.] Col. 1381. The Relation of this Expedition of Gervaſe of Cant. different from the other Hiſtorians.

[2.] To conquer both which, he marched through France without any great Oppoſition, and took many places round about that City: Earl Raymond being alarm'd at theſe great Preparations, implored the King of France's Aſſiſtance, and in compliance to his deſires he immediately put himſelf into the City with a potent Army; but King Henry, for the Reſpect he bore to his Perſon, would not beſiege it, though he ſubdued the greateſt part of that Earldom: He alſo falling upon the City of Cahors, had it ſoon ſurrendred to him.

[3.] But Gervaſe's Chronicle above-cited, quite differs from the reſt of the Hiſtorians in this Relation; (viz.) That King Henry was ſo far from declining the Siege out of any Reſpect to the King of France, that he beſieged it from the Nativity of St. John Baptiſt to that of All-Saints: Which though probable enough, being written by an Author who lived very near thoſe times, yet ſince he is contradicted by all the reſt except Roger Hoveden under this Year, who ſays expreſly, That the King beſieged the Town a long while, I ſhall not inſiſt upon the Truth of this Relation; only it lets us ſee the great Uncertainty of the Hiſtorians of thoſe times: But this is agreed on all hands, That King Henry being thus diſappointed in his main deſign, and having ſpent a great deal of Treaſure, and loſt a great many men to no purpoſe, beſides Winter approaching, he was forced to march away into his own Dominions, being little the better for his new Conqueſts; becauſe he gave up moſt of thoſe places to William Trencheveil, Earl of Nimes, a powerful Nobleman, from whom the Earl of St. Giles had before taken them.

K. Henry returns into Normandy.

Giving up moſt of his new Conqueſts to William Trencheveil.

Nor do I find the King to have been much the better for the Aſſiſtance of the Earl of Barcelona, with whom he had ſome time before entred into a Confederacy againſt the French King: Neither can I diſcover any thing elſe conſiderable to have happen'd during this Expedition, ſave that [4.] William Earl of Boloign, Son to King Stephen, with divers other Noblemen, died by the Sword in their Return: And that King Henry, when he came to the City of Tours, Knighted the King of Scots, in acknowledgment of his Valour and good Service.

[4] R. D. C. M.

At Tours he Knights the King of Scots.

But [5.] as Fitz-Stephens ſays, King Henry, having fortified Cahors to be as a Check upon Tholouſe, and recommended it to the care of Thomas Becket his Chancellor, and likewiſe having fixed Gariſons in all places neceſſary and convenient, returned into Normandy, and from thence with a great Force went into le Beauvaiſis, and deſtroyed the ſtrong Caſtle of Guerberes, and burnt ſeveral Towns and Villages thereabouts. Simon Earl of Montfort at that time delivered up to King Henry his places of ſtrength in France; (viz.) Rochfort, Montfort, Eſpernon, and the reſt; which was a great Detriment to the King of France; for none of his People could paſs freely from Paris to Eſtampes, or Orleans, for fear of being moleſted by the Normans whom he had put into thoſe Caſtles; and for this cauſe the French King thought it beſt to make a Truce or Ceſſation of Arms with King Henry, to be from December until eight days after Whitſunday.

I cannot here omit what the ſame Fitz-Stephens in his Life of Thomas Becket reports, That in this War between the Kings of England and France, Thomas then Chancellor, beſides his own Retinue, maintained Seven hundred Knights or Horſemen, and alſo Twelve hundred others of leſs Quality, with Four thouſand * mercenary Footmen, for one one Month; every Miles, or Knight, receiving every day to provide for his Horſes and Eſquires, Three Shillings of that Country Money; but the Knights themſelves had their Diet from the Chancellor; and though he was a Clerk, he tilted with a Knight of France, named Engelram de Trie, and with his Lance unhorſed him, and gained his Horſe. Anno Dom. MCLIX.

I have taken notice of this Paſſage, to let the Reader ſee in how great Favour this man was whilſt he was Chancellor, and what a vaſt Revenue he muſt have had in Offices and Benefices, to be able to maintain ſuch a Body of Men for a Month, as I believe never a Nobleman of England but himſelf was then able to have done. The vaſt Revenue of Tho. Becket.

But the King ſtaying all the reſt of this Year in Normandy, there happen'd nothing conſiderable in Civil Affairs; but in Church matters it is not amiſs to take notice, [1.] That Thirty German Hereticks of both Sexes, called Publicans, (though for what reaſons I know not) came about this time into England, under the Conduct of one Gerard their Teacher, in order to preach up their Doctrine here; who being ſeized upon, and put in Priſon by the King's Command, he thereupon ordered a Council of Biſhops to be ſummoned at Oxford; where being examined upon the Articles of their Belief, their Teacher (who ſeemed to have ſome more knowledge of Letters than the reſt, who were wholly unlearn'd,) anſwered, That they were Chriſtians, and believed the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, but utterly denied Baptiſm, the Lord's Supper, and Matrimony: And when they were urged from Scripture to embrace them, they anſwered, That they believed as they were taught, and came not to diſpute concerning their Faith; and remaining ſtill obſtinate Hereticks, they were delivered over to the Secular Power to be puniſhed, which condemned them to be marked with a Red Hot Iron in the Forehead, and then whipp'd; This Puniſhment they patiently underwent, their Captain going before them, ſinging, Bleſſed are ye, when men hate you, &c.

[1.] W. N. 30 German Hereticks come into England, to preach up their Doctrine.

[2.] After they were thus whipt, they were thruſt out of doors in the midſt of Winter, where they died with Cold and Hunger, no man daring to relieve them, it being expreſly forbid for any perſon ſo to do. I have taken notice of this, becauſe theſe were the firſt (as I can find) that ever ſuffer'd for Hereſy in England.

[2.] Id. ib.

The firſt that ever ſuffered here for Hereſy.

[3.] The ſame Year alſo happen'd a great Schiſm at Rome, upon the death of Pope Adrian; for moſt of the Cardinals aſſembling, elected Cardinal Rowland, Chancellor of St. Peter's Church, by the name of Alexander; but he at firſt too modeſtly refuſing it, divers of thoſe who were averſe to his Election, thereby took occaſion to chuſe another Cardinal, called Octavian, who named himſelf Victor; He being ſupported by the Emperor Frederic, both theſe Anti-Popes excommunicated each other; till at laſt Alexander got the better, and forced the Emperor Frederic to ſubmit to him.

[4.] This Year K Henry being ſtill in Normandy, kept his Chriſtmas at Falaiſe; and in May following there was a Peace again clapt up between the Two Kings of England and France, though it did not continue long: Yet, during this Interval, in July King Henry ſummoned a Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots, and Barons of Normandy, at a place called New-Market; and King Lewis did the like for the Eſtates of France at Beauvois, where they both agreed on the Reception of the new Pope Alexander, and the Rejection of Victor above-mentioned. Anno Dom. MCLX.

[5.] Upon the late Contract of Marriage between their Children, the ſtrong Caſtle of Giſors with its Dependancies, was to remain in the Cuſtody of Three Knights Templars, appointed by both the Kings, until the ſaid Marriage ſhould be conſummated, and then they were all to be delivered up to King Henry; but he thinking the time long e're he had them in his poſſeſſion, was reſolved to get them as ſoon as he could: Therefore about the beginning of November, by the Authority and Allowance of the Cardinals of Piſa and Papia, then the Pope's Legates, he cauſed the Nuptials to be publickly celebrated between Prince Henry his Son, at that time not Seven Years of Age, and Margaret, Daughter of King Lewis by Conſtantia his Second Wife, who was Daughter to Alphonſo King of Spain; upon which Marriage the Knights Templars delivered up the Caſtle of Giſors with its Dependancies to King Henry.

[1.] R. H. The 3 Knights Templars that kept the Caſtle of Giſors, &c. baniſh'd France, but are kindly received and rewarded by the King of England.

[1.] At this the King of France was ſo enraged againſt thoſe Knights, that he baniſhed them his Country for their breach of Truſt; but however they were kindly received by King Henry, and highly rewarded too for it. Nor was the French King contented with this, but he commanded the Earls Henry, Theobald, and Stephen, Brothers to his new Wife Ala, Daughter to Theobald Earl of Blois, to fortify Chaumont, which belonged to the Caſtle of Blois, that ſo from thence they might infeſt King Henry's Territories in Touraine: But He, ſo ſoon as he underſtood their deſign, without ſtaying for many Forces, preſently marched to diſappoint it, with thoſe he could get ready on the ſudden: The Earls hearing he was coming, left their Work, ſo he preſently took this new Fortreſs, and about a Hundred and twenty Soldiers in it, and demoliſhed it, and then fortified Ambois and Freteval, placing Gariſons in them, and went to Mans, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs with his Queen Eleanor.

[2.] C. N. The K poſſeſſes himſelf of the Caſtles in Normandy.

This Year he [2.] ſeized into his own hands all the Strong-holds of the Earl of Mellent, and the other Barons in Normandy, and committed them to the Care of his Confidents, and then repaired and ſtrengthned all his Caſtles on the Borders of Normandy toward France, and well manned them, eſpecially Giſors: But Theobald Earl of Blois did many ill Offices, creating freſh Quarrels between the Two Kings; ſo that after Eaſter they both drew their Armies into the Field againſt each other, to defend their Countries, firſt in Le Veuxin, afterwards in Le Dunois, every day expecting Battel; yet at length they made a Truce without any Bloodſhed.

Takes the ſtrong Caſtle of Agen.

From hence King Henry after Midſummer marched into Aquitain, and beſieged the famous Caſtle of Agen, ſeated upon the River Garonne, which was fortified as well by Nature as Art; but yet in a Week's time he made himſelf Maſter of it on St. Lawrence's day, to the great Aſtoniſhment and Terror of the Gaſcoins.

Both Kings do honourably receive Pope Alexander, near the River Loir.

During this Truce between the Two Kings, they met together near the River Loyr, and honourably received Pope Alexander, (then lately arrived in France, being expelled Italy by Victor his Competitor) each of of them performing the Office of Yeoman or Gentleman of his Stirrup, walking on foot, the one led his Horſe by the Bridle on the Right ſide, and the other on the Left, until they brought him to a Pavilion prepared for him; by whoſe Mediation a firm Peace was made between them. I have mentioned this, to let the Reader ſee the wonderful Reſpect that Princes paid the Pope in thoſe days of Ignorance, which is the Mother of Superſtition, rather than true Devotion.

Anno Dom. MCLXI.

And perform the Office of Yeoman of the Stirrup to him.

I find nothing conſiderable to have happen'd this Year in England, [3.] except the Death of Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a Prelate of great Piety, who deceaſed, and was buried at his own Church.

[3.] R. D. C. G. The Death of Theobald ABP of Canterbury.

The [4.] King, being ſtill detain'd in Normandy by his Foreign Affairs, this Year ſent over Thomas his Chancellor into England, to diſpatch the Buſineſs of the Kingdom; but chiefly with this intent, that he ſhould be now choſen Archbiſhop of Canterbury: But before that, he called a Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots, and other Great Men of England, wherein they ſwore Fealty to Henry the King's Son, whom the Chancellor had now brought over with him; and He firſt took the Oath, and did him Homage, Saving the Faith which he owed the King his Father as long as he lived, and ſhould pleaſe to govern.

Anno Dom. MCLXII.

[4.] Ibid. Thomas the Chancellor ſent into Engl. and for what. The Biſhops, Abbots, and Great Men of the Kingdom in Council ſwear Fealty to Henry, Son of K. Henry.

Not long after which, [5.] a Synod of the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury being aſſembled at London, together with the Prior and Senior Monks of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury, the Biſhops having before declared to them the King's Command to proceed to an Election of a new Archbiſhop; the ſaid Prior, together with the reſt of the Clergy there preſent, elected Thomas the Chancellor to be Archbiſhop, no man oppoſing it, [1.] except Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford, who ſaid, It was not fitting to make a mere Soldier, and a Secular Man, an Archbiſhop: But that weighed nothing with them; ſo he was ſoon after conſecrated on Trinity-Sunday, by Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter; the Archbiſhop of York being denied to perform that Ceremony, becauſe he and his Predeceſſors had for ſome time before refuſed to ſwear Canonical Obedience to the See of Canterbury.

[5.] Ibid. Synod of the Clergy of Cant. aſſembled at London about the choice of a new ABP.

[1.] Fitz. Steph. The Chancellor made ABP. and conſecrated by the BP. of Wincheſter.

The K. much diſappointed in him.

He reſigns his Office of Chancellor, And affects Auſterity of Life.

However, though this was a Creature of the King's own raiſing, yet he was very much diſappointed in this Choice; for whereas he expected to have found the new Archbiſhop wholly compliant to his Will, he on the contrary, immediately after his Conſecration, not only reſigned his Office of Chancellor, and returning to the King his Seal, which was then (as it is now) the Badge of that Office; but he alſo quite alter'd his former courſe of Life, from a free and Courtly, to a rigid and Monkiſh way of living, wearing Sackcloth next his Skin, and the Habit of a Monk under that of a Chanon Regular; and yet even of theſe Trifles the Monkiſh Writers make great Myſteries.

[2.] King Henry having ſettled all his Affairs on the other ſide the Water, at laſt left Normandy, having been detain'd there above a Month by contrary Winds; ſo in the beginning of January he landed at Southampton, where he was received by moſt of the Biſhops and Nobility with great Expreſſions of Joy and Reſpect; and in particular by Archbiſhop Thomas; of whom it was obſerved, That though the King ſaluted him with a Kiſs, yet he received him ſo coldly, that it appeared to all there preſent, that he was not much in his Favour.

[2.] R. D. K. comes for England, after he had ſettled his Affairs in Normandy.

Then

Anno Dom. MCLXIII.

Then [3.] the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Weſtminſter, where he held a Great Council, during which time the Body of King Edward the Confeſſor was tranſlated into a New Shrine: But I cannot find any thing of moment to have happen'd this Year, only that Malcolm King of Scots, with Owen and Rees, Princes of North and South Wales, and all the Greateſt Men of that Nation, did Homage to the King of England and his Son Henry, upon the Firſt of July at Woodſtock: The Norman Chronicle adds, That the North-Welſh Prince gave his Brother David, and ſome of his Baron's Sons as Pledges for his good Behaviour, or preſervation of Peace; and that the King might have ſuch of his Caſtles as he pleaſed.

[3.] C. B. Col. 1164. M. P. Annales de Waverley. The Kings of North & South-Wales do Homage to the King and his Son Henry.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, I find that [4.] about the end of May Pope Alexander held a General Council at Tours, to which Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury being ſummoned, appeared, and was received by the Pope with very great Honour, and ordered to ſit on his Right hand, and the Archbiſhop of York together with the Biſhop of Durham on his Left. In this Council the Pope excommunicated the Emperor Frederick Barbaroſſa, and Victor the Anti-Pope, with their Adherents.

[4.] G. G. Col. 1384. Pope Alexander holds a Gen. Council at Tours, and Thom. the AB^P is preſent at it, and what is done there.

I ſhall here, for want of Civil Occurrences, give you ſome other Church matters, which, though of no great moment in themſelves, yet ſince they were the Originals of all thoſe grand Differences and Quarrels, that after happened between the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, it will not be amiſs to let the Reader underſtand them, ſeeing moſt of them hapned about this very time. And this I ſhall do from William Fitz-Stephens, a Monk of Canterbury's Manuſcript Hiſtory (already cited) who was preſent at moſt of the Proceedings againſt the Archbiſhop, and wrote his Life, ſtill in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library.

The Riſe of the Quarrels between the K & the AB^P firſt promoted by ſome Court Clergymen.

The firſt thing that raiſed the King's diſpleaſure againſt the Archbiſhop, was, a Jealouſy put into his Head by ſome Clergymen belonging to the Court, who having obtained Eccleſiaſtical Benefices without any great Deſert, were afraid of the Archbiſhop's Strictneſs, that he would not ſuffer them to be advanced any higher, if he let them keep what they had: Theſe men detracted what they could from him, whiſpering in the King's Ear, That if the Archbiſhop's Power proceeded too far, his Royal Dignity would be in danger; and that unleſs he took care of himſelf, the Archbiſhop would at laſt be King, as being the Perſon that the Clergy would moſt likely elect; or elſe that the King would reign precariouſly at the Archbiſhop's pleaſure: But that which chiefly incenſed all the King's Tenants or Military men of the Kingdom againſt him, was, That he endeavoured to recover the Caſtle of Tunbridge from the Earl of Clare, with that whole Honour, though long ſince aliened from the Church of Canterbury, becauſe (according to the Decretals) it was lawful for his Predeceſſors, as Stewards for the Church, to manage its Lands ſo as to increaſe and not to diminiſh or alienate them: [5.] Therefore he had lately ſummoned the Earl to do him Homage for that Caſtle with its Appurtenances; but he refuſed it, and alledged for his ſo doing, that he held of the King by Knights Service.

The K.'s Tenants highly incenſed againſt the AB^P for his Proceedings againſt the Earl of Clare.

[1.] F. S.

[1.] In the next place the Archbiſhop challenged a Right to preſent to the vacant Churches in the Towns as well of his Barons, (i. e. thoſe who held of the Church by Knights Service) as his Monks (viz. of Canterbury) and by this Right gave the Church of Eynesford

Eynesford in Kent to one Lawrence a Prieſt, whereupon the Lord of the Mannor called William de Eynesford, moleſted the Servants of Lawrence, and forced them out of the Town, for which the Archbiſhop Excommunicated him: Upon this he applied himſelf to the King, who wrote to the Archbiſhop to Abſolve him; but he ſent the King word, That it belonged not to Him to command any man to be Excommunicated, or Abſolved; the King provoked with this ſawcy Anſwer, ſtill inſiſted upon his Royal Prerogative, That no Tenent in Capite ought to be Excommunicated, without his Knowledge or Conſent; at length the Archbiſhop, to pacify the King, did Abſolve him: But from thence-forward the King had no kindneſs for him, though not long before he had obtain'd of him a Liberty to Enjoy all the Honours and Dignities of his Church Entire, and that he might alſo ſeek to recover thoſe Lands that had been Alienated by his Predeceſſors, and were now poſſeſſed by Lay-men. Nor did he, (it ſeems,) ſpare the King himſelf, for he required of him the Caſtle of Rocheſter, as belonging to the See of Canterbury.

Anno Dom. MCLXIII.

The Archbiſhop pretends a Right to preſent to all vacant Benefices in all Towns both of his Barons and Monks.

He Excommunicates William de Eynesford, a Tenant in Capite.

But afterwards Abſolves him to pacify the King.

Yet he ſpares not the King himſelf.

But Edward Ryme, a Clerk or Chaplain to this Archbiſhop (who has written an Account of his Life and Death ſtill in Manuſcript) gives us ſomewhat a different Account of the Original of this Quarrel, between the King and the Archbiſhop, to this Effect; That the King being at Woodſtock with the Archbiſhop, among other Matters, a Queſtion was ſtarted concerning a certain Cuſtom which was then obſerved in England, viz. That out of every Hyde of Land Two Shillings were paid to thoſe Officers, who as Under-Sheriffs kept the * Counties, i. e. the County-Courts; which Tax or Payment the King would have added to his * Exchequer, and made a part of his own Revenues: But the Archbiſhop oppoſed this to his face, ſaying, They ought not to be exacted as Royal Revenues; neither (ſaid he) My Lord the King, by your good leave ſhall we pay it on that account; but if the Sheriffs or Inferior Miniſters of the Counties, who defend and maintain our Tenents, do worthily perform their Duty, we ſhall not be wanting to their Aſſiſtance; but the King taking the Archbiſhop's Anſwer very ill, Replied, By God's Eyes (his uſual Oath) it ſhall be paid as part of my Revenue, and ſhall be * enter'd in my Accounts, neither is it well done of you to contradict it, when no body would unjuſtly burthen your Tenants againſt your Will; but the Archbiſhop being very fearful, leaſt by his Connivance a Cuſtom ſhould be introduced, by which the Payment of that Tax might become a Precedent, Replied, My Lord the King, In Reverence to thoſe Eyes, by which you have now ſworn, not one penny ſhall be raiſed on my Lands by * Law on that account; Upon this the King held his peace, being confounded at the Archbiſhop's Reply; but his ſecret diſpleaſure was not the leſs againſt him; and with this Relation alſo Quadrilogus agrees, though it be ſomewhat ſhorter in this particular.

The Kings Anſwer.

The Archbiſhop's Reply.

[2.] But long before this, in the time of Archbiſhop Theobald, the King had been much incenſed through the Inſolence and Wicked Actions of divers of the Clergy, who had committed ſeveral Robberies, Adulteries, and Murders, as alſo through the irregular Proceedings of ſome Archdeacons, who had by taking Money of Offenders, turned other mens Crimes to their own Advantage; the particular Inſtances of which being many and tedious, I ſhall only extract ſome of them for

But long before this the King had been incenſed againſt the Wickedneſs and Corruption of the Clergy, whom the Bp. would not ſuffer to be Tried in the Secular Courts.

for the Reader's ſatisfaction, that ſo he may the better judge of the Grounds of this great Quarrel between the King and the Archbiſhop.

[3.] F. S. Ib. One Clerk guilty of Fornication and Murder.

[3.] There was a Clerk in Worceſterſhire, that had Debauched an honeſt man's Daughter, and afterwards Killed her Father; this man the King would have had Tried in his Secular Court; but the Archbiſhop would not permit it, but cauſed him to be kept in the Priſon of the Biſhop of the Dioceſs, leaſt he ſhould be delivered over to the King's Juſtices.

[4.] Id. Ib. Another of Theft and Sacrilege.

[4.] Another Clerk had ſtole a Silver Chalice out of a Church in London; this man the King would likewiſe have had Tried in the Secular Court; but the Archbiſhop cauſed him to be Tried in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, where he was only Sentenced to be degraded, and, to pacify the King, to be branded in the Face with a Hot Iron.

[5.] Id. Ib. The King holds a great Council of Biſhops at Weſtminſter, to remedy theſe Enormities.

[5.] The King being much provoked by theſe and ſeveral other Enormities of the Clergy, reſolved to put a ſtop to them, and to apply a ſpeedy Remedy to ſo ſpreading a Diſeaſe; and therefore holding a Great Council at Weſtminſter, he demanded of the Archbiſhop, and all the reſt of the Biſhops, That by their Conſent and Allowance ſuch Clerks as were Taken in the Fact, or were Convicted, or had confeſſed any Enormous Crime, ſhould firſt be degraded, and forthwith delivered over to Secular Officers, in order to be corporally puniſhed, and not have any Protection from the Church; he demanded alſo, That when any Clerk was degraded, ſome of his Miniſters of Juſtice might be preſent to take him into Cuſtody, that ſo he might not fly, to eſcape puniſhment.

[1.] Id. Ib. The private Conference between the Archbiſhop and the reſt of the Biſhops, about delivering over Clerks to the Secular Power. They were for degrading, and then delivering them over, &c. But the Archbiſhop ſaid it was againſt the Canons. And adds, That they ought not to deſtroy the Liberties of the Church. But they were for complying for fear of loſing their Temporalities. Biſhops not to be preſent at any Sentence of Blood.

[1.] The Archbiſhop not being able to obtain leave to defer his Anſwer to theſe demands ſo much as till the next Morning, went preſently apart with the Biſhops, and Diſcourſed the Matter, who were all of Opinion, That indeed according to the Secular Law, Clerks were to be degraded, and then delivered over to the Temporal Court to be corporally puniſhed, which they proved not only by Law, but Authentick Examples out of the Old Teſtament; but the Archbiſhop, adhering to the Canons of the Roman Church, thought otherwiſe, aſſerting, That it was unjuſt and againſt the Laws Eccleſiaſtical, that Clergymen ſhould be ſubject to the Lay-power, but ought to be only deprived of their Orders for ſuch great Crimes, and not to be any farther puniſhed; ſince no man ſhould be doubly puniſhed by Two ſeveral Courts for the ſame Crime; adding withal, That they ought to be very careful, not to deſtroy the Liberties of the Church by their own Conſents, for which, from the Example of Chriſt their High-Prieſt, they were in Duty bound to contend unto the Death; the Biſhops Replied, That the Church was in no danger if they ſhould conſent to what the King demanded, and that they ought to yield to the Iniquity of the Times, (as they called it,) leaſt the King ſhould ſeize upon all their Temporalities; but the Archbiſhop perſiſted in his Opinion, and told them, They ought not to expoſe any man to Death, ſeeing they could not themſelves be preſent at a Sentence of Blood; with ſeveral other Arguments according to the Notions of that Age, too long here to be particularly related.

[2.] Id. Ib. The Biſhop's Anſwer to the King's demands.

[2.] The King finding himſelf not likely to prevail in this, demanded of them, if they would obſerve his Royal Cuſtoms or Prerogatives?

The

The Archbiſhop Anſwered, Yes, Saving their Order by, and in all things; Then the King asked the ſame thing of every other Biſhop, and they all gave him the ſame Anſwer, at which he was ſo highly provoked, that he left them, and went away ſuddenly that Night to Woodſtock.

Anno Dom. MCLXIII.

* Salvo Ordine per omnia, & in omnibus.

The King in anger leaves them, and goes immediately to Woodſtock.

They follow him, and conſent to acknowledg his Laws.

The Biſhops fearful of his Diſpleaſure, followed him; and at Oxford, (tho Rog. Hoveden makes it at Woodſtock) conſented to acknowledg his Laws, without any ſaving of their Order; yet the Archbiſhop was immoveable, ſaying, Far be it from me, that for the fear or favour of any Mortal man, I ſhould be found to contemn God; if an Angel ſhould come from Heaven, and give me advice to make ſuch an abſolute acknowledgment, I would curſe him. But the Author of Quadrilogus owns, That the Archbiſhop being at laſt overcome by the importunity and intreaties of the Biſhops of Chicheſter and Hereford, conſented to the like acknowledgment, without that ſaving Clauſe which had given ſo much Offence. The King at this ſeemed pacified for the preſent, however, he reſolved to have their Conſents to his Cuſtoms, ratified in a Common Council of the whole Kingdom.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

[3.] C. G. Id. p. R. H. 282. b. The King calls a Genetal Council at Clarendon, to have his Antient Regal Rights Owned and Recognized.

[3.] And to this end, that he might the better aſſert the Rights of the Crown, he called a General Council at Clarendon, about the Feaſt of St. Hilary, in which he propounded to the Biſhops and Secular Barons, many Antient Regal Cuſtoms and Laws, which he would have the Biſhops to own and Recognize, as the Antient Rights of the Crown; which Laws being commonly called the Conſtitutions or Ordinances of Clarendon, ſince they are printed in the Hiſtory called Quadrilogus, as alſo in Chronicon Gervaſii, and likewiſe in Matt. Paris, and being very long, I ſhall refer the Reader to the end of this King's Reign, where he will find them ſet down at large, with a Note under each of thoſe, that the Pope afterwards took upon him to condemn; for they are very well worth the peruſal, becauſe they contain the chief Prerogatives and Privileges that were then Claim'd, as well by the King as the Clergy.

But to return to our Hiſtory.

[4.] Idem ib. The Conſtitutions conſented to by all the Biſhops ore tenus.

[4.] Theſe Conſtitutions being openly read in the preſence of all the Biſhops, who conſented to them by word of mouth, they were then required to put to their Seals; at firſt they ſeemed willing enough to do it, but the Archbiſhop utterly refuſed it; whereupon the King ſent to him the Earls of Cornwal and Leiceſter, to perſuade him to acknowledg them; but they not prevailing, at laſt Two Knights-Templars (one whereof was the Maſter of the Order) throwing themſelves at his Feet with many Tears and great Importunity, ſo wrought upon him, That he promiſed without Fraud or any Reſervation or Saving, really to receive and ſubmit to the King's Antient Laws. But Fitz-Stephens relates more at large, That the Two laſt Meſſengers with Tears laid before him the danger he was in, and what ill conſequences his ſtanding out might produce, and that then for fear of Death, as well as to appeaſe the King, both the Archbiſhop and all the Biſhops conſented to thoſe Laws, and Recognized them under their Seals; and the King afterwards ſent them to the Pope to be Confirmed, who not only refuſed to do it, but Caſſated and Condemned them.

And at laſt the Archbiſhop and all the Biſhops Recognized them under their Seals.

[5.] F. S. But the Archbiſhop repents of what he had done.

[5.] Then the Archbiſhop, by the ſevere Reproof and Admonition of one of his Chaplains, ſoon repented of this Act, and made his Body ſuffer a ſevere Penance for it; nay, he thought it ſo heinous an an Offence, and which ſo much defiled him, that he was not fit to ſay Maſs, or to appear before the Altar; and therefore he ſuſpended himſelf from that Service for ſome Weeks, untill by his Confeſſion and Penance he thought he might be worthy the Pope's Abſolution, which he obtained without any great difficulty.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

[1] R H. The Pope ſends the Archbiſhop of Roüen over from France to compoſe theſe differences, and what the reſult thereof.

[1.] Nor can I here omit, that during this Controverſy between the King and the Archbiſhop, the Pope, being ſtill in France, ſent over Rotrod Archbiſhop of Roüen on purpoſe to compoſe theſe differences, which the King would by no means hearken to, unleſs the Pope would firſt conſent to confirm his Laws by his Bull, which he refuſed; and when the King ſaw he could not obtain it, he ſent over John of Oxford, and Geoffery-Ridel (two of his Clerks or Chaplains) to prevail with the Pope, to conſtitute Roger Archbiſhop of York his Legate throughout all England, that ſo by this means he might confound the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but though the Pope would not grant the King this requeſt; yet that he might ſatisfy him in part, he then ſent him a power of being Legate himſelf, provided he did thereby no injury to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which Bull or Commiſſion, when the King ſaw how little it ſignified for his purpoſe, he ſent it back again to the Pope by the ſame hands, that brought it him.

[2.] Ib. G. D. The Quarrell between them daily increaſed: The Archbiſhop reſolves to leave England, and twice attempted it, but detained by contrary winds, he goes to Canterbury.

[2.] The quarrel between the King and the Archbiſhop daily encreaſing, and he now deſpairing of his Friendſhip, and apprehending himſelf in much greater danger then he really was, reſolved to leave England privately; ſo going to Rumney (a Town of his own) he twice put to Sea, but either had no Wind at all, or elſe a contrary one; and therefore being forced to come again on Shoar, he went in the night to Canterbury; at which News the King was much pleaſed, being afraid that if he had got beyond Sea, he would have put his whole Province under an Interdict; yet was he ſo much incenſed againſt the Archbiſhop for this raſh attempt, that not long after, when he came to Woodſtock to ſpeak with the King about it, he would not give him admittance, ſo that the Archbiſhop receiving a repulſe, was fain to return to Canterbury.

Comes to ſpeak with the King at Woodſtock, but is denied admittance.

[3.] Id Ib. F. S. The King Summons the Biſhops and Great men to meet at Northampton.

Then the King ſuſpecting he might eſcape unpuniſhed, ſummon'd the Biſhops and Great Men to meet at Northampton on the 13th day of October. Edward Ryme's Account ſays, That the King reſolving to hold a Solemn Council at the Caſtle of Northampton, cauſed all thoſe that held of him in Capite to ſummon'd thither, and the Archbiſhop in the firſt place; this was about the beginning of October; but the exact day is not material, nor can our Hiſtorians agree about it; only this much is certain, that the Council being then met, the King let fall the firſt Controverſy with the Archbiſhop about his refuſing to obſerve the Statutes of Clarendon, and fell to New Accuſations againſt him, which ſeeming to be done out of pure Revenge, afterwards gave the Archbiſhop a great advantage over Him when his cauſe came to be heard before the Pope; for firſt the King cauſed the Archbiſhop to be accuſed for denying Juſtice to one John the Mareſchal of the Exchequer, and afterwards for a Contempt in refuſing to appear at the King's Court, to ſhew cauſe why he had not done this John due Juſtice. The cauſe in ſhort was this; John had demanded of the Archbiſhop a Mannor or Farm, which (as he ſaid) the Archbiſhop unjuſtly

And brings new Accuſations againſt the Archbiſhop.

For denying Juſtice to one John the Mareſchal of the Exchequer, and for refuſing to appear at the King's Court.

juſtly detain'd from him, and finding he could have no Right in his Court, he brought down thither the King's Writ to remove the Cauſe into that of the King's, whither the Archbiſhop being cited to anſwer it, had fail'd to appear at the day appointed, for reaſons I ſhall give you by and by. Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

[4.] The King being very angry that he appeared not in perſon, at the requeſt of this John the Plaintiff, he appointed another day (to wit) the firſt day of the next Council, and ſent his Writ to the Sheriff of Kent to cite the Archbiſhop, for the King did not write to him, becauſe he would not ſalute him; nor had he any other ſolemn Summons by writ to come to the Council * according to antient cuſtom.

[4.] E. R. The King angry that he appeared not in perſon.

And is cited a new by the Sherif of Kent, and then appears in the K's. Court.

* Ut antiqui moris erat.

But it happened that the Cauſe was that day put off, by reaſon of John's abſence at London about the King's affairs (as being an Officer in the Exchequer.) The next day the Archbiſhop was again accuſed, that he had not done Juſtice to John in his Suit; to which He preſently anſwer'd, That he had done him true Juſtice, and had not wilfully declined the Authority of the King's Court, becauſe John had not taken his Oath upon the Goſpels (as was requiſite) but upon an Old Tropaz or Song-Book, which he drew out from under his Coat; and that if being cited, he had not appeared in the King's Court, it was no contempt, becauſe he was then detain'd at home by Sickneſs, and had ſent Two lawful men to make his Excuſe on this account: Fitz Stephens repreſents the Archbiſhop to have made another kind of Plea, viz. that tho he came not at the day, yet he had ſent to the King Four Knights with his Letters, as alſo a Letter from the Sheriff of Kent; atteſting the Injury of John, and the imperfection of his proof, (viz. as I ſaid before) becauſe he had Sworn upon the Tropaz, and not upon the Goſpels. This is the Relation theſe Authors make of this Affair; But tho it ſeems improbable, that John ſhould preſume to Swear upon a Song-Book inſtead of the Goſpels, yet ſince they are only thoſe of the Archbiſhop's Party who have left us any account of theſe matters, we muſt reſt contented with what we find in them, having no other Authors to recurr to.

But the Cauſe was put off to another day.

The Archbiſhop's Anſwer to John the Mareſchal's complaint.

And excuſes his non-appearance by reaſon of ſickneſs.

But let the Archbiſhop's Plea have been what it would, [2.] his Crime being made no leſs than that of * Læſæ Majeſtatis, by which expreſſion whether is meant Treaſon, or only a High Contempt, or Miſdemeanour, I will not determine, but the King demanded Judgment upon it; and it ſeemed to all there preſent, from the Reverence due to the King's Majeſty, as alſo by the Bond of Leige Homage, that the Archbiſhop had made, and from the Oath of Fidelity, which he had Sworn to him, that he had failed in his own defence; whereupon his Plea being over-ruled, they all condemned him to be in the King's Mercy for all his moveable Goods. Upon this Judgment a ſharp Diſpute aroſe between the Biſhops and the Barons, who of them ſhould pronounce the Sentence, for Each Order excuſing themſelves, would fain have laid it upon the Other, and One of the Barons ſaid, 'You Biſhops ought to pronounce Sentence, 'for it belongs not to us, We are only Laymen, You Eccleſiaſtical perſons, 'his fellow Prieſts and fellow Biſhops; to whom one of the Biſhop, anſwered, 'No, it is rather Your Office than Ours, for this is not an 'Eccleſiaſtical Sentence, but a Secular; We ſit not here as Biſhops but 'Barons;

[2.] F. S. * Læſæ Majeſtatis.

The King demands Judgment upon him.

Diſputes between the Biſhops and the Barons about pronouncing the Sentence.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

'Barons; We are Barons and You are Barons; We are all Peers (or 'Equals) here; nor can you impoſe it upon our Order, for if you have 'reſpect to that Character in us, You ought alſo to have regard to the 'ſame in him; and then as we are Biſhops we cannot Judge our Arch-'biſhop and Lord.

[1.] Id. The Biſhop of Wincheſter, by the King's Order, pronounces it.

[1.] The King hearing of this Controverſie about pronouncing the Sentence, quickly decided this matter by laying it upon the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who, tho with great Reluctance, was forced to pronounce it; thereupon the Archbiſhop (becauſe no man might contradict a Sentence or Judgment which is a Record made in the King's Court,) by advice of the Biſhops ſubmitted to it, and by a ſeeming complyance, for the mitigation of the King's Diſpleaſure, threw himſelf upon his Mercy, as the cuſtom was: then all the Biſhops, except Gilbert Biſhop of London who refuſed it, became ſureties for him.

[2.] Id. Ib. The ſame day, after the Sentence, he was proſecuted for 300 l. His plea to it. The King demands Judgment, and the Archbiſhop gives ſecurity for the Mony.

[2.] After this the very ſame day the Archbiſhop was proſecuted for Three Hundred Pounds he had received, as he was Caſtellan, or Conſtable, of the Caſtles of Eye in Suffolk, and Berkhamſtead in Hertfordſhire; the Archbiſhop waved this action by pleading, that he was not cited for that matter, and further ſaid, that he had diſburſed much more money than that in the Reparations of the King's Palace at London, and likewiſe of thoſe Caſtles, as might be ſeen by his Accounts; yet the King would not admit of his Plea, but demanded Judgment; Hereupon the Archbiſhop, to pleaſe the King, and not being willing that ſuch a ſmall ſum of Money ſhould be the cauſe of any further difference between them, gave Security for it, by Three Laymen, (viz.) the Earl of Gloceſter, and Two others his Tenants.

[3.] Ib. Id. He is proſecuted for 1000. Marks more, and ſeveral other ſums he had receiv'd when Chancellour.

[3.] On the Third day after he was again proſecuted at the King's Suit for Five Hundred Marks, which had been lent him in the Army of Tholoſe, and for another Five Hundred, which he had borrowed of a Jew upon the King's Security; he was likewiſe proſecuted for all the profits of the Archbiſhoprick of York, and other Biſhopricks and Abbies, that were void during his Chancellorſhip, of all which he was Commanded forthwith to give an Account; the Archbiſhop replyed, He came not now prepared to anſwer theſe matters, nor was he cited there concerning them; but in due time and place he would do to his Lord the King according to Right: yet the King ſtill exacted further Security of him; upon this the Archbiſhop anſwered, He ought firſt to have the advice of his Suffragans and Clerks about it, to which the King yielded; and ſo the Archbiſhop departed from the Court, and from that day neither the Barons, nor other Knights came any more to his Houſe to viſit him, having ſufficiently underſtood the King's mind by theſe proceedings.

Deſires firſt to have the advice of his Suffragans.

[4] Id. Ib.

[4.] On the Fourth day all the Eccleſiaſticks came to the Archbiſhop's Houſe, where he treated with the Biſhops ſeverally and apart, and with the Abbats ſeverally and a-part; the Biſhop of Wincheſter adviſed him to offer a Compoſition in Money, and to try the King that way; there were 2000 Marks tender'd, tho' not accepted; in the mean while Others encourag'd him reſolutely to maintain the Liberties of the Church, he being, upon his Advancement to the Archbiſhoprick, thereby diſcharged of all Secular Demands: but moſt of of them perſwaded him to comply with the King, and put himſelf on his Mercy: And Edward Ryme his Relation further adds, That the Biſhop of Wincheſter, out of ſeeming kindneſs told him, That in his Opinion, for the appeaſing of the King's Anger, his beſt way would be to ſurrender up the Archbiſhoprick into his hands; but the Archbiſhop proteſted with an Oath, That he would never give up his Archbiſhoprick ſo long as he could keep it; nor had he taken it on that Condition, ever to ſurrender it, whilſt he lived; yet notwithſtanding all this, he afterwards did reſign it into the Pope's hands, as you will find anon.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

They adviſe a Complyance.

Wincheſter perſwades him to ſurrender his Archbiſhoprick, but the Archbiſhop proteſts againſt that with an Oath. But afterwards reſigned it to the Pope.

On the Fifth day, [5.] being Sunday, 'tis ſaid the Barons ſate in a cloſe Conſultation; but the reſult of their Debates and Reſolutions are not mentioned. On the Sixth day the Archbiſhop fell ſick of the Colick, proceeding (as 'tis ſuppoſed) from the great agitation and trouble of his Mind; then the King hearing of it, ſent ſome of his Earls and Barons to viſit him, and to know his Reſolutions, Whether he would give ſecurity to render an Account of what he had received from the vacant Churches in the time of his Chancellorſhip, and ſtand to the Judgment of his Court in that matter, or not; the Archbiſhop anſwer'd by the Biſhops, That if he was not hindered by Sickneſs, he would come the next day to Court, and do what he ought in that affair.

[5.] Id. Ib. The King demands ſecurity of him. And to ſtand to the Judgment of his Court. The Archbiſhop ſaid, If not hindred by ſickneſs, he would.

[1.] The next day being ſomewhat better, he came thither according to his promiſe; but ſo ſoon as he enter'd the Caſtle, he took the Croſs from its Bearer into his own hands, in order to ſecure his Perſon from any Inſult or Violence that might be offer'd him; but when he came into the Room where they were to wait the King's pleaſure, and had ſate down with the reſt of the Biſhops, the Biſhop of London perſwaded him to deliver the Croſs to its uſual Bearer, leſt he might be thought to intend ſome Diſturbance in the Kingdom; but the Archbiſhop would not hearken to that Propoſition, which produc'd hard words between Him and the Biſhops of London and Wincheſter. Then the reſt of the Biſhops being call'd, they waited on the King, who was retir'd in an Inward Room, where they ſtayed with him a long time, as did alſo Roger Archbiſhop of York, who came laſt, that ſo he might not be ſuſpected to be One of the King's private Counſellors and Adviſers. In the mean time the Archbiſhop attended in the Outward Room with the Croſs ſtill in his hand, whilſt the Earls and Barons were with the King.

[1] Id. ib. R. H. And comes accordingly, bearing the Croſs himſelf, to ſecure his Perſon from any Inſult or Violence.

The Biſhops in this Conference inform'd the King, That the Archbiſhop, when he laſt adviſed with them, told them, They had uſed him very hardly, and that the Barons had not Sentenc'd him according to Juſtice, but after an unheard-of manner; ſince for one ſingle *Abſence, or Omiſſion, which was (at moſt) but a Default, and not a wilful Contumacy, they ought not to have inflicted ſuch a heavy Puniſhment upon him, as the forfeiture of his Moveables to the King, and to be alſo in his Mercy; and that being an Inhabitant of Kent, he ought to have been Sentenced and Fined according to the Law of that Country, where Forty ſhillings was a ſufficient Fine for thoſe that were Sentenc'd for ſuch a Default; and the Biſhops added further, That this very day the Archbiſhop had told them, he had now appealed to the Pope againſt that Sentence, and by his Authority forbad them them for the future to Judge him in any Secular Matter he had done before he was Archbiſhop.

[2.] Id. ib. The K mightily diſturb'd at this Appeal.

[2.] The King was very much moved at this Relation, and ſent the Earls and Barons to know of him, whether he had indeed made this Appeal and Prohibition, or not; eſpecially ſeeing he was his Leige-man and bound to him by a particular Oath at Clarendon, that he would ſincerely and legally obſerve his Royal Prerogatives, amongſt which this was one, That the Biſhops ſhould be preſent at all his Tryals or Judgments, except thoſe of Blood. They were alſo farther to know of him, whether he would give Pledges to ſtand to the Judgment of the King's Court concerning the account of his Chancellorſhip?

He is requir'd to give Pledges to abide by the Judgment of the King's Court.

[3.] Id. His Anſwer to the whole Accuſation.

[3.] To all which Demands, he made anſwer to this effect, "That "he was indeed bound to the King by Leige-Homage, and Oath of Fealty, yet the Oath was chiefly Sacerdotal; and that tho in reſpect to God "he was in all due obedience and ſubjection obliged to obſerve, honour and maintain Fidelity towards him, yet it was ſtill, ſaving "his Obedience to God, and that Epiſcopal Reſpect due to his perſon, and "that he only declined this Suit, becauſe he was not cited to give an "account upon any other cauſe, then that of John the Mareſchal; neither was he bound to make anſwer, or hear Sentence in any other "matter: he confeſſed, he had received many Offices and Dignities from the King, in all which he had faithfully ſerved him "as well in England as beyond Sea, and had ſpent his own Revenues in his Service, and for the ſame had contracted many Debts; "As to his putting in Pledges or Security to render an account, that "he conceived he ought not to be compelled to, becauſe he was not "adjudged to do it, nor had he any Citation as to matter of Account, or any other except that of John the Mareſchal: And as to "the Appeal and Prohibition, he had that day made before the Biſhops "he did acknowledge that he told them, that for meer Abſence, "and not Contumacy, they had unjuſtly condemned him, contrary "to the Cuſtom and Example of former times; wherefore he now "Appealed, and forbad them (depending that Appeal) to Judge "him in any ſecular accuſation, concerning things done before "he was Archbiſhop; wherefore according to his Appeal he put his "Perſon and the Church of Canterbury under the protection of God, "and his Lord the Pope.

Puts his Perſon & Church under the Pope's protection.

[4] Id. The K. would have had the Biſhops, &c. declare the Sentence againſt the Archbiſhop.

* Dicent Sententiam But they fear his Prohibition.

[4.] The King having received this Anſwer, urged the Biſhops by the Homage they had done, and the Fealty they had ſworn to him, that together with the Barons they would * tell him what Sentence ought to be paſt on the Archbiſhop: But they began to excuſe themſelves by reaſon of his late Prohibition; at which the King was not ſatisfied, but ſaid, That this Prohibition ought not to hold good againſt what was done and ſworn to at Clarendon: they replyed, if they ſhould not obey his Prohibition, the Archbiſhop would proceed to a further Cenſure againſt them, and that for the good of the King and Kingdom, they muſt obey it; yet at length by his perſuaſion they went again to the Archbiſhop.

[5.] Id. The Bp of Chicheſter repreſents to him the Streights they were driven to by this his Prohibition.

[5.] Then the Biſhop of Chicheſter told him, That by this Prohibition he had reduced the Biſhops to a very great ſtreight, ſince if they did not obey it, they were guilty of diſobedience to the Pope, and if they did obey it, they were then guilty of breaking the late Conſtitutions ſtitutions of Clarendon, and lay thereby expoſed to the King's diſpleaſure; for the non-obſervance of his Prerogatives, which, leaſt they might doubt what they were, he had ſhew'd them thoſe Royal Cuſtoms of which he ſpake in writing, and that they had then given their aſſent to them; the Archbiſhop himſelf firſt, and afterwards all his Suffragans by his Command; and that when the King preſſed them to Swear to what they had promiſed, and ſet to their Seals for the Confirmation of, they had anſwered, that That alone ought to ſuffice, inſtead of an Oath, that they had ſaid in the word of Truth, in good Faith, without deceit, and according to Law, they would obſerve them: why do you then forbid us to be preſent at that Sentence, which the King Commands us? upon this Grievance and leaſt you may add any thing to our prejudice, We alſo will appeal to the Pope, though for this time we give Obedience to your Prohibition.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

And the Promiſes they had made to the King to obſerve the Conſtitutions of Clarendon, even by the Archbiſhop's own Command.

"The Archbiſhop anſwered, he would be preſent at the proſecuti-
"on of the Appeal, and that there was nothing done at Clarendon
"either by them or himſelf, in which their Eccleſiaſtical Honour was "not ſaved: 'Twas true, (he ſaid) they had promiſed in good Faith,
"without Deceit, and according to law, to obſerve thoſe Decrees, yet by
"thoſe general words the Dignities of their Churches, which they held "by the Pontifical or Cannon Law, were ſafe, for whatſoever was a-
"gainſt the true Faith of the Church, and againſt the Laws of God,
"could not in good faith, or, according to Law, be obſerved. Alſo
"that a Chriſtian King had no Prerogative, by the Exerciſe whereof
"the Liberties of the Church (which he had ſworn to maintain) "might receive any prejudice. Moreover thoſe, which they called "Royal Prerogatives, being ſent to the Pope to be confirmed, were "brought back rather diſapproved, for but few of them were allow"ed by him; and that he had thereby ſhewn them what they "ought to do, in being ready to receive the Decrees of the Roman "Church, and to refuſe whatever ſhe refuſed: yet further, if they had "failed in any thing at Clarendon, (ſince the fleſh is weak) they "ought to take freſh courage, and by vertue of the Holy Spirit
"to ſtrive againſt the old Enemy, who endeavours, that he who
"ſtands may fall, and that he who hath fallen may not riſe again:
"If therefore they had promiſed any unjuſt things there, or con"firmed them in the Word of Truth, they knew ſuch unlawful Sti"pulations do not oblige.

The Archbiſhop's Anſwer to his Remonſtrance.

Notes.

This is the Sum of that Speech which our Author tells us the Archbiſhop made in his own behalf: but to come again to the Hiſtory.

[1.] The Biſhops return'd to the King well ſatisfied, as being excuſed from Judging the Archbiſhop: and ſo they ſate apart from the Barons concern'd in that affair. Then certain Sheriffs and antient *Barons of a Second Rank or Dignity were call'd forth, that being added to the former, they might alſo ſit in Judgment upon him. And after a little while, the Earl of Leiceſter preſſed ſome of them to pronounce the Sentence, but they all refuſed it; whereupon he began to repeat the buſineſs of Clarendon very particularly, (as the Biſhop of Chicheſter had done before,) and would have made the Archbiſhop guilty of Treaſon, and Breach of the Faith he had given in verbo Veritatis; and then deſir'd the Archbiſhop to hear his Sentence, he being now preſent.

[1.] Id. The Biſhops excuſed from pronouncing Sentence.

The E. of Leiceſter takes it upon himſelf.

[4.] But

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

[2] Id. But the Archbiſhop refuſes to hear it.

[2.] But the Archbiſhop could not forbear any longer, but ſaid, "What is it ye mean to do? Come ye hither to Judge me? ye know ye ought not to do it. Judgment is a Sentence given after the Controverſy or Tryal; I have ſaid nothing this day in the Cauſe: I have been cited for no Cauſe but that of John the Mareſchal, who durſt not try it with me, and therefore you cannot Judge me: I am your Spiritual Father, ye are Noblemen of the King's Court, and meer Laymen, I will not hear your Judgment: So the Noblemen withdrew, and the Archbiſhop went his way to the Monaſtery of St. Andrews in Northampton, (a Houſe of Chanons Regular) and one Herbert and our Author William Fitz-Stephens then waited on him as his Clerks or Chaplains.

And goes to his Lodging at the Monaſtery of St. Andrews.

And this is the Account that he gives us of theſe Tranſactions between King Henry and the Archbiſhop at this Meeting; which tho' they are very particular in Some points, yet are they defective in Others, which are alſo as fit to be taken notice of: For [3.] Roger Hoveden and Edward Ryme, in his Manuſcript Hiſtory, further relates, That the Archbiſhop being privately advertiſed by his Friends, that ſome deſigned his Death, or at leaſt to do him a conſiderable miſchief, the day before his departure from Northampton, being that morning to go to Court, he firſt ſung a Maſs at the Altar of St. Stephen, to implore the Aſſiſtance of that Saint, as if himſelf expected Martyrdom; and that when he had done, laying aſide his Mitre and Pal, and putting on a Hood with a black Canonical Gown, he went to Court. And the latter of theſe Authors, after the Account of his taking the Croſs from the Bearer, and carrying it himſelf, adds, That when the Biſhops, who waited for his coming, ſaw this, they much admir'd at it, and would needs have taken it (as out of Reverence) to hold it for him, leſt he ſhould provoke the King's Anger againſt him, by thus entring after an unuſual manner with that Spiritual Weapon into his Preſence; but the Biſhops of London and Hereford both ſtriving to wreſt it out of his hand, the Archbiſhop was ſo far from delivering it, that he held it the faſter, which produced ſome hard words between the Biſhop of London and him; then Roger Archbiſhop of York reproved him very ſharply, that he ſhould preſume to come to Court thus armed with his Croſs, ſaying, That notwithſtanding he would find that the King carried much the ſharper Weapon of the Two, and therefore gave him advice to lay aſide his Croſs; but the Archbiſhop would not hearken to it, but told him, That though the King's Weapon might kill the Body, yet his own (viz. that of Excommunication) could deſtroy the Soul, and ſend it to Hell.

[3] P. 283.

The Archbiſhop privately informed, that ſome conſiderable Miſchief was deſigned him.

[4.] Col. 1392.

[4.] Gervaſe alſo gives a much fuller Account than any of the Reſt of what paſſed between the King and the Biſhops, concerning this Affair of the Archbiſhop, and their Reſolutions upon it; and likewiſe of the Proceedings that followed them, to this effect: That the King, being in the next Room, and hearing what had happen'd, was much incens'd at it, and preſently retired into an Inner Chamber with the Biſhops and Lords, whilſt the Archbiſhop, and thoſe few that attended him, remained without; then the King highly complained to the Biſhops and Lords of the Archbiſhop's proceedings, in coming thus armed into his Court; upon which the Biſhop's Enemies going out, conſulted together in what manner they might deal with him; who when when they had all agreed, returned, and told the King, That they were now reſolved to bring an Appeal againſt him before the Pope, and being there convicted, he would certainly be depoſed, which pleaſed the King very well. Upon this they all went out to the Archbiſhop, and Hilary, Biſhop of Chicheſter, being bolder and more eloquent than the reſt, ſpoke to him to this effect: "That being their "Archbiſhop, they had been hitherto bound to obey him; yet ſince "he had ſworn Fealty to his Lord the King to preſerve his Life and "Royal Dignity, and to maintain thoſe Cuſtoms or Prerogatives he "required, which he (the Archbiſhop) then endeavoured to deſtroy, They therefore pronounced him guilty of Perjury, and for the future thought themſelves not obliged to obey a perjur'd Archbiſhop; wherefore putting themſelves under the protection of the Pope, they cited him to his Preſence, there to anſwer concerning theſe Matters; to whom the Archbiſhop ſaid no more than this, I hear what you ſay.

They reſolve to appeal to the Pope, in order to get him depoſed.

And they appeal to the Pope.

Then the Archbiſhop retired, and ſate down over-againſt them in great Silence, whilſt in the mean time the King, with the Great Men of the Kingdom, ſate in Council concerning him: the Reſult of which was, That the King, by ſome of his Knights, commanded him without any delay to appear and give a full Account of whatſoever he had received of the Revenues of the Crown, whilſt he was Chancellor, and in particular of Thirty thouſand Pounds of Silver; to which the Archbiſhop replyed, "The King himſelf knew that he had already given "an account of all thoſe Summs which he had now demanded, be"fore he was Elected Archbiſhop: and that upon his Election Henry, "the King's Son, with all the Barons of the Exchequer, and Richard "de Lucy, Juſtitiary of England, had pronounced him clear and ac"quitted before God, of all Receipts and Accounts whatſoever due "to the King; and ſo being free and diſcharged, he was Elected to "the Adminiſtration of his Office; therefore he refuſed to make any "other Plea to thoſe demands. But when the King was inform'd of this Anſwer, he ſpake thus to his Barons: Do me ſpeedy Juſtice upon him, for he is my Liege-man, and yet refuſes to ſtand to the Judgment of my [a] Court; thereupon they all going out, Judged him worthy to be ſeized, and committed to Priſon. After this Sentence, the King ſent Reginald Earl of Cornwall, and Robert E. of Leiceſter, to acquaint him with the Judgment that had been paſſed upon him; but when they deſired him to hear his Sentence read, "he forbad them under the pain of an "Anathema to pronounce Judgment againſt him, becauſe he had ap"pealed to his Lord the Pope; and further told the Earl of Leiceſter, "That by the Power committed to himſelf by God, he commanded "him as a Son of the Church, not to preſume to give Judgment "againſt him as being his Spiritual Father." But whilſt theſe Earls returned to the King with his Anſwer, the Archbiſhop went out of the Room through the midſt of the Company, to his Horſe, and mounting upon it, left the Court, though all that ſtood without cried after him, ſaying, Traytor, whither goeſt thou? ſtay, and hear thy Judgment. When he came to the Outward Gates, and found them ſhut againſt him, he was afraid then he ſhould be ſeized; but One of his Servants perceiving the Keys hanging near the Door, ſnatched them up, and opened the Gate, and ſo the Archbiſhop got away, whilſt the [5.] Then the Archbiſhop return'd to the Abbey above-mention'd, attended by a vaſt Crowd of ordinary People; and ſo ſoon as he got home, he Commanded Supper to be ſet upon the Table, and all the Poor who were before the Gate to be brought in, with whom He and his Family did eat; whilſt he was at Meat, the Biſhop of London and Chicheſter coming to him (out of ſeeming good-will) told him, They had now found out a way how he might make his Peace with the King, and being asked by the Archbiſhop what it was? they anſwered, "That if he would make over to the King (for a time only by way "of Mortgage) his Two Mannors of Otford and Wengham in Kent, "the King would be pacified, and remit all the Money he claimed "from him, and would alſo the ſooner reſtore him to his Favour: "But the Archbiſhop replyed, That he would rather venture the Loſs "of his Head (which he then touched with his hand) than part with "any of the Lands of the Church to buy his own Peace; whereupon "the Biſhops went away much diſcontented, and this Refuſal aggravated the King's diſpleaſure againſt him.

But the A. Bp. would rather venture his Head, than ſo buy his Peace.

[1.] Id. p. 8.

[1.] As ſoon as the Biſhops were gone, Two Noblemen of good Intereſt and Favour came to him privately, and told him, they were inform'd, that ſome Men of Quality had conſpired his Death, and bound themſelves by Oath to ſee it executed; which he believing, reſolved, if he could, to defeat their deſign, and preſerve himſelf by a ſpeedy Flight, ſince he perceived he could ſtay no longer with any ſafety: But whether this Information were true or no, God knows; for the King had abſolutely forbid any Injury to be done him, yet it ſeemed a good Pretence for him thus to ſteal away; [2.] for that Evening he ſent the Biſhop of Rocheſter with Two other Biſhops to the King, deſiring his leave to go beyond Sea; but he being then at Supper, ſent him word, that he would propoſe it to the Council the next day, and then return him an anſwer.

He receives private Notice, that ſome had conſpir'd, and ſworn his Death.

[2.] Ib.

Sends the Bp. of Rocheſter, &c. to the K. to beg his leave to go beyond Sea.

The K. would firſt adviſe with his Council about it.

But the Archbiſhop not thinking it ſafe for him to ſtay any longer, reſolved to be gone; but the better to conceal his Intentions, he ordered his Bed to be made in the Church behind the Altar, pretending as if he would have made it his Sanctuary; yet about midnight, taking with him Two Friers of the Ciſtercian Order (one of whom knew the way very well) he with no more beſides than One Servant, left the Town, and Travelling all Night, reached Lincoln the next Day, where the Archbiſhop changed his Habit, together with his Name, calling himſelf Bereman; and then paſſing through the Fens, and being ſeen by few, he at laſt got as far as Canterbury; and only paſſing through it by Night, ſtayed at a Village belonging to the Monks, called Eſtrey, ſomewhat beyond it, in order to go to the Sea-ſide, where he remain'd private for ſome days (no more than one Clerk being acquainted with his being there) till he found he could have a Veſſel provided to carry him over into Flanders; in the mean time let us look back and ſee what was done at Northampton after his departure.

He privately thereupon ſteals away at midnight, and near Canterbury gets a Veſſel that carried him over to Graveline.

Fitz-Stephens ſays, That ſo ſoon as the King heard of the Archbiſhop's Eſcape, he cauſed a Proclamation to be made throughout the Town, That no Man ſhould give him, or his Retinue, any ill language, or offer any ways to injure or moleſt them; the next day, when his Flight was certainly known, the King and all the Council conſidered what was fitteſt to be done, and at laſt reſolved to ſend over to the Pope ſeveral great Perſons Embaſſadors, as well of the Clergy as Laiety, about this great Affair of the Archbiſhop; their Names we will give you by and by; yet the Archbiſhop was permitted to enjoy for ſome time all the Revenues of his Church of Canterbury, becauſe both Parties had appealed to the Pope. The reſt of that day was ſpent about Raiſing ſome Foot-Souldiers to be ſent againſt Reeſe King of Wales; and there was (at the King's deſire) a certain number ſubſcribed by every Eccleſiaſtick and Lay-perſon there preſent for his Aſſiſtance, and ſo the Council was diſſolved.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

The K. and his Council agree to ſend to the Pope.

And to raiſe a Number of Foot-Souldiers againſt Reeſ, Prince of Wales.

[3.] Then the King ſent after the Archbiſhop with all ſpeed, thinking to have ſtopt his paſſage at Dover, and other Ports; but it was all in vain, for he lay ſtill all day at certain Abbeys, or elſe at Friend's Houſes, and Travell'd only by Night. So that it was from the Quindene of Michaelmas till the 2d of November, before he took Shipping at Sandwich; and then Landing at Graveline, he Travell'd partly on Foot, and partly on Horſeback, on a ſorry Jade to St. Omers, where he was joyfully received at the Abby of St. Bertin; and there indeed he was furniſh'd with all things neceſſary for a Prelate of his High Dignity, till he went from thence into France.

[3.] F. S. Ed. Ryme.

How he got to St. Omers.

And from thence to France.

Whilſt he tarried at St. Omers, Richard de Lucy, the King's Juſticiary, (being a little before come over on a private Meſſage to the Earl of Flanders) ſaw him, and would fain have perſwaded Him to go back along with him into England, and reconcile himſelf to the King; but the Archbiſhop fearing the King's implacable Temper, when once throughly incens'd, would by no means conſent to the Propoſal. Ed. Ryme alſo differs ſomewhat from Fitz-Stephen's Account of the Archbiſhop's Reception by the Earl of Flanders, as that he not only refus'd the Archbiſhop's ſafe Conduct, but threatned him; ſo that he ſtole away privately into France, with whom the Author of Quadrilogus agrees; ſaying, That he durſt not truſt the Earl, becauſe his Brother the Earl of Boloign had by the King's means Married King Stephen's Daughter, who had been an Abbeſs, and that contrary to Thomas Becket's Advice; who, being then Chancellor, openly declar'd againſt it; which made that Earl his Enemy ever after.

At St. Omers the K's Juſticiary would fain have prevailed with him to return to England, and be reconciled to the King.

But he would not yield to him.

Ed. Ryme's Account of his Reception by the Earl of Flanders.

[4.] So ſoon as the King knew that the Archbiſhop was gone beyond Sea, to prevent his being received by the King of France, he ſent Gilbert Foliot, Biſhop of London, and William Earl of Arundel, Ambaſſadors, not only to diſſwade him from receiving the Archbiſhop, but alſo to ſend to the Pope, to deſire him (out of reſpect to King Henry) not to receive him neither into his Favour; but by how much the more the King of England's Meſſengers labour'd, that the Archbiſhop might be expell'd France, by ſo much the more that King maintain'd his Cauſe; and beſides, ſent his Almoner to Pope Alexander then at Sens, deſiring him, That as he loved the Honour of the Roman Church, and the Advantage of the Kingdom of France, ſo in all things he would maintain THOMAS Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Cauſe againſt the Tyrant of England; and from that time forward the Pope receiv'd him into greater favour.

[4.] R. H.

The K. ſends the Bp. of London and E. of Arundel to the K. of France not to receive him.

But France ſends to the Pope, deſiring him to maintain the A. Bp. and his Cauſe againſt the K. of England.

Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

[5] Yet, to prevent this, the King ſent to the Pope Roger Archbiſhop of York, Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, Gilbert Biſhop of London, Hilary Biſhop of Cheſter, and Bartholomew Biſhop of Exeter: Wido, Rufus, Richard, Ivelceſter, and John de Oxford, Clerks: and of the Laiety, William Earl of Arundel, Hugh de Gundevile, Bernard of St. Walery, and Henry Fitz-Gerald, who found the Pope at Sens; where (as Hoveden relates) they ſaid many falſe and evil things againſt the Archbiſhop: and Gervaſe of Canterbury has given us all their Speeches at large; which becauſe they would be too tedious to repeat, I ſhall only give you the Subſtance of them.

[5] R. H. p. 284. a. K. Henry beſides ſends to the Pope ſeveral Bps, and Great Laymen.

Who alledged many falſe and evil Things againſt him.

[1] The Pope being ſeated in his Conſiſtory with his Cardinals, the Biſhop of London firſt began, and remonſtrated to the Pope, that there had lately been a ſharp Contention in England between the Clergy and Laiety from a ſmall Occaſion, which might eaſily have been remedy'd, if due moderation had been uſed: But becauſe his Lordſhip of Canterbury following his own particular Opinion, and not their Advice, without any conſideration of the Iniquity of the times, and what prejudice might happen for ſuch Heats of Paſſion, had thereby laid Snares for Himſelf and his Fellow-Brethren: "So that if they had "given their Conſents to his deſigns, things had turn'd to a much "worſe ſtate than they now were; but becauſe he could not have "their Conſents (as indeed he ought not) to thoſe things which he "propoſed, he endeavour'd to lay all the fault, which proceeded from "his own raſhneſs, upon the King, and the reſt of the Biſhops; nay, "and upon the whole Kingdom; therefore to blacken their Credits "as much as poſſible, the Archbiſhop had fled away, no man threatening "or offering him any Violence, according as it is written, The "wicked flee, when no man purſues.

[1] C. G. The ſubſtance of their Speeches.

[2] To which the Pope ſaid no more, but parce, Frater, ſpare Brother: then the Biſhop reply'd, Holy Father, I will ſpare him; the Pope return'd, I do not mean him, but your ſelf, Brother; at which the Biſhop being confounded, held his peace. Then Hilary Biſhop of Chicheſter, truſting more to his Eloquence, than to the Goodneſs of his Cauſe, made likewiſe a ſhort Speech; wherein he told the Pope, "That it "was his Beatitude's Intereſt to reſtore whatever had been done in "prejudice to the Publick, to the former ſtate of Peace and Concord, "leſt one man's immoderate Preſumption might procure the deſtruction of many, beſides a Schiſm in the Catholick Church; "which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury little regarded; ſince ſlighting "more mature advice, he only conſulted himſelf, that ſo he might "not only bring great Troubles upon himſelf, but upon the King "and whole Kingdom, which did not become ſo Great a Man; "neither ought his Friends to have given their aſſents to it. This is the Summ of that Biſhop's Speech, though, as this Author words it, (making him run from one thing to another) it appear'd ſo ridiculous, that all thoſe that were preſent fell a Laughing, which put the poor Biſhop to ſilence.

[2] Id. ib. The Pope's Reply.

The Bp. of Chicheſter's.

The Archbiſhop of York, ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of thoſe that ſpoke before him, reſolv'd to moderate his Paſſion, and only told the Pope, "That he very well knew my Lord of Canterbury's Temper, that "whatever Opinion he once embraced, he was ſcarce ever to be removed from it; and therefore it was eaſy to be believed, that he

" The Biſhop of Exeter ſpoke more to the purpoſe, and told the " Pope, he would not dwell long upon thoſe matters, but ſince this " Buſineſs could not be decided but in the Abſence of the Archbiſhop: " therefore he deſired that Legates might be appointed, who ſhould " hear and decide the Difference between the King and the Arch- " biſhop: and ſo held his Peace; neither did any of the Biſhops add any thing farther; which the Earl of Arundel obſerving, He then ſtood up at the Head of a great Number of Knights and Laymen, and made the Pope a very handſome and modeſt Speech in his own Language, to this effect; " That what the Biſhops had ſpoken (in La- " tine) they being Laymen, did not all underſtand; yet however it " was their Duty to expreſs how they might beſt diſcharge themſelves " of the Affair they were now intruſted with; therefore it was not " his Buſineſs to caſt reproaches upon any man in the preſence of ſo " great a Perſon, to whoſe Authority the whole World ought to ſub- " mit, but rather to ſet forth before his Beatitude the King his Ma- " ſter's Love and Devotion towards him, ſince he had now ſent the " Greateſt and moſt Noble Perſons of all Orders and Degrees, as his " Ambaſſadors; and then proceeded to mention that Great Fidelity " and Devotion the King had ſhewn him upon his firſt Advancement " to the Papal See: So that there was no Prince more Faithful and " Devout, nor more deſirous to preſerve Peace than the King; and " tho' the Lord Archbiſhop was alſo very well inſtructed in all things " relating to his Order, and was alſo very vigilant in thoſe matters " which belong'd to his Charge, yet he ſeemed in ſome things too " ſharp and ſevere; but yet were it not for the preſent difference " between the King and Him, both the Clergy and Laiety might " live in mutual Concord under ſo good a Prince, and ſo excellent a " Paſtor; and therefore their preſent Requeſt was, That his Beatitude " would take due care to remove this Diſſention, and renew the for- " mer Peace and Charity between them.

The Bp. of Exeter's.

The E. of Arundel's ſhort Speech.

When the Earl had ended his Speech, (which it ſeems was interpreted to the Pope) tho' he ſaid little to the Biſhop's: yet he anſwer'd His to this effect; " That he very well remember'd with how " great Devotion the King of England had beſtow'd many and large " Benefits upon him, which he was willing as far as lay in his power " to return, when any fit Opportunity offer'd, but ſince they had de- " ſired Legates they ſhould have them. Then when they had kiſſed the Pope's Feet, the Biſhop of London asked Him (on purpoſe) with what Powers thoſe Legates ſhould come? To which he anſwer'd, With due Powers: Yes, Sir, reply'd the Biſhop; we deſire they may de- cide this Cauſe without any Appeal: To which the Pope ſharply return'd, " I will not give my Glory to another; and certainly when the Arch- " biſhop is Judged, it ſhall be by our Selves, for there is no manner of " reaſon that we ſhould ſend him into England to be Judged by his " Adverſaries; he alſo added, That they ſhould ſtay a little for the " Archbiſhop's coming, without whoſe Preſence He could deter- " mine nothing: but when the Ambaſſadors ſaid, That they had a [3.] *Rog. K. Lewis his great Offers to him.

His Honourable reception by the Pope at Sens.

Sometime after his arrival, being admitted to a private Audience in the Pope's Chamber, and having proſtrated himſelf at his Feet, he was Commanded to riſe; and when he would have ſtood, he was ordered by the Pope to ſit down: So ſoon as he was ſeated, he made a ſhort Speech to this purpoſe; " That although he was not very wiſe, " yet he was never ſo fooliſh as to leave his King, Friends, and Eſtate, " for nothing; and that if he could have complied with his Will in " all things, there was no Man in his Kingdom who would have been " prouder to obey him: but that he had refuſed all upon the Conditions propoſed, and having taken a contrary courſe, the King had " quite withdrawn his former kindneſs; nay, if he would yet comply, he needed no body's interceſſion to recover his Favour: Yet " ſince the Church of Canterbury was uſed to be as it were the Weſtern Sun, whoſe brightneſs was now obſcur'd, he was reſolved to " endure any Torments, nay a Thouſand kinds of Deaths, rather than " to diſſemble the Evils it now ſuffer'd; and leſt he ſhould ſeem to " have undertaken theſe things needleſly, and out of pure vain Glory, " he thought it beſt to ſatisfy all there preſent by an Ocular demonſtration. Then producing the Writing, wherein were contain'd thoſe Cuſtoms or Prerogatives, about which the preſent difference aroſe, he ſaid with Tears, Here, ſee, Holy Father! what the King of England has ordain'd againſt the Liberty of the Catholick Religion, or if it be lawful to diſſemble theſe things without danger of one's Soul, ſay ye to it. Which Conſtitutions being read, it not only moved them to Tears; but the Pope, before all the Cardinals there preſent, declar'd, That he for ever condemn'd them, and anathematiz'd all thoſe that kept, kept, or any way favour'd them. This is Hoveden's account of the Iſſue of this affair, and that the Pope ſolemnly publiſh'd a * Bull to the ſame effect. Anno Dom. MCLXIV.

* See it in Speed's Chronicle at large.

[5.] But Gervaſe of Canterbury proceeds to tell us, That the Archbiſhop being not long after this admitted into the Pope's Chamber, ſpoke to him and the Cardinals there preſent to this effect; "That "he himſelf ought not to lye before God; therefore willingly, yet "with Grief, muſt confeſs, ſince it was his own fault that had brought "theſe Troubles upon the Engliſh Church, that he had enter'd Chriſt's "ſheepfold not by the door, nor by any Canonical Election, but was "One whom the Terror of a Lay-power had obtruded into it; and "tho' he had undertaken that charge unwillingly, yet ſince it was "not a Divine, but Humane Will which had beſtow'd it upon him, "What wonder was it then, if it had ſucceeded no better with him? "Yet if for the King's Threats he ſhould have preſently renounced "his Epiſcopal Dignity, as ſome of his Brethren the Biſhops perſwa-"ded him to do, he ſhould have left a pernicious Example of ſub-"jecting the Church to the pleaſure of Secular Princes: therefore he "had deferr'd it till he could come to his Holineſs's Preſence; but "now being convinc'd, that his entrance into the Church was not "Canonical, and fearing the ill Events that might proceed from "thence, and being alſo ſenſible that his ſtrength was not ſufficient "for ſo great a charge, leſt he might prove a Ruine, rather than a "Benefit to his Flock, he now reſign'd his Archbiſhoprick into his "Holineſs's hands.

[5.] G. C. Col. 1397.

An Account of the Speech the A. Biſhop made in Private to the Pope.

Then immediately taking off his Epiſcopal Ring from his Finger (as a token of his Reſignation) he deliver'd it into the hands of the Pope; then concluding his Speech with Tears, he made the Pope and his Cardinals ſympathize with him. Then he withdrawing, whilſt the Pope and his Cardinals began to conſult what was to be done in this affair; at firſt it ſeem'd very eaſy to appeaſe the King's Anger by accepting the Archbiſhop's Reſignation, and beſtowing ſome other Dignity upon him, to put another into his Place: but then they plainly ſaw, that this would be very ungrateful in reſpect of one who had ſacrific'd his Authority, Riches and Quiet, (nay expos'd his very Life) for the Liberty of the Church; and that if he were now deprived to pleaſe the King, no Man for the future would venture to contradict the Will of the Prince in any thing, whereby the Church not only ſhould be in great danger, but the Authority of the Pope would ſignify nothing: therefore all the Cardinals agreed it was beſt to reſtore this Man to his Charge, (tho' he ſhould be unwilling to receive it) ſince he had venter'd ſo much for the Church, rather than to nominate another; which Opinion pleas'd the Pope and all there preſent.

He reſigns his A. Biſhoprick into the Pope's hands.

The Pope and Cardinals conſulting what was beſt to be done in this caſe, reſolved at laſt not to accept of the Reſignation, but to reſtore him again to his Office.

[1.] Then the Archbiſhop being call'd in again, the Pope reſtor'd to him his Archbiſhoprick, and promiſed him the utmoſt aſſiſtance of the Roman See: To which R. Hoveden further adds, That either at this or ſome other Audience not long after, the Archbiſhop deliver'd into the Pope's hand a Tranſcript of the Laws of England, (that is, the late Statutes of Clarendon) which the King call'd antient Cuſtoms; which when the Pope had cauſed to be read before the Cardinals and others there there preſent, He damn'd them for ever, and iſſued his Anathema againſt all thoſe who ſhould for the future dare to obſerve them; and not long after He iſſued out his Bull to that purpoſe, a Copy of which Speed has given us in his Chronicle from an Original then in the Cotton. Library.

[2.] Id. ib. The Pope recommends him to the Care of the Abbot of Pontigny, who provided for him for two years.

[2.] Theſe things being thus tranſacted, the Pope recommended the Archbiſhop to the care of the Abbot of Pontigny in Burgundy, (who was then preſent) to provide for him, not ſplendidly, but according to what was fitting for one who was baniſh'd for Chriſt's ſake, (as it was then eſteem'd) ſo the Archbiſhop going along with that Abbot was by him provided, with all things neceſſary for the ſpace of two Years enſuing. But it is now time to look back and ſee, what the King did in England the mean while.

[3.] Id. ib. K. Henry ſeizes the A. Bp's Revenues.

[3.] The King being very angry that his Ambaſſadors had receiv'd a repulſe in his deſires, both from the Pope and the King of France, to be revenged on the Archbiſhop, ſeized upon the Revenues of the Archbiſhoprick, but did not as yet convert them to his own uſe, and ſo things remain'd all the reſt of this Year.

[4.] Dr. P's Chr. The South-Welſh under the Conduct of Prince Rees, invaded the Lands of the E. of Gloceſter.

Took great ſtore of Plunder from the Flemmings.

And reſolved to caſt off the Norman Yoke.

[4.] I find nothing elſe to have happened in England worth noting, only that the South Welſh encouraged (as I ſuppoſe) by theſe Domeſtick diſturbances, under the Conduct of their Prince Reeſe or Ryſe, invaded the Lands of Roger de Clare, Earl of Gloceſter, (becauſe by his means the Prince's Nephew Eneon had been lately murther'd) and took divers Caſtles, and razed them to the ground, and ſo in ſhort time he brought all Caerdigan under his ſubjection; from thence he made many Inroads againſt the Flemmings, and got great ſtore of Plunder in their Country: then all Wales reſolv'd to agree to caſt off the Norman Yoke (as they call'd their Subjection to the King of England) and only to obey Princes of their own Nation: But tho' King Henry was ſufficiently incens'd at this Rebellion, yet it being now late in the Year, he was forc'd to defer his Revenge till the next Spring.

Anno Dom. MCLXV.

[5.] G. G. Col. 1398. The K. baniſhes all the A. Bp's Kindred and Friends.

But they are well receiv'd in France.

[5.] The King began this Year with a very ſevere (if not cruel) proceeding, for he now baniſh'd out of England all the Relations and Friends of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſending them over to him into France, even ſo much as the old Men, Women, and Infants; but He was thereby ſo far from ſtraightening the Archbiſhop, that they were all there kindly received, and found Quarters either in the Monaſteries, or elſe with People of the beſt Quality. Roger Hoveden places this Action under the enſuing Year, but I rather chuſe to follow Gervaſe's Chronicle, whom I look upon to be more exact in his account of this matter.

[1.] R. D. Reginald A. Bp. of Cologne, as Ambaſſador from the Emperor Barbaroſſa, deſires Mathilda, the King's Eldeſt Daughter in Marriage for the D. of Saxony

The E. of Leiceſter refuſes him the Kiſs, and why.

[1.] About this time the King continuing ſtill at Weſtminſter, Reginald Archbiſhop of Coloign arrived in England as Ambaſſador from the Emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa, to deſire Mathilda the King's Eldeſt Daughter in Marriage for the Duke of Saxony, who was then highly in the Emperor's favour: But when all the Great Men of England ſolemnly receiv'd the ſaid Archbiſhop, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, the King's Juſticiary, was the only Perſon who refuſed to afford him the Kiſs, (the common Salutation among the Great Men in thoſe times) becauſe he was then, as well as the Emperor his Maſter, excommunicated by the Pope; and after his departure out of England, all the Altars on which either He or his Chaplains had celebrated Maſs, were demoliſhed; ſo great an influence had the Pope's Authority then in England: but this Match between the Duke of Saxony and this Princeſs was not conſummated until two or three years after; for ſhe being now but 11 years old, was not thought mature enough for it. Anno Dom. MCLXV.

Altars

[3.] In Lent the King paſſed over into Normandy, and preſently after Eaſter went as far as Giſors, and there had a Treaty with the King of France, concerning divers matters of moment; the particulars of which are not (as I find) ſpecified. [3] Id. Chron. Nic. Trivet. K Henry goes as far as Giſors, and had a Treaty there with the K of France.

[4.] Not long after this, the King, being allarm'd by the Inſurrections of the Welſh, who, taking advantage of his abſence, preſumed to invade England, David ap Owen Prince of North-Wales having deſtroyed all Flintſhire, then part of the King's Dominions, and carried all the People and Cattle away with him to Dyffryn Cluyd (now call'd Ruthyn;) the King, I ſay, return'd out of Normandy, and levied an Army with all ſpeed, and came to their ſuccour as far as Ruthlan Caſtle; and after he had lain before it Three days, and ſaw he could do no good, he return'd to England, where he gather'd another Army of choſen Men through all his Dominions in England and France, ſending for Succors from Flanders and Bretaigne, and then march'd towards North Wales, reſolving utterly to deſtroy all the People he could meet with; and coming to Croes Oſwalt, (now call'd Oſwaldſtre) he there encamp'd: On the other ſide, Prince Owen and his Brother Cadwalladar, with all the Power of North-Wales, and the Lord Rees with the Power of South-Wales, and Owen Cyuelioc, and the Sons of Madoc ap Ednerth with the People betwixt Wye and Severne gather'd together, and came to Corwen in Edeyrneon, reſolving to defend their Country. [4] Dr Powel Chr. The K. upon the News of the Welſh Inſurrection, & deſtroying of Flintſhire, returns out of Normandy. And comes with an Army to ſuccour his People as far as Ruthlan Caſtle. Then goes into England and raiſes another Army, and with that marches towards North-Wales. The Princes of North and South-Wales with their Forces reſolve to defend themſelves and Country.

[5.] But the King underſtanding that they were ſo nigh, and being mighty deſirous of a Battle, came to the River Ceireoc, and cauſed the Woods to be cut down; whereupon a great number of Welſh men well knowing the Paſſage, met with the King's Out-Guards, (who were there placed) being the Flower of all his Army, and began a hot Skirmiſh with them, where divers Brave Men were ſlain on both ſides: But in the end the King gained the Paſſage, and came to the Mountain of Berwyn, where he lay encamped for ſome days; and ſo both the Armies ſtood in awe each of other, for the King kept the open Plains, and was afraid of being caught in the Straits of the Mountains; but the Welſhmen watched for the advantage of the Place, and kept the King in ſo narrowly, that neither Forage nor Victuals could be brought to his Camp, neither durſt any Souldier ſtir abroad; and to augment theſe Miſeries, there fell ſuch great Rains, that the King's Souldiers could ſcarce ſtand on their Feet upon thoſe ſlippery Hills: In Concluſion, the King was forced to return home ingloriouſly with vaſt Loſs both of Men and Munition, beſides his Charges: therefore in a great Rage he cauſed the Hoſtages to be gelt, and their Eyes put out: which were Rees and Cadwalhon, the Sons of Owen, and Cynwric and Meredyth, the Sons of Rees, and others. [5] Id. ib. A hot diſpute on both ſides, but at laſt the K. gains the Paſs, and encamps by the Mountains of Berwyn. The Welſh ſtraiten the K. ſo cloſe, that no Forage or Victuals could be brought to his Camp. And ſo he was forc'd to return ingloriouſly home. He cauſes thereupon the Hoſtages to be gelt, and their Eyes put out.

This Action, tho' perhaps juſtifiable by the Laws of War, was certainly one of the moſt cruel of this King's Reign, ſince it is always counted a great piece of Cruelty to exerciſe the utmoſt ſeverity upon innocent Perſons, eſpecially Women and Infants. This, one of the Cruelleſt Actions of his Reign.

Anno Dom. MCLXV.

The K. in the Skirmiſh had been ſhot, if the Conſtab. of Colcheſter had not come between, and ſaved his Life, with the loſs of his own.

The K's gratitude to his Daughters for his Loyalty.

But I cannot omit a paſſage, which tho' related only by Ralph of Cogſhal, yet ſeems very likely to be true; which is, That in the abovemention'd Expedition, the King in a Skirmiſh near a Bridge was in great danger of his Life; for one of the Welſhmen ſhooting directly at him, had pierc'd him through the Body, if Hubert de St. Clere, Conſtable of Colcheſter, perceiving the Arrow coming, had not caſt himſelf between the King and it; whereby, tho' like a Loyal Subject he ſaved the King's life, yet he loſt his own: but the King in gratitude highly preferr'd his Daughters, by marrying them to Men of great Eſtates.

I find nothing elſe conſiderable to have happen'd this Year on this ſide of the Sea, [1.] but that MALCOLM King of Scotland, a Prince of great Virtue and Chaſtity, died unmarried, as having vowed perpetual Continence, and was thence called the Maiden: and Alexander, his Brother, a Prince of great Valour, ſucceeded him.

The K's ſevere Edict againſt the Pope and the A. Bp.

[2.] The Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year do alſo deſerve our Notice; for the King, ſo ſoon as he arrived in Normandy, made a very grievous Edict againſt the Pope and Archbiſhop: the Contents whereof were theſe.

[3.] Id. ib.

The Contents of it.

1. If any one [3.] ſhould be found bringing Letters or Mandates from the Pope or Archbiſhop, containing an Interdict of Chriſtianity, (that, is the Uſe of the Service, Sacraments and Holy Rites) into England, he ſhould be taken, and ſpeedy Juſtice executed upon him, as a Traytor to the Kingdom.

2. Alſo no Clerk, Monk, or other Religious Perſon, ſhould be permitted to paſs beyond Sea, or return into England, unleſs he had a Paſs-port from the Juſtices for his going out, and the King's Letters for his return; and if any one did otherwiſe, he ſhould be taken and impriſoned.

3. Alſo all Men were thereby prohibited from bringing any Command or Meſſage from the Pope or Archbiſhop; And whoever did, was to be taken and detain'd in Priſon: Alſo it was forbidden in general, That any Man ſhould appeal to the Pope or Archbiſhop; or for the future ſhould receive any Meſſage or Commands from them, or hold any Plea by their Order or Command; and if any Man did contrary to this Prohibition, he was to be taken and impriſoned.

4. Alſo all Biſhops, Abbots, Prieſts, Monks, Clerks, or Laymen, that ſhould comply with, or ſubmit to the Sentence of an Interdict, they and their Kindred ſhould forthwith be baniſhed the Nation, and not ſuffered to carry any thing along with them, but their Goods and Eſtates ſhould be taken into the King's hands.

5. Likewiſe all Clerks that had Rents and Eſtates in England ſhould be ſummon'd to Return to them within Three months; and if they did not, their Goods and Poſſeſſions ſhould be ſeiz'd to the King's uſe.

6. Alſo that the Biſhops of London and Norwich ſhould be Summon'd before the King's Juſtices to make ſatisfaction; for that contrary to the Statutes of the Realm, they had Interdicted the Lands of Hugh, Earl of Cheſter, and pronounced Sentence againſt him.

7. And laſtly, That the Peter-pence ſhould be gather'd, and ſafely kept for the King's uſe, and no longer paid to the Pope.

When

When the Archbiſhop found the King thus reſolute, and that his Patron the Pope could by no means prevail with him to revoke the Statutes of Clarendon, and recall him from his Baniſhment, he was forced then to ſpend his time in writing of Letters, either to the King or the Biſhops of England; ſome of which are of great moment for the better underſtanding of what had already paſſed between them.

Anno Dom. MCLXV.

The A. Bp perceiving the K's reſoluteneſs not to revoke the Statutes of Clarendon, is forc'd to write Letters to him and the Biſhops here.

[4.] For the King now holding a great Council of his Biſhops at Chinon in Tourain, the Archbiſhop wrote the King a long Epiſtle.

[4] R. H. p. 285. a.

But before I give you any Account of its Contents; give me leave to obſerve, That [5] tho' Roger Hoveden repreſents it as a Speech made there by the Archbiſhop to the King, yet it plainly appears from Rad. de Diceto (with whom alſo Quadrilogus agrees) that he was all that Time at Pontigny, and ſent the King (who was then at Chinon) the above-mention'd Epiſtle, to this effect.

[5.] Id. ib. p. 586.

[1.] " Firſt he ſets forth the diſtinction between the Eccleſiaſtical " and Civil State, with the ſeveral Orders and Degrees in both; then " he lays down this as a Fundamental Principle of the Papal Power " (which was now at its full Growth;) that becauſe it was certain, " that Kings receive their Power from the Church, and not the Church " from them, but from Chriſt, therefore he had nothing to do to " command Biſhops to Excommunicate or Abſolve any one, or to " force Clerks into Secular Courts, or Judicatures, to Judge of Tithes, " of Churches, to prohibit Biſhops that they ſhould not intermeddle " with Tranſgreſſion, or Breach of Faith, or Oath; and many other " things, which were written to this effect, among thoſe late Cuſtoms " which the King calls antient. And then after a Citation of Scripture " out of the Prophets, Wo be to thoſe that make unjuſt Laws, &c. He " proceeds to adviſe him to have no familiarity for the future with " Schiſmaticks*; and then putting him in mind how devoutly he had " receiv'd Pope Alexander, and how much he had honour'd him in " all things, he deſir'd him, as he wiſh'd the health of his Soul, not " to ſubſtract any ways from the Church that belong'd to it, but that " he would let her enjoy the ſame Liberties in his Kingdom, as ſhe " did in others; That he would be mindful of the Oath or Profeſſion " he had made before the Altar at Weſtminſter, when he was Anointed " King; That he would reſtore to the Church of Canterbury the State " and Dignity ſhe enjoy'd in the Times of his Predeceſſors, and alſo " reſtore wholly to himſelf the Poſſeſſions and Lands which belong'd " to the Church, which the King had given away to Others at his " pleaſure; and laſtly, that if he would permit him freely and in " peace to return to his See, then he would be ready moſt faithfully, " and with all reſpect to ſerve him as his moſt dear Lord and King in " all things he could, ſaving the Honour of God, and the Roman Church, " and his own Order; or that otherwiſe the King would certainly feel " the Divine Severity and Vengeance.

[1.] Id. ib. R. D. Col. 541, 542. In his Epiſtle to the King, the A. Bp. declares that Ks. receive their Power from the Church, and not the Church from them.

And tells him in what things he had nothing to do.

* That is, Frederic the Emperor, and ſuch as adhered to Pope Victor, and rejected Alexander.

[2.] " About the ſame time alſo he ſent another Epiſtle to his Suffragans in England, directed to the Biſhop of London; wherein he " blames them, that they had not joyn'd with him in oppoſing the " King, and reclaiming him from his perverſe Purpoſes; yet that " having firſt invoked the Grace of the Holy Spirit, he had not only

Anno Dom. MCLXV.

He caſſates the K's Laws, and Excommunicates all the Obſervers of them.

As alſo ſeveral Others by name for particular matters.

" condemn'd that Writing, in which the King had publiſh'd his Cuſtoms, or rather Pravities (as he call'd them,) but had alſo Excommunicated all the Obſervers, Adviſers and Defenders of them, and abſolved all his Suffragans, by God's, and his own Authority, from the Obſervation of them; alſo that he had Excommunicated John of Oxford (afterwards made Dean of Salisbury) and Richard of Ilcester, for joyning with Archbiſhop Reginald, and the Germans, (as has been ſaid before;) as likewiſe Richard de Lucie and Jocelin de Bailol, and Rainulph de Broc; the Two former for the Reaſons already ſet down; and the latter, becauſe they were Partakers with Hugh de Clare, and Robert Fitz Bernard, in taking and detaining the Goods of the Church without his conſent, as alſo for divers other Cauſes, needleſs here to be repeated.

And tells his Suffragans that he had hitherto deferr'd pronouncing Sentence againſt the K's Perſon, and why; but was ready to do it.

" Laſtly, He further ſignified to them, that he had hitherto deferr'd pronouncing Sentence againſt the King's Perſon, to ſee whether he would repent or not; which if he did not quickly, he was ready to do it, and commanded their Fraternity, by virtue of their Obedience, That they ſhould eſteem as Excommunicated, the before-mention'd perſons, and cauſe them to be denounced ſuch, injoyning the Biſhop of London to ſhow this Epiſtle to all his Brethren and fellow Biſhops of his Province: and ſo takes his leave as becomes an Archiepiſcopal Metropolitan.

I thought fit to give you the ſubſtance of theſe Letters, becauſe it ſhews the Arrogance and Preſumption of this Haughty Clergyman, who ſtill took upon him to do as much as the Pope himſelf could pretend to.

[2.] Id. The K. ſends a ſevere Edict into England to have the Ports watch'd.

[3.] Upon theſe high Proceedings of the Archbiſhop, King Henry, being ſtill in Normandy, ſent his Precept or Edict into England, that all the Ports ſhould be moſt ſtrictly watched, leſt Letters of Interdict ſhould by any means be brought in; and if any one brought them, he commanded that his Feet ſhould be cut off; but if he was a Clerk, no leſs than his Eyes and Genitals; if a Laick, to be hang'd; if a Leper, to be burnt; and if any Biſhop fearing ſuch Interdict, would depart the Nation, he ſhould carry nothing with him but his Staff. He alſo order'd, that all Scholars ſhould return into England, or be deprived of their Benefices; and ſuch as remained abroad, ſhould never return. The Prieſts likewiſe that would not chant or ſing Maſs, he order'd to be gelt; and all ſuch as were Rebels to him, were to looſe their Fees or Livelihoods.

And what to do with any that ſhould bring in Letters of Interdict, &c.

Anno Dom. MCLXVI.

William K. of Scots comes into England, and did his Homage to K. Henry.

Theſe are the Heads of this Edict which Hoveden has given us in ſhort; but the Author of Quadrilogus hath it more at large, and thither I refer my Reader, if he pleaſe to conſult it.

About the beginning of this Year (as Buchanan and Polydore relate) William King of the Scots came into England, and did his Homage to King Henry, (as his Anceſtors had done before;) but when he demanded Northumberland of the King as his antient Right, his Anſwer was, That he could not alienate it without the conſent of the Great Men of his Kingdom, and ſo put him off to the next Common-Council; which the Scottiſh King not able to contradict, was forced to comply with: But we do not find that ever that County was reſtored to him by King Henry; and therefore having no Authority from any of our Engliſh Writers concerning this matter, I leave the Reader to deter-

Upon the demanding Northumberland as his antient Right, the K. anſwer'd, It could not be aliened without the Conſent of his Great Men.

determine as he thinks beſt about it: Yet thus much is certain, [4.] that King William not long after followed the King into Normandy upon his Summons; and the Chronicle of Mailroſs ſays, That it was about the great Affairs of King Henry his Lord; and having ſhewn his Courage in certain Martial Atchievements, he then return'd home. Anno Dom. MCLXVI.

[4.] C. M. K. William follows the K. into Normandy upon his Summons.

But [5.] King Henry (it ſeems) ſtayed longer in thoſe Parts to ſettle his own affairs; and there alſo at the requeſt of the King of France he agreed to grant Four pence upon every Hyde of plough'd Land throughout all England towards the Relief of the Holy Land.

[5.] C. G. K. Henry grants 4 d upon every Hyde of plowed Land, for the Relief of the Holy Land.

But notwithſtanding this pious Act of the King's, Archbiſhop Becket was highly incens'd that the King had ſeized upon his Temporalities, and ſtill put in execution the Statutes of Clarendon; but tho' He would not hitherto pronounce any Sentence againſt the King's Perſon, [1.] yet he did againſt ſeveral of thoſe about him; for now going from the Abbey of Pontigny, to the City of Vizelay, upon Aſcenſion-day, there getting up into the Pulpit, he, in the preſence of a Great Aſſembly, Excommunicated with lighted Candles all the Obſervers, Defenders, and Promoters of thoſe Cuſtoms which in England were call'd Antient; as by name Richard of Poictou, Jocelin de Bailleol, Alan de Nevil, and divers Others; but they being abſent, and neither cited nor convicted, upon the News hereof, ſent Meſſengers to the Archbiſhop to appeal from his Sentence to the Pope, and in the mean time did not refrain coming to Church.

Thomas Becket highly incenſed againſt the K. for ſeizing his Temporalities.

[1.] R. H. Id. He ſolemnly Excommunicates all thoſe that obſerved the Statutes of Clarendon, and ſuch and ſuch by name.

But they ſent to let him know that they appealed from his Sentence to the Pope.

[2.] Not long after this, the Pope remaining ſtill in France, (tho' he return'd not long after into Italy) ſent Two Cardinals, William of Pavia, and John of Naples, as his Legates, who cited the King and the Archbiſhop to meet them at Montmiral in Champaigne, which they both did accordingly; and tho' the Archbiſhop found them more favourable to the King's ſide than he would have had them, yet he conſented to ſubmit to their Judgment on this condition, That there ſhould be firſt an entire Reſtitution made both to Himſelf and his Followers of all that had been taken away from them; to which when the King would not agree, nor the Archbiſhop (being the loſer) would not upon other terms ſubmit, and they having no power to compel him, left this buſineſs undiſpatched, and ſo returned to Rome, having only abſolved thoſe, whom the Archbiſhop had before Excommunicated; and indeed the Archbiſhop ſhewed himſelf very ſubtile in this Tranſaction, for could he have gain'd the point of Reſtitution, he had made the King confeſs himſelf in the wrong, and yield up the Cauſe before it came to be heard: But to return to Civil affairs.

[2.] Id. ib. The Pope ſends Two Cardinals as his Legates, to make up the buſineſs between the K. and the A Bp.

But they not being able to reconcile them, return'd to Rome, after having abſolved thoſe whom the A. Bp. had Excommunicated.

[3.] King Henry finding the Nobility of Main and Bretaign diſobedient to the Orders of Queen Eleanor, (whom he had left Regent in his abſence) and ſhowing ſome inclinations to rebell, he was reſolved to humble them; and therefore marching into thoſe Parts with an Army, he took in their Caſtles as he pleaſed, and demoliſhed the ſtrong One of Fulgers, for that, it ſeems, had made a more obſtinate Reſiſtance than any of the Other.

[3.] Id. ib. N.T. K. Henry marches into Bretaign, and reduces the Country to his Obedience.

Then [4.] Conan Earl of Bretaign and Richmond, being not able any longer to withſtand the King's Power, thought it beſt to make his peace with him as well as he could; and therefore agreed that his only Daughter Conſtance (tho' not as yet old enough for Marriage) ſhould be betrothed to Geoffry the King's third Son, ſettling upon them the Earl-

Anno Dom. MCLXVI.

Earldoms of Bretaign and Richmond, reſerving only to himſelf Guingamp, which deſcended to him by Earl Stephen his Grandfather; King Henry highly approving of this Match, preſently took poſſeſſion of the Country, and went a Progreſs to the Cities and Caſtles of the chief Barons and Knights.

I have been the more particular in this Tranſaction, becauſe tho' it be mention'd by Nicholas Trivet, yet it is omitted by R. Hoveden: But Walter Hemingford and Brompton's Chronicle do both give ſome account of this matter, however they falſely ſuppoſe this Match not to have been made till after the Death of Earl Conan, who ſurvived indeed divers years, as you will find hereafter; but the Authority of theſe Writers hath (as I ſuppoſe) led Polidore Virgil, Daniel, and Dr. Brady, into the ſame miſtake.

[4] Id. ib. Conan makes Peace with him, by offering Conſtance his only Daughter to be betrothed to Geoffrey the K's 3d Son, ſettling on them the Earldoms of Britain and Richmond.

[5.] When King Henry had met with this good ſucceſs, he return'd into England, and ſoon after his Arrival iſſued forth a ſevere Edict, whereby he baniſhed all the Kindred and Relations of Archbiſhop Becket out of all his Dominions, not excepting Women, Sucking Infants, or Aged perſons; but they going over into France, were all there kindly received, and by the King's Order, quarter'd with ſuch Noblemen, Biſhops and Religious Houſes, as were willing to receive them, where they were plentifully maintained till the Archbiſhop's return into England; nor did the King's ſeverity ſtop here, but he alſo forbad all perſons to aſſiſt the ſaid Archbiſhop with Money, or to hold Correſpondence with him by Letters, or ſo much as to pray for him in the Churches; all which had only that ſucceſs, as ſuch ſevere and cruel Actions commonly meet with, to render the King more odious both at Home and Abroad.

[5.] K. Henry returns to England, and by his Edict baniſhes all the A. Bp's Relations. Who go over into France, and are there hoſpitably received. The K. forbids all perſons to hold any correſpondence with, or ſo much as to pray for the A. Biſhop.

[1.] And to be further revenged of the Archbiſhop, who had been now ſcarce Two years at the Abby of Pontigny (in the Confines of Champaign and Burgundy) with Abbot Warin and his Monks, to whom Pope Alexander had recommended him; King Henry ſent word to that Abbot, That if he ſhelter'd any longer the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Monaſtery, he would forthwith baniſh all the Monks of his * Order out of England; which the King of France hearing, came of himſelf to Pontigny; and leſt any thing might be done by King Henry to the prejudice of the Ciſtertian Order, he took the Archbiſhop along with him as far as Sens, and from thence ſent him to the Abby of St. Columbe not far off, where he allowed him a handſome Maintenance, and paid him frequent Viſits, till he return'd into England.

[1] F. S. G. C. And forces him to leave the Monaſtery of Pontigny.

* i. e. Ciſtertian.

The K. of France thereupon ſends him to the Abby of St. Columbe, and honourably maintains him there.

[2.] Nothing further remarkable happen'd this year, but the Birth of Earl John, the King's youngeſt Son call'd at firſt in Raillery Sans Terre, becauſe his Father ſettled no Lands, nor Principalities upon him, as he had done upon his three Elder Brethren; yet he was afterwards created King of Ireland, and Earl of Mortaign, and after the Death of his Elder Brother King Richard, ſucceeded to the Crown of England.

[2] R. D. Col. 544. The Birth of Earl John, the K's youngeſt Son.

As to the Archbiſhop's concerns, I find nothing more done this year, only ſometime after his removal from Pontigny, [3.] R. Hoveden gives us a choice Collection of Letters written by the Pope to the Engliſh Biſhops, and alſo by the Archbiſhop himſelf: That which Pope Alexander wrote to King Henry on the behalf of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, is to this effect: "That as Seculars were diſtinguiſhed "in their way of Life and Habit from Clerks or Eccleſiaſticks, ſo "their

The Pope writes another Letter to the Bp. of London in behalf of the A. Bp. and the Church.

[5.] " Then follows the Biſhop of London's Anſwer to the Pope, " wherein he lets him know, That he had taken to his aſſiſtance " Richard Biſhop of Hereford, and they had both urged the King ac- " cording to the Inſtructions already received from his Holineſs, in " this as well as in other Epiſtles, and told him, The King received " his Reproofs very thankfully, and with great temper of Mind, mo- " deſtly anſwering to every point.

[5.] Id. ib. b. The Bp's Anſwer to the Pope.

Telling him how thankfully the K. receiv'd his Reproofs.

" As firſt, That he had no averſion to his Holineſs's Perſon; but " that, on the contrary, whilſt he ſhewed him his paternal Grace and " Favour, the King would love him as his Father, and honour and " cheriſh the Roman Church as his Mother, and would humbly obey " his Commands, ſaving his own Regal Dignity, and that of his King- " dom. That if at any time he had been deficient in his Reverence " towards him, it was becauſe his Holineſs had given a denial to every " one of his Requeſts, notwithſtanding when his Holineſs was in the " greateſt ſtreights, he had cordially eſpouſed his Intereſt; That He " would hinder no man from Appealing to his Holineſs, yet affirm'd, " that in all Appeals, according to the antient Conſtitutions of his " Kingdom, no Clerk ought for any Civil Cauſe to go out of his " Kingdom, before he had tried whither by his Authority and Pre- " cept he could obtain Juſtice, or no; which not being granted, any " one might and ſhould Appeal to him; in which Act, if he did any " ways prejudice his Holineſs's Right or Dignity, he would amend it by " advice of the Church of his own Kingdom: He farther aſſerts, That " he never baniſh'd the Archbiſhop out of his Kingdom, but as he " went of his own accord, ſo he might freely return again to his " Church whenever he pleaſed; on condition to obſerve thoſe Royal " Prerogatives he had ſworn to, tho' now he calls them wicked and un- " juſt; and that if any Church or Eccleſiaſtical Perſon could ſhew " themſelves grieved by him, or any of his, he was ready to make ſa- " tisfaction according to the Judgment of the whole Church.

And what complyance he yielded to all his Propoſals.

" Theſe (they ſaid) were the King's Anſwers, and therefore they " beſeech his Sublimity to conſider, what iſſue this affair was like to " have, ſince the King ſeemed only ſo much to juſtify himſelf, as " that he ſubmits in all things to the Counſel and Judgment of the " Church of his Kingdom, whether the Archbiſhop might return up- " on the Conditions before expreſſed; and ſo they ſupplicate his Ex- " cellency (as they term him) to act mildly, and not to pronounce

Anno Dom. MCLXVI.

The K's Mother and the A. Biſhop of Roüen write to the K. to be reconcil'd to Tho. Becket.

His Anſwer to them.

" ſentence of Interdict or Excommunication againſt the King, leſt he " ſhould force Him, and with Him much People, and innumerable " Churches from his Obedience.

About this time alſo (according to the Author of Quadrilogus) the King's Mother and the Archbiſhop of Roüen wrote to him to be reconciled to the Archbiſhop; but all the Anſwer he would return, was, That as he had gone away of himſelf, no body forcing him, ſo he might return as he came, if he pleaſed: but it ſeems this general Anſwer did not ſatisfy; for by being reconciled, was meant, that the King ſhould yield to all the Archbiſhop's demands, as he was at laſt forced to do, tho' much againſt his will.

[1.] F. S. Bp. of Salisbury beſtows the Deanry of that Church on John of Oxford, againſt the Pope's Prohibition.

[1.] This year alſo the King having been diſpleaſed with Jocelin Biſhop of Salisbury, he, to regain his Favour, beſtow'd the Deanery of that Church upon one John of Oxford the King's Chaplain, altho' he had been by the Pope's Letters forbidden ſo to do without the conſent of his Chanons, moſt of whom were now in Exile with the Archbiſhop, who thereupon by the Pope's Command excommunicated the Biſhop, with divers others, without ſo much as hearing what they had to ſay for themſelves.

Upon which the A Bp. Excommunicates the Bp. with divers others.

[2.] R. H. p. 291. a

The Bps. of the Province of Canterbury write to the A. Bp. in favour of the K.

Telling him, the K. cauſed him to be elected A. Bp. contrary to his Mother's advice, & the Opinion of the whole Kingdom.

And that he only inſiſted to have thoſe Prerogatives allowed him, which his Predeceſſors had enjoyed.

They demand of him by what Right he could thus thus oppoſe the King.

Or ſuſpend & condemn the Bp. of Salisbury, without firſt hearing him.

[2] Whereupon all the Biſhops of his Province now wrote to the Archbiſhop a large Epiſtle, which was to this effect; " That they " had hopes that thoſe things which by his unexpected departure " were put into confuſion, might by his prudence have been reduced " to their former peaceable condition; but that to their great grief " they heard, he threatned the King with an Interdict, and to cut him " off from the Church; then they urged to him the Inconveniences " of ſuch proceedings, and the Conveniences of a peaceable and quiet " Temper; and deſir'd him to remember, that the King, contrary " to the Advice of his Mother, and the Opinion of the whole King- " dom, cauſed him to be elected Archbiſhop, in hopes He might Reign " happily, and enjoy greater quiet and ſecurity by his Council and " Aſſiſtance. They told him farther, That the King being appointed " by God to that end, had provided for the Peace of his Subjects in " all things, and preſerved it to the Churches and People committed " to his Charge; That he only inſiſted on the Prerogatives which " were his due, at leaſt which were yielded to all Kings before him, " that thoſe might be allowed and yielded to him: about which, if " there were any Controverſy between the King and himſelf; yet " when he was lately admoniſhed by the Biſhops of London and He- " reford, by Directions from the Pope, he had anſwer'd humbly and " meekly, (as has been already related) and that in very Deed he was " then ready to perform, and give ſatisfaction for any injury done. " Then they demand of him by what Right, Law, or Canon, he could " thus oppoſe the King, or how he could cut him off from the Church. " Then they gently reprove him for ſeveral prepoſterous, new and un- " warrantable Actions, as condemning and ſuſpending the Biſhop of " Salisbury, before he was accuſed, or heard; which new way of Judg- " ing, to condemn firſt, and hearing the Cauſe afterwards, they " hoped was not to be found amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Canons; yet " leſt he might attempt to exerciſe and extend it againſt their Lord " the King, or his Kingdom, or againſt them and the Churches com- " mitted to them, to the Prejudice of the Pope, and the Diſgrace and

" Detri-

" Detriment of the Holy Roman Church, and the Increaſe of his own " Confuſion; they oppoſed againſt him the Remedy of an Appeal, " and now Appeal'd the Second time to the Pope in writing, and " aſſign'd next Aſcention day for the time of proſecuting this Ap- " peal. Anno Dom. MCLXVI.

And leſt this power might be extended againſt the K. &c. they appeal a Second time againſt him to the Pope.

" [3.] Much ſuch another Epiſtle, and to the ſame effect, the ſaid " Biſhops alſo wrote to the Pope in behalf of the King, in which they " excuſe him as before, and commend his compliance and obedi- " ence, and inform the Pope, that was no need of an Interdict, " Threatnings or Curſe, to force him to make ſatisfaction. Then " they aſſign for the ground and cauſe of this Controverſy, the Ex- " travagancies and Exceſſes of certain inſolent Clerks, and the manner " and place of puniſhing their grievous Crimes and Enormities: " They blame the Archbiſhop for threatning to excommunicate, and " Interdict the Nation; and ſay, it was neither like the Devotion or " Patience of a Father, or Archbiſhop: They farther acquaint the " Pope, that he had excommunicated (and that without any Citation, " or hearing their Defence) ſome of the King's Servants, and Chief " Men of the Kingdom, by whoſe ſpecial Aſſiſtance and Councel " the great affairs of the Kingdom were mainly directed; and this " (as they ſaid) without proofs of guilt, or being convicted, or ha- " ving confeſſed any fault; And then laying before him the Incon- " veniences and ill conſequences of ſuch his extravagant actions, " they make their Appeal to the Pope, and propound the day of Ap- " peal as before.

[3] Id. p. 292. b. 295. a.

They write to the ſame effect to the Pope in behalf of the King.

And aſſign for the ground and cauſe of this Controverſy, the Extravagancies and Exceſſes of Inſolent Clerks, and the manner of puniſhing their Crimes.

" Not long after Archbiſhop Becket wrote an Anſwer to the for- " mer Epiſtle, ſent him by his Suffragan Biſhops which being very " long, I ſhall refer the Reader to it as it ſtands in Quadrilogus; " yet will give you the Sum of it from [4.] Dr. Brady's Hiſtory. In " the firſt place, he indeavours through the whole to draw a paralel " between the Sufferings of our Saviour Chriſt and himſelf; tells them " they wrote not that Epiſtle by common advice and prudence, it con- " taining more of Sharpneſs and Diſobedience than Comfort or Cha- " rity; and after that wonders why they ſhould be ſo unkind to him " who never did them any Injury; and exhorts them to lay down " their lives with him to free the Church from the yoke of ſecular " Servitude. Next he affirms the injury done to himſelf, the Church " of God, and that of Canterbury, was the cauſe of his Appeal, and " That the Cauſe of his Receſs. He accuſeth the Biſhop of London, " Archbiſhop of York, and Rich. de Ivelceſter, for dictating the Sen- " tence againſt him; and particularly the Biſhop of London, for re- " ceiving the Money of the Church of Canterbury, and applying it " to the uſe of his own Cathedral. He affirms, he ought not to fear " any puniſhment or ill conſequences, for ſtanding out againſt the " King: He alſo exhorts the Biſhops not to confound the Rights of " the Church and Kingdom which were diſtinct powers, of which " the one received its Authority from the other. He farther ſays, " the Biſhop of Salisbury admitted John of Oxford to be Dean of Salis- " bury againſt the Pope's and his Prohibition, which was a manifeſt " diſobedience, and therefore there was no Solemnity required in the " Proceſs againſt him, and cites ſome Canons to make good his Aſ- " ſertion. Then he argues againſt their Appeal; and aſſerts that le" gally and Canonically they could not Appeal ; and affirms, it " would be no Injury to the King, to ſmite him with Excommuni- " cation ; and as for his being made Archbiſhop againſt the opinion " and good liking of the Kingdom, he appeals to the form and man- " ner of his Election, and endeavours to make what they ſay im- " probable, from the number and quality of the Perſons there preſent; " and for that the King himſelf wrote for his Pall ; So that his Election " was made without any contradiction. He then takes notice, that " they had reported him an inconſiderable fellow, and of mean Pa- " rentage ; his Anſwer was, That though he deſcended not from Kings, " yet he choſe rather by the greatneſs of his mind, to Raiſe a Family, " than by his negligence to render one Degenerate. He tells them they " talk of the Danger of the Roman Church, and the fear of the " King's and his People's receſs from it, as alſo of his own danger, " and of thoſe that belonged to him ; but they thought not all this " while of the loſs of Souls. Laſtly, that the Suffragans of his Church " ought all to be of his opinion, and to ſuffer and dye with him.

The Archbiſhop certainly miſtaken in affirming, that his Election was without contradiction.

This Epiſtle, though long, is very well worth reading, ſince the Archbiſhop hath therein exerted his utmoſt Skill and Eloquence, according to the way of writing in thoſe times ; yet however he was certainly miſtaken, (whither wilfully, or through forgetfulneſs, I will not determine) when he there tells the Biſhops that this Election was without contradiction ; for the Author of Quadrilogus owns, that the Prior and Monks of Canterbury were at firſt much againſt chuſing a meer ſecular and military Man for Archbiſhop ; and the Biſhop of London oppoſed it to the laſt. I have been more particular in the Extracts of theſe Letters, becauſe they are the moſt exact pieces of Hiſtory in their kind ; and ſhew us more of the Inſide of Affairs than any other Relations.

[5.] About Chriſtmas this year Prince Henry the King's Son went from England to his Father in Poictou ; then after Eaſter the King marched with an Army into Auvergne, and waſted the Lands of Earl William, who thereupon engaged his Faith to ſtand to the King's Arbitrement in relation to his Nephew the young Earl of Auvergne, whom he had diſinherited ; but he broke his Faith, and went over to the King of France, and raiſed new Diſcords between them.

The King marches with an Army to Auvergne, to aſſert the Right of his diſinherited Nephew.

[1.] G. G. Col. 402. The War is again renew'd between the Kings of England & France, and on what Occaſion.

[1.] So that now the Peace was again broke, and the old Quarrel renew'd between the Kings of France and England about the City of Tholoſe, and other matters ; but chiefly (as it was believed) becauſe of Archbiſhop Becket, (whoſe Quarrel King Lewis now eſpouſed): then the County of Eu and the Veuxin were miſerably harraſs'd by Plundering and Burning ; for the French King invading Normandy on that ſide, ſtay'd there with his Army four days ; in the mean time England was much alarmed by reaſon of a Report, that Matthew Earl of Bologne, being highly diſpleaſed at the King, becauſe he had ſtopt certain Revenues he received from hence, had furniſht his Brother the Earl of Flanders, with 600 Veſſels to invade this Kingdom ; and preſumed the more, becauſe the King was now engaged in a War with France ; But all the Earl's endeavours were fruſtrated by the care of Richard de Lucy, Juſtitiary of England, who guarded it ſo well with its own Militia, that no Foreigners durſt approach. From whence we may obſerve, that in thoſe days, the Militia of England conſiſting of Tenants England is much alarm'd at the News of an Invaſion from Flanders.

But being well defended by its Militia, thoſe deſigns come to nothing.

by Knights ſervice, as alſo by other Tenures, was ſo conſiderable, that without any ſtanding Army, it was able to be a Terrour to its Neighbours: But to return to France. Anno Dom. MCLXVII

[2.] On Trinity Sunday the Two Kings meet in the French Vexzin, where they treated of a Peace; but the Noble Men of France exaſperating their King againſt King Henry, nothing was done at that time; whereupon both ſides fortified their Caſtles, and brought together what forces they could. Then King Lewis burnt many Villages between Mante and Pacey, at which King Henry was much provoked, and in requital burnt the ſtrong and Noble Caſtle of Chaumont near Giſors, (which was the K. of France his Magazine for Arms, and other warlike proviſions, and where alſo lodged his Money to pay his Soldiers) and likewiſe divers Villages thereabouts. This ſo inraged King Lewis, that he marched ſtraight into Normandy, and burnt ſeveral Towns and Villages, and among others the good Town of Andeli Sur Seine, which belonged to the Archbiſhop of Roüen, with divers other places; and all that King Henry was able to do, in the mean while was to take a ſtrong Caſtle called Finnel by ſtorm. [2.] C. N. The two Kings treat of peace but without any effect; whereupon they burn each others Towns and Caſtles.

This is the ſame Action that Hoveden places under the Year following, but not truly; for both Gervaſe and the Norman Chronicle place it more rightly under this.

In Auguſt there was a Truce made, and Sworn to by both Kings to continue until Eaſter. Then King Henry went into Bretaign, and brought under his Subjection all the Bretaigns, and thoſe of St. Paul de Leon; for Guihomar, Son to Henry, Viſcount of that Town, gave pledges, and ſubmitted to the King, being much ſurpriz'd to ſee his ſtrongeſt Caſtle burnt, and his other beſt places either eaſily taken, or as eaſily ſurrender'd. Id. ib. A Truce made between the Two Kings. K. Henry ſubdues Britain.

While the King was thus buſied in Bretaign, a Meſſenger came to him with the news of the deceaſe of his Mother the Empreſs, who dyed the 10th of December at Roüen, and was buried at the Abby of Bec. Her Son diſtributed her Treaſure (which was very great) to Churches, Monaſteries, Lepers, and other poor people, for the good of her Soul; ſhe herſelf had built three Monaſteries in Normandy, and given a great Summ of Money towards building the Stone-bridge at Roüen, which ſhe had already begun. Id. ib. Maud the Empreſs, her Death. Her vaſt Treaſure diſtributed to Monaſteries, &c.

Now it may not be amiſs here to give ſome Character of this Princeſs, who being the Daughter of a Great King, and the Mother of a Greater, was of a Maſculine, but haughty and turbulent Spirit: for thinking the Earl of Anjou, her Second Husband, too mean a match for her, ſhe had at firſt frequent Diſputes with him, which ran ſo high that they parted; but being again reconciled, ſhe had ſeveral Children; yet with ſo little fondneſs on his ſide, that ſhe continued four Years in England without his ever ſeeing her, though he had been often deſir'd to come over. She was alſo very ambitious of Governing, as appears by her indefatigable pains to obtain the Crown of England, and very vigorous in ſetting up arbitrary power, which loſt her the hearts of the Londoners, and of the reſt of the Kingdom; and which made them ſo afraid of a Female Government, that in the Agreement between King Stephen and her Son Henry, ſhe was wholly put aſide, and the Crown ſettled upon him immediately after the Death of that Prince: ſo that (laying down that pompous Title of her being Lady of the Engliſh) ſhe remain'd in a private condition Her Character.

Anno Dom. MCLXVII

until the day of her Death: This Character we may gather from her Actions, for I do not find any given of her by the Hiſtorians of that Age.

As for the Archbiſhop's affairs, this Year produced no great Alteration in them, and therefore he chiefly ſpent his Time in writing Letters to the Pope and the King, as alſo to Gilbert Biſhop of "London; in the laſt of which he laid to his charge the long abuſe of "his patience, and the refuſal both of the Pope's and his own admo- "nition, and pronounced him excommunicated, and cut off from the "Body of the Church; commanding him by virtue of his Canonical "Obedience, that he ſhould abſtain from all Communication with faith- "ful believers, till he had made ſufficient ſatisfaction, [3.] but the Biſhops and the others of the Clergy for the preſent eluded the force of this Excommunication, by appealing to the Pope, and ſo prolonged the matter for near a year longer.

R. H. p. 289. b. 293. b.

The A Bp. ſpends moſt of his time in writing Letters to the Pope, the K. and Bp. of London, and at laſt Excommunicates him.

[3.] F. S.

But the Bps. and reſt of the Clergy eluded it, by appealing to the Pope.

[4.] He wrote alſo to the Dean and Arch-Deacon and Clergy of the "Dioceſs of London, that by vertue of their Obedience, and as they "tender'd their Salvation, and Order, they ſhould avoid the Com- "pany of their Biſhops, and likewiſe of all other perſons excommuni- "cated; and there he named at the end of this Epiſtle, Jocelin Biſhop of Salisbury, Earl Hugh (I ſuppoſe of Cheſter,) with divers others, who need not be here ſet down; and then farther informed them that on Aſcention day enſuing he would Excommunicate divers others, whom he had cited, if in the mean time they did not make ſatisfaction; namely Gilbert, Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, and Robert his Vicar, Richard de Lucy, with ſeveral others, and all ſuch as by the King's mandate, or their own raſhneſs, had ſeized his Goods, or thoſe of his Clerks; alſo thoſe by whoſe aſſiſtance or advice the King's mind was ſet againſt the Liberty of the Church, and by whoſe Inſtigation he had proſcribed, and ſpoiled the Innocent; and laſtly, all thoſe who had hindered the Pope's Commiſſioners and his from perſuing the Buſineſs of the Church.

R. H. p. 293 b.

And commands the Dean and Clergy of his Dioceſs to avoid the Company of all thoſe he had excommunicated.

And informs that at ſuch a time he would excommunicate others, if in the mean time they made not ſatisfaction.

[5.] He then alſo gave Robert Biſhop of Hereford notice by another Epiſtle, that he had excommunicated the Biſhop of London, and Gilbert Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, with the reſt of the Perſons already mention'd in his laſt Letter to the Clergy of London; and thoſe who had received Eccleſiaſtical Offices or Benefices from the hands of Laymen, contrary to the Canons, or had uſurped them by their own Authority, &c. And then he commanded him by the Pope's Authority, and his Own, that they ſhould be declared excommunicate throughout his Dioceſs.

In another Letter he gives the Bp. of Hereford notice of all thoſe whom he had excommunicated.

And alſo all thoſe who had receiv'd Eccleſiaſtical Benefices from Laymen's hands.

Not long after the Biſhop of London, (although (in the opinion of ſome) he was thought ſafe from the above ſaid Excommunication of the Archbiſhop by the late Appeal, which he had made to the Pope, yet, it ſeems) his Heart now failed him, and ſo patiently ſubmitting to it, he forbore entring into any Church, till he was abſolved. Roger of Hoveden hath placed theſe Letters under the following Year, but I rather chooſe to follow [1.] Rad. de Diceto, who ſets them down under this, and that in my Judgment with much greater reaſon; for it is not likely, that the Archbiſhop would let all this Time ſlip without doing any thing againſt the Biſhops that oppoſed him, and who ſtill perſiſted in doing ſo after the Pope's and his Admonitions to the contrary.

Upon this the Bp. of London declines entring into any Church, till he was abſolved.

Nor

Nor can I here omit, what the Author of Quadrilogus relates to have been done this Year, (viz.) That the King ſent John of Oxford and Richard of Ivelceſter his Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, with offers to join with him in the Renouncing of Pope Alexander; and that they on the King's behalf actually join'd with the Emperor, and the Archbiſhop of Cologne in the Abjuration of that Pope's Authority, and in the acknowledging the Anti-Pope, whom the Emperor had then ſet up againſt him; and that upon the return of theſe Ambaſſadors, King Henry made all the People of England abjure Pope Alexander; now this is a falſe and malicious Repreſentation of this matter. For all that the King did then (as Matt. Paris relates) was to ſend his Letters to the Archbiſhop of Cologn, ſetting forth, "That he had "for a long time waited for an occaſion to quit Pope Alexander, and "his perfidious Cardinals, who had preſumed to maintain that Traytor Thomas of Canterbury againſt him; and therefore that by the "advice of the Biſhops and Barons of his Kingdom, to wit, the "Archbiſhop of York and others there named, he was reſolved to "ſend to Rome to let the Pope know from him, that he ſhould no "longer uphold his Traytor againſt him; but rid his hands of him, "that ſo he might by his Clergy's conſent appoint another for the "Church of Canterbury, and that he ſhould confirm his antient Laws "and Prerogatives; which if he refuſed to do, neither himſelf, his Barons, nor Clergy, ſhould yield him for the future any Canonical Obedience; and further, that he would openly reſiſt him and all that belonged to him; and whoever ſhould be found adhering to the Pope, "ſhould be expel'd the Kingdom; and then deſires him to ſend "Arnald a Kight Hoſpitalar with all ſpeed, who ſhould have the "Emperor's and the King's ſafe conduct. This is all I can find the King acted in relation to the renouncing Pope Alexander, that the Author of the Quadrilogus, either ignorantly, or wilfully, miſtakes for the King's abſolute Renunciation of him; which I muſt confeſs I cannot find the King ever did: Matt. Paris indeed places this Letter under the next Year, in which perhaps it was ſent, tho it might be written in this.

Anno Dom. MCLXVII

The K ſends Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, offering to join with him in renouncing Pope Alexander.

And they actually join with him and the Bp. of Cologne in Abjuring that Pope's Authority, & acknowledging the Anti-pope.

All the people of England abjure Alexander.

But Matt. Paris gives a quite different relation of this matter.

[2] R. D. Col. 548.

[2.] I find nothing during this Truce between the two Kings to have happen'd conſiderable in France, only Conan Earl of Bretaigne deceaſed and left his only Daughter Conſtantia his Heir, whom he had by the Siſter of the King of Scots; this young Lady was not long after married to Geoffery ſecond Son to King Henry, who being now deſirous to keep that Province in Peace, gain'd the Affections both of the Clergy and Laiety, by gracious and popular Actions.

Conan Earl of Bretaign dies, leaving one Daughter, whom the K. married to his Son Geoffery.

[3] C. G. Col. 1402.

I do not find any thing done farther this year, concerning the Archbiſhop's affairs, [3.] more than that the Pope ſent Two Legates, (viz.) William of Pavia, and one Otto, into France to conſult with the Archbiſhop of Sens, how to procure peace between the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the King; They attended on him indeed, but to no purpoſe, for they found him obſtinate in his firſt Reſolutions: yet that they might do their utmoſt, they alſo met the Archbiſhop of Canterbury between Giſors and Try, where diſcourſing with him, and ſounding his mind by divers queſtions for the peace of the Church, as whither he would renounce his Archbiſhoprick, if the King would give up his Cuſtoms? he refuſed that offer, ſaying, That the King

The Pope ſends two new Legates to the A. Bp. of Sens, to ſee how to reconcile the K. and A. Bp. but all to no purpoſe. They meeting with the A. Bp. found him about Renouncing his A. Biſhoprick, if the K. would give up his Cuſtoms; but he refuſes that offer.

was

was bound for the good of his Soul to renounce thoſe cuſtoms, but he could not renounce his Archbiſhoprick, without betraying the honour of his Church; ſince it was never heard, that any of his Predeceſſors had ever done ſo; therefore the Legates finding him wholly immoveable, and not at all willing to agree with the King upon the Terms they propoſed, as being thought ſubdolous and inſnaring, they return'd again to Rome.

And ſo they return to Rome.

Having thus put together all that concerns the affair of Archbiſhop Becket, and which was tranſacted this Year in Normandy, I ſhall now take notice of what was done in Ireland, which about this Time began to be invaded, and in part conquer'd by the Engliſh, under the Authority of a general Order or Commiſſion from King Henry: I have already given the Reader an account of the King's Title and pretence to that Kingdom, and the great deſire he had from his firſt coming to the Crown to add Ireland by force of Arms to the reſt of his Dominions; and that the better to countenance and ſtrengthen his claim, he had near fifteen Years ſince, obtain'd the Pope's Bull for the total Conqueſt thereof under his Obedience, as has been before related.

The firſt Occaſion of the Conqueſt of Ireland.

But though King Henry thought it not fit then to make uſe of this Grant from the Pope, yet about this time a fair Opportunity offer'd it ſelf of bringing the Engliſh into Ireland, which this King and his Son John improved, to the reducing good part of that Iſland under their Dominion, tho I confeſs, a larger ſhare long after remain'd under the Government of its own Princes: which was the reaſon why none of our Kings, till Henry the VIII. ſtiled themſelves by any higher Title than Lords of Ireland.

A fit opportunity is now offer'd for that deſign, which was afterwards improved by K. Henry and K. John.

As to the State of the Iſland at this time, [4.] Giraldus Cambrenſis tells us, that there were then no leſs than five petty Dominions in it, the Princes of which were often ſtiled Kings, though they were all as it were Feudataries under one Supreme King, or Lord, who was at that time named Rodoric K. of Connaught; [5.] one of thoſe five Princes called Dermot Mac-Morrogh (in Iriſh) or Fitz-Murchard (in French) was then Prince, or King of Leinſter, who from his firſt coming to his Kingdom, was an Oppreſſor of the Nobility, and a cruel Tyrant over his other Subjects: To this ill Treatment of his People, he alſo added another crime, for taking advantage of the abſence of his next Neighbour, Ororic Prince of Methe, who was then gone on progreſs to the farther Parts of his Kingdom, and had left his Wife Omachla behind him, ſafe as he thought in an Iſland, within a Bog; but Dermot and this Princeſs having before held a ſecret Correſpondence, he came ſpeedily thither, and not only debauched her, but carried her away by her own conſent.

[4.] Hiber. Expug. l. 2. c. 1. Five petty Dominions in it under one Supreme Lord.

[1.] Prince Ororic (as he had reaſon) being highly provoked at this outrageous Indignity, reſolved to revenge it; and gathering together what Forces he could, brought alſo Rodoric King of Connaught to his aſſiſtance; whereupon the People of Leinſter, conſidering to what ſtreight their Prince was now reduced, began to diſcover their private Reſentments for the Injuries they had received at his hands, and both the great Men as well as the Common people left him, and joined with his Enemies. Dermot finding himſelf thus forſaken by them, after many conflicts with unequal force, having been always worſted, took

King Henry received him kindly, and having heard the cauſe of his Exile, and coming to him, after he had taken an Oath to be his faithful Vaſſal (though unable at preſent otherwiſe to aſſiſt him) he granted "him his Letters Patents, whereby he gave notice to all his Loving "Subjects, Engliſh, Normans, Welſh and Scots, and to all Nations "under his Dominions, that having received Dermot Prince of Lein- "ſter into his Protection, whoſoever would had free licence to "aid and aſſiſt the ſaid Prince for the reſtoring him to his King-"dom.

Anno Dom. MCLXVII

K. Henry receives him kindly; and having firſt taken his Oath to be his faithful Vaſſal, gives him his Letters Patents for all his Subjects that would, to aſſiſt him to recover his Kingdom.

[2.] Having obtain'd theſe Letters, he went for England, and ſtayed ſome time at Briſtol, where he could receive the beſt Intelligence of the ſtate of his Affairs at home; and during his ſtay there, he often cauſed the King's Letters to be read before the People of that City and the Neighbouring places that reſorted thither, but all in vain, till at length Richard Earl of Striguil (now Chepſtow in Monmouthſhire) Sirnamed Strong-Bow came thither, to ſee and diſcourſe with him; and it was at laſt agreed between them, that the Earl ſhould next Spring aſſiſt him in the recovery of his Country, and that Dermot ſhould give unto him his Eldeſt Daughter in Marriage, with his Kingdom after his Deceaſe.

[2.] Ibid. Cap. 2. Dermot goes for England, lands, & ſtays at Briſtol for ſome time, where he cauſed theſe Letters to be read, but all to no purpoſe.

[3.] This Agreement being thus concluded, Dermot was very deſirous to ſee his native Country, and forthwith went to St. Davids in South-Wales, which was the neareſt paſſage into Leinſter, where Prince Rice or Reeſe ap Griffin then governed, as Feudatary to King Henry; and David the 2d was then Biſhop of St. Davids; theſe both commiſerated his condition, but either would not, or could not do him any other ſervice at this time, than by permitting Robert, Sirnamed Fitz Stephen, Conſtable of Abertivie, (now Caerdigan) Cozen German to Prince Reeſe by Neſta his Father's Siſter, to go along with him, who, being ſome years before taken Priſoner, had been lately releaſed by his Cozen Prince Reeſe, upon condition that he ſhould take up Arms with him againſt King Henry; but Robert, having no mind to fight againſt his own Prince, deſired rather to make his fortunes abroad; therefore by the Mediation of his Half-Brothers, the Biſhop of St. David's and Maurice Fitz Gerald, he obtained a licence of Rees or Rice, to go over into Ireland; whereupon by their Mediation he made a Contract with King Dermot, That provided he would grant the City of Wexford in Fee, with two Cantreds (or Hundreds) adjoining, to himſelf and to Maurice Fitz-Gerald his Brother, they would both aſſiſt him with Men the next Spring; which being agreed on, King Dermot ſoon after embarking at St. Davids, arrived in Ireland, and coming to Ferns, (not far from Wexford,) remained there Incognito with the Clergy of that place all that Winter, which he ſpent in privately carrying on his intended deſign of recovering his loſt Dominions.

At length Richard Strongbow agrees to aſſiſt him in the following Spring, and Dermot to give him in marriage his Eldeſt Daughter, with his Kingdom after his Death.

[3.] Id ibid. Dermot goes to St. Davids in South-Wales, the neareſt paſſage into his own Country.

Prince Rees & David the Bp. there, pity his condition.

Fitz-Stephen has leave to go into Ireland to aſſiſt K. Dermot rather than fight againſt K. Henry.

But I find nothing to have been done in England this Year worth our noting; [4.] unleſs that the King being ſollicited to ſend his Daughter Mathilda to her Husband the Duke of Saxony (to whom ſhe had been affianced near Two years before;) to this end wrote for the Queen his Wife, and ſaid Daughter, to come over into Normandy, which order they immediately obey'd.

Owen and Rees beſiege Ruthland, and take it; as alſo Preſtatyn, and bring all Tigengel under Owen's Subjection.

But before I return to the War in France, give me leave to look back into England, where all things continued quiet, [1.] except in Wales, where Owen Prince of North-Wales, Cadwalladar his Brother, and Rees Prince of South-Wales, brought an Army into Powis-Land againſt Owen Cyvelioc, Lord of that Territory, and won all his Country, and drove him out of it, and gave a great part of it, called Caerneon to Owen Vachan, the Son of Madoc ap Meredyth, to hold of Prince Owen; and the Lord Rees had Walweren, becauſe it ſtood within his Territories; but in a little while after, Owen Cyvelioc returned with a great number of Normans and Engliſhmen to recover his Country, and laid Seige to the Caſtle of Caerneon, and taking the ſame, burnt it to the ground. Alſo the ſame Year the aforeſaid Princes Owen, Rees, and Cadwalladar laid Seige to the Caſtle of Ruthland, which King Henry had lately built, and fortified; and though the Garriſon defended it ſtoutly for a long time, yet theſe Princes would not depart until they had taken it, which was after Two Month's Siege, and then razed it; they got likewiſe the Caſtle of Preſtatin, and deſtroyed it, and brought all Tigengel under Prince Owen's Subjection; who then return'd into his Country with Great honour.

Robert Fitz-Stephen goes into Ireland to aſſiſt King Dermt.

I ſhall now proceed to relate the mighty Succeſs of a handful of Engliſh this Year in Ireland: [2.] for about this time Robert Fitz-Stephen being not unmindful of his late engagement to King Dermot, to come over to his Aſſiſtance, embarked with Thirty Knights, Sixty Eſquires (or Men of Arms) on Horſeback, and Three Hundred Archers on Foot, in three Ships, and landed about the firſt of May this Year at Bannough-Bay, not far from Waterford, and the next day Maurice de Prendergraſt, a Brave Souldier, following Fitz-Stephen on the ſame deſign, ſet ſail from Milford-Haven, and landed at the ſame place, with Ten Knights and a great number of Bow men, whom he tranſported in two Ships; but not thinking themſelves ſafe in the ſmall Iſle of Bannough where they lay, their landing being now known to the Country; they preſently diſpatched Meſſengers to King Dermot, who forthwith ſent his natural Son Donald with Five Hundred Men to receive them, and follow'd him in perſon with all ſpeed; where, renewing their former Agreement, and confirming it with their Oaths, they join'd their Forces, and marched towards Wexford about Twelve Miles from Bannough. Upon their approach the Town's-Men, to the Number of about Two Thouſand, marched forth with an Intention to give them Battle; but when they ſaw the unexpected Numbers, with the Order and Diſcipline of the Engliſh Forces, ſuch as they had never known before, they were greatly diſmaid, and burning the Subburbs, retir'd into the Town.

Fitz-Stephen aſſaults Wexford, but is repulſed.

Upon this Fitz-Stephen prepar'd to ſtorm it, and having cauſed the Ditches to be filled, his men made a vigorous aſſault, but being repulſed by the Citizens, they were forced for the the preſent to ſound a Retreat.

But

[3.] But when they ſaw that he was preparing for another Aſſault the day following, they deſpaired of defending their City, and ſo deſired a Treaty; the Iſſue whereof was, the Surrendering of the Town, and the delivery of four Hoſtages to King Dermot for their future Fidelity; who ſo ſoon as he was poſſeſſed of the City, gave it, with the whole Territory, to Robert Fitz Stephen, and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, according to the Agreement he had before made with them. Anno Dom. MCLXVIII.

[3] Id. ib. But the Wexfordians, upon his preparing for another Aſſault, ſurrender'd the Town, giving four Hoſtages to Dermot for their future Fidelity.

Wexford being thus reduced, King Dermot, by the addition of many of the Inhabitants of that Place, [4.] now made up an Army of about Three thouſand Men, with whom he marched againſt Donald King, or Prince, of Offery, who of all his late Vaſſals, was now his greateſt Enemy. This Army advancing to the Skirts of the Country, entred a little way into it; but finding the Paſſages through the Woods and Bogs ſo well fortified, and ſtoutly defended by the Natives, that they could not without great hazard aſſault them, King Dermot retreated into the Plains; and this ſo encouraged the Offerians, thinking their Enemies had turned their backs through fear, that they ſallied out of their Faſtneſſes, and perſued them into the Champaign Country.

[4.] Ibid cap.4. Dermot marches to Offery.

But finding the Paſſages ſo well fortified againſt him, he makes a Retreat.

[5.] Upon this Robert Fitz-Stephen taking the advantage, faced about with his Horſe, and charged them furiouſly, and making a great ſlaughter of them with his Lances, totally routed them; and then entring into the moſt inward Parts of the Country, he ruined it all with Slaughter, Rapine and Burning: So that the Prince of Offery, by advice of his Council, deſired Peace, gave Hoſtages, and again ſwore Fidelity to King Dermot.

[5.] Id. ib. Fitz-Stephen totally Routs the Offerians with his Horſe.

And the Pr. of Offery ſwears Fidelity to Dermot.

[1.] The Engliſh Confederates becoming formidable by this Succeſs through the whole Iſland, Roderic King of Connaught, and Monarch of Ireland, by his Meſſengers called together all the Princes or Chief Men of the whole Nation; who upon conſultation unanimouſly agreed to riſe againſt Dermot, and to that end brought vaſt Forces into the Province of Leinſter, whereupon moſt of his pretended Friends forſook him, not regarding their Promiſes or Oaths; only Fitz-Stephen and his Men, with ſome few others, ſtuck cloſe to him; and in a place not far from Ferns, ſurrounded with thick Woods, Steep Mountains and Bogs, (by Nature and Scituation almoſt inacceſſible,) they ſecur'd themſelves by cutting down Trees, and therewith making ſuch a Fort as was capable to receive their Friends, and keep out their Enemies.

[1.] Id.ib.cap.5. Roderic, by advice of his Council, reſolves with all his Force to oppoſe Dermot.

[2.] King Roderic thereupon ſent to Fitz-Stephen, and endeavour'd to perſwade him by great Promiſes and Gifts to depart the Country, but could not prevail; the Meſſengers then turning to King Dermot, endeavour'd to perſwade him to join his Arms, and drive out the Strangers, with a full aſſurance, that he ſhould peaceably enjoy all Leinſter, with the friendſhip of Roderic his Sovereign Prince; but he would not hearken to any ſuch Overtures.

[2.] Ib. Cap.6. Roderic ſollicits Fitz-Stephen to leave the Country, but could not prevail.

[3.] Yet at length, by the Mediation of Friends, a Peace was made on theſe Conditions; That Dermot ſhould quietly enjoy Leinſter, acknowledging Roderic as Chief King and Monarch over all Ireland; and, that it might remain firm and laſting, he delivered his Son Cnute to him as an Hoſtage. This Agreement was publiſh'd and confirm'd by mutual Oaths; and it was further privately agreed between them, [3.] Id.ib. c.10. A Peace concluded between Dermot and Roderic.

Anno Dom. MCLXVIII.

That Dermot ſhould call no more Strangers into Ireland, and that ſuch as were there ſhould be ſent away.

[4.] Ib. Cap. 11. Maurice Fitz-Gerald Lands at Wexford with a great Force.

[4.] Immediately after this Agreement Maurice Fitz-Gerald (above mention'd) Half-Brother to Fitz-Stephen, a Perſon of great Courage and Conduct, came with Ten Knights, Thirty Horſemen, and a Hundred Archers of Foot, in two Ships, into Ireland, and Landed at Wexford. Dermot was ſo enraged at his Arrival, that forthwith raiſing an Army, he marched toward Dublin, which was then in Rebellion, Maurice being made General, (while Fitz-Stephen was buſied in building a Caſtle upon a Rock called Karrec,) and in a little time the whole Territory adjoyning to the City was almoſt deſtroyed with Fire and Sword; whereupon the Citizens deſiring a Peace, ſurrender'd the Town, and gave good Security to their Prince for their future Fidelity.

Dermot marches towards Dublin, and deſtroys almoſt the whole Country with Fire and Sword.

[5.] Id. ib. Roderic invades Limrick upon a Quarrel between Him, and Donald its Prince. But is vanquiſhed, and forced to withdraw with diſgrace.

[5.] In the mean time there happen'd a Quarrel between Roderic King of Connaught, and Donald Prince of Limerick; Whereupon Roderic with an Army invading the Country of Limerick, Dermot ſent Fitz-Stephen with his Troops to the Aid of his Son-in-Law, Prince Donald, by whoſe Aſſiſtance he obtained the better over them in every Conflict; inſomuch that Roderic withdrew himſelf from his Government with diſgrace. King Dermot being encouraged by this Succeſs, and having now regain'd his Country, propounded to himſelf nothing leſs than the ſubduing of all Connaught, and thereby obtaining the Sovereignty of Ireland; which Secret he imparted to Maurice and Fitz-Stephen, who thought it might be eaſily accompliſh'd if he could procure ſome greater number of Engliſh Forces, and therefore earneſtly deſired him to ſend for them; whereupon he wrote to Richard Earl of Striguil to mind him of his Promiſe, and to let him know, that the Year was already near ſpent without ſeeing him, or receiving any aſſiſtance from him; and therefore deſired him to make good his Agreement lately made in England.

Dermot projects the obtaining the Sovereignty of Ireland, and imparts the Secret to Maurice and Fitz-Stephen. They think it eaſy to effect, if they could get more Forces from England.

Dermot writes to the E. of Striguil to make good his Agreement.

[1.] Id. ib. E. Striguil goes to K. Henry, and deſires him either to give him his Eſtate again, or let him go ſeek his Fortune abroad.

[1.] The Earl upon receipt of theſe Letters went to King Henry, then in Normandy, and earneſtly intreated him, either to reſtore his Hereditary Eſtate, which he had formerly taken from him, or give him leave to make his Fortune in ſome other Nation. Then he having received from the King a ſeeming, rather than a Real Licence, (and that by word of mouth only) reſolved on an Expedition into Ireland ſo ſoon as he could raiſe ſufficient Forces for that purpoſe, and in the mean time would ſend thither a ſmall Body of Men (to keep up their ſpirits) till his Arrival, which he promiſed to be the Spring following, as you will find under the next Year.

He ſends ſome Forces firſt into Ireland, to keep up their Spirits till he could follow them.

But it is now time to look back into France, and ſee what has been doing there all this while, where I find no great Action; only that this

So that he was thereupon forced to march into their Country, where he deſtroyed their Towns and Villages, took their Caſtles, and put Gariſons into them; then leaving thoſe Countries to the Care of his Queen, and Patrick E. of Salisbury, he went to meet the King of France, eight days after Eaſter, between Mante and Pacey, to expoſtulate with him concerning the Injuries he had lately received at his hands; for the Poictovins had now applied to the King of France, and put themſelves under his Protection, and given Pledges for their Fidelity, notwithſtanding they were King Henry's proper Subjects. The two Kings had a long and ſharp Debate about this matter; however the King of France would not deliver up his Hoſtages, though they were received contrary to Juſtice; and therefore the Truce was only prolonged until eight days after Midſummer, and then the War broke out afreſh between them.

[3.] About this time alſo Patrick Earl of Salisbury was ſlain by the Treachery of the Poictovins, or rather of Earl Guy of Leziniam, who murther'd him in his return from a Pilgrimage he had made to St. James's in Spain; but Earl Guy for this Offence was driven by King Henry out of Poictou; and ſo he went from thence into the Holy-Land, where he died Governor, during the minority of King Baldwin the Younger, whoſe Mother he had married.

[4.] In the mean while (I ſuppoſe towards the end of this Year) the Duke of Saxony (the King's new Son-in-Law) with the Archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne, and Biſhop of Leige (all Chief Princes of the Empire) came to the King (being then in Normandy) on an Ambaſſy from the Emperor; the Intent of which was, To promiſe the King a powerful Aſſiſtance againſt France, yet with a deſign (on that Condition) to draw him in to joyn with them in their preſent Schiſm againſt the Pope; but the King not being reſolved wholly to break with him, though he received theſe Ambaſſadors with great outward Reſpect, yet he put them off with fair Words and general Promiſes, and ſo ſent them away well enough ſatisfied with the noble Preſents he made them, notwithſtanding he did not comply with their deſires.

[5.] About the ſame time alſo ſome of the Nobility of Bretaign rebelled, againſt whom King Henry preſently marched; and beginning with the Head of them, (viz.) Eudo Viſcount of Brogaret, or Porhoët, took his chief Caſtle, which he preſently burnt; and waſting all his Territories, deſpoiled him of the whole Country of Brogaret, (from whence He had his Title) together with the City of Vannes, its Metropolis. After this he marched into the Country of Dinan, and took that, and all the Fortreſſes round about it into his poſſeſſion.

[1.] Then eight days after Midſummer the Two Kings met again at Ferte Bernard (a Caſtle in Main near the Edge of Perche) to treat of Peace, but ſtill, as before, parted without Succeſs; for the Bretaigns and Poictovins when they gave Hoſtages to the King of France, he Covenanted with them, that he would make no Peace with the King of England without their conſent. Hereupon both ſides fortified their Borders, and continued Skirmiſhing in ſmall Parties until Advent, (i. e. until a Month before Chriſtmas) when King Henry, by the Aſſiſtance of Matthew Earl of Boloign, march'd into the Country of John Earl of Ponthieu, and burnt above Forty of his Towns and Villages, becauſe he had refuſed Earl Matthew's Forcesa paſſage through his Country; ſo that he was obliged to convey them into Normandy by Sea. In the mean while the French King burnt the Caſtle of Brueroles, and waſted almoſt the whole Country of Perche.

The Poictovins and Bretaigns comprized in this Peace.

[5.] G. G. Col. 1405.

K. Henry and the A. Biſhop brought together in the Preſence of the K. of France, and the A. Bp. offered to put the Controverſy to the Arbitration of that King, ſaving the Honour due to God.

This Salvo mightily incenſes the K. Yet makes a fair Offer to the A. Bp.

[2.] Thus the War continued very ſharp between the Two Kings till near Chriſtmas, and then by the Interceſſion of certain Religious Men, who wiſh'd well to both Parties, there was a Peace agreed upon; for the confirmation of which, an Enterview alſo was appointed at the Feaſt of Epiphany then next enſuing.

At which time the Two Kings, with the Great Men of both Kingdoms, met at Mont-Mirail to conclude the aforeſaid Peace; and it being at length finiſhed, King Henry ſpoke thus to the King of France: My Lord the King, This being the Day on which the Three Kings offer'd Gifts to the King of Kings, I likewiſe commend my Sons and Territories to your Protection. To whom the King of France thus anſwer'd; Since the King of Kings did now, as on this day, graciouſly receive thoſe Gifts, let your Sons afford us their Preſence, and they ſhall from us receive the Territories they would poſſeſs. [3.] Then came Henry the King's Eldeſt Son, and received from the King of France the Earldoms of Anjou and Main, doing him Homage for them; but as for the Dukedom of Normandy, he had done Homage before.

At the ſame time alſo King Lewis his Father-in-Law made him Seneſchal of France, which Office had long before belong'd to the Earldom of Anjou; and at Candlemas following, Prince Henry went to Paris, and there waited on the King of France at his Table, by virtue likewiſe of that Office.

[4.] Some ſhort time after, Richard the King's Second Son was affianced to Alice, Second Daughter of the King of France, and being then by him Inveſted with the Dutchy of Aquitain, did him Homage for it: the Poictovins and Bretaigns, who had taken part with the King of France, were alſo comprized in this Peace, and all ſeemingly reconciled to the King.

[5.] Not long after this Enterview, the King and Archbiſhop Thomas were brought together in the Preſence of King Lewis, when the Archbiſhop offer'd to put the whole Controverſy between them to that King's Arbitration, ſaving the Honour that was due to God: Which laſt words, when K. Henry heard, he was very angry at, and reproached him for them; to whom the Archbiſhop anſwer'd very calmly and gently; but the King obſerving that he gained upon the Auditory, interrupted him, and ſaid to the King of France; Pray ſee, Sir, the cunning Evaſions of this Man; for whatever diſpleaſes him, he preſently cries, 'Tis contrary to the Honour due to God; under which pretence he would diſpoſſeſs me of all my Rights. Yet that he might not ſeem to derogate from the Honour of God, He ſaid, "That there had been many Kings "of England before him, ſome of greater, and others of leſs Power than "himſelf; and that there had been alſo many Archbiſhops of Canter-"bury before Thomas Becket, Great and Holy Men; Let him there-"fore (ſays he) do what the greateſt and moſt Holy of his Prede-"ceſſors did to the leaſt of mine, and I will acquieſce in it; and added, That He drove him not from the Kingdom, but he himſelf fled away privately, no man compelling him: Yet he now inſinuates to the King of France and his Nobility, that he only defended the Cauſe of God's Church; as for his own part, he always deſired, and now granted, that the Archbiſhop ſhould enjoy his Church, and Govern it with the ſame Liberty that any of his Predeceſſors had done before.

[5.] Then

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

[1.] Then it was agreed by all there preſent, that the King had yielded ſufficiently, and the King of France himſelf ſeeming much moved againſt the Archbiſhop, asked him, "Whither he would be "greater than the Saints, or better than St. Peter? The Archbiſhop "replied, He would willingly enjoy his Church in the ſame Liberty "his Predeceſſors had done; but thoſe Cuſtoms, which were contrary "to the Inſtitutions of the Holy Fathers, he would never receive; "the Mediators then adviſed him to ſubmit to the King, and give "him his due Honour: He replied, Our Fathers ſuffer'd, becauſe they "would not deny the Name of Chriſt, and ſhould I for the Favour of Man "ſuppreſs the Honour of God?

[1.] Id. ib. Which was approved by the K. of France.

[2.] At which all the Great Men of both Kingdoms roſe up unanimouſly againſt him, ſaying, His Arrogance was the main Obſtacle of Peace; and becauſe he ſo obſtinately oppoſed the Pleaſure of both Kings, he was unworthy of the Aſſiſtance of either of them; and being baniſh'd England, he ought not to be received in France. King Henry's Courtiers further told him to his face, That he was always Proud, and only wiſe in his own Conceit. Hereupon the King of France's Countenance ſeem'd changed towards him for ſome days, and did not viſit him as he was wont, nor afford him his uſual Supplies. Though this fit did not laſt very long, for he ſent again for him; and when he came, he found the King ſitting with a melancholy Countenance, not riſing up to him as he uſed to do; but on a ſudden, fetching a deep Sigh, he threw himſelf at the Archbiſhop's Feet, ſaying, Thou only haſt a diſcerning Spirit; and repeating thoſe words with a Sigh, Verily Thou only haſt a diſcerning Spirit, we were all blind who Counſelled thee againſt God, and that for the favour of Man thou ſhouldeſt be ſilent in a matter ſo nearly concerning God's Honour: I repent, I repent; Father, pardon me, I beſeech you, and abſolve me from this fault; and from this hour I offer you my Self and Kingdom. Then the Archbiſhop raiſed up the King and Abſolved him.

[2.] Id. ib. The Great Men both of England and France riſe up againſt him, condemning his Arrogance.

The King of France altered towards him for a while, but it was all Trick and Hypocriſy.

The Monkiſh Writers of this Man's Life make this ſudden Change of the French King's Mind a wonderful Miracle; but though the true Cauſe thereof be not expreſsly mention'd by them, yet we may gueſs by Circumſtances at the Reaſon of it; for it ſeems very likely that the Archbiſhop had given King Lewis private notice, how but a few days before, King Henry had broken all the Articles of the Agreement which he had made with the Poictovins and Bretaigns in the Treaty of Mount-Mirail by his Mediation; whereupon [3.] Gervaſe tells us, that at the publick Receipt of this News, he again highly magnified Archbiſhop Becket's foreſight of what he had told him concerning the King of England; who now hearing what had happen'd, ſent to him to let him know, "That he much wonder'd he ſhould keep the Archbiſhop "in his Country, who had ſo contumaciouſly refuſed the Peace and "Reconciliation lately offer'd unto him: but the King of France bad "his Envoys tell their Maſter, That ſeeing he ſtood ſo much upon "thoſe Cuſtoms, (which he called Antient) he would not abate any "thing of that Old Liberty the Kings of France had always taken, "which was, To relieve all oppreſſed and exil'd perſons, eſpecially "Eccleſiaſticks.

The Deſign diſcover'd.

[3.] Col. 1407.

Thus

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

Thus we ſee this cunning Prince either frown'd, or ſmil'd upon the Archbiſhop, as he found it moſt conducing to his own preſent Intereſt, and the perplexing of King Henry's Affairs, and then pretended a divine Impulſe for it.

[4] R. H. p. 295. a.

[4.] About this time the King finding that moſt of thoſe about him ſtood Excommunicated by the Archbiſhop, with the Pope's leave, and at the Intreaty of ſome of the Biſhops, as well as of the Chief Men of the Kingdom, who were afraid of being involved in the like Sentence, He appealed again and again from the Archbiſhop to the Pope; and not able to endure the Condemnation of thoſe about him, ſent two Arch-Deacons to Rome to complain of the Injury done him, and to deſire that Legates might come forthwith to Abſolve his Excommunicated Servants, and to ſettle Peace, leſt he ſhould be otherwiſe compell'd to provide for his own Honour and Security by ſome other way.

K. Henry again and again Appeals from the A. Bp. to the Pope.

And ſent two Arch-deacons to Rome, deſiring that Legates might come hither to Abſolve his Excommunicated Servants and to ſettle Peace.

This Requeſt of the King, the Pope preſently complied with, and prohibited the Archbiſhop from iſſuing out any Sentence of Excommunication againſt Him or his Servants, whom he alſo promiſed to Abſolve by his Legates, as appears by his Letter to the King in the ſame Author. And, although the Archbiſhop ſent his Meſſengers to oppoſe and obviate the King's deſigns, yet at laſt it was agreed at Rome, that Gratian, the late Pope Eugenius his Nephew, and Vivian, an Advocate of the Roman Court, Perſons of great Wiſdom and Eloquence, ſhould be ſent to the King to perſwade him to be reconciled to the Archbiſhop; and they ſoon after coming into Normandy, and diſcourſing with him about it, he readily conſented that the Archbiſhop might return into England, and enjoy his Archbiſhoprick in peace, ſaving to the King the Honour of his Kingdom. Hereupon they being overjoyed with theſe Conceſſions, reſolved, that Vivian ſhould go over into England, and there Abſolve the Excommunicated Biſhops, whilſt Gratian ſhould ſtay behind to perfect this Reconciliation. But the next day, when the King was gone away, they fear'd there was ſome fallacy hidden under his fair promiſes, and therefore they would not ſtand to theirs, but ſent after him, Peter Arch-Deacon of Pavia, to Sound him further. This ſo provoked the King, that the Arch-Deacon narrowly eſcaped very hard Uſage; therefore Gratian, who was a briſker Man, and more ſevere to the King than his Colleague Vivian, ceaſed not moſt confidently to importune, nay even to reprove Him about the Archbiſhop, and, deſpiſing all the Preſents he offer'd him, return'd in great haſte to Rome, leaving Vivian behind him.

'Tis agreed at Rome, that two Legates ſhould be ſent to the King.

They fear a fallacy in the King's Promiſes, and therefore would not be oblig'd to ſtand to theirs.

The Arch-deacon of Pavia narrowly eſcapes hard Uſage from the King.

Gratian in haſte returns to Rome, and leaves Vivian behind him.

[5.] Id ib. K. Henry, to appeaſe the K. of France, pretends to be reconciled to the A. Bp.

Therefore goes in Perſon to France under pretence of a Pilgrimage, and there a Peace is mediated for the A. Bp.

[5.] But the King grew very Jealous of this ſudden Departure of the Legate, and perceiving the King of France highly provoked by the late Breach of the Articles of Peace, he began to conſider by what means he might appeaſe him; therefore thought beſt to ſeem, as if he deſired to be throughly reconciled to the Archbiſhop, leſt he ſhould be compelled to it againſt his Will; whereupon he ſeemed very ſorry that he had not ſooner granted the Archbiſhop what he had ſo long required: So that without deſiring any further Enterview with King Lewis, he ſo far condeſcended, as to go into France in Perſon, under a pretence of a Pilgrimage to the Shrine of St. Denis; and being there honourably received, the Two Kings met again at Mount-Martre near Paris, and diſcourſed concerning the reſtoring of the Archbiſhop; who though he did not appear in Perſon, yet was not far off.

[5.] But

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

[1.] But when it had been long debated concerning the beſt means of making a Reconciliation between them; and that it ſeem'd hard to find out an Expedient how to do it, without injuring the Rights of the Church on the one hand, or thoſe of the King on the other: At laſt it was agreed by the Advice of the King of France, as alſo of his Biſhops and Nobility, That the Archbiſhop ſhould reduce his Demands into writing, and deliver them to King Henry; which was done accordingly, being to this effect.

[1.] R. D. Col. 550.

The King orders the Archbiſhop to put his Demands into writing.

1. He deſired, that the King, for the good of his Soul, would receive him again into his Favour according to the Pope's Command.

2. That he would grant him, and all thoſe who were baniſh'd the Kingdom on his account, Peace and Security for themſelves and their Eſtates, without any evil (or ſiniſter) meaning.

3. That he ſhould reſtore to him the Church of Canterbury, and all the Poſſeſſions thereto belonging, in the ſame State of Freedom and Liberty as he had ever enjoy'd them, ſince he was promoted to the Archbiſhoprick.

4. Laſtly, That the King ſhould permit him to diſpoſe of all Benefices and Prebends thereunto belonging, and that had became vacant, ſince his leaving the Kingdom, as he ſhould think fit.

[2.] The King would not give his Aſſent to two of theſe Articles, for he did not think it agreeable to his Royal Dignity to allow the Archbiſhop any thing by way of Reſtitution, ſince He had not driven him out of the Kingdom; neither would He make void the Grants he had made of the vacant Benefices; but that he might ſhew himſelf a Prince * obliged to Laws, he there publickly declared before the King of France, That he was ready to ſatisfy the Archbiſhop in all things, and would ſtand to the Judgment either of the Great Men of France in the Court at Paris, or elſe of the Gallican Church, if ſhe would interpoſe her Self; if not, to ſuch learned Men of divers Provinces, who would impartially examine this Affair: So the King who before had raiſed the Hatred of moſt Men againſt him, regain'd their Favour, by this ſo reaſonable and fair an Offer.

* Legibus alligatum.

[3.] Yet, in the concluſion, the King offer'd, that the Archbiſhop ſhould return, and enjoy his Archbiſhoprick with the ſame Rights and Liberties that any of his Predeceſſors had enjoy'd it; and beſides, promiſed to give him a Thouſand Marks towards the Expences of his Journey home; but he demanded Thirty Thouſand for his Loſſes, ſaying, That unleſs the King fully reſtored what he had taken away, his Sins could not be remitted. Upon this the King of France and the Great Men of both Kingdoms perſwaded him to quit ſome part of his Demands, which he at laſt agreed to; then the Archbiſhop (by the Pope's Command, as he ſaid) required of the King ſufficient Security for the true Obſervation of the Peace.

[3.] G. G. ib.

The K. promiſed to give him 1000 Marks towards his Expences.

But the Archbiſhop demands 30000 Marks.

All things at length are agreed.

[4.] Then all there preſent ſaid, That Caution or Security was not to be exacted from a King, and that his Word, with the Kiſs of Peace, was ſufficient. This being intimated by the King of France to King Henry, he ſaid he would never willingly grant that, becauſe in a paſſion he had once publickly ſworn, he would never Kiſs the Archbiſhop, although he ſhould be reconciled to him, and receive him into favour; yet

[4.] Id. ib.

Oſculum Pacis, a Ceremony then uſed.

But K. Henry denied to give him the Kiſs of Peace.

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

yet however he would not retain the leaſt Rancor or Malice againſt him.

This wilful humour of the Kings proved a great prejudice to his Affairs, as you will find anon. But [5.] Fitz-Stephen gives us ſomewhat a different Account of this Meeting, as that the Archbiſhop being now again interrogated about the Articles propoſed at the laſt Meeting, ſtill kept to his former Anſwer, without any alteration; whereupon King Henry, to ſatisfy the Audience, offer'd to refer all Differences between them to the Judgment of the Clergy of France, or elſe to that of the Univerſity of Paris, but ſaid not a word of making that Reſtitution which the Archbiſhop had hitherto inſiſted on: ſo when the King had made this Offer, he left the Aſſembly, and went to Paris to viſit the Queen and the Young Prince Philip: and upon this denial the Treaty breaking off abruptly, the Archbiſhop went away with higher Reſentments than ever againſt the King.

Fitz-Stephen gives a different account of this meeting.

[5.] In vita Archiepiſcopi MSS.

The K. offer'd to refer all Differences between him and the A Bp. to the Judgment of the Clergy of France, or to that of the Univerſity of Paris.

From whence we may obſerve the great Obſtinacy of this Prelate, who would not refer his Cauſe to ſo impartial Judges, nor would be contented with leſs than all his Demands.

And by this [1.] Author it appears farther, that the King of France and other Mediators ſuſpecting ſome hidden Reſerve under the King's fair Words, only reported them to the Archbiſhop, without perſwading him one way or other; but He would not accept of any Terms, unleſs they were confirmed by the Kiſs; whereupon all Parties went their ways without concluding any Peace, and that only for want of this Ceremony: [2.] Then the King of France ſent his Letters and Meſſengers (together with thoſe of the Archbiſhop) to the Pope, beſeeching him that he would no longer delay the Sentence againſt King Henry; nay, the Biſhop of Sens went in Perſon to prevail with the Pope to iſſue out his * Interdict upon England, unleſs Peace was ſpeedily reſtor'd to the Church: But King Henry having notice of it, ſent into England a ſevere Edict, or Precept, againſt bringing any Letters, or Mandates from the Pope or Archbiſhop, making all Perſons ſwear to the Obſervation of every Article therein contained; which ſince they are long, I ſhall here abridge.

[1.] Id. ib. But the A. Bp. would not accept the terms without the Kiſs.

[2.] C. G. Col. 1408, 1409. The King of France and A. Bp. of Sens excite the Pope againſt King Henry, and the latter goes in Perſon to Rome to ſollicit to have England under an Interdict.

* i. e. of the Sacraments & Divine Service.

The [3.] Firſt Injunction was, That if any perſon whatſoever, after the Feaſt of St. Denis, was found bringing over, or publiſhing the Pope's, or the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Letters, or any Command on their behalf, containing an Interdict, he ſhould be ſeized, and Juſtice done upon him as a Traytor to the King and Kingdom.

Upon which K. Henry ſends a ſevere Edict into England againſt bringing any Letters of Interdict from either the Pope or A Bp. and that all perſons ſhould Swear to obſerve every Article.

2. If any Biſhops or Abbots, or any Clerk or Layman, ſhould obſerve the Sentence of this Interdict, they and all their Kindred ſhould be immediately baniſhed the Land, and all their Chattels and Eſtates confiſcated to the King's uſe; and that all Clerks, who had Eſtates either within England or without, ſhould be Summon'd through all Counties, That if they return'd not by the Feaſt of St. Hilary, all their Revenues ſhould be ſeized into the King's hand.

[3.] Id. Col. 1409.

3. No Appeal was to be made to the Pope, nor the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, nor any Plea to be held by their Command; and if any one after the Feaſt of St. Denis ſhould be found guilty of this Offence, he he ſhould be ſecur'd, and all his Chattels and Poſſeſſions taken into the King's hand, of what Order or Condition ſoever he were. Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

4. If any Clerk, Chanon or Monk of any Order whatſoever, came from beyond Sea, he ſhould be ſearched; and though nothing were found upon him, unleſs he have the King's Paſs, he ſhould not go any farther, but return as ſoon as poſſible; and if any ſuch forbidden thing as aforeſaid were found about him, he ſhould be taken and impriſon'd.

5. The Fifth abſolutely Prohibits all Clergymen from coming over into England without the King's Paſs.

6. If any Welſh Clerk Landed in England without the King's Paſs, he was to be ſeiz'd and put in Priſon, and all Welſhmen in Engliſh Schools (or Univerſities) were to be baniſh'd.

Further, the Sheriffs of England were to Summon all Knights and Free-Holders, and all thoſe of Fifteen years old, in their ſeveral Counties, to appear at the County-Court, to be there Sworn to the ſaid Articles; as alſo throughout all Cities and Burroughs, that they ſhould keep all theſe Injunctions on pain of Life and Members; and that ſending their Officers over all the Villages of England, they ſhould make all thoſe Swear, who did not come to the County-Court, to obſerve theſe Articles, as well as others; Whereupon all Perſons throughout England, from the very Boy to the Old Man, were forced to renounce their Obedience to Pope Alexander and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (as our Author calls the King's Aſſertion of his Right, in order to his own Preſervation.) But the Biſhops being aſſembled, and asked to confirm this Oath of the People by their own Authority, utterly refuſed it, being reſtrain'd through meer Shame, as R. Hoveden will have it.

I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of the further ſucceſs of the Engliſh Arms in Ireland: I told you under the laſt, that Richard Earl of Striguil, looking upon himſelf as ſufficiently authorized by the King's verbal Licenſe, or Commiſſion, reſolved to go over into Ireland the next Summer; in order to which [4.] about the beginning of May, he ſent over a young Gentleman of his Retinue called Raymond, Nephew to Maurice and Fitz-Stephen by their Elder Brother, who with Ten Knights, or Men at Arms, and 70 Archers, Landed in Ireland under a Rock called Dundolf, four Miles from Waterford, where they built a ſmall Caſtle of Wood and Turf.

[4] G. C. & J. 13. Annal. Hib. Raymond ſent by E. Richard with Forces into Ireland.

This news the Citizens of Waterford no ſooner underſtood, but gathering together a Body of Three Thouſand Men, they paſſed the the River Swere, and marched towards the Fort, with a deſign to aſſault it; at whoſe coming Raymond was ſo far from being daunted, that he and his Men ſallied out upon them; but being oppreſſed with their Numbers, they were forced back to the Caſtle, and their Enemies purſuing, enter'd with them: Raymond ſeeing in what danger he was in, by a lucky preſence of mind boldly faced about upon them, and with his Sword cut them down one by one as they entred, and then with a great Outcry calling back his Men to his Defence, he ſtruck ſuch a Damp and Terror into his Enemies, that they gave way, and fled in ſo great confuſion and diſorder, that Raymond and his Men in the perſuit killed above Five Hundred of them.

He obtains a great Victory over the Iriſh.

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

Several of the Citizens of Waterford taken Priſoners,

And are barbarouſly deſtroyed.

By this Victory they had taken Seventy of the Chief Citizens of Waterford Priſoners, for whom they might have had very conſiderable Ranſoms, or perhaps have obtain'd the City it ſelf. But, contrary to the opinion of Raymond, by the advice of Harvey of Mount Maurice, (who had brought in with him a few Men at his firſt Landing) they rather choſe to ſatisfy his cruel humour, and ſo caſt them headlong into the Sea, which was certainly a horrid piece of Barbarity: but our Author excuſes it by telling us, that Harvey did this to ſtrike a Terror into the Iriſh; ſo that though they were many more in number, yet ſhould not dare for the future to oppoſe them: and he gives us two long Speeches, which he ſuppoſes Raymond and Harvey to have made on this occaſion.

[5.] Id. ib. Annal. Hib. Earl Richard lands near Waterford.

But I wiſh he had rather told us, what theſe Engliſhmen did for two or three Months following; [5.] till about the end of Auguſt, when Earl Richard (commonly called Strongbow) Landed near Waterford with 200 Horſemen or Men at Arms, and about 1000 Others, and within Two days after aſſaulted the Town; but though they were twice repuls'd by the Citizens, yet upon the Third Attack they enter'd and killed very many in the Streets, and obtained a Bloody Victory: they took Mac Laghlin Prince of Ophaly, and one Reginald, Priſoners; but by the Mediation of King Dermot they had their Lives ſaved: with him came Maurice Fitz Gerard, Robert Fitz-Stephen and Raymond, who joined their Forces with Earl Richard, to whom Dermot then gave his Daughter Eva in Marriage, according to the contract formerly made between them.

Obtains a Bloody Victory, and takes Mac Laghlin, Pr. of Ophaly Priſoner.

Dermot, according to the Contract gives Eva his D. in Marriage to E. Richard.

[1.] Ibid. Dublin aſſaulted and taken.

This [1.] Solemnity being over, they all marched together in a Body to beſiege Dublin, and had not long ſat down before it, but Raymond and Miles Cogan, with a ſelect Company of Valiant young Men aſſaulted, and ſoon made themſelves Maſters of it, and kill'd many Citizens therein: But the Governor, Haſculf (a Norwegian) with the better part of the Garriſon and Inhabitants (taking with them all their Money) got out of the other ſide of the City, and recovered their Ships then lying in the Road, and ſo ſailed to the Northern Iſles. Roger Hoveden puts this Expedition of Earl Richard Strongbow, under the former Year, but I rather follow the Iriſh Annals which place it under this.

[2] G. G. ib. Rodoric, much concerned at this, ſends Dermot word, that if he would not hinder his Foreigners from making theſe Excurſions, he would cut off his Son's Head, and ſend it him.

And being exaſperated at Dermot's Anſwer, he did put his Son to Death.

[2.] Rodoric King of Connaught was much concern'd at theſe proceedings of Dermot, and ſent to him to let him know that he had broken the Peace between them, by calling ſo great a number of Strangers into the Iſland, and that he neither was mindful of his Oath, nor of the Life of his own Son, (then a Hoſtage with Rodoric) and gave him alſo notice, that if for the future he did not reſtrain theſe excurſions of his Foreigners, he would cut off his Son's Head, and ſend it him; but to this Dermot anſwered, that he would never deſiſt from War until he had ſubdued Connaught, and made himſelf Chief King of all Ireland: Rodoric provok'd with this reply, immediately took Dermot's Son, and made him ſhorter by the Head.

K. Henry recalls his Engliſh Subjects out of Ireland.

But the late ſucceſs of Earl Strongbow's Arms now met with a great Check; for King Henry hearing of it, and being afraid he ſhould grow too great for him, did put forth an Edict, by which he prohibited all his Subjects from carrying any thing by Sea into that Nation, and alſo at the ſame time recalled all the Engliſh, appointing pointing them to return by Easter upon pain of being disinherited, and living in perpetual Exile. Upon this the Earl sent Raymond to the King then in Aquitain with a Letter, in which he put him in " mind, that he had his License to go and assist his Vassal Dermot; " telling him farther, That as whatsoever he had acquired proceeded " from his Munificence, so it was all at his Command, and that he " would return Home whensoever he pleased. Wherefore little was attempted further all that Winter, till the next Year, when you will find more of them.

Anno Dom. MCLXIX.

Raymond pleads for their Continuance there.

But before we end this, I must take notice, [3.] that Owen Gwyneth Prince of North-Wales, after he had Governed that Country worthily, for many years with great Valour and good Success, now deceased, leaving divers Children behind him by several Women whom he kept, besides his Wife: But his Eldest Son Jordwerth Drwynden being counted unfit to govern, because of a great Scar he had on his Face, Howel a Base Brother of his took upon him the Government; but David, another Brother lawfully begotten, thinking himself more fit for it, gathered what Forces he could, and coming against Howel, slew him in Battle, and so held the Principality till Llewellyn his Brother Jordwerth's Son came of Age, who deposed his Uncle, as you will hear in due time. But we shall here conclude this Year, and return to King Henry whom we left in France.

Anno Dom. MCLXX.

At [4.] Christmas following, the King kept his Court at Nants, together with his Son Geoffery Earl of Bretaign, and after the Festival-Solemnity He and his Son went about to all the Castles of that Province, taking the Oaths of Fealty and Allegiance from the Earls, Barons and Freemen of whom they had not received them before, and afterwards returned into Normandy; where having put all things in good Order as well as in his other Dominions, about the Beginning of March he took shipping with design to sail for England: but there arose so Violent a Storm, that many of his best Vessels were lost, and he himself narrowly escap'd: In one of these perish'd his chief Physitian and several Persons of Quality, with other of his Domestick Servants, to the number of about Four hundred Men and Women.

Then returns to Normandy.

And sometime after sails for England; but met with so violent a Storm, that he lost several of his best Ships, and about 400 Souls.

[5.] Not long after the King's arrival, he held his Court at Windsor on the Easter following, where were present William King of Scots, and David his Brother, with almost all the Bishops and Great Men of England: when the King also appointed certain Earls, Abbots, Knights, and Clerks to go as Commissioners through the whole Kingdom, giving them Instructions in writing what they were to do; our Author has given us the names of some of them for one of these Circuits, which are needless to be mentioned, and therefore I shall only recite you their Instructions; and they were to this Effect.

At Easter he keeps his Court at Windsor.

He appoints several Commissioners to go through the Kingdom with Instructions what to do.

[1.] These Itinerant Barons were to exact Security or Pledges of all Sheriffs, who were made so since the King went last into Normandy (being about the space of four years,) and of all who during that time were their Bayliffs, or Ministers, whatsoever Bayliwick or Charge they had under them, and of all those who had the Hundreds of Barons in any Counties, whither they had them in Farm or not, that they should appear before the King at a day by them appointed, to do such Right to him, and his Subjects, as they ought; and if the Sheriffs could not come before them in person, they were to send such such in their ſteads, as ſhould be anſwerable for them, who were to give Security and Pledges, as well for themſelves, as the Sheriffs that they would do before the King what the Sheriffs ought to do at the day appointed. Alſo theſe Commiſſioners were to make Inquiries upon divers other Articles, which being very long, and now obſolete, I ſhall only tell you in General, they were for the Diſcovery of the Frauds, Extortions and Miſcarriages of Sheriffs, their Bayliffs, and others, the King's Officers, ſince his laſt going over into Normandy. But becauſe theſe Articles contain divers things, which may give us a great Light into the Miniſterial Part of the Law in thoſe times, I have added them at large among the Laws at the end of this King's Reign for the ſatisfaction of thoſe that are curious Inquirers into the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of this Kingdom.

[1] Id. Col. 1412.

14. June, the K. held a great Council at London, of all the great Men of the Kingdom, who appeared with their Fidejuſſors or Sureties.

And that day he Knights his Son Henry, and commands him then to be anointed and crowned King.

[2.] The above-mention'd Inquiſition, (which if duly executed would have puniſhed the Diſorders and Injuſtice of all ſorts of Officers) being finiſhed, all Parties concern'd in it were commanded to appear before the King at London on the 14th of June; upon which day he alſo held a Great Council of all the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Sheriffs, Bayliffs and Aldermen of England; who appeared with their Fide-juſſors or Sureties in great fear, for they knew not what the King deſign'd by it: And on that very day he Knighted his Son Henry, (who was newly come out of Normandy, not above a week before,) and the King then commanded him to be anointed and Crowned King at Weſtminſter on the day laſt mentioned, the Clergy, and Laiety there preſent aſſenting to it; yet all Perſons were aſtoniſh'd and wonder'd at it, as having never ſeen, nor heard of the like before in England.

A Bp of York order'd to perform the Ceremonies.

New K. by his Father's command receives the Fealties of the K. of Scots, and all the Earls and Barons.

This Coronation proved afterwards very unfortunate to his Father, and all the Bps. that had any hand in it.

The Reaſon which induced the K. to let his Son into ſo great a ſhare of Power with him.

No Law then eſtabliſhed in England, of Entailing the Crown on the next Heir by Blood, without conſent of the Common-Council of the Kingdom.

[4.] Vid Mezeray's Hiſt. of France, Vol. II. in the Lives of theſe Kings.

However [3.] the Archbiſhop of York was order'd to perform the Coronation Ceremonies, the Biſhops of London and Durham aſſiſting him, divers other Biſhops being alſo preſent; which being ended, the day following the new King by Command of his Father received the Fealties of William King of Scots, and David his Brother, and of all the other Earls and Barons of the Kingdom; and thus being rid of their fear, they all departed to their own homes.

This Coronation of Young King Henry proved very troubleſome and unfortunate not only to the King his Father, but to all the Biſhops who had any hand in it, as you will find in due time; but leſt it ſhould ſeem ſtrange and unaccountable to the Reader, why ſo Wiſe a Prince, and ſo jealous of his power as King Henry was, ſhould now reſolve to let his Son, an active young Prince, and of a High Spirit, participate any of it; to take off this Wonder we may obſerve, that the King conſidered, how notwithſtanding the Oath of Fealty that had been made to his Mother the Empreſs by all the Clergy Nobility and People of England, they had yet ſet her aſide, and choſen Stephen for their King; and though the very ſame Orders of Men had alſo lately taken the like Oath to Henry his Son, yet they might after his deceaſe have ſet him aſide if they had ſo pleaſed, as they had done his Grandmother, there being then no Law eſtabliſhed in England, whereby the Crown was entail'd upon the next Heir by Blood, without the advice and conſent of the Common Council of the Kingdom. There might be alſo this further motive for the King to act thus; He had heard, or obſerved, [4.] that both

Robert

Robert and Lewis the Groſſe, late Kings of France, had done the ſame thing, and cauſed their Sons to be crowned during their own lives, without feeling any ill effects from it. Anno Dom. MCLXX.

The Young King's great Ingratitude towards his Father.

But it is Obſervable, that this new King Henry was ſo far from being ſenſible and grateful to his Father for this great Kindneſs and Truſt he repos'd in him, that (as Polydore relates) at his Coronation-Feaſt, when the King himſelf, in Honour to his Son, would needs carry up the firſt Diſh, the Archbiſhop of York, who at the ſame time ſtood by the young King, taking notice of it, and gravely telling him how much he was obliged to his Father for that Favour; he ſcornfully reply'd, That it was no ſuch great Condeſcention in his Father who was only the Son of an Earl, to perform that Service to him, who was the Son of a King.

K. Henry in this Council turns out moſt of the Sheriffs of England, and their Bayliffs, for abuſing his Subjects.

† Ad reſcindam.

* Villanis.

And obliges them to make ſatisfaction.

Nor can I here omit mentioning what Abbot Benedict further relates, (though after a more conciſe manner,) that in this Council above mention'd, the King turned out of their Offices moſt of the Sheriffs of England and their Bayliffs for abuſing his Subjects, and obliged them in Sureties to † make ſatisfaction to Himſelf, and them; and to that end made all the Men of his Kingdom, as well Earls, Knights, Barons, Franc-Tenants, as the * Countrymen in every Shire, to Swear upon the Holy Goſpels, how much the Sheriffs and their Bayliffs had taken of them, and what by Judgment of the County or Hundred, and what without it, and for what forfeitures: yet this Inquiſition (which without doubt was taken in ſeveral Counties) as alſo its return, ſeems in this Author to have been taken at London at one and the ſame time; whereas indeed the Inquiſition had been before made in the ſeveral Counties, upon the return whereof at this Council thoſe Officers abovementioned either were, or at leaſt ought to have been puniſhed.

Every Man in the Kingdom to ſwear how much had been taken from them and by what means.

[5.] Id. ibid.

[5.] The Coronation being over, on Midſummer-day King Henry the Father went to Portſmouth, from whence he ſail'd into Normandy becauſe King Lewis of France was ſo very much diſpleaſed, that his Daughter Margaret was not Crowned with the young King her Husband, but left behind him in Normandy, that he thereupon threatned War there: The King at his departure granted his Son Power in his abſence to do all Men Right and Juſtice, by a new Seal which he commanded to be made for him; then on the Twenty Second of July (preſently after King Henry's arrival in France) the Two Kings met at Vandeure in Main, where upon a Conference, they again adjuſted all Differences between them.

K. Henry the Father goes into Normandy, for the K. of France threatned him with a War.

The New K. made Vice-Roy, and a new Seal order'd to be made for him.

K. Henry and the K. of France meet at Vandeure, and there adjuſted all differences between them.

[1.] King Henry being return'd from this Enterview into Normandy about the Feaſt of St. Laurence (i.e. the Tenth of Auguſt) fell into ſo violent a ſickneſs, that it was commonly reported in France that he was dead; during this Extremity, he divided his Kingdom and Lands among his Sons; to Henry the Eldeſt, he left the Kingdom of England, with the Dukedom of Normandy, and Earldoms of Anjou and Main; and recommended his Youngeſt Son John to be provided for, and maintained by him; but [2.] Roger Hoveden with more probability ſays, he bequeath'd unto John (before nick-nam'd Sans Terre) the Earldom of Moretaign in Normandy; and to his Son Richard, the Dukedom of Aquitaign with it's Appurtenances, to be holden of the King of France; and to his Son Geoffry, the Earldom of of Bretaign with the Daughter and Heir of Earl Conan, to be holden by the like Tenure: but the King ſoon recovering from this ſhort, (though violent) Indiſpoſition, this Teſtament ſignified nothing; for ſo ſoon as He was well again, he went on Pilgrimage to the Shrine of St. Amator, there to pay his acknowledgments to that Saint for his Recovery, from whence he came back again into Anjou.

The K. recovers, and the Will ſignifies nothing.

[3.] Id. p. 298. a.

[3.] Some time after this there happen'd a new occaſion of Diſcord between him and the King of France, concerning the Archbiſhoprick of Bourges, which King Henry claimed as belonging to the Dutchy of Aquitaign, and which King Lewis denied: whereupon the former entred Berry with an Army; but the King of France coming likewiſe with another into the ſame Country, prevented his deſign, and at laſt the quarrel ended in a Truce until the Feaſt of St. Hilary following.

The former enters Berry with an Army.

But at laſt the Quarrel ends in a Truce.

[4.] G. G. Col. 1411, 1412.

[4.] But it it now time to look back to the old difference between the King and the Archbiſhop, which ſtill remain'd undetermin'd; for immediately upon the King's laſt arrival in England, leſt the Church ſhould receive any further prejudice by the Archbiſhop's abſence, the Pope renewed his Mandate to the Archbiſhop of Roüen and Biſhop of Nevers, commanding them again to admoniſh the "King to be reconciled to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the Sum "of which * Mandate was, that if the King would not make full Re"ſtitution to the Archbiſhop of his poſſeſſions, and alſo give him the "kiſs, or if he uſed any Trick or Shuffling in the matter, then "they were by St. Peter's and his own Authority, to pronounce the "Sentence of Interdict againſt England, without any Appeal, and "to prohibit the Celebration of all Divine Offices, except the Bap"tiſm of Infants, and Pennance to dying People; and if the Arch"biſhops and Biſhops did not obſerve this Edict, and cauſe thoſe "under their care to obſerve it, they were to ſuſpend them, and "upon obſtinacy to excommunicate them: this Bull bears date the "10th of May.

The Pope ſends the A Bp. of Roüen and Bp. of Nevers to the K. to be reconciled to Becket, and make him full Reſtitution, upon pain of an Interdict againſt England.

* Vid. Quadrilogus.

About the middle of June the Legates being ready for their Journey, ſent the King Letters, wherein they acquainted him with the Commands they had received from the Pope; but he wrote back deſiring them not to expoſe themſelves to the danger of the Seas, promiſing that he would ſuddenly be with them, and conſent to a Peace with the Archbiſhop by their Advice; upon which they remained in Normandy expecting the King's coming over.

[5.] Id. ib.

[5.] In the mean time there happen'd a new occaſion of Diſpute between the King, the Pope and the Archbiſhop, upon the account of the late Coronation of the King's Son: which though his Father had kept very private, yet it ſeems the Pope had ſome way or other got Intelligence of; (for there wanted not then as well as now thoſe that betrayed the Secrets of their Princes;) therefore in April the Pope wrote to the Archbiſhop of York and all the Biſhops of England, That if any ſuch Coronation was offer'd, they ſhould not perform that Ceremony without the Conſent and Privity of the Archbiſhop whoſe Right it was to conſecrate Kings: but notwithſtanding this Admonition, the Young King was Crowned by the Archbiſhop of York, (as you have already heard) without the Licenſe of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who immediately after complained to the the Pope not only of him, but alſo of theſe Four Biſhops; viz. Hugh of Durham, Walter of Rocheſter, Gilbert of London, and Jocelin of Salisbury, who had aſſiſted at the Coronation: whereat the Pope being incenſed, and looking upon what had been done as a Contempt of his Authority, Excommunicated the three laſt Biſhops, and only ſuſpended the Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop of Durham, and "wrote to theſe two laſt a long Epiſtle, wherein he accuſeth the King "for depreſſing and diminiſhing of the Churches Liberties; and that "under pretence of preſerving his Royal Prerogatives, he deſtroy'd "them, contrary to the Canons; then he tells the Biſhops how "much he had been ſollicited to confirm his Uſurpations (meaning "the ſtatutes of Clarendon) and that he had ſent ſome Cardinals and "others to ſoften him, but that he ſtill grew more obſtinate, and "would not abate in the leaſt the Rigor of his perverſe Laws; that "he had ſeized the Rights of the Church of Canterbury contrary to "her antient Dignity; that his Son Henry had been Crowned by the "Archbiſhop of York without any Caution, or Reſervation made by "him, for preſerving the Liberties of the Church, and that he had "promiſed by his Oath that he would maintain all thoſe Cuſtoms "of the Kingdom which they call Antient, by all which the Liberties "of the Church were much in danger; and concludes, that for theſe "Conſiderations he now ſuſpended the ſaid Archbiſhop of York and "Biſhop of Durham from the Exerciſe of their Epiſcopal Fun-"ction.

Anno Dom. MCLXX.

The A. Biſhop complains to the Pope of the A. Bp of York, and thoſe Biſhops that aſſiſted him at the Coronation.

Whereupon the Pope Excommunicates three of the Bps. and ſuſpends York and Durham, and writes a long Letter to theſe two, to tell the reaſon why he ſuſpended them.

He accuſes the K. of depreſſion and diminution of the Church's Liberties.

[1.] Now alſo Lewis the French King with the Archbiſhop of Sens, and the reſt of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops and Great Men of his Kingdom, concerned themſelves ſo far on the behalf of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that they earneſtly ſollicited the Pope, not to permit the King of England to make any farther delays in receiving him, as he loved the Kingdom of France, and the Honour of the Apoſtolick See: and the Archbiſhop of Sens went to Rome on purpoſe about it; upon which the Pope reſolved, that unleſs the King preſently made peace with the Archbiſhop, his Kingdom ſhould be anathematized and put under an Interdict; when (ſays the Hiſtorian) at this Juncture of Time it pleaſed God ſo to change the King's Mind, that by the paternal Admonition of the Pope, and the Mediation of the King of France, with the advice of ſeveral Biſhops and noble Perſons, he at laſt was pleaſed to be reconciled to the Archbiſhop, and reſtore him to his Church.

[1.] R. H. Ib. K. Lewis, his Archbiſhops, Bps, and Great Men of his Kingdom, ſollicit the Pope in behalf of the A. Bp. of Canterbury.

The Pope reſolves, if the K. doth not preſently comply to receive him, to put the Kingdom under an Interdict.

Abbot Benedict relates it thus, that the peremptory day for the Sentence being at hand, ſo that it could no longer be deferred, the King of England was forced by theſe Canonical ſeverities to embrace a Peace, and to that end came to Amboiſe near Tours on the Twelfth of October, with ſome of the Biſhops and Great Men, where he met William Archbiſhop of Sens, and Theobald Earl of Blois, and moſt of the Biſhops and Noblemen of France, who brought with them Archbiſhop Thomas; and the next day, by the Mediation of King Lewis (who yet appear'd not there in Perſon) and by the Command and Admonition of Pope Alexander, the King receiv'd the Archbiſhop into his Grace and Favour, as well as all thoſe that were with him in Exile; promiſing entirely to reſtore to him all the Rights and Poſſeſſions of the Church of Canterbury, as he held them the year before he left England.

The K. is reconciled to the A. Bp.

[.] In ſhort, the King there agreed to all that the Archbiſhop would or could reaſonably demand of him; moſt Authors agree about the matter of this Treaty, but differ about the Time and Place; Hoveden and Abbot Benedict both ſay it was on the fourth of the Ides, or 12th of October on a Hill between Tours and Amboiſe; but Quadrilogus, Fitz Stephen and Gervaſe of Canterbury, place it on St. Mary Magdalen's day, or the 22d of July, at Freteville, between Chartrin and Main, in a Meadow called the Meadow of Traytors.

[3] Quadril. l. 5.

The K. in writing ſignifies to his Son Henry here, that the A Bp. had made Peace with him.

[3.] The King and Archbiſhop being thus outwardly reconciled, the former wrote into England to his Son Henry to let him know that the Archbiſhop had made his peace with him; and therefore Commanded, to let him and all that accompanied him have and enjoy all things as they did Three Months before he went out of England, as appears by his Writ or Letter, which you will find in Quadrilogus, and Gervaſe of Canterbury.

[4] F. S.

Thomas Becket complains againſt the A. Bp. of York for his Crowning the Young K. out of his own Province.

The K. leaves it to him to take what Satisfaction he would of that A Bp. and the Other Bps.

[4.] After he had made this Peace with the King, the Archbiſhop in a ſet Speech told him, That amongſt all the Evils he had ſuſtained by his Indignation, as Baniſhment, and the Spoiling and Oppreſſion of the Church of Canterbury, &c. there was one thing which he neither ought nor could leave unpuniſhed, and that was the Archbiſhop of York's Crowning the young Son out of his own Province, and by the King's cauſing him to do it, had thereby robbed his Church of that Honour, which amongſt all her Dignities ſhe had peculiar and proper to her ſelf ever ſince the time of St. Auſtin; then after ſome further diſcourſe of this matter, the King left it to him to take what ſatisfaction he pleaſed of the Archbiſhop of York and the other Biſhops for the Injuries done to the Church of Canterbury and himſelf.

The great Civilities that upon this paſſed between them both.

The Archbiſhop ſeemed ſo ſenſible of the King's unexpected Conceſſion of ſo great a Point, that He preſently alighted from his Horſe, and went to throw himſelf at his Majeſty's Feet; but he alſo preſently alighting, took him up and embraced him; and when he mounted again, held his Stirrup: yet notwithſtanding all theſe mutual Civilities, the Archbiſhop ſtill kept his former Reſentments, being (as he thought) ſlighted by the King in his not deferring his Son's Coronation till his return: but why could not that Omiſſion have been paſſed by, as well as others for Peace ſake?

It was a ſtrange Eaſineſs in the K. thus to give up the A Bp. and Bps. to the Pope's and Becket's Indignation, as well as great rigidneſs in them, ſo ſeverely to proſecute thoſe Bps.

And I cannot tell which to admire the moſt, the King's eaſineſs in thus giving up the Archbiſhop of York and the reſt of the Biſhops to the Pope and his Favourite's Indignation without any conditions made on their behalf, (ſince they had ſerved him faithfully, and acted according to his Command) or the Pope's and the Archbiſhop's imprudent rigidneſs in their ſevere proſecuting of thoſe Biſhops when indeed it had been the wiſeſt courſe to have compoſed all differences by accepting of their acknowledgments, and deſires of pardon for their fault, if it were one; becauſe there had been, as the King himſelf then urged, late Examples of the Archbiſhop of York's Crowning and anointing our Kings, as appears by William and Henry the firſt, who were both conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of York, though there were Archbiſhops of Canterbury then living, as the Reader may obſerve in the Reigns of thoſe Kings. And this was alſo confeſſed by Archbiſhop Becket, only he excuſed it in the Firſt Inſtance,

ſtance, by reaſon that Lanfranc had not then his Pall from the Pope; and in the Second, becauſe of Archbiſhop Anſelm's Exile beyond Sea, which (admit it were unjuſt) made the caſe the ſame. Anno Dom. MCLXX.

[1.] After all this, the Peace had like to have broke off at laſt; for the King having ſworn not to do it, refuſed now to give the Archbiſhop the Kiſs of Peace, though the Pope had before abſolved him from that raſh Oath, and enjoin'd him to do it; yet the King put it off, ſaying, In my own Territories I will kiſs him (nay his very Hands and Feet) a Thouſand times, let him only defer it now, that it may appear to be done out of my meer Grace and Good-will, and not by Conſtraint. With which Anſwer, by the Advice of all there preſent, the Archbiſhop appeared ſatisfied, and ſo there was great Joy at this ſeeming Reconciliation; and the King and the Archbiſhop went apart, and diſcourſed ſome time in private together; and then taking his Leave, the Aſſembly broke up, and the Archbiſhop returned Thanks to all his Benefactors in France, and received the King's Licenſe to return home; But he ſtill delaying his Journey, the Pope began to grow jealous, and haſtened his Return into England by his Letters.

[1] Id. ibid. The Peace like to be broke off, for want of the King's kiſſing the A. Biſhop, which he had ſworn not to do.

The Pope haſtens the A. Biſhop's return into England.

Then [2.] the Archbiſhop having taken his Leave of the King of France, went to do the like of King Henry at Tours; who, for all that he was now in his own Dominions, yet ſtill deferr'd giving him the Kiſs of Peace, though he might very well have done it at Maſs: But he put it off by the Advice of Nigel de Salcaville, a Clerk, and Keeper of his Seal, who having one of the Archbiſhop's Livings beſtowed upon him, did not deſire their Agreement. This Repulſe was taken notice off by the Archbiſhop and all that were there preſent.

[2.] Id. ib.

But though he had neither That, nor yet his Debts paid, nor the Archbiſhop of Roüen appointed to conduct him over, as the King promiſed; (for he only ſent John Dean of Salisbury to wait upon him) yet being preſſed by the Pope's Letters, he reſolved to make what haſte he could into England.

[3.] For the Pope had ſent a Meſſenger expreſsly to exhort him to return to his Church; by whom he alſo received Letters, which gave him notice of the Suſpenſion of the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of Durham, and the Excommunication of the Biſhops of London, Rocheſter, and Salisbury.

[3.] Id. ib. And ſends preſſing Letters to him about it, &c.

But I cannot here forbear to obſerve the Pope's ſtrange partiality in only Suſpending the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of Durham, though the former had himſelf Crowned the New King, and the Other aſſiſted at the Ceremony, the very ſame fault, for which the reſt of the Biſhops were Excommunicated.

The Pope's ſtrange partiality.

[4.] The Archbiſhop ſet ſail from Whitſand and Landed at Sandwich on the firſt of December; where ſo ſoon as he arrived, he pronounced the Sentence of Suſpenſion and Excommunication againſt all the ſaid Biſhops, [5.] at which thoſe Officers of the King that came to meet him were much troubled, and asked him, Why at his firſt coming into England, he would in Affront to the King offer to ſuſpend and excommunicate thoſe Biſhops, and withal threatned him with the King's diſpleaſure thereupon; but the Archbiſhop anſwered them, That the King ought not to be offended, becauſe it was done with his permiſſion: Then the Biſhops being at Dover, ſent sent to the Archbiſhop, ſo ſoon as he came to Canterbury, very earneſtly deſiring Abſolution of him, but He ſtill ſaid, they were bound by a Superior Judge, and though it was not in his power to releaſe a Sentence given by the Pope's Order, yet he would ſo far preſume upon his Clemency as to Abſolve them, if they would give caution to ſtand to the Judgment of the Church, (i.e. of the Pope) concerning thoſe things for which they were excommunicated; but it ſeems the Meſſengers declined that, and uttering ſome high Words againſt the Archbiſhop's proceedings, returned to thoſe who ſent them, and gave them an account of all their Negotiation. Hereupon they conſulted what was next to be done; and the Author of Quadrilogus ſays, That the Biſhops of London and Salisbury were at firſt willing to ſubmit to the Archbiſhop's Offer, but the Prelate of York, would by no means conſent, but perſwaded them to the contrary, ſaying, That he had ſtill 2000 Marks by him, which he would ſpend to the laſt Farthing, but he would humble this Haughty Primate.

The Bps. deſire Abſolution of him.

He offers to do it, upon caution to ſtand to the Judgment of the Church.

The Biſhops of London and Salisbury are willing to ſubmit, but York would by no means hearken to them.

[1.] F. S.

[1] Immediately upon this publication the ſuſpended and excommunicated Biſhops went over to the King into Normandy, and throwing themſelves at his Feet, told him, He had made a very ill Peace for them, ſince they and all thoſe who had aſſiſted at the Coronation of his Son were Excommunicated by the Pope; and the Archbiſhop of York told the King, That ſo long as Thomas Becket was alive he would never enjoy happy Days, nor a peaceable Kingdom. At which words the King fell into ſuch an Indignation, that he preſently ſhew'd it by his Countenance and Geſture.

They apply to the King, and complain that this was an ill Peace for them.

The A. Bp. of York exaſperates the King againſt Becket.

[2.] G. G. Col. 1415.

But [2.] Gervaſe of Canterbury is more particular in this Relation, and tells us, the King was now ſo highly provok'd, that in a great paſſion He cried out aloud, He was a miſerable Man, that had fed ſo many ungrateful cowardly Fellows, none of whom durſt vindicate him from the Injuries he ſuffer'd at the hands of one Prieſt. At which words Four of the King's Domeſtick Knights or * Bed-Chamber-men (as the Quadrilogus calls them) who were of great Reputation both for the Nobility of their Birth and Military Exploits; namely, Reginald Fitz-Urſe, William de Tracy, Richard le Brito, and Hugh de Morville, bound themſelves by a Solemn Oath to revenge the King's Quarrel; and to that intent they preſently ſtole away from Court, having already Sworn the Archbiſhop's deſtruction.

The K. in a Paſſion upbraids the Cowardice of his Servants, that none would dare to vindicate him.

* Cubicularii: Note, Fitz-Stephen calls thoſe Knights, Barons.

Four of his Knights reſolve to murther the A. Bp.

[3.] He being newly arriv'd in England, was joyfully received by the Clergy and People of Canterbury, from whence he preſently ſent a Meſſenger to the Young King to give him an account of his late Proceedings againſt the Biſhops, and how it was done by the Pope's poſitive Commands, and the King his Father's Permiſſion; but the Young Prince being awed by thoſe Counſellers his Father had ſet over him, durſt not ſee, nor ſpeak with this Meſſenger; but yet for all that the Archbiſhop reſolved to go to Court, and take London in his way.

[3] Id. ib.

The young K. durſt not ſee nor ſpeak with the meſſengers the A. Bp. ſent to him, but he is reſolved to go to Court.

And firſt to London, and why.

However, this could not be the cauſe of his going thither, ſince the Young King was then at Wincheſter (as Fitz-Stephen ſays) or elſe at Woodſtock (as Matt. Paris has it) but let him have been at either of thoſe places, it is plain, the City could not lye in his way to Court; and therefore I ſuppoſe his Journey to London was purely out of vain

Glory

Glory to ſhew himſelf, and make the People flock out to meet him, as they did in great Numbers, for which Miſdemeanor many of the chiefeſt Citizens were ſummon'd afterwards to appear, and give Security to anſwer it. But to return to the matter; the Young King hearing of his Intended Journey to Court, ſent Two Knights to meet him, to forbid both his coming thither, or going about to Cities; and ordered his ſpeedy Return to Canterbury, and to reſide there; which Command he preſently obey'd, and remain'd there with his Family till the day of his Death, which was not long after.

Anno Dom. MCLXX.

The young K. forbids his coming to Court, and orders his return to Canterbury, which he obeys.

For on [4] Chriſtmaſs-Day following he preached a pathetic Sermon to the People of that City, wherein after he had ſet forth the great Apprehenſions he had of a ſpeedy Suffering, or Martyrdom (as he called it) he then Excommunicated Ranulph and Robert de Broc (both Brothers) becauſe they, the day before, meeting ſome of his Servants in the High-way bringing Proviſions for his Houſe, did not only beat them, but cut off one of their Horſe's tails; yet however this Excommunication did but exaſperate his Enemies the more againſt him.

Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

[4] F. S. R. H. The A. Bp. preaches to the People, and Excommunicates the two de Brocs.

For about this Time the Four Knights (above-mention'd) who had ſworn to revenge the King's Quarrel, met with a more ſpeedy paſſage than ſo wicked a deſign deſerved; for having Landed privately near Dover, and in the Country thereabouts raiſed a pretty large Company of Men, partly of the King's Officers, and partly of thoſe whom the Archbiſhop had Excommunicated, they made what haſte they could to Canterbury, where being arrived on the 30th of December in the afternoon, they enter'd the Palace, came into the Archbiſhop's Chamber, and there ſate down without ſpeaking a Word, till the Archbiſhop asking them the occaſion of their coming, One of them (Fitz-Urſe by name) told him, That they came from beyond Sea with a Meſſage from the King; upon which the Archbiſhop commanded his Domeſticks to withdraw: but when the Other ſaid, that he deſired all there preſent ſhould hear, they ſtayed in the Room; then Fitz-Urſe in the name of the Reſt, deliver'd his Meſſage; but Fitz Stephen makes the Archbiſhop's Servants to have withdrawn by his order during the delivery of it; and that ſo ſoon as it was over, he fearing ſome Violence, called in his Chaplains and Domeſticks, before whom the Knights repeated what they had to ſay; I ſhall not here relate the whole Dialogue between the Archbiſhop and them (as I find it in my Authors) ſince it would be too tedious, and beſides they themſelves differ about what they make the Gentlemen to ſay: but the Sum of what Fitz-Urſe told him, was, "That he had as good have taken the Crown from the King his "Maſter's Head, as thus to Excommunicate the Biſhops, and then "refuſe them Abſolution: But the Archbiſhop ſaid, He was ſo "far from taking the Crown from the King's Head, that he wiſh'd "with all his heart he could put another on, (God's Honour and his "own Soul being ſtill ſafe) and that not himſelf, but the Pope had "excommunicated and ſuſpended thoſe Biſhops, and it was not in "his power to abſolve them; They anſwer'd, It was all one as if "he had done it, ſince it was done by his procurement; To which "the Archbiſhop reply'd, That indeed he was much obliged to the "Pope for thus Vindicating the Injury done to God, as well as to "him-

[5.] C. G. col. 1415. The Knights bring their Guard into the A. Bps. Court who during the Conference waited at his Gates.

[5.] Then going out of the Abbie, they brought thoſe of their Guard into the Court, whom they had before left at the Gates, whilſt they talk'd with the Archbiſhop; But during the time that they were gone away, the Monks hearing that the Knights with their Men were returning, would fain have perſwaded the Archbiſhop (being near Veſpers) to go along with them into the Church, but he being unwilling to it, they were at laſt forced to haul, rather than lead him thither, through a private door out of the Cloiſters, which was broken open on purpoſe to let him in: He had not been there very long, and was but juſt got upon the Steps of the High Altar, when the Four Knights return'd again being now arm'd, and finding the Doors of the Monaſtery ſhut, they broke a Window, and Robert de Broc getting in, opened the Doors to them; and he being their Guide, they enter'd the Church by the ſame way the Archbiſhop had before; yet would not he permit the other Door to be made faſt at all, ſaying, It was the Church, and all Men were free to enter into it; God's Will be done. So ſoon as they came in they cry'd out, Where is the Archbiſhop: where is the Traytor? he coming down from the Steps of the Altar to a Pillar not far off, ſaid, Here am I; no Traytor, but a Prieſt: then they laid hands on him, to try if they could pull him out of the Church, that (as they afterwards confeſs'd) they might either kill him without, or carry him away Priſoner: but when they could not eaſily get him from the Pillar, Reynald Fitz-Urſe came up nearer; to whom the Archbiſhop ſaid, I have done thee many favours, and doſt thou (who oweſt me Faith and Homage now come to kill me? Then he laying hold on the Archbiſhop's Cope, ſaid, Thou ſhalt go forth, for that now thou ſhalt dye, but he pulling it out of his hand, anſwered, I will not go out: then the other cried, Fly: No, reply'd he, I will never fly; But I command you in the Name of God, and under an Anathema, that you do none of mine any harm, then (as Edward Ryne in his Manuſcript Hiſtory relates) the Archbiſhop thruſt that Knight from him, calling him Pimp; at which he being much provok'd, ſtept back, and ſeeing his Companions behind him, he ſtruck at the Archbiſhop with his Sword, and almoſt cut off the Arm of this Author, which was then held up to defend his Lord, and at the ſame time wounded the Archbiſhop in the Crown of the Head, where it was ſhaven; who now ſeeing his time was come, ſpoke theſe laſt words, Lord, into thy hands I commend my Soul; or, as Gervaſe and the Author of Quadrilogus give us them, I commend my ſelf and the Cauſe of the Church of God, St. Mary, St. Denis,

The Knights get into the Church where the A. Bp. was, and not being able to make him come out, they kill him there.

St. Denis, and all the Saints Patrons of his Church: Then another of the Knights wounded him in the ſame place to the very Brain; ſo falling down upon his Face on the Pavement the reſt ſtruck him on the Head ſtill in the ſame place; and one of them, Richard Brito, cut off a piece of his Scul, where the reſt had already begun; then another of their Followers, called, Hugh the ill Clark (for he was a Sub-Deacon) not content with what had been done, ſet his Foot upon the Biſhop's Neck, and with his Sword's point Flung the Brains and Blood about the Pavement, crying out, Let us now be gone, he will riſe no more: So that all of them hitting Him (which was very ſtrange) in the ſame place, all his Brains fell upon the ground. Anno Dom. MCLXXI

When they ſaw he was dead, they went out in great Triumph at the ſame door they came in; and in the mean time their Accompliçes without, breaking open the Doors and Locks, plunder'd the Goods of the deceaſed Archbiſhop, together with the Charters and Muniments belonging to the Church. As ſoon as the People heard of it, they all grievouſly lamented him, and running thither, deſir'd to ſee his Body, dipping their Fingers in his Blood, and therewith making the Sign of the Croſs on their Foreheads; then the Corps was by the Monks laid before the High Altar, where it remain'd all night; but ſo ſoon as it was day, hearing that the Murtherers intended to return, and abuſe the Body, and fling it into ſome filthy place or other, they ſhut up the Church doors, and putting it in a Stone-Coffin, buried it privately in a Vault adjoining to the place where he was killed.

The Guards in the mean time plunder his Goods, and carry away the Charters and Muniments of the Church.

His Death much bewailed by the people there.

He is privately buried in a Vault, adjoining to the place where he was murther'd.

I have given you this large Account of the manner of this Archbiſhop's Death, as being atteſted by Two perſons, of undoubted Credit, who were then upon the ſpot, (viz.) Gervaſe of Canterbury, and Edward Ryne the Clerk, who (as I have ſaid) receiv'd a Wound in his Arm in ſo ſtoutly defending his Maſter; The Manuſcript relation of the Life and Sufferings of this Archbiſhop, written in a Hand of that Age, is preſerved in the Library of the Royal Society at Greſham Colledge.

But [1.] as for thoſe who committed this execrable Murther, they durſt not return to the King, but went for ſome time into the North as far as Knaresborogh, a Town belonging to Hugh de Morville, where they remain'd till all Men avoided their Converſation; and that being excommunicated by the Pope, they at length got to Rome for Abſolution: but he enjoin'd them to go to Jeruſalem, and afterwards to do Pennance in the black Mountain during life, in the performance of which, they all dy'd; though where this Mountain is our Author does not tell us. This ſad Relation may ſerve for a Warning to Princes, how they Command (or ſo much as ſeem to deſire) in their Paſſions any unlawful Action, to be done to pleaſe their humour; or how any Perſons undertake ſuch unjuſt Commands, ſince they often end to the Prejudice, if not ruine, of at leaſt one of them, and ſometimes of both.

[1.] R. H. His Murtherers go firſt to Knaresborough, then to Rome for Abſolution.

I ſhall now conclude this Story of the Archbiſhop who was not long after by the Church of [2.] Rome Canonized for a Saint, with a ſhort account (omitting Legends) of his Birth and Education, and a Character of his diſpoſition from the ſame Authors.

His Birth, Education and Character.

They

Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

They all agree that He was the Son of one Gilbert ſometime Sheriff of London, that his Mother's name was Mahauld, whom ſome that wrote his Life will needs have to be the Daughter of a Saracen Admiral, or Commander; and that ſhe fell in Love with this Gilbert, who had been ſome time before taken Priſoner by her Father, and was then a Slave in his houſe: But this ſtory, ſince it looks like a Legend, and is neither mention'd by Fitz-Stephen nor Ryne, who both wrote his Life, I do but juſt mention.

But his Father had this Son by one Mahauld a Saracen Woman; he was firſt put to School at London, then by his Father was ſent to the Abbie of Merton for farther Learning and Improvement, and was afterwards for ſome time ſent to ſtudy at the Univerſity of Paris. Upon his return, he obtained an Office in the City of London in the Sheriff's Court, in which he learned ſome Knowledge of the World, and how to Govern both the Church and State; he was firſt recommended to Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by Two Fryers of Bologn, who had been his Father's Gueſts and old Acquaintance. The Archbiſhop (to whom he was alſo ſomewhat related) ſent him ſeveral times to Rome about Buſineſs concerning the Engliſh Church, where he ſoon gain'd favour with the Pope and Officers of the Roman Court.

Educated at Paris.

Gets a Place in the Sheriff's Court.

Is recommended to A Bp. Theobald.

His Travels to Rome, Bononia, and Auxerre, to ſtudy the Canon-Law.

Afterwards, by the Archbiſhop's leave, he went into Italy, and ſtudied the Canon-Law one Year at Bononia, and then went to Auxerre in France.

His ſeveral Riſes and Preferments in the Church.

The firſt Eccleſiaſtical Preferment he had, was the Church of St. Mary in the Strand, (where Somerſet-houſe is now built) and alſo was Parſon of Otford in Kent. From whence we may obſerve, that in thoſe days a man was thought qualified for Benefices without being in Prieſt's Orders. Afterwards the Archbiſhop ordained him Deacon, and gave him in ſome time the Arch-Deaconry of Canterbury, which was then, next to the Biſhops and Abbots, one of the moſt Honourable as well as Profitable Preferments in the Church. And at length by the recommendation and procurement of the Archbiſhop and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, he was made the King's Chancellor, which was accounted in thoſe days the prime Dignity of the Kingdom; and by this Imployment he became exceeding popular.

Is made the K's. Chancellour.

His Popularity, and Entertainments.

His Houſe and Table were Common to all Indigent perſons that came to Court; and there was ſcarce a day paſs'd, but he eat with Earls and Barons, whom he himſelf invited: He order'd his Rooms of Entertainment to be every day beſtrewed with freſh Straw in Winter, and with green Graſs, or Ruſhes, in Summer; that thoſe many Knights or Military Gentlemen, whom the Seats or Benches could not receive, might ſit down upon a clean Floor, leſt their fine Cloaths and Shirts ſhould be ſullied. During this time, he did all he could to conform himſelf to the King's humour, and endeavour'd to pleaſe him in Trifles as well as in Serious Matters, delighting himſelf in all Country Recreations; being highly pleaſed with popular Applauſe. He exceeded divers Earls in the Magnificence of his Equipage, having his Horſe's Bits and Stirrups of Silver: But amongſt all theſe outward Pomps he ſtill retain'd a wonderful Chaſtity, if the Monkiſh Authors may be credited, whoſe Relations alone are now left us of his Life and Actions; though it might ſeem very ſtrange, that a perſon, not overſtrict in other things, and who liv'd high, and and convers'd in a Court where he ſaw ſo many looſe Examples, ſhould be ſtrictly ſtanch as to Women: But theſe Authors make him no more moved with them, than if he had been made of Braſs or Marble. Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

[3] But this ſeems more certain, that the Great Men of England, as well as neighbouring Kingdoms, ſent their Sons to him, from whom they receiv'd Ingenuous Education, and (being often Knighted) were ſent back to their Parents with Honour; nay, the King himſelf placed his Eldeſt Son Henry with him, and recommended to him his Education. He had beſides many Sons of Noblemen, and their Tutors and Servants, whom he treated with all due Reſpect. [3] Id. The K's. and Noblemen's Sons committed to his Education

[4] To him alſo many Noblemen and Knights did Homage, which he receiv'd, ſaving their Faith to the King; and there was ſcarce a day in which he did not give ſome large Boons, as Horſes, Hawks, rich Cloaths, alſo Gold or Silver Utenſils, or elſe Money: in ſhort, His Bounty and Liberality was ſuch, that he became the Delight and Darling of all ſorts and degrees of Men; and what he did at the War of Tholouſe, ſhews him to be a Man of great Courage, as well as his Sufferings and Death declare him a Maſter of great Paſſive Valour. And certainly nothing but his Extraordinary Endowments both of Body and Mind (being a Tall and Graceful Perſon, though of a ſevere Aſpect) could ever have recommended one of his mean Birth ſo highly to the King's Favour, as that he never took greater pleaſure than when he was in his Company, either riding abroad, or coming to his Houſe; of which our Author gives us ſome agreeable Relations; inſomuch that the King beſtowed no vacant Biſhopricks or Abbies but by his Advice. [4] Id. ib. He receives Homage of Noblemen. His Bounty and Liberality. The K never ſo well pleaſed as when in his Company. Diſpoſes all Biſhopricks and Abbies by his Advice.

So that from all the Actions of his Life, we may very well conclude him to have been a Perſon of a great Genius and large Abilities, though they were allay'd with much Haughtineſs, vain Glory, and Love of popular Applauſe; and this is not deny'd even by thoſe that have wrote his Life. Beſides this, we may alſo reckon the Prejudices of his Educacion, and his long Converſation in Italy, which perhaps might make him too much devoted to the Power of the Pope and Intereſt of the Clergy, which they call their Eccleſiaſtical Priviledge and Exemption from Secular Power. Theſe having been not long before eſtabliſh'd by ſeveral Papal Decrees, and generally receiv'd in Italy and France, no wonder, if that Prelate deſired to have England brought under the ſame Yoke that himſelf had already ſubmitted to; therefore as I cannot join with ſome Writers, who make this Man to be a meer Hypocrite, ſince all thoſe who give us an Account of his Life, repreſent him, as one very Charitable to the Poor, and ready to help thoſe that were oppreſſed by the more Powerful, and alſo to have been very ſtrict in his private Pennances and Mortifications, which are no ſigns of a Hypocrite; ſo on the other ſide, I do not allow him to be a Saint or a Martyr; for, as no Man, who was a Hypocrite, would have ſuffer'd Exile, and the loſs of all his Eſtate, when he might by a ſoft Compliance with the King (as ſeveral of his Predeceſſors had done) have thereby ſafely enjoy'd both his Eſtate and his Dignity; ſo the Cauſe for which he ſuffer'd, being meerly Temporal (or at laſt but Eccleſiaſtical) and not for any Fundamental Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, though he ſuffer'd unjuſtly, The A.Bp. a man of a great Genius, but haughty, and vain-glorious. Too much devoted to the Intereſt of the Pope. Very Charitable, and Benevolent. And very ſtrict in his private pennances. No Saint, nor Martyr.

Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

unjuſtly, yet could he not thereby deſerve the Title of a Martyr; nor can he any ways be excuſed from Obſtinacy in a falſe Opinion, or for want of Prudence and Chriſtian Moderation in thus earneſtly ſolliciting the Pope to excommunicate the Biſhops, who he ſuppoſed had affronted him, and by pronouncing the Sentence againſt them, when he was not at all obliged to have done it. Alſo his impatient Temper in reſenting the leaſt Injuries does further appear, by his Excommunicating Ranulph de Broc for only cutting off one of his ordinary Horſe's tail. This (if 'tis not too much) may ſuffice concerning the Life and Character of this Great Prelate, who was not long after Canonized by the Pope, for the many Miracles which his Admirers affirmed (nay ſwore) had been wrought by him after his Death; (for we cannot find he did any while he lived) And this was no hard matter to bring about in an Age ſo ignorant and credulous as this, when both the Pope and the People were as ready to believe, as they that promoted it were to Swear it; inſomuch that the King himſelf not long after, from a violent Perſecutor, became a zealous Worſhipper of this pretended Saint, as you will find anon. Let us now ſee what ſad Effects his Death produced.

But canonized by the Pope for his pretended Miracles.

The K. from a Perſecutor became a Worſhipper of him.

[5.] Quadril. The firſt news of his Death madehimvery melancholy.

[5.] As ſoon as the King was acquainted with the news of it, he ſeemed greatly troubled; and it put him into ſo deep a Melancholly, that for above a Month he ſcarce diſpatch'd any buſineſs. But whether this proceeded from a real Grief for the Murther, or only from a high Concern and Fear of the ill Conſequences that would attend it, I ſhall not determine.

[1] R. H. p. 299. a.

[1.] In the mean time his Death was very much reſented by thoſe Neighboring Princes and Prelates, who when alive, had eſpouſed his Quarrel. Lewis King of France immediately wrote to the Pope to ſtir him up to unſheath the Sword of St. Peter in revenge of this Archbiſhop's Death, for (as it had been related to him) the Divine Glory had revealed it ſelf in Miracles done at his Tomb, by which it was manifeſt for whoſe cauſe he had contended.

The King of France writes to the Pope to unſheath the Sword of S Peter againſt K. Henry.

[2.] Id p. 300. Theobald, E. of Blois writes to him to the ſame purpoſe.

Says the King gave the A Bp. leave to Sentence the Bps. as the Pope and He pleaſed.

" [2.] Likewiſe Theobald Earl of Blois wrote to the Pope, that he " was preſent at the late agreement between the King and the Arch- " biſhop and He had complained to the King, he had too ha- " ſtily, and with too warm a Zeal, cauſed his Son to be Crowned, " for which he promiſed to do him Right, and give him ſatisfaction. " That the King had given him leave to Sentence thoſe Biſhops, who, " contrary to the Right inveſted in the Church of Canterbury, had " preſumed to intrude a new King into the Royal Throne; and far- " ther, had given him leave to ſentence them according to the Pope's " and his own pleaſure. This (he ſaid) he was ready to prove by " his Oath, or any other way, and told him the Blood of the Juſt " cried aloud to him for Vengeance.

[3.] Id p. 399. b. The A Bp. of Sens writes two Letters upon the ſame Subject.

[3.] But William Archbiſhop of Sens wrote Two Letters to the Pope concerning the ſame Subject, in the Former of which he highly aggravates the Murther of this Archbiſhop, who had been ſlain for maintaining the Liberties of the Church, and then beſeeches him, that for the Honour of God he would revenge his Death by ſevere Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures; and gives the Pope an account of what had happen'd between the Archbiſhop of Roüen and him, concerning the deferring the Sentence of Interdict, which he had lately iſſued out out according to his demands upon all the Territories of the King of England on that ſide the Sea. Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

" In the Second Letter the above-mentioned Archbiſhop gives the " Pope a large account of the manner of the murther of this new " Martyr, much to the ſame effect as you have already heard, and " further gives us a long relation of the Archbiſhop's appearing to " many ſince his death, of which the Bearers would give him a fuller " Account; as alſo of a Blind Man, who immediately after he had " ſuffer'd his Eyes to be anointed with his Blood, recover'd Sight. But theſe and divers other Miracles (he ſays) he received only by Report; and then concludes with earneſt deſires to him to be pleaſed to revenge it, aggravating this Action above all the cruelties of Nero, or the Treaſon of Judas: after which exclaiming againſt Roger Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop's Gilbert and Jocelin (the former of whom he calls a Devil, and the other an Apoſtate, he excites the Pope to exert his utmoſt Authority againſt the King and his Adherents.

Gives him in the Latter an account of the manner of his murther.

Of his appearance to ſeveral after his death, and the miracles he had wrought, as he had heard.

Aggravates this action beyond the Cruelties of Nero, or Treaſon of Judas.

[4.] In the mean while Rotrod Archbiſhop of Roüen, Giles Biſhop of Eureux, Roger Biſhop of Worceſter, Richard Barre, and many others of the King's Envoys, (who ſhall be particularly mention'd by and by,) were by him ſent to the Pope, to intercede on his behalf; but the Archbiſhop of Roüen being very old and infirm, returned back, whileſt the others went on their way; and being got to Rome, with great difficulty obtained of the Pope, that Two Cardinals, Theodinus and Albertus ſhould come into Normandy to hear the Cauſe concerning the Death of the late Archbiſhop, as alſo ſome other Eccleſiaſtical Priviledges; and to Judge in all theſe, as God ſhould direct them.

[4.] Id. p. 301.

Several Bps. & others ſent to the Pope from the K. in his behalf.

Two Cardinals are to come into Normandy to canvaſs this matter, and judge accordingly.

[5.] But I will give you a more particular Account of this Ambaſſy, from the Letter of the Ambaſſadours themſelves to this effect, viz. That only Four of thoſe that were employ'd in it, went through to Rome (viz.) Robert, Abbot of Valace near Liſlebone in Normandy (who was then alſo Archdeacon of Salisbury) Robert Archdeacon of Liſieux, Robert Barre, and one Maſter Henry a Clerk: but Richard Barre went before them, and with much trouble and danger arrived at Rome, where he acted prudently and dilligently on the King his Maſter's behalf, whilſt the others were ſtopp'd in their Journey at Sienna (in Tuſcany) by Earl Macharius's command: however they eſcaped away by night, and going over ſteep Hills and places almoſt unpaſſable, they at laſt, though in great fear and danger arrived at Tuſculum (now Fraſcati) on Palm Sunday-Eve. But the Pope would not ſee them, and but few of the Cardinals would vouchſafe them a word. At length, with much importunity, by the mediation of thoſe they thought had any kindneſs for the King, [1.] or rather by a good Bribe of 500 Marks, which they ſay they then beſtow'd among the Cardinals (according to the Roman cuſtom, as Gervaſe obſerves) they obtained, that the Abbot of Valace and Robert Archdeacon of Liſieux might be heard, they two being leaſt ſuſpected; but when they mentioned the King's name, the whole Court cried out, hold, hold, as if it had been a moſt horrid thing for the Pope to hear it; and ſo they went from Court: yet in the evening they had a private Audience of his Holineſs; wherein they declared their Meſſage from the King, as they did publickly afterwards before the Pope and Cardinals

But only Four got through to Rome, and they meet with great difficulty in their paſſage.

Others are ſtopped at Sienna.

The Pope at firſt would not ſee them.

[1] G. G. Col. 1419.

Two at laſt obtained private Audience.

The whole Court would not indure the K's. name to be mentioned.

dinals, where they were oppoſed by one Alexander, and Gunther a Flemming, two Clerks of the Church of Canterbury. But on Tueſday following (as was uſual in the Roman Church) the Pope was wont publickly to Abſolve, or Excommunicate whoſoever he thought deſerved it; and the Ambaſſadors being certain there were ſome deſigns on foot againſt their King and his Kingdom, they conſulted ſome Cardinals, whom they thought moſt inclinable to the King, ſuch as the Biſhops of Portua, Pavia, and Tuſculum with ſome few others, to know the Pope's reſolutions; and were by them inform'd, that it was the joint Advice of his Cardinals, that he ſhould immediately pronounce the Sentence of Interdict againſt King Henry by Name, and all his Dominions, and likewiſe confirm the late Decree againſt the Biſhop's; upon which, they, being in a grievous ſtreight plied the Cardinals afreſh, endeavouring to divert them from this Sentence, or at leaſt to deferr it till the Biſhops (who were left behind) could arrive; but when they ſaw they could not prevail by importunity, they at length conſulting with ſome Cardinals, their Friends, had found out a good and ſecure way for the honour of the King, and ſafety of the Nation, by which (though they expoſed themſelves to all the hazard) they averted the danger then impending upon him and his whole Kingdom; and ſo they conclude their Letter with hopes, that the buſineſs would ſucceed according to his mind, though they knew his ruine had been deſign'd by that Court, and mightily feared the Cuſtom of that terrible day above-mention'd.

They met with no Succeſs.

They are informed that the Pope by advice of his Cardinals reſolves to interdict both K. and Kingdom on their Feria quinta ante paſcham.

But at length by cloſe application to ſome of the Cardinals they get it ſtopt.

But to add ſomewhat for the farther Explication of this Letter; what this ſecure way there mention'd means is hard to determine; whether ſome ſecret promiſe of a far greater Bribe among the Cardinals, or whether it were (as [2.] Radulph de Diceto relates) that theſe Ambaſſadors avoided the Sentence of this terrible Interdict by the Interceſſion of certain Cardinals, who told the Pope, the Ambaſſadors had received their Kings command to acquaint him, they were ready to ſwear on his behalf, that their Maſter ſhould ſubmit to his Holineſſe's Judgment, and that the King himſelf would alſo take the ſame oath before thoſe Legates, the Pope was now about to ſend concerning that Affair.

[2.] Col. 557. By which means the Ambaſſadors avoided the ſentence of Interdict againſt the King.

[3.] But whilſt theſe things were tranſacting at Rome, there came Two other Cardinals Legates, Gratian and Vivian, who had been ſent before by the Pope into Normandy to enquire into this matter, who mightily perplexed the King, threatning to put Him and his Dominions under the Interdict; but He being already forewarn'd of their coming, appealed to the Pope's own perſon, and ſo ſaved himſelf and his Country from their Sentence: yet he ſtill was afraid of the Pope's ſeverity, and therefore made haſt to the Sea-ſide, and preſently paſſed out of Normandy into England: However, before he went, he by his Edict commanded all his Juſtices and Bayliffs of Normandy, eſpecially thoſe near the Sea-Coaſt, by no means to permit any Stranger or Clerk, who brought any Brief or Bull from the Pope, to paſs over from Normandy into England, or from England thither, unleſs he firſt gave Security, that he would no ways procure any evil or miſchief to the King or his Kingdom.

[3.] R. H. p. 301. a. Two Cardinals at the ſame time ſent into Normandy to threaten the Interdict.

K. Henry forbids all Clerks or Strangers to bring any Bulls from the Pope to Normandy or England.

And goes himſelf for England.

I ſhall conclude this year with the Affairs of Ireland; whilſt the King continued in Normandy, I find by the Manuſcript Chronicle of * Robert Abbot of Bec, that he held a Council of his Barons at Argenton whither, as they conſulted concerning the King's Expedition into Ireland, there came over Meſſengers from Earl Richard Strongbow offering to give up to the King the Cities of Dublin and Waterford, with whatever elſe the Earl then poſſeſſed in that Kingdom in right of his Wife; which offer the King graciouſly accepted, though this Agreement, between Him and the Earl was not finiſh'd, till the King's Arrival in England, as you will find anon; after which about the beginning of Auguſt he took Shipping again, and ſo landed at Portſmouth.

[4.] As ſoon as the King arrived here, in purſuance of his late Reſolutions he made great and ſpeedy Preparations for his Voyage into Ireland, being (as Gervaſe of Canterbury relates) invited over thither by the Kings and other Great Men of that Kingdom, who choſe rather to ſubmit to him than Earl Richard Strongbow.

[4] Id. ib. K. Henry invited into Ireland by the Ks. and Great Men of that Kingdom, who would rather ſubmit to him, than to Strongbow.

But before I relate King Henry's Succeſs in Ireland, it is fit to give you a ſhort account, of what had been there performed by the Engliſh Forces this Year, and which mightily facilitated the King's paſſing over thither.

You may remember, King Henry had the Year before put forth a Proclamation to recal all the Engliſh out of Ireland, [5.] which about Whitſontide laſt paſt had encouraged Haſculf a Norwegian, late Governor of Dublin, to attempt the regaining of that City; and therefore he now ſail'd into the River Liffeè with Sixty Ships filled with Norwegians and other People of the Northern Iſles, and Landing there he aſſaulted it at the Eaſt-Gate under the command of one John Sirnamed The Wood, (i. e. the wild) but Miles Cogan, Governor of the Town, defended it ſo well, that his Brother Richard ſailing out by his Order at the South-Poſtern, beat them off with ſo great a ſlaughter, that they were forced to fly, and John their Captain was there ſlain; but Haſculf being taken in the Ouſe, as he was making to his Ships, was brought before the Governor, and ſaid inſolently that in a little time greater Forces ſhould come up; at which Cogan was ſo highly provoked, that he commanded his Head immediately to be ſtruck off, for he was reſolved he ſhould never ſee them.

[5.] C. G. ib. cap. 21. Haſculf attempts the regaining of Dublin.

But is repulſed by Cogan, and taken priſoner, and at laſt beheaded.

[1.] Then the Iriſh Princes perceiving that no recruits either of Men or Victuals were like to come from England to Earl Richard, collected a vaſt Army from all parts of the Country, and beſieged Dublin, being inſtigated thereto by King Roderic, and Laurence Biſhop of that City, who wrote to Gothred King of Man and other petty Princes of the Northern Iſles, promiſing them great Rewards for their aſſiſtance; they being thus allur'd, with Thirty Ships full of fighting Men arrived at the mouth of the Liffeè, blocking up the Town by Water, whilſt the Landmen joined with the Iriſh Army.

[1.] Ibid. Cap. 22 The Iriſh Princes with a great Army beſiege Dublin.

This Siege continued for Two Months without any relief either by Sea or Land; and when Victuals began to fail among the beſieged, to add yet further to their diſtreſs, they were at the ſame time credibly inform'd, that Robert Fitz-Stephen was, by the men of Kenſele (now called King-ſale) and thoſe of Wexford, to the number of Three Thouſand beſieged in the ſmall Caſtle of Karree, not far from Waterford, and unleſs unleſs he were relieved within Three days, he muſt of neceſſity fall into the Enemie's hands.

[2.] Id. ib. Maurice and Raymond perſuade the Earl to ſally out, and attack the Enemy.

[2.] Earl Richard, with Raymond, and Maurice Fitz-Gerard, were then in Dublin, the laſt of whom hearing of the great Danger his Brother Robert, his Wife and Children were in, by their being beſieged in a weak Caſtle, made up only with Wood and Turfs, Maurice and Raymond did [3.] all they could to perſuade the Earl to ſally out of the Town, and fall upon the Enemy; who though they appear'd very numerous, were yet raw undiſciplin'd and unarm'd Men.

[3.] Id. C. 23.

[4.] Ib. C. 24. The Engliſh Forces, how drawn up.

[4.] This being at laſt agreed on, the Souldiers and Voluntiers were divided into Three ſmall Troops; in the firſt, Commanded by Raymond, were Twenty Knights; in the ſecond, led by Miles Cogan, were Thirty; and in the laſt, Commanded by Maurice, were Forty, with ſome other Horſemen and a few Citizens joined to every Diviſion or Troop; with theſe (leaving enough for the Guard of the City) they marched out, and ſuddenly, about nine of the Clock in the Morning, ſet upon the Iriſh Army of Thirty Thouſand Men, (they not in the leaſt expecting them,) and kill'd very many of them, diſperſing the reſt. King Roderic truſting to the multitude of his Men, and not at all dreaming of ſuch a deſperate Sally, was bathing himſelf, and very hardly eſcaped: The Engliſh purſued their Enemy until the evening, beating off and putting to flight the main Army, as alſo another conſiſting of divers Bodies that lay about ſeveral parts of the City, under their Reſpective Commanders; and the next day they returned well provided with Victuals and other good Booty; and having placed ſufficient Guards in the City, they marched toward Wexford.

They ſet upon Roderic on the ſudden, and defeat his whole Army.

Spoil his Camp, he hardly eſcaping; and return well provided with Victuals and other Booty.

[5.] Id. C. 25. The Wexfordians take Fitz-Stephen by a Stratagem.

[5.] In the mean while the Wexfordians and Kenſalians took Robert Fitz-Stephen priſoner by a ſtratagem, whom they could not ſubdue by force, and it was thus; they brought the Biſhop's of Waterford and Kildare and other Religious Men before the Caſtle, who calling to the beſieged affirm'd to them (though falſly) that Dublin was taken, and the Earl with Maurice and Raymond and all the Engliſh were deſtroy'd, and that a great force out of Connaught and Leinſter was marching down againſt him, and come very near to Wexford; and to induce him to believe the truth of what they ſaid, they took a voluntary Oath upon certain Relicts which they brought along with them; whereupon Robert Fitz-Stephen too haſtily crediting them, ſurrender'd up himſelf and the Caſtle into their hands; but inſtead of conveying him into Wales, as before they had promiſed to do, they clapt both him and his men into Priſon, killing divers of them, and wounding and miſuſing the reſt moſt cruelly. But in a very little time after, there came contrary news to them, that the Seige of Dublin was raiſed, and Earl Strongbow was marching in perſon toward them: upon which they fired the Town of Wexford, and removed themſelves and Goods with their Priſoners into the Iſle of Beg, lying at the mouth of the Harbour.

The Siege of Dublin raiſed.

The Town of Wexford fired.

[1.] Id. C. 26. The E. marches towards Wexford to relieve Stephen, and the Engliſh gain the Paſs, putting divers of the Iriſh to Death.

Then the Earl marched with all ſpeed towards the Town, though he was much hindered in his way thither by the Iriſh, who had fortified a certain paſs over a Bog (called Odron) with ſharp ſtakes; yet notwithſtanding this their oppoſition, the Engliſh gained the Paſs, putting putting many of the Iriſh to Death with the loſs of but one man on their ſide. Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

When they came to the Borders of Wexford, they were inform'd of the ſad condition of Fitz-Stephen, and of the burning of the Town, and received a meſſage from the Iriſh in whoſe cuſtody he was, viz. that if they preſumed to come near, or diſturb them, they would cut off all their Priſoner's Heads; at which meſſage being mightily concerned, they directed their courſe toward Waterford, where they found Harvy of Mount Maurice, (who had been ſent on a Meſſage to King Henry) newly return'd with Letters from him; in theſe he commanded Earl Richard immediately to attend him, who in all dutiful obedience ſtrait paſſed over into England, and met the King at Newnham near Gloceſter where after divers diſputes he was by the mediation of Harvey (whom he brought over with him) reconciled to the King, on theſe conditions, that he ſhould deliver Dublin into his hands, with all the Cantreds or Hundreds adjoining, as alſo the Maritime Towns and Caſtles; and in conſideration of this he ſhould hold all the reſidue of his late Acquiſitions of the King and his Heirs.

The Iriſh threaten to kill all the Priſoners, if the E. diſturb'd them.

The King reconciled to E. Richard, upon his agreeing to deliver up Dublin to him.

Whilſt [2.] the Earl was thus taken up in England, Ororic, the One ey'd King of Methe, taking the advantage of his abſence, came in September with a great multitude to beſiege Dublin, and finding but few Men therein, he aſſaulted the Walls with great Shouts and Outcries; but Miles Cogan the Governor and his Men ſallying out on the ſudden upon them, routed and perſued the Enemy with ſo great a ſlaughter, that beſides many others, the Son of King Ororic, a Valiant Youth, was ſlain on the ſpot. This was the ſtate of Affairs, when the King was ready to go for Ireland.

[2] Id. C. 29. Ororic attempts to beſiege Dublin, but is repulſed with conſiderable Loſs.

And Ororic's Son ſlain on the Spot.

In the mean time King Henry went by Sea to S. David's, and from thence to Pembroke, [3.] where Rees Prince of South-Wales, met him; and to mollify the King's Anger for permitting Earl Richard to paſs into Ireland, promiſed him towards the Conqueſt of it 300 Horſe and 400 Oxen, and gave him 14 Pledges or Hoſtages; and the King in Return beſtow'd upon that Prince all Caërdigan, Stratywy, Aruſtly, and Eluel. [4.] Then the day after S. Luke the King (having left his Son the young King Henry to command in his abſence) took Shipping at Milford Haven, and the ſame day arrived at a place called Croch, about eight Miles from Waterford, with 400 Ships, and a great Army of Horſe and Foot; and the day following marched to the Town, where he ſtay'd for ſome time: during which the Citizens of Wexford, under pretence of Obedience and good Service, brought to him Robert Fitz-Stephen in Bonds, for that he firſt of all invaded Ireland, without his conſent; and the King being then in a great paſſion, for that raſh and unwarrantable attempt, ſent him in Chains to Reginald's Tower.

[3] Dr. Powel's Chron. Rees, Prince of South-Wales, meets the K. at Pembroke, and promiſes him his aſſiſtance for the Conquering of Ireland.

And the K. in return gives him all Caërdigan, Stratywy, Aruſtly and Eluel.

[5.] King Henry lying now at Wexford, there came to him Dermot Mac-Carty, King of Cork, and of his own accord ſubmitted himſelf, and ſwore Fealty, gave Hoſtages, and agreed to pay a certain Annual Tribute. Then King Henry with his Army marched to Liſmore; and from thence to Caſſiles; which Places ſurrender'd upon the ſame Terms.

Anno Dom. MCLXXI.

[1.] Id. ib.

[1.] Upon this ſucceſs the King of Limeric, the King of Oſſery, the King of Methe, with all the Great Men of Ireland, ſubmitted themſelves to the King except the Kings of Connaught and Ulſter, who lying too remote, did not fear the power of his Arms. Then the King, after he had received the Submiſſions of theſe Iriſh Princes above mention'd, returned to Waterford, where Fitz-Stephen was again brought before him; and inconſideration of his great Merits and Valiant Atchievements, back'd with the interceſſion of divers Eminent perſons, he reſtored him to his Liberty, but took from him Wexford, and the Territories thereunto adjoining; which ſeem'd very hard meaſure for ſo great valour in one, who had only acted under the Command of another, who was abſolutely pardon'd.

Fitz-Stephen reſtor'd to his Liberty.

[2.] Then all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops and Abbots of Ireland came unto the King of England at Waterford, and received him as King and Lord of Ireland, and ſwore Fealty to Him and his Heirs; and from every Archbiſhop and Biſhop he received a Charter, by which they acknowledged and conſtituted him King, and ſubmitted to Him and his Heirs as their King's for ever; and, according to their example, the aforeſaid King Roderic and many other Petty Princes of thoſe parts received him as King and Lord of Ireland, and became his Leige-men, and ſwore Fealty to Him and his Heirs againſt all Men.

[2] R. H. p. 301. b.. The Iriſh Clergy ſwear Fealty to Him and his Heirs for ever.

And Roderic with the reſt of the petty Princes of thoſe Parts did the like, and acknowledged him as their K. and Lord.

[3.] Theſe Charters being tranſcribed, the King ſent the Tranſcripts to Pope Alexander, who by his Apoſtolick Authority again confirmed to Him and his Heirs the Kingdom of Ireland, according to the form of thoſe Charters; this you may ſee in Holinſhed's Chronicle, and being to the ſame effect as that of Pope Adrian above-mention'd, need not to be here inſerted.

[3.] Id ib. C.B. Col. 1071. The Charters ſent to the Pope, who confirms them.

But the whole Iſland being thus ſetled in peace, the King called a Council or Synod of all the Clergy thereof at Caſſiles, and ſent Ralph Abbot of Buldewas, Ralph Arch-Deacon of Landaff, Nicholas his Chaplain, and other Clerks to aſſiſt at it; Here many Eccleſiaſtical Canons were made, as well for the Reformation of the Religion, as Manners of the People of that Nation, the King's deſign being to bring the ſtate of the Iriſh Church as near to the form of the Engliſh as might be; and therefore he confirmed the Decrees of this Council by his Royal Authority.

Many Eccleſiaſtical Canons made therein.

The K goes to Dublin, and cauſes a Palace to be built there for him.

From Waterford he came to Dublin about the Feaſt of St. Martin, or 12th of November, where he cauſed a great Houſe or Pallace to be built on purpoſe for him, of Wattles, according to the manner of that Country.

Anno Dom. MCLXXII.

[4.] In this homely Pallace the King kept a magnificent Chriſtmaſs the Iriſh much admiring his Hoſpitality and the ſpendor of his Court; and here he ſtay'd till the beginning of Lent; and then he went to Wexford, having ſent his Officers and Servants to Waterford to embark there. He, receiving Information, that the two Cardinals, Theodinus and Albertus, who had been ſent from the Pope, were arrived in Normandy, made haſte to go to them, though he left Ireland very unwillingly, it not being as yet entirely ſubdued. However, before he went away, taking advice of his principal Councellours, he made the beſt proviſions he could for the ſecurity of it; [5.] for before he departed, he gave to Hugh de Lacy all the Country

He takes Shipping in the Haven of Wexford, Lands near St Davids, from thence goes to Portſmouth, and ſo to Normandy.

Having thus ſettled the Kingdom as well as the ſhortneſs of time would permit, he took ſhipping in the furthermoſt part of the Haven of Wexford on Eaſter Sunday before Sun-riſing, and landed near St. David's in Wales the ſame day about Noon: from thence with all imaginable ſpeed he paſſed to Portſmouth, where the Ships lay ready to tranſport him into Normandy. Indeed his deſign was to have ſtay'd in Ireland all the Summer, and to have wholly reduced it under his Subjection, had it not been for this ſudden avocation into Normandy about the buſineſs of the late Archbiſhop, and the differences between him and the King of France, that were to be compoſed and determined by thoſe Two Cardinals, whom the Pope had now ſent as his Legates.

[1.] Id. C. 40. Counter-Security given between Ororic and Hugh de Lacy for their ſafe coming and going to Ororic-Hill.

[1.] Not long after the King's departure, Ororic (Sirnam'd the One-ey'd King of Methe) and Hugh de Lacy gave mutual Oathes to each other for their ſafe going to and from a place called Ororic-Hill, where they had appointed to meet, and treat for the better and more peaceable ordering of their Affairs: they were to bring along with them but few Men of each ſide, and thoſe unarm'd; but Griffin, the Nephew of Maurice Fitz-Gerald, dreaming a ſtrange Dream of certain wild Hogs and a Boar that fell upon him and Hugh de Lacy, and thereby conceiving a jealouſy of the Treachery of Ororic, brought along with him privately Seven choice Knights or Horſemen of his Relations who lay out of ſight; after ſome time had been ſpent in diſcourſe by an Interpreter upon ſeveral propoſals to no purpoſe, Ororic gave the Signal to his Men, whom he had laid in Ambuſh for the deſtruction of Hugh de Lacy and Maurice, and then came up himſelf to ſmite Hugh with his Iriſh Ax; with which ſtroke his Interpreter, who interpoſed himſelf, had his Arm chopt off, of which Wound he dy'd. Upon this Maurice and his Nephew Griffin ran preſently in to the reſcue of Hugh de Lacy; which when Ororic ſaw, he intended to fly, but as he was mounting his Horſe, Griffin charged him ſo home with his Lance, that he killed both Man and Horſe, and afterwards Three of his Servants that waited on him; ſo the Reſt fled to the Woods, where ſeveral of them were killed in the perſuit, and Ororic's Head was ſent into England to the King. In this conflict Ralph the Son of Robert Fitz-Stephen deſerved Praiſe beyond all others for his Valour and Conduct.

Ororic's Treachery to deſtroy Hugh de Lacy and Maurice.

But Ororic is kill'd by Griffin, Nephew of Maurice.

And his Head ſent into England to the K.

[2.] But to return to the King, who was now arriv'd in Normandy with King Henry his Son, and meeting the Two Cardinals at Caën, he, by their mediation, made an Agreement with the King of France about the Crowning of his Daughter, and a while after by their their Advice ſent back his Son into England, and with him Rotrod Archbiſhop of Roüen, Giles Biſhop of Eureux, and Roger Biſhop of Worceſter, to Crown him anew, together with Margaret his Queen; which Ceremony theſe Biſhops ſolemnly performed at Wincheſter in the Church of St. Swithin on the 27th of Auguſt; and preſently after the Coronation was over, they all returned into Normandy.

K. Henry his Son ſent back into England, to be Crowned anew with Margaret his Queen.

And then return'd into Normandy.

[3.] On the 27th of September, Henry the Father, and the King his Son, with Rotrod Archbiſhop of Roüen, and all the Biſhops and Abbots of Normandy, met Theodinus and Albertus the Cardinals at Abrinces (now Auranches,) where the Father in the Church of St. Andrew purged himſelf by Oath, and aſſerted his Innocence upon the Reliques of the Saints and the Holy Goſpels, that he neither commanded nor deſired that Archbiſhop Becket ſhould be ſlain, and that when he heard it he was grieved extreamly; but becauſe thoſe Malefactors who kill'd him could not be taken, and becauſe he was afraid they might have committed that cruel and wicked Murther upon the account of their ſeeing him in a very great paſſion, he there made this following Oath for the Pope's Satisfaction.

[3.] Id. ibid.

K. Henry the Father purges himſelf by Oath, that he neither commanded nor deſired the A. Bp's death.

[4.] Firſt, That he would never quit Pope Alexander nor his Catholick Succeſſours, ſo long as they acknowledged him a Catholick King.

[4.] Id. ibid.

And makesthe following Oath of Satisfaction and Pennance.

Secondly, That he would not hinder, nor ſuffer to be hinder'd any Appeals, but that they might be freely made from his Kingdom to the Pope in all Eccleſiaſtical cauſes; but with this Caution, that if any perſons were ſuſpected by the King, they ſhould give ſecurity not to do any injury either to Him, or his Kingdom.

Thirdly, That at Chriſtmaſs following, he would undertake the Cruſado, and go to Jeruſalem for Three years; and in caſe he ſhould be diverted by going into Spain againſt the Saracens, then he would give to the Templers ſo much money, as they ſhould in their own Judgments think ſufficient to maintain Two Hundred Souldiers for One Year, for the defence of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem.

Fourthly, That he pardoned all Clerks and Laicks, who were in Exile with Archbiſhop Thomas, and granted them free leave quietly and in ſafety to return home to their own again.

Fifthly, That he would reſtore the poſſeſſions of the Church of Canterbury, if any had been taken from it, as fully as it enjoy'd them a Year before the Archbiſhop went out of England; and that the cuſtoms which were contrary to the Churches of his Land, and introduced in his time, ſhould be wholly laid aſide, and aboliſhed.

[5.] Id. ibid.

And cauſes his Son Henry to do the like.

[5.] All theſe things the King ſwore faithfully to obſerve without any Deceit or Guile, and then he cauſed his Son Henry to do the like, except in ſuch things as concerned his own perſon; and that they might remain in the Regiſters of the Roman Church, King Henry the Elder cauſed his Seal to be affixed to the writing, which contained theſe Articles, or Heads, ſuperadding to his Own the Seals of the Cardinals; who upon his Purgation, Submiſſion, and Satisfaction, granted him a Charter of Abſolution for the Death of the Archbiſhop.

K. Henry the Father cauſes his Seal to be fixed to the writing, ſuperadding to it the Seals of the Cardinals.

And ſo receives from them a Charter of Abſolution.

The

Anno Dom. MCLXXII

The Pope, here you may ſee, by the aforeſaid Conditions, and the Grant of theſe Articles, not only gained an entire Submiſſion from King Henry, with a full Conceſſion of Appeals to Rome for the time to come, but alſo eſtabliſhed and enlarged his Eccleſiaſtical Power to a great degree; ſo that the King's long and obſtinate Oppoſition, and the Murther of Archbiſhop Becket, proved as advantageous to the Pope's uſurped Authority, as Rebellions when quell'd do to the Power of Temporal Princes.

By theſe Articles the Pope's Eccleſiaſtical Power was greatly enlarg'd.

[1.] The next day after, the Cardinals held a Great Council or Synod with the Archbiſhop of Roüen, and Biſhops and Clergy of Normandy, where divers Decrees were made, and enjoyn'd to be obſerv'd; but ſeeing they only concern that Province, and do no ways relate to England, I ſhall refer the Inquiſitive Reader to our Authors, if he deſires further ſatisfaction therein.

[1.] Id. ibid. The Cardinals hold a Great Council in Normandy, wherein divers Decrees were made.

[2.] We will now ſee what was doing the mean while in England, as to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, for want of Civil; and here the Young King, by the Advice of his Governors, commanded Odo, the Prior, with the Monks of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury, to come to him, and there chuſe a new Archbiſhop: to this they paid a ready Obedience, and coming to Court, the Prior deſired they might have (according to cuſtom) a Free Election, which though not abſolutely deny'd them, yet it was for that time adjourn'd, and they put off for Three weeks longer, when they might be better prepared by Prayers and good Advice for a new Election; ſo the Prior and his Monks return'd home, and at the time appointed came up again to Court about Michaelmaſs; yet they ſtill remaining in the ſame Reſolution, the Young King (or rather his Courtiers) flatly denied them their Requeſt, commanding that ſome of them ſhould go over beyond Sea to the King his Father, to know his pleaſure concerning it; the Prior obey'd preſently, and there found him in a very humble Temper, rather ſupplicating than commanding them to elect the Biſhop of Bayëux Archbiſhop, for he was afraid they might chuſe ſome ſevere Man, who would imitate the laſt Archbiſhop; but the Prior knowing that Biſhop to be but a weak Man, and eaſy to be drawn aſide, utterly refuſed to name any one without the conſent of his Convent: Upon which the King was forced to ſend the Prior back into England with Letters to induce them to conſent to his Nomination.

[2.] C. G. The Young K. ſends for Odo the Prior, and the Monks of Chriſt Church in Canterbury, to come and chuſe a New A. Bp.

Upon the Prior's deſiring a Free Election, they are adjourned for Three weeks.

Then come again to Court, but their Requeſt is flatly denied them.

The Prior goes over to K. Henry the Father, who deſires them to elect the Bp. of Bayeux.

The Prior refuſing to nominate any without the conſent of the Convent, The K. ſends Letters to them to comply with his Nomination.

[3.] The Prior being return'd, the Biſhop and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury were ſummon'd to meet at London, and Prior Odo was then preſent among the reſt; where after many Debates about an Election, there was no liberty allow'd them of having a Free One; and being thus again fruſtrated of their hopes, they all return'd home without doing any thing in the matter.

[3] Id. ib. The Bps and Clergy of Canterbury ſummon'd to meet at London.

But not obtaining any Free Election, return home as they came.

This Tranſaction, though it had no effect, yet I have here ſet down, not only to ſhew the Reader the manner of Electing Archbiſhops in thoſe days, and the great Solemnity of it; but alſo to let him ſee that the King's Deſires or Commands for the Election of whom he thought fit, was ſeldom or never diſobey'd; and if they were not comply'd with now, it was becauſe the King had loſt his Power with them by the Murther of the late Archbiſhop: and yet notwithſtanding you find they durſt not proceed to an Election without his conſent.

The Young K. and Q. go into Normandy, and from thence are ſent to the K. of France. But were not long there before recalled.

[4.] After this, about the Feaſt of All-Saints, the Young King, with his Queen, according to his Father's Command, went into Normandy; and when they came thither, they were both ſent to the King of France; who being very deſirous to ſee his Daughter, received them with all imaginable Expreſſions of Joy and Honour; and they ſtayed there for ſome time with him. But King Henry ſuſpecting the Fraud and Malice of King Lewis, of which he had had ſo often Experience, and the ill impreſſions that might be made upon this eaſy Young Prince, if he continu'd too long there, ſent for his Son and Daughter to return into Normandy.

Great Miſchiefs ariſe from this Viſit. K Lewis ſets the Son to demand of his Father either all England or all Normandy for his Subſiſtance.

This Viſit was the Occaſion of great Wars and Miſchiefs to both Kingdoms; for during their ſtay there, King Lewis (who always bore a ſecret Grudge againſt the King of England) adviſed his Son-in-Law upon his return into Normandy, to require of his Father, either all England, or all Normandy, for his Subſiſtance; and if his Father would not grant either of them, then to return into France to Him. Upon this they took their leaves, and about Chriſtmaſs return'd into Normandy; ſoon after which, the Father went into Anjou, but his Son and Daughter-in Law were order'd to tarry behind. Walſingham reports, that whilſt the King was in Ireland, Hugo de St. Maur, and Ralph de Faia, the Young Queen's Uncle, (and as 'twas ſaid by her inſtigation) began to alienate the Mind of the Young King from his Father, ſuggeſting that it ſeem'd indecent and abſurd that any Man ſhould be a King without a Territory or Dominion: But ſince I find it not in any antient Author, I will not warrant the truth of this Relation.

The Young Q. ſuſpected to cauſe the Diviſion between the Father and Son.

[5.] B. A. Adam de Port Outlaw'd for Treaſon, upon refuſing to ſtand to the Judgment of the K's Court.

[5.] About this time Adam de Port, a Nobleman, was impeached of Treaſon for Conſpiring the Death of the King; and being Summon'd, he refus'd to ſtand to the Judgment of his Court, whereupon he was Outlaw'd. But this ſeems very ſtrange, that He alone ſhould be thus puniſh'd, and none of his Fellow-Conſpirators in the leaſt taken notice of.

[1.] Id. R. H. p. 304. The K. ſends for his Son to come to him to Chinon.

[1.] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Chinon in Anjou with his Queen Eleanor, whilſt his Son and the Young Queen remain'd ſtill in Normandy: After Chriſtmaſs the King ſent for his Son to come to him to Chinon, from whence they went together into Auvergn to Clermont, (though Hoveden by a miſtake ſays it was Mont-ferrat, which lies in another Country.) The Buſineſs they went about, was, to meet and treat with Hubert Earl of Maurienna (now part of Savoy) about a Marriage between the King's youngeſt Son John and his Daughter Alice with whom he was to have had the greateſt part of her Father's Dominions, in caſe they had Children. This Treaty is very long and particular in our Author; but the young Lady dying before the Marriage was conſummated, it all came to nothing; and therefore it is to no purpoſe to ſet it down here.

They both go to Clermont in Auvergn, to treat about a Marriage between E. John and Alice, the Daughter of the E. of Maurienna. But ſhe dies before the Marriage is conſummated.

[2.] From hence both the Kings went to Limoges, where Raymond Earl of St. Giles met them, and became their * Vaſſal; and alſo did Homage to Richard the King's Son as Earl of Poictou, and agreed to hold Tholouſe of Him in Hereditary Right, by the Service of attending them upon their Summons, and ſtaying with them Forty days at his own coſt; but if they would have him ſtay longer, it was to be at their Charges. The reſt of the Conditions being long, and not much to our purpoſe, I omit.

[3.] Now alſo aroſe the Firſt apparent cauſe of Diſſention between King Henry and his Son the Young King, and it was upon this occaſion; the Earl of Maurienna above-mention'd had follow'd King Henry to Limoges to know what Territories he would ſettle upon his Son John at his Marriage; and when the King offer'd him the Caſtles of Chinon, Lodun, and Mirabel, the Young King contradicted his Father, and would not ſuffer him to do it, for he took it very ill that He would not aſſign him any of his Dominions, which He and his Queen might call their own. For the Earls and Barons of Normandy that malign'd his Father, had put him upon asking that Dutcheſs for his Appenage. From this time the Son ſought occaſions and opportunity to recede from Him, and would not any more hearken to what he adviſed.

The firſt apparent cauſe of Diſſention between the Father and Son.

The Young K. contradicts his Father.

And alienates his Mind from him.

[4.] The King having diſpatch'd his Affairs at Limoges, haſtened to return into Normandy; and taking his Son along with him, came to Chinon, where he lodg'd that night; but the Son having (it ſeems) out-rode his Father, went forward without taking any leave of him, and on the morrow came to Alençon, and the next day lodg'd at Argentom; (his Father ſtill following him) and that night he came thither, his Father lay at Alençon, ſo that he could never overtake him; for the very night he came to Argentom, (being the 8th of March) after he had repoſed himſelf for a few hours, he with his whole Family went over to the King of France, but left the Young Queen behind him for ſome time.

[5.] King Henry knowing his Son had left him, had ſufficient reaſon to fear the Treachery of the French, and therefore with all diligence viſited his Caſtles in the Borders of Normandy towards France, and manned and victualled them very well; he alſo ſtrengthened Giſors as well as he could: and likewiſe went to all his other Caſtles in Normandy, and ſent his Commands to all his Caſtellans in England, Anjou, and Bretaign, that they ſhould keep ſtrong Guards, and take care to ſecure the Caſtles under their Command; the chief Contrivers of this Treachery were Lewis King of France, and Ralph de Faya above-mention'd: but, what ſeems more wonderful, Queen Eleanor having both her younger Sons, Richard Duke of Aquitain and Geoffrey Earl of Bretaign, then with her in England, ſhe ſent them both over into France to the Young King their Brother, that ſo they might ſide with him againſt their Father.

But though it may at firſt ſeem very ſtrange (and indeed almoſt incredible) that this Queen ſhould not only encourage her Son Henry againſt the King her Husband, but ſhould alſo excite and ſend over her Two other Sons to join in the ſame wicked and unnatural War againſt their Father: Yet it will not appear ſo ſtrange, when the Reader ſhall underſtand, that ſome time before this, the King had ſlighted the Queen his Wife, (who was much older than himſelf) and had fallen into ſeveral Amours with divers Miſtreſſes, till at laſt the Lady Roſamond, Daughter to the Lord Clifford, got the Aſcendant in his Affections; and by her he had ſeveral Children, who are mention'd at the end of this Reign: Wherefore the Queen's Jealouſy and Rage to ſee her ſelf thus caſt off by a Husband whom ſhe had ſo highly obliged, ſo far tranſported her beyond all the bounds of Reaſon and Moderation, that nothing leſs would ſatisfy her Revenge, than to ſee him

But to return to the Hiſtory.

[1.] Id. ib. The Young K's Chancellor brings his Seal to his Father.

[1.] Upon this ſudden departure of the Young King above-mention'd, Richard de Bar his Chancellor return'd to his Father, and deliver'd him the Seal he had committed to his Charge, which he receiv'd, and caus'd it to be ſecurely kept. The Servants alſo whom he had placed in his Son's Family, return'd to him, and brought with them his Carriages and other Furniture; but his Father would not retain them, but ſent them back together with his Horſes, Plate and Apparel, commanding them to ſerve him faithfully; but when they came thither, he cauſed all ſuch as would ſtay, to ſwear Fealty to him againſt his Father, and would not permit any to ſtay with him that would not take that Oath, which they all did except Walter his Chaplain, Edward his Chamberlain, and William Blound his Porter; who all came away, and ſtayed with the King his Father.

There were within the Town (besides the Castle) Three Burghs separated from each other, and inclosed with strong Walls, and Ditches full of Water; one of them was call'd the Great Burgh, against which the King of France fix'd his Engines, though without much success; after a month the Besieg'd wanting Victuals, were forc'd to make a Truce with him for Three days, that so they might go to their Lord the King of England to desire Relief; and if within that time they failed of it, then to deliver the Burgh, and the peremptory day appointed for it was the Vigil of St. Laurence; the day before which, at the request of the Besieged, King Henry came to relieve the Town, and drew up his Army before it, the Souldiers being all then very desirous to fight: and it was thought to be so near a Battle, that William Earl of Arundel made the Norman Nobility a long Speech to encourage them; but when they were now in the heighth of their Expectations of it, the King of France sent to the King of England the Archbishop of Sens, and the Earls Henry and Theobald, to let him know, that the next day (which was the Peremptory day for its Surrender) he would have a Conference with him; but he neither came, nor sent, and so by a Trick He had part of the Town surrender'd to him; yet when he had thus got it, he durst not keep it, but plunder'd and burnt it, and presently retir'd, carrying the Burghers Prisoners along with him into France; so soon as King Henry knew it, he persued the French, kill'd many of them, and took more Prisoners, and return'd that Evening to Verneüil; and lodging there that night, commanded the Walls that were batter'd down to be repair'd. [3.] The Chriſtmaſs following King Henry ſpent at Caën in Normandy, where a Truce was concluded between Him and the King of France from the Feaſt of St. Hillary until the Cloſe of, or Eight days after Eaſter. And then likewiſe Hugh Biſhop of Durham made a Truce with the King of Scots at Revedale for the ſame time, and in conſideration of it gave him Three Hundred Marks of Silver, to be levied upon the Lands of the Barons of Northumberland.

When the Time of this Truce was expir'd, [4.] King William (having firſt collected his Three Hundred Marks above-mention'd) march'd into Northumberland with a great Army of Scots and Galloway-men, and committed ſuch great Slaughters and Barbarities upon the People of all Ages and Conditions, as would ſeem incredible (as our Authors report them) had we not read of the like committed in the Reign of King Stephen; [5.] and then ſent his Brother Earl David to Leiceſter to relieve that Place; but before he could get thither, the Town was taken by Richard de Lucy the King's Juſticiary, whilſt King William was beſieging Caerliſle: But when he had lain a few days before it, he inveſted the Caſtle with ſome part of his Army, and with the reſt paſſed quite through Northumberland, ſpoiling the Country wherever he came.

He took by Storm the Caſtles of Burgh and Apelby, then in the cuſtody of Robert de Stuteville; as alſo the Caſtles of Werkworth and Gerby, which were all the Kings, and then return'd to his Army before Caerliſle, and beſieg'd it ſo long that the Gariſon began to want Victuals; whereupon Robert de Vaus the Governor Articled with him, That he would Surrender both the Town and Caſtle at Michaelmaſs following, if by that time he receiv'd no Relief from the King of England; and for performance of this, he gave the King of Scots Hoſtages, and his own Oath beſides.

So leaving the Town blockt up, from thence he went with his Army and beſieg'd Prudhou, the Caſtle of Odonel de Unfranvill, but could not ſtay to take it, for he heard that a great Force out of Yorkſhire was coming againſt him under the Command of Robert de Stuteville and his Son William, with divers other Gentlemen of that Country; upon which News, the King of Scots raiſed his Siege from that Caſtle, Caſtle, and retreating thence beſieged Alnewick; and whilſt he lay before it, ſent the Earls Duncan and Angus with the greateſt part of the Army to harraſs, pillage and burn the Country round about, which they executed with the like barbarous and inhumane Cruelty, as they had before done at their firſt enterance into the Kingdom.

Anno Dom. MCLXXIV.

And falls upon Alnewic, and with his Army burns and pillages the Countries round about.

[1.] In the mean time the Commanders of the Yorkſhire Forces being informed of his Retreat from Prudehou, and that he had ſent away the greateſt part of his Army from him, and lay with the reſt before Alnewick; they made towards him with all the ſpeed they could, and leaving the Main Body of their Forces behind, Robert de Stuteville and Ranulph de Glanville reſolved to march with a Choſen Party of light Horſe early in the Morning to ſurprize the King in his Quarters; ſo by Sun-riſing they came before Alnewick, where they found him ſecure, and taking the Air in the Morning with about Sixty Horſemen that attended him. At firſt, when he ſaw the Engliſh afar off, he was not at all concern'd, for he thought they had been his own Party, Commanded by Earl Duncan, then returned from Plundering the Country; but the Engliſh preſently aſſaulted this ſmall Party, and him Priſoner without any great difficulty, (he having then but a ſmall Guard about him,) before more Forces could come in to his aſſiſtance, though He made the beſt Defence he could, and had his Horſe kill'd under him. Beſides the King, there were divers Priſoners of the Scotiſh and Engliſh Nobility taken, who then ſided with him.

[1.] B. A C.G. The Yorkſhire Men ſurprize and take the K. at Alnewic, with divers of the Scotiſh and Engliſh Nobility, Priſoners.

But ſince [2.] Buchanan and the reſt of the Scotiſh Hiſtorians relate this War, with the Occaſions of it, after a different manner, it is fit we take ſome notice of what they ſay: As firſt, That the King of England being taken up with the French War, reſtored that part of Northumberland to the Scotiſh King, which his Great Grandfather had before poſſeſs'd: But this is very improbable, ſince it was not a part, but the whole County of Northumberland which that King then held. They ſay likewiſe, that the Engliſh, being very much diſpleaſed at the giving up of ſo great a part of their Country, made frequent Incurſions into Scotland; and by refuſing to make ſatisfaction for it, gave freſh Occaſions for a War, which their King was then forced to make; and that when he had now entered England with a powerful Army, the Engliſh (having no Forces ready ſufficient to oppoſe them) ſent Meſſengers to his Camp to deſire a Ceſſation of Arms, offering a great Sum of Money for it; which being granted by him, they ſpent all the time of this Ceſſation in Warlike Preparations, and in the mean time ſent Spies into the King's Camp, where they found all things in great ſecurity, as relying on the Truce, and that the King had ſent away the greater part of his Army to fetch in Forage and Proviſions.

[2.] Lib. 7. Sub Rege 93. The different Account the Scotiſh Hiſtorians give of this War in favour of their own Nation.

The Engliſh having received this Intelligence from their Spies, at their return, the Commanders reſolved not to loſe this advantage, but leaving the greateſt part of their Army behind with Four hundred light Horſe, they marched away by night, and came near the Scotiſh Camp before Sun-riſing, where finding a better opportunity than they could expect for the execution of their deſign, they (with Scotiſh Arms and Enſigns) ſet upon the King, who was Riding out early in the Morning with a ſlender Guard; and before it could be known whither they were Friends or Enemies, ſurprized, and took him Priſoner.

Anno Dom. MCLXXIV.

This is a very plauſible Story if it were all true; but in the firſt place, as to the Occaſions of this War, they are altogether improbable; for is it likely that the Engliſh ſhould ſtand ſo much in awe of the Scots, as to deliver up great part of the Country to buy a Peace, and yet ſhould afterwards preſume to make freſh Incurſions, and not only that, but alſo deny to make ſatisfaction for the Injuries they had done, when they knew they were not in a condition to maintain a War? But in Truth there was not any Truce then made with the Scotiſh King, but that which was concluded the laſt Winter, and expired before this Invaſion; nor was part of the Scotiſh Army ſent to fetch in Proviſions, but to deſtroy the Country, as all our Hiſtorians agree: and therefore there could be no Ceſſation of Arms at the ſame time, and conſequently all the reſt of the Story of this King's being ſurpriz'd during the Truce, is a great miſtake; though that he was taken at unawares, we do not deny, ſince he did not expect the Engliſh Army ſo near him; which, I muſt confeſs, was a great overſight in ſo warlike a Prince, who ought certainly to have had his Scouts abroad to watch the Enemie's motions.

A plauſible Story, if true; but it is altogether improbable, for the following Reaſons.

No Truce made with the Scotiſh K. but what was expir'd before this Invaſion.

The Story of their K's. being ſurpriz'd during the Truce, a great miſtake.

Their own Chronicle of Mailroſi being againſt them.

But I ſhall ſay no more of this matter, ſince the Chronicle of Mailroſs, which was written for the greateſt part by the Abbot of Dundrinnand (a Scotchman) ſays expreſsly concerning this War, That William King of Scots hoping to repair old Loſſes, through evil Counſel began a cruel War againſt his Coſin and Lord the King of England: Therefore I ſhall leave it to the impartial Reader to judge who beſt deſerves credit, our Engliſh Hiſtorians that lived at the ſame time, and all agree in this Relation; or the Scotiſh Writers, the earlieſt of whom lived above an Hundred years after. I thought good to mention this, not ſo much to vindicate the Credit of our own Hiſtorians, as the Honour of our Nation.

The K. of Scots firſt carried to Richmond-Caſtle, and kept cloſe Priſoner there, till removed by K. Henry's Order to Normandy.

[3.] But by what means ſoever this King was taken Priſoner, thus much is certain, that it was done on the 13th of July, and that he was firſt carried to Richmond-Caſtle, where he was kept cloſe Priſoner by King Henry's Order, till he was ſome time after convey'd into Normandy.

[4.] About a month before this Action, the Earl of Flanders having lately taken an Oath before the French King to Invade England, he with a powerful Army, preſently after Midſummer, (in order to reduce it to the Young King's Obedience) had come down to Whitſand to paſs over, and till his whole Army could be ready, ſent before Ralph de la Haye with above Three Hundred choice Horſemen, all Veterane Souldiers, who, landing in Norfolk, joyned themſelves to Earl Hugh Bigot; and he not long after marched with them to Norwich, and fired it; [5.] then Ansketel Malhore Conſtable of Leiceſter, preſently after Whitſuntide went with his Forces to the King's Town of Northampton, where the Burgeſſes with the Souldiers within it ſallied out upon them, and had a ſharp diſpute, yet the Leiceſtrians got the better, carrying away with them Two Hundred Priſoners, beſides thoſe that were kill'd or wounded.

[1.] In the mean while Geoffrey, Biſhop Elect of Lincoln (the King's Natural Son) gather'd an Army out of Lincolnſhire, and beſieged the Caſtle of Liſle in the Iſle of Axholm, which Roger de Mowbray had fortified; but he going to Leiceſter for Aſſiſtance, was taken by the Country-

Countrymen of Claye, and there kept Priſoner. As ſoon as Biſhop Geoffrey had taken that Caſtle, he commanded it to be demoliſhed; and going away from thence to York, and taking Roger Archbiſhop of that City to his Aſſiſtance, he marched with the Militia of that Shire to Maleſarch, another Caſtle of Mowbray's, which he took in a few days, (with many Knights that were in it) and deliver'd it to the Cuſtody of that Archbiſhop.

[2.] But ſome time after, viz. on the 3d of July, Reginald, Earl of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucy, chief Juſtice of England, were ſeverely reveng'd on thoſe Leiceſter Rebels, for they march'd with their joynt Forces againſt the Town of Leiceſter, and took it, and in the Aſſault ſet it on fire, and burnt moſt of it, except the Caſtle which they could not take; but the Townſmen, upon payment of Three Hundred pounds, had leave to go away, and inhabit in any Towns they pleaſed then under the King's Obedience.

[3.] Some time after Midſummer, Richard de Lucy beſieg'd Huntington-Caſtle, but the Gariſon had burnt the Town before his coming; then he built a Fort before the Gates of the Caſtle, ſo that thoſe within it could not go out with ſafety; and by the King's Command he deliver'd that Fort into the hands of Earl Simon*, who had lately claimed the Earldom of Huntington in the King's Court as his Inheritance, which the King granted to him whenever he could reduce it.

[4.] At Midſummer the Young King, and Philip Earl of Flanders, at the Inſtigation of the King of France, and Requeſt of ſome of the Earls and Barons of England of their Party, came with a great Army to Gravelin in Flanders, where a Fleet lay ready to Tranſport them into England, but they wanted a Wind to carry them over. In the mean while the Old King was with his Army in Poictou, and there ſubdued many Forts and Caſtles, and at length came to the City of Xaintes and took it, with two Towres, whereof one was called the Great One, in which were many Knights and *Eſquires; He likewiſe beſieged the Cathedral which was fortified and victualled againſt him, but within a few days he poſſeſſed himſelf of it, and there alſo he took ſeveral Knights, with their Followers; then preſently returning into Anjou about St. Barnaby-tide, he took Ançena, the Town of Guinon de Ançena near St. Florence, and built there a ſtrong Fortreſs, and placed a Gariſon in it: after this he waſted the whole Province, cutting down the Vines and Fruit-Trees, and then return'd into Normandy.

Saint by the Pope: but ſo ſoon as the King ſaw the Cathedral Church where this new Archbiſhop Thomas was interr'd, though he was then Three Miles off, he alighted from his Horſe, and pulling off his Boots, went Bare-foot to the very Sepulchre, and there proſtrating himſelf, received the Diſcipline, or (as Gervaſe more plainly words it) was voluntarily whipp'd by all the Biſhops and Abbots there preſent, as alſo by every one of the Monks of Chriſt-Church; and then remained in Prayer and Faſting by this (ſuppoſed) Martyr's Tomb all that Day and the Night following, neither would he ſuffer a Carpet or any ſuch thing to be put under him to keep him from the cold Stones. Then after a ſolemn Proceſſion round about all the Altars of the Upper Church, and the Bodies of the Saints that lay there buried, he return'd again to the Tomb of the New St. Thomas; and ſo having next morning (being the 13th of July) heard Maſs, he departed joyfully from Canterbury, and the next day reached London.

The K. of Scots taken Priſoner.

Now it happen'd on that very day the King took his Journey from Canterbury, that the King of Scots was taken Priſoner, which is by our Monkiſh Writers imputed to the Merits and Interceſſion of this new Saint, who had the Year before been Canoniz'd by the Pope, as you may find by his Bull recited at large by Radulphus de Diceto and Quadrilogus, to whom we refer thoſe that are deſirous to read it. But of the Tranſlation and Enſhrinement of this pretended Saint we ſhall ſpeake more, when we come to the Reign of King Henry the Third.

[1.] As ſoon almoſt as the King came to London, he received the good News, by a Meſſenger ſent Poſt on purpoſe from Ranulph de Glanville, of the taking the King of Scots Priſoner; which when he heard, he with Tears gave Thanks to the new Martyr St. Thomas; and [2.] then on the Thurſday following, he marched with his Army toward Huntington, and beſieg'd it, and on the Twenty-firſt of July forced thoſe within to ſurrender upon Mercy, their Lives and Limbs only preſerved.

[3.] From thence the King went with his Army toward Framingham-Caſtle, where Hugh Bigot was with a ſtrong Gariſon of Flemmings, and ſate down before it; but on the next day (viz. the Twenty Fifth of Auguſt) the Earl being afraid, came out and made his Peace with the King, and deliver'd his Caſtles of Framingham and Bungey, upon obtaining from him with great difficulty, that the Flemmings might have liberty to depart home. From thence he went to Northampton, whither the King of Scots was brought with his Legs tied under the Horſe's Belly, and preſented to the King: there came alſo to him the Biſhop of Durham, who then ſurrender'd that Caſtle, as likewiſe the Caſtles of Norham and Alverton. And on the ſame day came to him Ansketil Mallore and William de Diva, Conſtables of the Earl of Leiceſter, and render'd the Caſtles of Leiceſter, Mont-ſorrel and Groby. The ſame day alſo came to him Roger de Mowbray, and render'd up his Caſtle of Thurſk; and then came in the Earl of Ferrers, and deliver'd up his Caſtles of Stutesbury and Duffelde; ſo that within Three Weeks all England was at Peace, and all the ſtrong Places were ſurrender'd into the King's hands.

[4.] While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the King of France hearing of the taking of the King of Scots, and the reſt of King Henry's Succeſſes in England, recalled the Young King and Earl of Flanders from the Sea-Coaſt, ſince he found it was in vain for them to ſtay there any longer; [5.] and ſo joyning their Forces with his, and making up a Great Army, they march'd away and beſieg'd Roüen, hoping to take it before King Henry could arrive thither: but they did little againſt it, for the Barons and Knights of Normandy (who had an entire Affection for King Henry the Father) put themſelves into the City, and courageouſly defended it.

[1.] This News coming to the Old King's Ears, whoſe Affairs in England were now in a pretty good Poſture, he with great ſpeed went to Portſmouth, and taking Shipping on the Eighth of Auguſt, Landed at Barfleur in Normandy, and carried with him (beſides his Brabanters) a Thouſand Welſhmen, lately ſent him by David Prince of Wales (now married to Emma the King's Natural Siſter:) He alſo carried over with him William King of Scots, with the Earls of Leiceſter and Cheſter, and firſt impriſon'd them at Caën, but afterwards ſent them to the Caſtle of Falais.

On Sunday following King Henry came to Roüen; upon the News of whoſe arrival, the King of France was much concern'd; as alſo at a bold Action of the Welſhmen, that ſtole out of the City by Night, and lying hid in a Wood, took Forty Waggons laden with Wine and other Proviſions for the French Camp, which by that Loſs ſuffer'd greatly.

Diſpoſes of his Priſoners in ſeveral Caſtles, & comes to Roüen.

[2.] Hereupon King Lewis began to think of a Retreat; but the King of England opening the Gate which the Citizens had damned up, ſallied out of the Town, and marched to the French Camp; from whence the Souldiers iſſued out, and bravely charged the Engliſh, who took and wounded many of them, and kill'd many more. The next morning William Archbiſhop of Sens, and Theobald Earl of Blois came to King Henry, and ask'd his leave that the King of France might ſafely retreat with his Army to a place called Malauny, upon condition, that he would come the next day to treat with the King of England; and to do this, they both obliged themſelves by their Faith and Oaths: Whereupon the King of France retreated with his Army to the place appointed, and there pitched his Tents; but about Midnight he cauſed his Souldiers to march away privately, and never ſtopped till they came into France: King Lewis not at all regarding the Faith and Oaths of the Archbiſhop and Earl, by which they had gain'd ſo great an Advantage for him. This ſhameful Retreat, or rather Flight of the King of France, happened on the 14th of Auguſt. From whence we may take notice, that it is no new thing for the Kings of France to get thoſe Advantages by Treaties, which they never could have gained otherwiſe.

This Peace was made between the King and his Son on the 23d of September at Poictiers; from whence they went to meet the King of France and Young King Henry at the Treaty that was to be held on Michaelmaſs day (as I ſaid a little above) to acquaint them with what had been now tranſacted.

[2.] Then

Anno Dom. MCLXXIV.

[1.] G. B. Col. 1099.

[1.] Then Earl Richard and Geoffrey the King's Sons did their Father Homage for thoſe Territories he had given them; but when King Henry his Son was going to do it, the Old King would not accept it, becauſe he ſaid he was a King; yet ſome time after his Father, upon their more perfect Reconciliation, received his Homage, as you will find by and by.

The K. of France included in the foregoing Articles, though not particularly mentioned.

The Reader muſt alſo obſerve, that the King of France was likewiſe comprized within this Treaty of Peace, though not particularly mentioned in the foregoing Articles, becauſe there was no occaſion for it; for he being the Aggreſſor, and having made War upon King Henry without any juſt grounds, upon the account of the Young King his Son-in-Law, whom he excited and aſſiſted againſt his Father, there needed no more than a Reſtitution of the Places he had taken from the King during this War, and to put things in the ſame ſtate they were in before it began.

During this War between France & England, and the Civil Wars at home, may be placed the General Defection of the Iriſh againſt King Henry.

During the continuance of this War between the Kings of France and England, and the Civil Wars that were raiſed here by Young King Henry againſt his Father, we may place the General Defection of the Iriſh Princes againſt King Henry, notwithſtanding the late Submiſſions and Homages they had made him; of which Wars and Diſturbances that aroſe by them theſe Two years laſt paſt, I ſhall give you this ſhort account from [2.] Giraldus Cambrenſis, without making any diſtinction between the Years wherein they were tranſacted, ſince our Author has not given us any exact time of them: Only this much is certain, That not long after the breaking out of that War, all the Princes of Ireland entered into a Confederacy to throw off the Engliſh Yoke, and to drive that Nation entirely out of their Country: to ſuppreſs which Inſurrection, and to reduce that Iſland again under its former Allegiance, King Henry firſt ſent over Earl Richard Strongbow with his Commiſſion; but he in a little while ſpent all the Treaſure he brought over with him; his Souldiers alſo, that were under the Conduct of Harvey de Mont-Maurice, then Conſtable or General, wanting their Pay, came unanimouſly to the Earl, affirming, that unleſs he would make Raymond their General again, they would preſently leave him, and either return into England, or go over to his Enemies.

[2] L. 2. A ſhort Account of it from Giraldus Cambrenſis.

The Iriſh Princes enter into a Confederacy to throw off the Engliſh Yoke.

A Deſection from Richard Strongbow, through his ill Conduct.

[3.] He being driven to this ſtraight, was obliged to make Raymond again Commander in chief of theſe Forces, with which he invaded Ophaly, and got much Plunder, recruiting his Souldiers both with Horſe and Arms; from thence he went to Liſmore (about Sixteen Miles from Cork,) and plundered that City and the Country about it; and having with their great Booty laden ſome ſmall Veſſels which came from Waterford, and other places, to carry it thither by Sea, in their Voyage they were ſet upon by the Inhabitants of Cork, who it ſeems, had privately mann'd out Thirty Two of their Ships to intercept them; whereupon there happen'd a very ſharp Engagement, but at length the Men of Cork were beaten, and their Admiral Gilbert Fitz-Cutger killed by Philip Walſh, a ſtout young Man; Raymond was not in this Rencounter, but in his Return to Waterford by Land, meeting with Dermot Mac-Carty, Prince of Deſmond, coming to the aſſiſtance of the Corkiſts, they Fought, and Dermot being vanquiſh'd, left the Field, and Raymund return'd to Waterford with Four Thouſand Head of Cattle.

[3.] Ibid. C. 2. Raymond again made Commander in Chief.

Invades Ophaly, and gets much Plunder.

The like he does to Liſmore.

The Men of Cork beaten, and their Admiral kill'd.

Raymond vanquiſhes Dermot Mac-Carty, and returns to Waterford with 4000 Head of Cattle.

[4] Soon

Anno Dom. MCLXXIV.

[4.] Soon after this, He receiving Intelligence that his Father William Fitz-Girald was dead, went over into Wales to look after his Affairs there, and in his abſence Harvey of Mont-Maurice was again made Conſtable or Commander in chief of theſe Forces; who, that he might ſeem to do ſomething extraordinary, drew Earl Richard and the Souldiers with him to Caſſils, where the Forces of Dublin were Commanded to meet them. In their March thither, they quartered one night at Oſſory, and Donald O Brien, Prince of Limerick, having certain notice of it by his Scouts, very early in the morning beat up their Quarters on the ſudden, and kill'd Four Hundred Oſtmans, (i. e. Norwegians or Danes, who then lived in and near Dublin) with Four Knights that Commanded them; which the Earl hearing of, he return'd in diſorder to Waterford.

[4.] Id. C 3. He upon his Father's death, goes into Wales; and Harvey Mont-Maurice made Commander in Chief in his room.

Donald O Brien on a ſudden ſets upon his & E. Richard's Forces, and gains a notable Victory.

Upon this unfortunate Accident the whole People of Ireland unanimouſly roſe againſt the Engliſh, ſo that the Earl lay as it were block'd up in Waterford, whilſt Rodoric Prince of Connaught paſſed the River Shannon, invaded Methe, demoliſhed the Caſtles, and with Fire and Sword waſted the Country almoſt to the very Walls of Dublin.

The Iriſh upon this, revolt againſt the Engliſh.

Prince Rodoric invades Methe, and waſtes the Country, almoſt to Dublin.

[5.] The Earl finding himſelf in a great ſtreight, wrote into Wales to Raymond, deſiring him to return with all ſpeed, and bring over what Aid he could; and that upon his firſt Landing he ſhould receive in Mariage his Siſter Baſilia, whom he had been long in love with: Whereupon He with all poſſible ſpeed, and Meyler his Coſin, and Thirty Gentlemen more of his Kindred, beſides One Hundred Horſe and Three Hundred Archers, took Shipping in Fifteen Veſſels, and Landed at Waterford.

[5.] Ibid. C 4. The E. deſires Raymond's return, and promiſes him his Siſter in Mariage.

So ſoon as Raymond entered the Town, he with his Forces conducted the Earl to Wexford, leaving the Government of Waterford to one Tyrrell; his Chriſtian Name was Hugh, and he was Anceſtor to the Tyrrells of Ireland. But after this Earl's departure, the Oſtmen of Waterford taking up Arms, murther'd him, with many of his Followers, and did the like to all the Engliſh they could find in the Streets: yet for all this the City was preſerv'd by thoſe few Engliſh that remain'd in the Caſtle call'd Reginald's Tower, who drove the Traytors out of the City, and forced them to accept of Peace on harder terms than they expected.

The Oſtmen of Waterford murther Hugh Tyrrell their Governor, and all the Engliſh they met with.

In the mean time Raymond was married at Wexford to the Earl's Siſter, and the day after his Nuptials hearing that Rodoric King of Connaught had again deſtroyed Methe, and was marched into the Country near Dublin, He preſently advanced his Forces toward him, but Rodoric was wiſer than to ſtay for his coming. Raymond finding him thus retired, repaired the Caſtles in Methe, and brought things to ſuch a paſs, by the dread they had of him, that that turbulent Nation for ſome ſhort time was kept in peace.

Raymond married to the Earl's Siſter.

The next day he is forc'd to go againſt Rodoric K. of Connaught, whom he makes to fly.

But it was not long ere Donald O Brien (or O Brin) King of Limerick and Munſter quitted the Fealty he had ſworn to the King of England; whereupon Raymond gathering together an Hundred Knights or Men at Arms, and Twenty other Horſemen for his Guard, beſides Three Hundred Archers on Horſeback, and as many on Foot, about the beginning of October attacked Limerick; but coming to the River Shannon (which is there very deep, and almoſt encompaſſeth the City) they could proceed no further. At this Stand one David [1.] Id. Cap 8. Donald breaks his Oath made to K. Henry. Raymond attacks Limerick.

David Welſh his Courage.

Anno Dom. MCLXXIV.

Welſh (* call'd ſo from his Country, not his Family) a Courageous young Gentleman, that valued not Death ſo he could but gain Honour, firſt forced his Horſe into the River, and paſſing quite over, cried out to the Army, that he had found a Ford; but when he ſaw none durſt follow him, but one Geoffrey Judas a Common Souldier (who was drowned in the attempt) he return'd back. Meyler, Nephew to Raymond, ſeeing this, and envying the Honour that David Welſh had thereby gained, clapt Spurs to his Horſe and daſh'd through the River, notwithſtanding the great Danger he ran by the Stones that were thrown at him from the Walls, and the Oppoſition he was to meet with at his Landing; but he got ſafe over, and was preſently encounter'd by the Enemy: Raymond indeed was not then upon the place, but ſoon after marching up, and obſerving what danger his Nephew was in, he encouraged his Army, and led them over the River, himſelf firſt taking the Stream, and with the Loſs only of Two of his Guards and one Common Souldier that were drowned in their paſſage, he quickly drove the Enemy into the City, which with great ſlaughter of the Citizens he took by Storm, and there the Army met with a great deal of rich Booty.

[2.] Ibid. C. 10

[2.] As ſoon as Raymond had put the City into ſome good poſture of defence, and left there Fifty Knights, or Horſemen, with Two Hundred ordinary Souldiers, and as many Archers, under the Command of Miles of St. Davids, he return'd back to Leinſter: And here, I ſuppoſe, we may put a period to the Engliſh Conqueſts in Ireland during this Year; for what follows, moſt likely happen'd in the next ſucceeding, for our Author has been too remiſs in not ſetting down the Years when theſe things were tranſacted.

And when he had put the City into ſome good poſture of defence, he return'd to Leinſter.

[3.] B. A.

[3.] As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, this Year affords little in England, ſaving that Richard the Archbiſhop Elect of Canterbury, and Reginald Biſhop of Bathe, being arrived at Rome, about the Confirmation of their own Elections (as well as thoſe of divers Biſhops) the Pope, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition that young King Henry's Ambaſſadors could make, did not only approve of and confirm them, but alſo conſecrated the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with his own Hands, as appears by a Letter of Reginald Biſhop of Bathe to King Henry the Father, which Abbot Benedict has given us at large: But it is now time to return to the reſt of King Henry's Actions, during his Abode beyond Sea.

The Pope Conſecrates Richard the A. Bp. of Canterbury with his own hands.

Anno Dom. MCLXXV.

[4.] At Chriſtmaſs the King was at Argenton in Normandy, and from thence ſent his Son Duke Richard into Poictou, to reduce the Caſtles of his Earls and Barons (which they had fortified againſt him) to the ſame condition they were in before the War, and to demoliſh ſuch as he thought fit; and by his Letters order'd the Forces of Poictou, with his Bayliffs and Miniſters, to be aſſiſtant to him in that Enterprize.

[4.] B. A. R. H. K. Henry ſends his Son Richard into Poictou, to demoliſh the Caſtles of the Earls and Barons that had been fortified againſt him.

On the 2d of February the Two Kings, Father and Son, were at Mans, and from thence came into Normandy; and the Four and twentieth of that Month they had a Conference with the King of France at Giſors, and then afterwards went to Roüen, where King Henry the Elder left his Son, and proceeded on to Anjou; where having fortified his own Caſtles, demoliſhed ſome Others, and reduced the Reſidue to their former ſtate, He came to Caën, and ſent for the King his Son to meet him him there, in order to their going over together into England: But at first he refuſed, upon the malicious ſuggeſtions of the Envoys from the King of France, and other diſaffected People, who rumour'd, that if his Father once got him thither, he would put him in Priſon; but the King plying him with many kind Meſſages, ſo prevailed upon him, that at laſt he came to him to Bure, and there before the Archbiſhop of Roüen, Henry Biſhop of Bayeux, William Earl of Mandeville, Richard Humet Conſtable of Normandy, and divers other of the King's Friends and Great Officers; he threw himſelf with Tears at his Father's Feet, beſeeching him to receive his Homage and Allegiance, as he had done his Brother's, for before (as I have ſaid) his Father would not ſuffer it, becauſe he was a King as well as himſelf; adding, that if He would not receive his Homage, he could not believe he had any kindneſs for him; at length, by the perſwaſion of thoſe about him, the Old King received his Homage and Allegiance; and then ſent him to the King of France to diſcourſe him about ſome affairs, whilſt he himſelf went to Valoingues, and from thence to Cherbourgh, where his Son met him; and from thence they both went to Caën to meet Philip Earl of Flanders, who there deliver'd up the Charter of the Donation of the Lands and Rents formerly granted to him by the Young King; upon which they Both confirmed to him the Thouſand Marks Revenue he uſed to receive in England before the War. From Caën they both went to Barfleur, and from thence paſſed over into England in the ſame Ship, and Landed at Portſmouth on the Ninth of May.

But at length is prevailed upon, and meets him at Bure.

And does Homage to the K. his Father.

They both come for England.

[5.] But before King Henry left Normandy, he ſent his Son Earl Geoffrey into Bretaign, Commanding him to demoliſh all the Caſtles and Fortreſſes that had been fortified againſt him in that Dukedom. So ſoon as they came to London, which was at the latter end of May, they were both preſent, and aſſiſted at a Synod of the Clergy: of which I ſhall ſay more anon.

[5.] Id. ib The Father ſends E. Geoffrey into Bretaign to demoliſh the Caſtles, &c. that had been there fortified againſt him.

[1.] The King impeached the Earl of Glouceſter in his Court, for that he had forced his Souldiers out of the Caſtle of Briſtol, and kept it in his hands during the time of the War; but he willing to ſatisfy the King, ſurrender'd that Caſtle into his Hands. He likewiſe impleaded all the Earls, Barons, Clerks and Laicks of England, concerning their Forfeitures in his Foreſts, and for hunting in the time of War, and cauſed them all to be Fined, notwithſtanding Richard de Lucy, Juſticiary of England, appeared on their behalf, and vouched the King's Mandate from beyond Sea, by which he was impower'd to grant them ſuch Licences.

[2.] In the beginning of Auguſt following, the Two Kings came to York, where they were met by William King of Scots and David his Brother, with all the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, Knights and Franc-Tenants of Scotland, from the greateſt to the leaſt. The Buſineſs of this Great Meeting was to renew the late Peace and Agreement the King of Scots had made with the King of England, when he was his Priſoner at Falais in Normandy, which was reduced into writing under certain Heads or Articles, and agreed to by the King of Scots before the King and his Son, and Roger Archbiſhop of York, Hugh Biſhop of Durham, and moſt of the Earls and Barons of England, as also before the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons of Scotland, and was to this effect.

The Scotch Brothers do Homage to K Henry, Father and Son.

I. That the King of Scotland and David his Brother did Homage to King Henry for all the Territories they were poſſeſſed of, namely, Scotland and Galway, and did ſwear Allegiance and Fealty to him againſt all Men; the like they did to Henry his Son, ſaving the Allegiance and Fealty they bore to his Father.

All the Bps. & Abbots of Scotland ſwear Allegiance and Fealty to them & their Heirs for ever.

In like manner did Richard Biſhop of St. Andrews, Jocelin Biſhop of Glaſco, with all the reſt of the Biſhops and Abbots of Scotland, ſwear Allegiance and Fealty to both Kings of England, and their Heirs for ever.

And ſwear, that if their K did not obſerve the ſaid Agreement, they would Interdict his Land.

II. The ſame Biſhops further ſwore, That if the King of Scotland obſerved not this Agreement with the King of England, they would put him and his Land under an Interdict, until he ſubmitted himſelf to his good pleaſure. They alſo ſwore, That they would continue the ſame Subjection to the Church of England, which their Predeceſſors were uſed to obſerve, or ſuch Subjection as was due unto it.

They likewiſe ſwear Subjection to the Church of England.

The Earls & Barons of Scotland ſwear Allegiance to both the Ks. of England.

III. In like manner, the Earls and Barons by Command of the King of Scotland did Homage, and ſwore Allegiance and Fealty to both Kings againſt all Men, (viz.) Earl Duncan, the Earl of Angus, Earl Waltheof, and the other Earls and Barons: They all likewiſe ſwore, That if the King of Scotland ſhould recede from this Agreement, they would aſſiſt the King of England againſt him until he made ſatisfaction according to his Will.

And if their K. did not ſtand to this Agreement, they would then aſſiſt the K. of England.

[3.] Id. ib.

[3.] Then the King cauſed this Agreement which had been before made in Normandy to be new ſeal'd, and confirm'd by the King of Scots and his Brother David; but he would not truſt to this Charter alone, but had cauſed the King of Scots before this to deliver into his hands the Caſtles of Rokesburgh, Berwick, Gedworth, Edenburgh, and Sterling, which were to be maintain'd by a proportionable allowance out of the Revenues of the King of Scotland, by Aſſignment of the King of England, as it is expreſsly mention'd in the ſaid Articles; for the performance of which, Earl David the King's Brother, Earl Duncan, and divers other Earls and Barons of Scotland, were to be deliver'd as Hoſtages, till the Caſtles were ſurrender'd, and then they were to be ſet at Liberty, each of them delivering his Eldeſt Son or Nephew in his room.

This Agreement between the Ks. of England and Scotland, new ſealed.

And ſeveral Cautionary Towns and Caſtles put into the K. of England's hands for greater Security.

And ſeveral Hoſtages to be given till the ſaid Caſtles were ſurrendred.

This Agreement was firſt made and ſeal'd at Falaiſe before the King of Scots was ſet free, and witneſſed by ſeveral Biſhops, Abbots, and other Dignified Clergymen; as alſo by the Earls Richard and Geoffrey, King Henry's younger Son, and other Earls and Barons, as well of England as of Normandy.

This Agreement firſt made & ſealed at Falaiſe.

This Charter is the more remarkable, becauſe it is the Firſt wherein we find it expreſsly mention'd, That the King of Scots did Homage to the King of England for all Scotland, and not for thoſe Earldoms or Counties which were held of him before. But againſt this the Scotiſh Hiſtorians object, That it was objected by Dareſs, whilſt their their King was detain'd in Priſon by the King of England, and ſo it could not oblige Him, much leſs his Succeſſor to obſerve it: And as for the Biſhops and other Great Men's voluntary acknowledgment of it, Buchanan has no way to get off from it, but by imputing it to the great deſire the Scots had of enjoying an excellent King: but this Excuſe will not ſerve their turn, ſince, according to his own ſhewing, the King of Scots had been ſet free in the beginning of February before, upon his giving Fifteen Hoſtages, and the Four Caſtles abovemention'd; ſo that the Clergy and Nobility of Scotland could not join in this Acknowledgment out of a deſire to enjoy the King, but either becauſe they were convinced that this Homage for Scotland was truly due, or elſe that they were then over-aw'd by the great Power of the King of England, who had already poſſeſs'd himſelf of moſt of the ſtrong Places in Scotland: But upon which of theſe Motives they did it, I will not take upon me to determine.

Anno Dom. MCLXXV

The Scotch pretend this to be got by Dureſs, whilſt their K. was a Priſoner.

But this Excuſe of theirs is frivolous and groundleſs.

[4.] After the diſpatch of this important Affair at York, King Henry gave the King of Scots leave to march with his Army into Galoway, to ſubdue Gilbert, Son to Fergus, Prince of that Country, who, upon the King of Scot's being taken Priſoner, had rebelled againſt him, and driven out his Bailiffs or Officers, and taken and deſtroyed his Caſtles, with the Men that were in them; and for a farther aggravation of his crime, had by his Son Malcolm wickedly murther'd his Brother Uchred. Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in England, the Earls Richard and Geoffrey, the King's Sons, were both employ'd in Military Services; the Former in reducing and demoliſhing the Caſtles of Poictou, which had been held and fortified by their Owners againſt the King his Father during the late Wars; and the Latter in doing the ſame to the like Caſtles in his Earldom of Bretaign.

[4.] B. A. C. B. The K of England gives the K. of Scotland leave to go into Galoway, to ſubdue Gilbert, who had rebelled againſt him.

E. Richard during this time, was employ'd in demoliſhing the Caſtles of Poictou.

And E. Geoffrey in doing the ſame to thoſe in Bretaign.

[5.] Preſently after Michaelmaſs King Henry ſummon'd a Great Council at Windſor, where were preſent both the Kings, with Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury and all the Biſhops of England; as alſo Laurence Archbiſhop of Dublin, and all the Earls and Barons of England; in which Council Catholicus Archbiſhop of Tuam, Canthard Abbot of St. Brandon's, and Maſter Laurence Chancellor to Rodoric King of Connaught, being ſent Ambaſſadors from that King, made an Agreement between King Henry and their Maſter, to this effect.

[5.] R. H. p. 312. b. The K. Summons a Great Council at Windſor. Wherein the Ambaſſadors of the K. of Connaught make an Agreement with the K. of England.

I. Dependants in that Country ſhould help him to do it, if thereunto required, and that there were neceſſity for it.

The K of Connaught to pay yearly the Tenth Hide of every Beaſt made ſaleable for the Merchant.

II. To this end alſo the King of Connaught ſhould render to the King of England, yearly as his Tribute, the Tenth Hide of every Beaſt kill'd, that was made ſaleable for the Merchant, and that as well out of his own Land or Country, as out of Others; always excepted what the ſaid King of England held in his own Demeſnes, or in that of his Barons, (to wit) the Counties of Dublin and Methe with their Appurtenances; alſo except Wexford with its Appurtenances; and except Waterford with all that Country, Dungarven excluded.

Except what the K. of England held in his own Demeſnes, or in that of his Barons.

And except Wexford and Waterford.

The Iriſh that had fled might return in peace, paying the ſaid Tribute, and doing their antient Services.

III. If the Iriſh who fled away, would return to the Service of the Barons of the King of England, they might do ſo in peace, paying the ſaid Tribute, and doing their antient Services; but if any of them ſhould refuſe to come to their Lord the King of Connaught, he might compel them to return to his Lands, yet ſo as then to remain in peace; and the King of Connaught might receive Pledges of all thoſe whom the King of England had committed to him; and He likewiſe ſhould give as Pledges either Thoſe or Others (according to the Will of the King of England,) and they ſhould ſerve the King about his Hawks and Hounds, and not retain any of the King's Land againſt his Will and Commandment. This Agreement was witneſſed by Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter, Laurence Archbiſhop of Dublin, and Others of the Lay-Nobility.

The K of Connaught might receive Pledges of all thoſe the K. of England had committed to him.

[1.] In the ſame Council the King conferred upon Maſter Auguſtine, an Iriſh-man, the Biſhoprick of Waterford then vacant, which was the Firſt Biſhoprick that ever any King of England beſtow'd in Ireland, as I can any where find.

[1.] Id. p. 313. a. In the ſame Council the K. of England conferred the Biſhoprick of Waterford upon an Iriſh-man.

I have been the more particular in putting down this Agreement; becauſe it does not only hereby appear, what were the King of England's Dominions at that time, diſtinct from thoſe of the King of Connaught, but alſo upon what terms He and his Subjects were to hold all that they enjoyed under the King of England; and it hereby further appears, that this Agreement was made after the late Peace concluded between King Henry and King Rodoric.

For the better underſtanding of which piece of Hiſtory, it is fit that we give the Reader an Account of what happen'd in Ireland ſince the laſt year, when Raymond met with ſuch mighty Succeſs at Limeric; [2.] not long after which Harvey of Mont-Maurice envying his great Merits, and the Honour he had gain'd, (notwithſtanding he was related to him by the Mariage of his Coſin Neſta, the Daughter of Maurice Fitz-Girald) ſtill plyed the King with ſecret and malicious Informations againſt him, inſinuating and affirming, that he would not only ſubdue and uſurp to himſelf and Followers the whole Country of Limeric, but the whole Kingdom of Ireland.

Harvey of Mont-Maurice, through Envy of his great Merits, endeavours to undermine Raymond.

Inſinuating, as if he aim'd to ſubdue all Ireland for Himſelf.

The King too much crediting theſe falſe Informations, ſent Four Commiſſioners, (to wit) Robert Poer, Osbert de Hereford, William de Bendinge, and Adam de Gernman (or rather Gernemue,) whereof Two were to come back with Raymond (who was then recalled into England) and Two to ſtay behind with Earl Richard.

But

But it ſo happen'd, [3.] that while Raymond was preparing for his paſſage over, Meſſengers came from the Gariſon in Limeric with the News that Donald O Brien, Prince of Tuomond, with a great Multitude had beſieg'd, or rather inveſted it; and that during the laſt Winter, they had ſpent moſt of their Victuals, and therefore deſired ſudden Relief: Whereupon the Earl was very ſollicitous to relieve them, and therefore called upon and quickened the Army to go to their Aſſiſtance; but they all denied to march, without Raymond went along with them. Upon this the Earl adviſing with the King's Commiſſioners what was beſt to be done, at length, by the earneſt Entreaties of them all, Raymond undertook the Service, and marching towards Caſſil, with Eighty Knights or Men at Arms, and Two Hundred ordinary Horſe, and Three Hundred Archers, beſides the Iriſh whom he brought with him, (to wit) Murchard Prince of Kinſel, (now Kinſale,) and Donald Prince of Oſſery, he heard by the way that Donald Prince of Tuomond had left the Siege of Limeric, and was coming to meet him at the Paſs of Caſſil, which was of it ſelf very ſtrong, but by digging new Ditches and cutting down Trees, and therewith making a ſtrong Barricado acroſs it, 'twas made almoſt impaſſable.

Anno Dom. MCLXXV

[3.] Id. C. 11. Donald beſieges Limeric.

Raymond undertakes the Relief of it.

Donald leaves the Siege.

[4.] The Army marched in Three Diviſions, Meyler his Nephew Commanded the Firſt, who made ſuch a furious On-ſet at the Paſs, that he almoſt levell'd the Iriſh Barricado; and killing many of thoſe within, opened his way through it by the Sword. This was on Eaſter-Eve, and on Thurſday that week he entered Limeric with his victorious Army, and repaired what had been ruined or deſtroyed by the Siege.

[4.] Ib. C. 13. Meyler with his Army enters Limeric.

[5.] Not long after Raymond had Conference with the Princes of Connaught and Tuomond on the ſame day, but not in the ſame place; and after much diſcourſe, each Prince gave Hoſtages, and ſwore inviolable Fidelity for the future to the King of England, and his Heirs; at the End of which Treaty, it is very probable, that the King of Connaught ſent to King Henry the Ambaſſadors lately mention'd, to make a full concluſion of the late Peace which had been agreed on in Ireland.

[5.] Id. ibid. Connaught and Tuomond ſweat Fealty to K. Henry.

[1.] No ſooner was Raymond return'd with his Hoſtages to Limeric, but Dermot Mac-Carty, Prince of Deſmond, ſent to deſire his Aſſiſtance againſt his Eldeſt Son Cormach O Lechan, who had almoſt drove him out of his Kingdom, promiſing him and his Souldiers large Rewards. Raymond at firſt adviſed with his Friends about this Propoſal, and then march'd to Cork, took the Town, ſubdu'd the Rebel-Son, and reſtoring the Father to his Poſſeſſions, return'd with much Booty to Limeric: yet after this, under a pretence of Peace, the Son took his Father and kept him in Priſon; but he not long after getting his Liberty, under the ſame pretence got his Son into his Power, and cut off his Head.

[1.] Id. ib. Raymond aſſiſts Dermot Mac-Carty againſt his Rebellious Son.

The Son takes his Father, and keeps him in Priſon.

The Father ſoon after gets him, & chops off his Head.

Thus when Children have once diſcharged themſelves of thoſe Bonds of Gratitude and Duty which they owe to their Parents, and they likewiſe (provoked by their Children's diſobedience) have put off that Love and natural Affection they ought to have towards their Children, there is nothing ſo Cruel and Barbarous, which they will not act againſt each other.

[2.] There happen'd nothing more conſiderable this Year in Temporal Matters, unleſs it were the deceaſe of Reginald Earl of Cornwall, natural Son to King Henry the Firſt; who, though he was made Earl by King Stephen, yet revolted from Him to the Empreſs Mathylda his Siſter, and aſſiſted Her and her Son Duke Henry, during the Wars they maintain'd againſt Him; after whoſe Death, King Henry ſucceeding to the Crown, the Earl ſerved him faithfully in all his Wars both Foreign and Domeſtick. He ſeems to have been a Prince of great Worth and Courage; yet notwithſtanding all theſe good Services, the King would not ſuffer the Vaſt Eſtate he left behind him to be divided among his Daughters, but reſerved it for his Younger Son Earl John; and beſtowing on them a part of their Fathers fortune, he married them to ſome of the prime Noblemen of the Kingdom.

His Great Eſtate not ſuffered to be divided among his Daughters, the K. reſerving it for his Son John, and marries them to the firſt Nobility.

[3.] But to ſay ſomewhat of the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year. Immediately after the King's return out of Normandy, (as you have already heard) there was about the End of May a Council or Synod held at Weſtminſter by Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, conſiſting of all the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury; but neither the Archbiſhop of York, nor any of his Suffragans, were at it. Herein ſeveral Canons were made for the Reformation and better Diſcipline of the Clergy: which being only in Confirmation of ſeveral Foreign Decrees of Popes and Councils, and alſo few of them relating to the Laiety, I ſhall but recite ſome brief Heads of the moſt conſiderable Matters of them, and thoſe chiefly of ſuch as concern the Laiety.

[3.] B. A. C. G. R. H. p. 310, 311.

A Synod held at Weſtminſter of all the Clergy of Canterbury.

Several Canons made there for the better Regulating of the Clergy.

1. Againſt their Concubinage, or Marrying.

The Firſt is againſt Men in Orders keeping Concubines, or marrying Wives, both which they were to put away.

2. Againſt going to Taverns.

The Second is againſt Clergymen's Eating or Drinking in Taverns.

3. Againſt being concern'd in Cauſes of Blood.

The Third againſt Men in Orders, their aſſiſting in any Judgments concerning Blood or Loſs of Members.

4. Againſt their Merchandizing.

The Fourth is, That Monks and Clerks were hereby forbid to exerciſe Merchandize for Gain.

Things that concern'd the Laiety.

There were beſides theſe ſeveral others, relating to the manner of the Church Service, and againſt Receiving the Euchariſt, tinged or dipped in the Wine. But as for thoſe which concern the Laiety, theſe were the chief: That none ſhould transfer a Church to another under the Title of a * Dowry, or take Money for the Preſentation of any perſon, under pain of a perpetual Forfeiture of the Patronage to the ſaid Church. Alſo to enjoyn Payment of Tythes of Grain, Wine, and all other things therein mentioned; and that thoſe that fail to pay them, after a Threefold admonition, ſhould be Excommunicated: Alſo againſt Clandeſtine Mariages; and that if any Prieſt ſhould be found to marry Folks privately, he ſhould be ſuſpended for Three years.

* Dotalitium.

Transferring of Churches.

For payment of Tythes.

Againſt Clandeſtine Marriages.

Laſtly, Againſt Children's Marrying before they arrived at the years of Conſent appointed by the Canons.

And Children's marrying before the Years of Conſent.

Now for the reſt, I refer the Curious Reader to R. Hoveden and Gervaſe of Canterbury, where he may find them at large.

[4.] In this Council they alſo debated the Right the Archbiſhop of York claimed to carry his Croſs upright in the Province of Canterbury, with other matters of no great moment; which not being able to be decided by this Synod, an Appeal was made to the Pope about it by the Archbiſhop of York.

[4.] Id. ib. The Right of the A. Bp. of York's carrying his Croſs upright in the Province of Canterbury, debated.

The A. Bp. of York appeals to the Pope.

[5.] After this, a little before the Feaſt of All-Saints, Cardinal Hugo (or Hugezon) the Pope's Legate, at the King's Requeſt came into England, and waited on him at Wincheſter, to compromiſe the Diſpute between the Two Archbiſhops; and at length, through the King's Mediation it was agreed, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould releaſe his Claim to the Chappel of St. Oſwald in Hereford, and Abſolve the Archbiſhop of York's Clerks, whom he had Excommunicated: But as to the carrying the Croſs and the other Controverſies above-mention'd, they were to ſtand to the Judgment of the Archbiſhop of Roüen and other neighbouring Biſhops of France. Then alſo the Legate granted the King Power of impleading Clerks for Offences committed in his Foreſts, and for killing his Deer.

[5.] B. A. R. H. p. 313. a. Hugo, the Pope's Legate, comes into England to compromize the matter between the two A. Bps.

After this the Legate having the King's ſafe Conduct, went his Circuit about England, to viſit not only the Two Metropolitan Sees, but alſo the reſt of the Biſhopricks and Abbies.

He goes his Circuit about England.

But it ſeems [1.] the main Buſineſs for which this Legate was ſent over (if we may believe Gervaſe of Canterbury, who alone gives us this Relation) was, That the King, who now had an Averſion for his Queen, becauſe that great part of his late Troubles had happen'd through her procurement, (and for which he kept her under ſafe Cuſtody in a ſtrong Caſtle,) labour'd all he could to obtain a Divorce from her, and to that end had ſent for the Legate, whom he endeavour'd to gain over to him by Gifts and other Methods, but he could not effect it. [2.] However, to give the King ſome ſatisfaction, the Legate then granted Him free Leave and Authority to proſecute the Clerks before a Secular Judge for Forfeitures incurr'd by Hunting in his Foreſts; for which Conceſſion our Monkiſh Writers ſharply enough enveigh againſt this Legate.

[1.] G. G. Col. 1432. The main deſign of the Legate's coming over.

But all to no purpoſe.

[2.] Id. ib. G. B. He gives the K. leave to proſecute his Clerks before a Secular Judg for Forfeitures upon hunting in his Foreſts.

The Synod being ended, both the Kings went on Pilgrimage to St. Thomas's Tomb, and at their return kept their Whitſontide at Reading; from whence the King ſent one of his Clerks, call'd Roger of Hoveden (our Hiſtoriographer) to Norwich, and other Abbies, that were then vacant, commanding thoſe Convents to ſend up their Prior, with Five or more of the wiſeſt and diſcreeteſt Monks to meet the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury on Midſummer-day at Oxford. The Archbiſhop alſo wrote Letters to the ſame Religious Perſons to the like effect: Afterwards follow the Names of the Biſhopricks and Abbies then vacant, (viz. Norwich, Abingdon, with the reſt of them, needleſs here to be recited.

The K ſends to the Vacant Abbies, for the Priors and ſo many Monks to meet him on Midſummer-day at Oxford.

The A. Biſhop writes Letters to them to the ſame effect.

[3.] In the mean time the Two Kings went to Glouceſter, and there held a Great Council, with Rees ap Griffin and the other Kings or Princes of Wales; and there King Henry Commanded all his Welſh Vaſſals or Tenants, That if any of their Countrymen at any time ſhould begin to wage War or commit Violence there, every Man ſhould be oblig'd to oppoſe and reſiſt them; to the obſervance of which, the King made the Earl of Glouceſter, with William de Breüſe, and all his other Barons in thoſe Parts, to ſwear upon the Holy Goſpels.

[4] Id. R. H. A great Council at Northampton.

[4.] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs this Year with his Son Henry at his Caſtle of Windſor; and after that, on the 25th of January, He held a Great Council at Northampton, (where the King his Son was preſent) with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons concerning the Statutes and Laws of the Land; and, by Common advice of them all, divided the Kingdom into Six Parts or Circuits, into every one of which he ſent Three Juſtices, whoſe Names I need not repeat, only I would have the Reader take notice, that they were not profeſs'd Lawyers, but Barons or Knights: And as for the Circuits, they were almoſt the ſame as they are at this day, only Eſſex then belong'd to that of Norfolk, which Circuit alſo conſiſted of more Counties than it does at preſent, all Hampſhire, Barkſhire and Oxfordſhire belonging to it; which are now joined with Herefordſhire, and the reſt of the North-Weſtern Counties. As for Copland, there mention'd as a diſtinct County, under the Northern Circuit, ſince I do not find it any-where elſe, I ſuppoſe it conſiſted then either of the North part of Lancaſhire, or the South part of Weſtmorland and Cumberland, between both which it is placed in our Authors.

Where the Circuits are apportioned. The Juſtices at firſt not profeſs'd Lawyers, but Barons or Knts.

[5] Id. ib. The K. ſwears his Juſtices to obſerve his Statutes.

[5.] The King having thus divided the Nation, before theſe Juſtices went their Circuits, he cauſed them all to ſwear, that they would truly and juſtly keep, and alſo cauſe to be inviolably kept by his Subjects thoſe Aſſizes or Statutes that were firſt made at Clarendon, and now renew'd at Northampton; which becauſe they are ſomewhat long, I will not interrupt the Series of the Hiſtory by inſerting them here, but refer you to the end of this King's Reign, where you may find all the Laws of this King placed together. I ſhall only obſerve this to you, That theſe differ from the former Conſtitutions made at Clarendon already mention'd, for they relate wholly to Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and Affairs; but theſe (though made at the ſame time) concern Lay-perſons and Cauſes, as you will find by comparing them both together.

Thoſe of Clarendon, how far renewed at Northampton.

Id. ib. The K. of Scots appears at the K's Summons with the Clergy of Scotland; and what was then done.

At this Council of Northampton (which was alſo an Eccleſiaſtical Synod) William King of Scots appear'd at the King's Summons, and brought with him the Biſhop of St. Andrews and the reſt of the Biſhops, Abbots and Priors of Scotland; when they were come thither, they were all required by King Henry to own the like ſubjection to the Church of England, as they had done in the time of his Predeceſſors: to which demand they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That neither

Their Anſwer.

They nor their Predeceſſors ever paid any ſubjection to the Church of of England: To this Roger Archbiſhop of York reply'd, That the Biſhops of Scotland had yielded an expreſs Subjection to the Metropolitan See of York, during the time of his Predeceſſors, which was ſtill flatly denied by all the Scotch Biſhops; and the Biſhop of Glaſcow produc'd a Bull to the contrary. Upon this there aroſe a mighty Conteſt between the Archbiſhops of York and Canterbury about this Subjection each of them challenging it as belonging to his own Church; but not being able to agree about it, the Synod ended, and the Biſhops of Scotland with the King's good Leave return'd home, and made their advantage of this Diſſenſion between the Engliſh Archbiſhops; for they immediately ſent Meſſengers to Pope Alexander, beſeeching him to take them into his Protection, and defend them from that undue Subjection, which the Church of England then claim'd from them.

Anno Dom. MCLXXVI.

The A. Bp. of York's Reply.

A hot Diſpute between the A. Bps of York and Canterbury about this Subjection.

The Scots make advantage of this Diſſenſion.

And ſend to the Pope to pray his Protection.

[1.] Not long after the King of Scots, ſuſpecting a further Moleſtation from King Henry and the Archbiſhop of York about this affair, ſent Ambaſſadors to the Pope, intreating his Holineſs to ſend one of his Cardinals as Legate to make up this Controverſy between the Churches of England and Scotland concerning the Subjection then required: whereupon the Pope deputed one Vivian a Presbyter and Cardinal, as Legate for Scotland, Norway, and other adjacent Iſles; who Landing in England without the King's allowance, he ſent the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely to him to let him know, That if he did not yield to the King's Will, he ſhould proceed no further. With which Meſſage being terrified, the King cauſed him to ſwear, That he would, during his Legantine Power, do nothing to the prejudice of his Royal Perſon or Kingdom: And when he had done this, he was honourably received, and conducted into Scotland; where, when he was arrived, he did nothing at all in the Buſineſs he came about, but raiſed a great deal of Money on the Clergy.

[1.] Id. ibid.

And deſire a Legate might be ſent to make up this Controverſy.

Vivian comes as Legate into England without the K's allowance.

He ſwears not to do any thing to the K. or Kingdom's prejudice.

Then is honourably conducted into Scotland.

[2.] Not long after this, the Young King being weary of ſtaying in England under his Father's Eye, deſired Leave to go on Pilgrimage to St. James in Spain; but his Father perceiving that this Journey did not proceed from any real Devotion, but from the ill Advice of ſome Flatterers about him, who had a mind to get him away from his Company, he, to put off that Voyage, gave him leave to go into Normandy; But when he was got ſo far as Portſmouth, he was forced to lye there a good while waiting for a Wind.

[2.] C. B. Col. 1110.

Young King Henry deſires leave to go on Pilgrimage to St. James in Spain.

He has his Conſent to go into Normandy.

[3.] Then King Henry his Father kept the Feaſt of Eaſter at Wincheſter with the King his Son, whom he ſent for from Porteceſter, near Portſmouth, together with his Queen, to bear his Brothers Earl Richard and Earl Geoffrey Company, they being lately come out of France; and after that Solemnity was over, all the Three young Princes (with their Father's Leave) paſſed into Normandy, and [4.] Earl Richard went forthwith to Poictou, where he raiſed an Army, and fought with the Brabanters, (i. e. Mercenaries, that were then either in Rebellion againſt the King for want of Pay, or elſe had been hired to Fight againſt Earl Richard by ſome of the Nobility of that Country,) and overcame them; and, by the Aſſiſtance of his Brother King Henry, he took many Towns and Caſtles, and forced many Viſcounts of Towns, with their ſmall Territories and Caſtles in Poictou, and the Places adjoyning (being then in Rebellion) to ſubmit to him.

And ſends ſeveral with her to conduct her through France to the Mediterranean Sea.

She arrives ſafe at Palermo, and is married to the King.

And a good Dower is ſetled on her.

[5.] Alſo this Year, about Michaelmaſs, the King held a Council at Windſor, and from thence ſent Commiſſioners to all the Caſtles of England, and ſeized them to his own uſe, turning out the Conſtables or Governors whom the Earls and Barons had placed there, and putting in Others of his own choice; not ſparing his Favourite and chief Juſticiary Richard de Lucy, but took from him his Caſtle of Angra (where it was, I know not;) the like he did alſo with the Caſtles of his Earls and Barons in Normandy, where he appointed Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter his Lieutenant, in the room of William de Curcy.

[1.] And the ſame Year, not long after, the King cauſed the Walls and Caſtles of Leiceſter to be demoliſhed, as likewiſe the Caſtles of Groby, Treſk, Maleſart, and the New Caſtle at Alverton, with thoſe of Framingham and Bungey, and almoſt all the Caſtles of England and Normandy that had been fortified againſt him in the late War, except the Caſtle of Paſci, or Pacey in Normandy, which he kept in his own hands, and placed a Gariſon therein; as likewiſe in the Caſtle of Mont-ſorrel, which was ſworn to be his own Propriety by the Recognition of the legal Men of the Vicenage.

[2.] About the beginning of October this year, Gilbert Prince of Galloway, who had before ſlain his Brother Uchred, came into England, under the ſafe Conduct of the King of Scots, and did Homage to King Henry the Father, and ſwore Fealty to him againſt all Men, and gave the King, to be reſtored to his Favour (or Peace) One Thouſand Marks of Silver, and his Son Duncan for an Hoſtage or Pledge for his Peaceable and Loyal Behaviour.

This I have taken notice of, to let the Reader ſee the great Authority the Scotiſh Princes had in thoſe days over the Countries where they commanded, in which they exerciſed a Power little ſhort of that of the King himſelf.

[3.] But, to come to Matters of greater importance. About Whitſontide came over hither the Biſhop of Troyna, with other Biſhops and Noblemen, being Ambaſſadors, from William King of Sicily, to deſire the King's Daughter Joanna in Marriage for the King their Maſter: Upon which King Henry ſummon'd the Archbiſhops, Biſhops and Earls, with the Wiſe Men of the Kingdom, to meet him at London, to conſult what Anſwer he ſhould return; who all approving the Propoſal, the King ſent the Ambaſſadors to viſit his Daughter; and when they ſaw her, they were ſo extremely taken with her Beauty and Perſon, that they deſired the Mariage might be concluded as ſoon as poſſible: and ſome of them were immediately ſent back to acquaint their Maſter with King Henry's conſent to the Match, whilſt the reſt remained here, till all things could be got ready for conveying her over. This being done, the King ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Roüen, with divers other Biſhops and Noblemen to conduct her through France to the Mediterranean Sea, and then the Biſhops took their leaves; whilſt ſhe perſuing her Voyage under the Conduct of Giles Biſhop of Eureux and others, arrived ſafe at Palermo in Scicily, and within a few days after ſhe was married to the King by the ſame Biſhop: and the King then ſetled upon her ſeveral Lands and Territories for her Dower by his Charter, with his Seal of Gold, which he ſent to King Henry; a Draught of which our Authors have given us, to whom I refer the Curious Reader.

I

I have nothing elſe worth relating under this Year, but [4.] that William Earl of Glouceſter dying without any Heir-male, left all his Eſtate to John the King's youngeſt Son, on condition he married Haviſe or Aviſe the Earl's youngeſt Daughter, if that the Pope would allow the Mariage: the King accepted of the Grant, and thereupon allow'd her Five Elder Siſters certain Rents or Annuities in Money, in lieu of their Shares of the Eſtate.

Having done with Domeſtick Buſineſs, let us now look over into Ireland, and ſee in what poſture the Engliſh Affairs ſtood there this Year.

[5.] About the middle of May that Valiant Earl Richard (Sir nam'd Strongbow) Juſticiary of Ireland, deceas'd at Dublin; [1.] of whoſe Death, as ſoon as Raymond his Son-in-Law (who was then in Deſmond) had notice by a Letter from his Lady Baſilia, he endeavour'd to keep it private from the Iriſh; and immediately thereupon called a Council of his moſt experienced and truſty Friends, to conſider what was beſt to be done in the preſent Conjuncture: And ſince Raymond was ſuddenly to depart for England, they reſolv'd to remove the Gariſon out of Limerick, it being ſo remote from the Reſt of the Engliſh Territories, and to diſperſe it into the Maritime Towns, and the ſtrong Places in Leinſter, to reinforce them, and to leave the Charge and Defence of that City to Donald O Brien, Prince of Tuomond and Limerick, as one of the King of England's Barons, who gave new Hoſtages and took freſh Oaths to defend the Town, and reſtore it to the King upon demand, and in the mean time to preſerve the Peace. But the Engliſh were no ſooner over one end of the Bridge, but Donald cauſed the other end to be broken down, and the City to be ſet on Fire; though what advantage he could have by ſo doing, I cannot ſee, ſince he might have kept the Town without deſtroying it: But this is certain, that Raymond finding himſelf diſappointed in his deſign, by the Treachery of this Iriſh Prince, march'd back with the Army to Dublin; where, ſo ſoon as he arriv'd, he aſſiſted at the Funeral of his Father in-Law Earl Richard, whoſe Body was buried in the Church of the Holy Trinity, where his rude Monument, or Effigies, is ſtill to be ſeen, being commonly call'd Strongbow's Tomb.

[5] Id. ib. Earl Strongbow dies at Dublin.

[1] G. C. L. 2. c. 14.

Raymond (then in Deſmond) upon the News of it conſults with his moſt truſty friends what was to be done.

He is ſuddenly to go for England.

Raymond commits Limerick to the Charge of O Brien.

Who breaks down the Bridge, and ſets the City on Fire.

I know the Iriſh Annals place the Death of Earl Richard above-mention'd, under the Year following, viz. A. D. 1177. But ſince all our Engliſh Hiſtorians, who ſay any thing of his Death, agree in placing it under this; I chuſe to do ſo likewiſe, as the truer Account, and ſhall therefore here put together all the reſt of the Actions of this Year, that immediately follow'd this Earl's Deceaſe.

Raymond goes back to Dublin, and aſſiſts at his Father-in-Law's Funeral.

His Monument ſtill to be ſeen in the Church of the Holy Trinity.

[2.] Upon which certain Commiſſioners were ſent in all haſte into England to acquaint the King with the Change of Affairs in Ireland, who forthwith diſpatch'd away William Fitz-Adelm as his Juſticiary thither, with Ten Knights, or Men at Arms, of his own Houſhold, to attend him; and joyned to his Aſſiſtance John de Curcy, with whom he ſent Ten others of the ſame Quality; as alſo the Old brave Souldiers Robert Fitz-Stephen and Miles Cogan, each with the like number to be ready to attend their Commands: Whereupon Raymond hearing they were Landed, march'd to Wexford, and receiv'd them with great Reſpect, and forthwith deliver'd up all the Cities, Gariſons, Forts and Hoſtages of Ireland to William Fitz-Adelm as the King's Seneſcal or Juſticiary.

Anno Dom. MCLXXVI.

The Lord Hugh de Lacy treacherously murther'd by an Iriſh Labourer.

But I ſhall now defer treating further of the Affairs of that Kingdom till the enſuing Year; and only note under this, That (according to the Annals of Ireland) the Lord Hugh de Lacy was treacherouſly murther'd at a place call'd Dervah by an Iriſh man; and it was in this manner: He was going to build him a Caſtle there, and being about to lay the Foundation, he would have ſhewn this aukward Fellow how to work with a Pick-Axe; but as he ſtooped down to do it, the Iriſhman having him alone, and at advantage, cut off his Head with an Axe, and ſo put an end both to the Deſign and to that poor Lord's Life.

[3.] B. A. C. G. Col 1433. Huguſon the Legate Summons a Synod at Weſtminſter.

The Two A. Bps. diſpute about Precedency.

The Affront that is offer'd on both ſides.

The Legate cites the A Bp. of Canterbury, as the Contriver of the Affront, to anſwer it before the Pope.

He appeals from the Legate.

The Council breaks up in diſorder, and the Legate ſoon after goes for Rome.

I ſhall now conclude with the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of this Year. [3.] About Mid-Lent, King Henry, with the King his Son, came to London, and Cardinal Huguſon the Pope's Legate ſummon'd a Synod at Weſtminſter of all the Biſhops of England; where, when they were met, and he had taken his place, and Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury had ſeated himſelf on his Right-hand, Roger Archbiſhop of York coming in, refuſed to take his Seat, which was left for him on the Left; alledging, That becauſe he was conſecrated Firſt, he ought to have Precedency before the other; which Canterbury refuſing to yield to him, the Archbiſhop of York ſate down in his Lap, but was preſently thruſt out by the Biſhops that ſate next, and flung to the ground; where being rudely treated both by the Feet and Hands of thoſe that ſtood round about, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to return Good for Evil, reſcued him from them; but the Legate caſting all the blame upon Canterbury (as if this Affront to the Apoſtolick See had been done by his contrivance) cited him to anſwer it before the Pope: then the Archbiſhop of York riſing up, went and caſt himſelf at the King's Feet, complaining of the Violence he had ſuffer'd, and accuſing the Archbiſhop of Canterbury as the Cauſer of it, who preſently appealed from the Pope's Legate as one prejudiced againſt him, whilſt the Archbiſhop of York likewiſe made his Appeal to the Pope againſt the other: and would not come to any Agreement with him, unleſs in the Preſence of the Pope himſelf, and that he had his Judgment in it: Whereupon the Council broke up in diſorder, and the Legate not long after took his leave, and went for Rome.

[4] C B. Col. 1109 Another Council held at Wincheſter about the Mariage of the K's Daughter.

The K at laſt patches up a Temporary Agreement between the Two A Bps.

[4.] After which another Great Council was held at Wincheſter, wherein the King endeavour'd to make up the Difference between the Two Archbiſhops, but all to no purpoſe; yet at laſt, by his Mediation, he patch'd up a Temporary Agreement between them; which was, That they ſhould maintain entire Peace and Concord for Five years enſuing, till the Pope ſhould determine this affair. Thus this warm diſpute ended, than which there cannot be a more pregnant Inſtance of the great Pride of the Prelates of thoſe times; who would rather venture making a Diviſion in the Church, than yield in the leaſt punctilio to one another.

[5] Col. 589.

But to make an end of this troubleſome Affair: I ſuppoſe theſe Differences between the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York about Precedency and the Oath of Canonical Obedience, were fully ſetled before the Death of Pope Alexander the Third, which was not till Four years after this Quarrel; for [5.] Radulph de Diceto has given us a Bull of this Pope's, (though it comes in abruptly, without any date, or mention of the Occaſion upon which it was granted,) wherein wherein he declares, that following the footſteps of his Predeceſſors (therein named) he prohibits for the future either of the Archbiſhops to require any Canonical Obedience of the other, or that the See of York ſhould be any ways ſubject to that of Canterbury, but according to the Primitive Inſtitution: only this diſtinction of Epiſcopal Honour ſhould be obſerv'd, that That Archbiſhop who was firſt Ordained, ſhould enjoy the Precedency. Anno Dom. MCLXXVI.

How far this laſt Clauſe was obſerv'd, I will not determine; but I find no more diſpute about the former demands after this time to have been between them. This I take notice of, becauſe though it is a remarkable piece of Church-Hiſtory, I find it in no other Author.

The Nation being now pretty well ſetled in Peace, [1.] the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Northampton with his Two younger Sons Geoffrey Earl of Bretaigne, and Earl John; King Henry the Son being then at Argenton in Normandy, and Duke Richard at Burdeaux: This Latter preſently after Chriſtmaſs march'd forth with his Army, and beſieg'd the City of * Auxe, which the Viſcount of that Place held out againſt him, but he took it in Ten days; and then marching further, he laid Siege to the City of Bayonne, which the Viſcount Ernald de Bertram defended as well as he could; but this he alſo made to yield in Ten days time more; and then marching further towards the Borders of Spain, he took in ſome other Caſtles and ſmall Places and made thoſe of Navarre and Biſcay ſwear to keep Peace with the King. Theſe Countries being thus quieted, he return'd into Poictou, and ſent his Father notice of his good ſucceſs. Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

[2.] King Henry the Elder alſo hearing that a Great Baron of Normandy, called Ralph de Doles, was lately dead, and that his Daughter and Heir, together with her Territories and Eſtate, had been violently ſeiz'd by her Relations, wrote to the Young King his Son, then in Normandy, commanding him immediately to raiſe the Militia of that Dutchy, and reduce thoſe Territories, and reſcue the young Lady (who was the King's Ward) which in Obedience to his Father's Commands, he forthwith did, and ſo the Caſtle of Doles was preſently ſurrender'd upon his coming before it.

[3.] The King ſoon after the Feaſt of St. Hilary, or Thirteenth of January, held a Great Council at Northampton, with the Biſhops, Earls and Barons of his Kingdom; to which came Ambaſſadors from the Earl of Flanders to acquaint him, That the French King had deſir'd the Earl's two Nieces (Daughters of Matthew late Earl of Boloign) in Marriage; the Elder of them for his Son Philip, the Younger for Lewis, Son to Theobald Earl of Blois; yet their Maſter would diſpoſe of neither of them without the King's conſent: ſo great a deference did the neighbouring Princes then expreſs for King Henry.

But now there fell out an Affair that ſhews the High eſteem, which the Princes of Europe had of the Judgment and Authority of the King of England and his Great Council; [4.] for Alfonſo King of Caſtile (who had married Eleanor the King's Daughter) having great Quarrels with Sanctio King of Navarre concerning certain Caſtles and Territories which had been (as they alledg'd) unjuſtly taken and detained from each other; they both at laſt conſented to give mutual Security to ſtand to the Judgment of the * Court (or Great Council) of the King

* Curia.

Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

King of England: Whereupon, for the determination of this Controverſy, there came divers Biſhops and Noblemen Ambaſſadors from both theſe Kings, with ſeveral Learned Advocates to plead their Cauſe; and with them likewiſe Two ſtout Champions (one for each ſide) to undertake a ſingle Combat, in caſe the King of England's Court ſhould think fit ſo to determine Matters.

Theſe Ambaſſadors arriving about the beginning of Lent, came to Windſor, where they preſented to the King the Charter or Agreement made between the Parties, whereby they bound themſelves under very great Penalties (as upon the Forfeiture of certain Caſtles and Territories) if they did not abide by the Judgment of the King of England, and that a firm Truce ſhould continue between them in the mean time, as appears at large by the Charter it ſelf; for which I refer the Reader to our Author, for fear ſome may think me unneceſſarily tedious.

This Agreement, as alſo the Allegations on both ſides, being read before the King at Windſor, he ſent his Meſſengers over all England to Summon the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons to appear before him at London on the Firſt Sunday in Lent, where the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and almoſt all the Biſhops of his Province came, except thoſe that were hindred either by Buſineſs or Sickneſs, or where the Sees were vacant; the Archbiſhop of York was prevented by Sickneſs, but the Biſhop of Durham came thither, and with him the Biſhop of Candida Caſa, or Whithern in Galloway, as a Suffragan to the Archbiſhop of York. [5.] Beſides theſe, there came alſo ſo many Abbots, Deans and Arch-Deacons, that their Number is not eaſy to be reckon'd: There likewiſe appear'd all the Earls, Barons, and * Great Men of England, who met in the † Great Hall of the King's Palace, together with Four Commiſſioners from thoſe Kings (Two on each ſide) who were to hear and report the Judgment that ſhould be given: There appear'd alſo their Proctors or Advocates, who were to ſet forth the particular Rights of their reſpective Maſters.

Then, becauſe the Earls and Barons of England did not underſtand their Language, the King Commanded the Advocates to give in their Maſter's ſeveral Pleas, Demands and Allegations on both ſides in writing to him within Three days; at the end of which, the Ambaſſadors of both Kings produced their Demands and Pleadings before the Great Council of England; but they being very long, our Author has omitted them, and only given us thoſe ſhort Concluſions or Iſſues, in which both Parties joyn'd and agreed; which being read, King Henry cauſed the Ambaſſadors of both Kings to be ſolemnly ſworn upon the Evangeliſts, before all there preſent; That their Maſters ſhould ſtand to his Judgment, as well concerning the Reſtitution of the Places demanded, as the Truce; and that if they did not obſerve it, they ſhould then render their Bodies into his hands.

Their ſeveral Pleas and Allegations to be given in within Three days in writing, ſo interpreted, as that the King and his Barons might underſtand them.

[2.] " This Judgment of the Biſhops and Great Men is very ſhort, " and is follow'd by the Exemplification thereof by way of Charter, " under King Henry's Seal directed to both Kings, reciting all the " Proceedings and Claims on each ſide, and then giving Sentence " concerning the mutual Reſtitution of the Places therein mention'd, " with a Confirmation of the late Truce that had been made be- " tween them for Ten years; and further appointing his Son-in-Law " King Alfonſo to pay his Uncle Sanctio the Sum of Three Thouſand " Morobiteens, a Sort of Mooriſh Money, by Three equal Payments " every year, for the Space of Ten years; concluding with a Re- " cital of the Oath which their Ambaſſadors on both ſides had taken " on their behalfs, either to ſtand to his Judgment concerning theſe " Matters, or elſe to ſurrender their Bodies into his Power.

[2.] Id. ib. An Exemplification of the Judgment by way of Charter, under K. Henry's Seal to both Kings.

Though the Judgment is called the K's. yet it was the Act of the Great Council of the Nation.

This Charter (witneſſed by moſt of the Biſhops and Great Men) being very long, I have only given you the Heads of it, and refer the Reader to the Original for his farther ſatisfaction. But I have been the more particular in the Relation of this whole Affair, becauſe we may not only learn from thence, That though in the Charter it ſelf the Judgment is called the King's, (as being given in his Great Council) yet it appears plainly by the Judgment it ſelf, that it was alſo the Act of the Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and other Great Men of England; without whoſe Advice and Conſent, in thoſe days, our Kings acted nothing conſiderable, either concerning War or Peace, relating to Themſelves or their Neighbours.

[3.] Idem ib. The Ambaſſadors having had great Preſents, return home.

[4.] B. A. During this Tranſaction, a young Nobleman, Brother to the E. of Ferrers, was privately murther'd.

The K. ſwears a ſevere Revenge upon the Citizens.

[3.] This Council being thus happily ended, and the King having beſtow'd great Preſents upon the Ambaſſadors of Caſtile and Navarre, diſpatched them home with much ſatisfaction; not long after the King ſent ſome of his own Noblemen on an Ambaſſy to the ſaid Kings, that ſo he might by them know how they received his Judgment.

* Parentibus.

The better Sort of Citizen's Sons were wont to make nightly Excurſions, &c.

I ſhall ſay no more concerning this Affair, but only, that whilſt it was in agitation, [4.] a young Nobleman, Brother to the Earl of Ferrers, was privately murther'd by night in the Streets of London; and when it was told the King, he was ſo very angry, and troubled at it, that he ſwore he would take a ſevere Revenge upon the Citizens for his Death; for it ſeems it was a Cuſtom for a Hundred or more of the Sons or * Kinſmen of the † better Sort, or Gentlemen of that City, to make nightly Excurſions upon the Houſes of the Rich, and rob them; and if they found any Man abroad in the Night, they kill'd him without Mercy; ſo that few durſt walk the Streets after it was dark for fear of them. And then our Author proceeds to tell us by the bye, how that about Three years before, theſe Blades endeavour'd to rob the Houſe of a certain Rich Citizen; and had done it, but that the Maſter of the Houſe being a ſtout Man, and forewarn'd of their coming, had arm'd himſelf, and with a great many Worthy Citizens and their Servants, ſet upon the Thieves already broke into his Houſe; and having ſeiz'd one of them, and in Scuffle cut off his Hand, the reſt got out and ran away; and that the next day this Man being brought before Richard de Lucy the King's Juſticiary, the Thief upon a promiſe of his Life confeſs'd his Accomplices, of whom many were taken, but others fled; among thoſe that were apprehended, was a certain Rich Citizen call'd John the Old; who, when he could not clear himſelf by the Tryal of Water (i. e. Water Ordeal) he offer'd to the King Five Hundred Marks for his Life; but becauſe he could not prove his Innocence by Water-Ordeal, the King would not take the Money; ſo he Commanded, that the Sentence ſhould be executed upon him, and accordingly he was hang'd.

I have put down this Story as ſhort as I could, to ſhew the Reader the ill Government of this Great City in thoſe times, and that the old way of tryal by Water ſtill continued; as alſo that the King's Juſtices ſcorned to pardon notorious Robbers for Money; though this Man offer'd Five Hundred Marks for his Life, which was a great Sum in thoſe days.

[1.] Idem Ib. E. of Flanders comes over to viſit Tho. Becket's Tomb, where the K. meets him, & afterwards goes with him to the Sea-ſide, and gives him Five hundred Marks towards his deſigned Voyage to the Holy Land.

Not long after the King kept his Eaſter at Reading, where it being told him, that the Earl of Flanders was about to come over into England to viſit the Tomb of the New St. Thomas of Becket; the King made what haſte he could to meet him at Canterbury, which he did the day after his arrival; and when he had ſtayed there ſome days to perform his Vow, the King accompany'd him to the Sea-ſide, and at his departure gave him Five Hundred Marks towards his intended Voyage to the Holy-Land, which he had ſometime before vowed to undertake.

[2.] Idem Ib. After the K's Pilgrimaging to ſeveral Shrines, he goes to Gaitintun, where many Biſhops, Earls and Barons meet him to conſult about the Welfare of the Kingdom.

After this the King himſelf went on Pilgrimage to the Shrines of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, and to that of St. Audery; the Former of whom lay enſhrin'd at St. Edmundsbury, and the Latter at Ely; from whence he went as far as Gaitintun, (which is ſuppoſed to be Gayton in Cheſhire) where met him at his Summons Roger Archbiſhop of York and divers other Biſhops, together with many Earls and Barons to treat of the Welfare and Settlement of the Kingdom. When they had long conſulted about it, ſeveral of the Welſh Nobility came and ſwore Fealty to the King, and he transferr'd that Aſſembly from thence to Windſor, whither he took the Archbiſhop of York and other Biſhops along with him, and where alſo met him all the Earls, Barons, and Knights of England, with Horſe and Arms, to go whitherſoever the King ſhould Command them; and when they had treated farther there about the Peace and Settlement of the Kingdom, He, by the Advice of his Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, removed the Conſtables of ſeveral Caſtles in the North of England and Scotland, and committed them to the Cuſtody of ſome Knights of his own Family and others, the chief of whom were William Stuteville, whom he made Governor of the Caſtle of Rocksborough in Scotland, and Roger Stuteville of the Caſtle of Edenburgh; but to Roger Archbiſhop of York he gave the Cuſtody of the Caſtle of Scarburgh, and the Cuſtody of the Caſtles of Norham, Berwick, and Durham, to divers other Perſons of Note, whoſe Names need not be mention'd.

[3.] B. A. C. B. Col. 1127.

The K. commands the Welſh Kings to meet him at Oxford, who with many other Noblemen did Homage there to him.

From Windſor the King went to Oxford, where he had Commanded the Welſh Kings or Princes, and the moſt Potent Men of that Country to meet him (viz. Rees ap Griffin King of South Wales, Cadwallan King of Delwain, Owen de Kevilian, Griffin Lord of Bromfeild, Madoc Son of Gervet Chone, and many Others of the moſt Noble Families of Wales, who who all did Homage, and ſwore Fealty to him againſt all Men, and that they would keep peace with him and his Kingdom; then the King beſtow'd on Prince David (who had married his Half Siſter) all the Land of Ellesmere, and to King Rees the Country of Mereonith.

Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

The Lands he beſtows on the Kings, David and Rees.

But the moſt Remarkable thing concluded on in this Great Council, [4.] was, That there King Henry made his Son John King of Ireland, by virtue of the Bull formerly granted from Pope Alexander; but by the Title of King of Ireland it is plain, there was no more intended than Vice Roy, or Feudatary King at moſt, ſince King Henry himſelf never was ſtiled otherwiſe than Lord of Ireland, and the Oath of Fealty was taken to the King in the firſt Place, and then to Earl John his Son.

[4] Id. ib. And in this Great Council he makes his Son John K of Ireland by virtue of Pope Alexander's Bull.

The Title ſignified no more than of Feudatary K. or Vice-Roy.

But to give you at once whatſoever was done farther in this Council, [5.] the King then alſo beſtow'd divers Provinces and Cities of Ireland amongſt his Great Men and Others, who had the chief hand in the Conqueſt of the Country: As to Robert Fitz Stephen and Miles Cogan the Kingdom of Cork, for the Service of Sixty Knights, to hold of himſelf and his Son John, except the City of Cork, and one Cantred or Hundred next adjoyning, which the King reſerved to Himſelf and his Heirs: The King gave alſo to Hubert Fitz-Herbert, and William the Brother of Earl Reginald, and Jollan de la Pomeray, their Nephew, the Kingdom of Limeric for the Service of Sixty Knights: but ſometime after, upon their refuſal of this laſt Territory, becauſe it was not fully ſubdued, the King beſtow'd it on Philip de Breüſe for the ſame Service. Alſo Abbot Benedict ſays, That this year, when the King had reſtor'd the Earl of Cheſter to all the Caſtles and Lands that belong'd to him, as well on this ſide the Sea as beyond it; he then enjoyn'd him to go over into Ireland to help to ſubdue the petty Princes of that Country to the King's Obedience and his Sons, on whom the King had lately beſtow'd that Kingdom.

[5] Id. p. 323. He gives divers Provinces and Cities of Ireland to ſuch great Men as had aſſiſted him in this Conqueſt.

E. of Cheſter reſtored to all his Caſtles and Lands, to go & help to ſubdue Ireland.

[1.] On the Sunday before Aſcenſion day the King was at Wincheſter, where, by his Precept, all the Earls, Barons, and almoſt all the Knights or Tenents that held of him in Capite, met him all well prepared with Horſe and Arms to receive his Commands; for at that time he had order'd moſt of the Ships of England and Normandy to be ready at Portſmouth and Southampton to tranſport them together with himſelf: Then on Aſcenſion day the King gave them leave to go home, and appear again at Wincheſter on the Firſt of July, then and there to execute his Commands.

[1.] Id. ib. All the Earls, Barons, and Tenants in Capite attend the K. at Wincheſter with Horſe and Arms.

At the time appointed the ſaid Earls, Barons, and Tenents in Capite met him again at Wincheſter, being all ready to paſs over with him into Normandy, but he ſtill [2.] deferr'd his Voyage till certain Ambaſſadors were come back from the King of France, to whom he had ſent them, to know whither he would ſtand to his Agreement, made at the Contract of Mariage between his Two Daughters, Margaret and Alice, and King Henry's Sons, Henry and Richard; and whither he would give them the Lands he had promiſed them on that conſideration: But though theſe Ambaſſadors return'd not preſently themſelves, yet they ſent over one John de Raneville to let the King know the effect of their Negotiation; [3.] which was, That he would not part with any more Territories, but yet expected that Richard Earl of

Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

The King of England by his Biſhops appeals from the Legate to the Pope.

Poictou ſhould marry his Daughter Alice; and that if he did not, the Pope's Legate was ready (according to his Holineſs's Command) to put all his Dominions under an Interdict. Upon this the King having ſent for ſome of his Biſhops (viz.) Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Geoffrey of Ely, Bartholomew of Exeter, and John Biſhop of Chicheſter, and other Wiſe men of his Kingdom, conſulted with them what he ſhould do in this difficult matter, who all adviſed him to Appeal to the Pope himſelf againſt the Partiality of his Legate, which the Biſhops alſo did, putting the King, themſelves, and the whole Kingdom under the Pope's immediate Protection; and the King ſent to the Archbiſhop of York, for him and his Province to make the ſame Appeal as the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had done in his: This was about the 12th of July.

[4.] B. A. R. H. ib. 325. b. The K. with his army paſſeth over Sea.

And then ſends his ſon Geoffrey to reduce Bretaign.

[4.] Notwithſtanding this Appeal, the King, having remain'd almoſt all this time at Wincheſter to be cured of a ſore Leg he had got by the kick of an Horſe, about the middle of Auguſt paſſed from Portſmouth into Normandy, and Landed at a Place call'd Kapwic, whither almoſt all the Earls, Barons, and Knights of England (who had lately met at Wincheſter) follow'd him, expecting a War. So ſoon as the King arriv'd, he ſent his Son Geoffrey into Bretaign to reduce his Enemies in that Province.

The two Ks. meet at Roüen and Cardinal Peter comes to them ſtill threatning the Interdict.

The King of England deſires time till he could ſend to the K. of France.

About the End of Auguſt the Two Kings came to Roüen, and Cardinal Peter the Pope's Legate came thither to 'em, ſtill threatening by the Pope's Command to put all the King of England's Dominions under an Interdict, unleſs his Son Earl Richard was preſently married to the Lady Alice, Daughter to the King of France: The King, ſenſible of the Danger that was impendent over Him and his Kingdom, deſired ſome longer time of the Cardinal to make an end of this difference, and till he could ſend Meſſengers to King Philip. This being propoſed and agreed to, a Treaty was began between them; and on the 21ſt of September the Two Kings came to a Conference at Turic in preſence of the Legate and Great Men of both Nations, where the King of England gave his Faith, That Earl Richard his Son ſhould marry the Lady above-mention'd, if her Father would, upon the Mariage with her, give him the City of Bourges, with its Appurtenances, as was before covenanted between them; and to Henry his Son-in-Law, all the French Veuxin (that is, all the Land between Giſors and Pontoiſe) which he had already promiſed to give him with his Eldeſt Daughter Margaret: But becauſe the King of France would not perform his Covenants, therefore neither would King Henry then permit his Son Richard to marry that Princeſs; yet at this Conference, by Mediation of the Legate and Noblemen of both Kingdoms, there was a Peace and Final Concord made between the Two Kings under their Seals, and it was alſo confirm'd by their mutual Oaths; the Heads of which (ſince it would be tedious to ſet the whole down at length) are to this effect: [5.]

The King of England promiſes to marry his Son to the King of France's Daughter, if he would agree to the former Covenants.

At laſt upon Conference they agree.

III. That

III. That all manner of Diſcord might ceaſe between them, they granted to each Other, That from thenceforward Neither of them ſhould demand of the other any Lands, or any thing elſe they were in poſſeſſion of, except what was in diſpute between them in Auvergne, and except the Fee of Raoul-Caſtle, and the ſmall Fees and Diviſions, or Limits of Lands in Berry: about which, if they could not agree between themſelves, there were then Three Barons and as many Biſhops to be named on either part, who were to determine their Right according to the Oaths of ſuch Laymen, as beſt underſtood and knew it, and they were to ſtand to their Determination. Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

IV. That if either of the Two Kings ſhould dye in their Journey, the Other ſhould have the management of the Men and Money, and the whole care of the Expedition.

V. That in caſe they ſhould both dye in the Journey, they were before they ſet forth to chuſe ſome of their * honeſt and faithful Subjects or Vaſſals, to whom they ſhould commit their Money, the Leading and Government of their Souldiers, and the Ordering of the whole Expedition. * De probis & fidelibus hominibus noſtris.

VI. They were to appoint ſuch Governors of their Dominions in their abſence, as in all difficulties ſhould aſſiſt, and mutually defend each others Territories.

VII. That Tradeſmen, Merchants, and all Others, as well Clerks as Laymen, with all their Goods, ſhould be ſecure and free from moleſtation in both their Dominions.

Theſe Articles being thus reduced into the form of a Charter, were ſeal'd and witneſs'd in the Preſence of Cardinal Peter, the Pope's Legate, as alſo of divers Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of both Kingdoms there particularly nam'd; but though the Peace between both Kings continu'd firm during the Life-time of King Lewis, yet that Article concerning their joint Undertaking the Holy War was never perform'd. Theſe Articles reduced into the form of a Charter.

[1.] This Treaty being thus concluded to the great ſatisfaction of both Princes, King Henry went to Vernueil, where, at the Petition of the Good Men of Grammont, in the Preſence of Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter, and divers other Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of his Dominions, he made certain Statutes for the Common Benefit of the People of Normandy, Aquitain, Anjou, and Bretaign, which he confirm'd under his Great Seal, to this effect: [1.] B. A. R. H. p. 326. b. K. Henry then goes to Vernueil, and there makes divers Statutes.

"That no Man ſhould preſume to take the Goods of a Vaſſal for "the Debt of his Lord, unleſs the Vaſſal himſelf was a Pledge or "Surety for that Debt; yet the Rents of Vaſſals, which they were "to pay to their Lords, ſhould be paid to their Lord's Creditors, "not to the Lords themſelves.

[2] After this the King by his Writ ſummon'd the Earls and Barons of Normandy to meet him at Argenton on the Ninth of October, ready with Horſe and Arms for his Service; and then went to Alençon, and ſent his Son Richard into Poictou, to ſubdue thoſe Enemies that had there taken up Arms againſt him. [2] B. A. The King of England ſummons his Earls and Barons of Normandy to appear at Argenton.

[3.] But

Anno Dom. MCLXXVII.

[3] Id. ib. Young K. Henry not meeting with Succeſs in Berry, his Father with a great Army goes thither, and ſubdues the Noblemen.

[3] But King Henry hearing that the King his Son met with no very good Succeſs in Berry, (whither he had lately ſent him on the like affair,) he raiſing a Great Army, preſently march'd thither to his Aſſiſtance; and having taken divers Caſtles in thoſe Parts, he made the Noblemen of that Country ſubmit to his Will: And from thence going into the Province of Lymoſin, he there impleaded divers Earls, Barons, and other Gentlemen of that Country, for taking part with his Sons againſt him, and Fined every one of them according to their deſerts; and then returning again into Berry, he and the King of France met at Graſſere to treat about the County of Auvergne, to whom the ſupreme Dominion thereof did belong, whither to the King of France or to King Henry as Duke of Aquitain, which by the Earls and Barons of that Country (Aſſembled for that purpoſe) was found to be the Dominion of the Duke of Aquitain: But the King of France being not ſatisfy'd with this determination, the matter was again referr'd to Six Biſhops and Six Barons, equally choſen by both Parties; and ſo the Buſineſs reſted for that time.

From thence goes to Limoſin, and impleads ſeveral Noblemen, & Fines them.

He meets the K. of France at Graſſere, and treats with him about Auvergne.

The Earls and Barons of that Country give it to K. Henry.

[4] R. H. ib. G. B. K Henry returns to Grammont, where the E. of Marche agrees to ſell his Earldom to him.

[4.] This Treaty being ended, King Henry return'd again to Grammont, where came to him Audebert Earl of Marche, who having not long before loſt his only Son, now agreed to ſell his Earldom to King Henry for Fifteen Thouſand Founds of Anjou Money, Twenty Mules and Twenty Palfreys, and confirm'd this Sale by his Charter in the preſence of John Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux and Poictiers, and divers other of the Clergy and Laiety, as you may find in R. Hoveden, who has given it us at large. And ſo ſoon as the King had taken the Homages and Allegiance of the Barons and Knights of that Country, he went into Anjou, there to keep his Chriſtmaſs.

[5] G. C. Lib. 2. c. 18. Limerick fired by the Inhabitants. Philip de Breüſe thereupon returns to Cork.

I ſhall now give a ſhort Relation of the Iriſh Affairs that happen'd this year, Philip de Breüſe having (as you have already heard) the Kingdom of Limerick beſtow'd upon him by the King; [5.] Robert Fitz-Stephens and Miles Cogan went about this time to conduct him to his New Government; but when he came near Limerick, the Inhabitants rebelling, ſet the Town on Fire to prevent their Entrance; upon which Accident his Conductors offer'd their Aſſiſtance for the recovery of that City; but Philip refuſed the kindneſs, being unwilling to ſettle among ſuch wild ſort of People, and ſo returned to Cork.

[1] R. H. ib. Wexford committed to William Fitz-Adelm. And Waterford to Robert Poer the King's Mareſchal.

[1.] Sometime after this, the King committed unto William Fitz-Adelm his Sewer, the Cuſtody of the Town of Wexford and its Appurtenances, (though more for Favour than any good Service;) and likewiſe on Robert Poer his Mareſchal he beſtow'd the Government of the City of Waterford with its Appurtenances; and gave to Hugh de Lacy the Cuſtody of Dublin, with all its Dependancies, which were very large, (viz.) the whole Territories of O Felan and Kildare, with the Countries of Ophaly and Wicklow, together with the Services of the County of Methe; all which then belong'd to the Territory or Dominion of Dublin.

Hugh de Lacy has the Cuſtody of Dublin, with its Dependancies.

I ſhall now proceed to relate the Reſt of the Actions of Note that happen'd this Year in Ireland, though I cannot ſet down the Months in which they happen'd, becauſe our Author has been very remiſs in that that, only we may ſuppoſe them to have been done in the Spring and following Summer. Anno Dom. MCLXXVII

I told you the laſt Year, that the King had ſent William Fitz-Adelm thither as his Juſticiary, who acting with a great deal of Covetouſneſs, Oppreſſion, and Meanneſs of Spirit (of which our Author gives us divers Inſtances) hinder'd all further Conqueſts in that Kingdom: [2.] But John de Curcy wholly miſliking his Management, was reſolv'd, by his own private Intereſt, to undertake ſome notable deſign, as a Volunteer without any Commiſſion from the Deputy, who was now become contemptible, as being neither careful to provide for thoſe under his Command, nor yet formidable to his Enemies; which gave Curcy the better opportunity to draw out of the Forces about Dublin (which through the Sloth of the General, and for want of Pay were much weakned) Two and Twenty choice Knights, and about Three Hundred other Men at Arms, and with no greater Force he boldly attacked the Kingdom of Ulſter, which had not been hitherto attempted by the Engliſh Arms: And firſt he beſieg'd the City of Doun, the Metropolis of that Province, and took it without any difficulty; Dunleve, a petty Prince then in it, running preſently away, as not being provided to make any defence. Cardinal Vivian, the Pope's Legate (who was then newly arriv'd in Ireland) being inform'd of this, endeavour'd to make Peace between Roderic King of Ulſter and John de Curcy, but without any effect: Whereupon Roderic and Dunleve raiſe an Army of Ten Thouſand Iriſh in a few days, and both march towards Doun with hopes to recover it; which Curcy perceiving, he thought it not for his advantage to be ſhut up in a ſmall Fortreſs he had built in a corner of the City; and therefore drew out ſome of the Men he had there, being in all not above Seven Hundred, and went up towards them, reſolving to try the Fate of a Battle, which proved very ſharp and cruel, but at length he obtain'd the Victory with a mighty Slaughter of his Enemies, though not without a conſiderable Loſs on his own ſide.

[3.] Giraldus Cambrenſis in the ſame Chapter tells us of Four other Battles this Curcy fought in Ulſter, yet does only name them, and the Places where they were fought, without aſcertaining the time when, or the Succeſs of thoſe his Engagements.

Stanihurſt alſo in his Hiſtory of Ireland, paſſeth them over as briefly: But [4.] Dr. Hanmer in his Chronicle of that Nation, from a Book written in Latin by an Iriſh Fryar, and Tranſlated by Dr. Dowdall Archbiſhop of Armagh into Engliſh, gives us a fuller Account of them; which, ſeeing they are not mention'd in any of the Iriſh Annals, I ſhall but juſt touch upon them from that Author.

The Firſt was fought on Midſummer-day following, before the Walls of Doun, with Fifteen Thouſand Iriſh, in which Curcy was Victor, and beat them ſo ſufficiently, that the Ulſter Men had no great ſtomach to ſet upon the Engliſh afterwards.

[5.] The Second was in Ferns againſt Eleven Thouſand Iriſh, the Engliſh not being above a Tenth part of the Number; in which Fight the Latter were routed, and Sir John Curcy and Sir Amoric St. Laurence, his ſworn Brother, were fain to ſave themſelves by flight in an old Caſtle, where they lay perdue till their Forces could be rallied; and the Roderic and Dun-Leve raiſe an Army to recover it, but they are miſerably beaten by Curcy.

the night following having ſent out Spies into the Enemie's Camp, which they found without either Centries or Guards; they preſently march'd with all the Forces they had, and taking the Iriſh aſleep, kill'd them without any reſiſtance, ſo that not above Two Hundred of them eſcaped: but of this laſt Succeſs, Giraldus ſays nothing.

But falling again upon them by Surprize, the Iriſh were almoſt totally cut off.

[1.] Id. p. 155. The Third Battle was at Uriel, near the Newry.

The Third was fought in that part of Ulſter call'd Uriel, (which ſeems to have been the Country about the Newry) near which River the Iriſh being then encamp'd, a certain Fryar ſhewing the Engliſh a Ford that was paſſable, they got over, and fell upon the Iriſh, Commanded by one O Han lan, being about Six Thouſand, and the Engliſh One Thouſand; the Conflict was very ſharp, but the Engliſh Foot giving ground, left Curcy in the midſt of his Enemies, till his Friend Sir Amoric St. Laurence coming to his Relief, they again rallied, and encouraged their Souldiers, who charged the Iriſh ſo briskly, that they forced them to retreat: but the Slaughter was ſo great on both ſides, that each of them drew off without boaſting of the Victory.

O Hanlan commanded the Iriſh, who were 6000, and the Engliſh but 1000.

The Slaughter ſo great on both ſides, that neither could much boaſt of the Victory.

[2.] Id. p 157. The Fourth Battle at the Bridge of Ivori, which he obtained with Honour.

[2.] The Fourth was at the Bridge of Ivori, where Curcy again prevailed, and ſlew many of his Enemies. Theſe were the Great Acts of that John de Curcy, who Commanded thoſe Engliſh Forces that ſubdued Ulſter; after which he built many Caſtles in convenient places for the Security of it, and eſtabliſh'd there a firm Peace.

He builds ſeveral Caſtles in Ulſter, and eſtabliſhes Peace.

[3.] G. C. l. 2. c. 17. Miles Cogan invades Connaught.

[3.] While John de Curcy was thus imployed in reducing Ulſter, Miles Cogan, who was Conſtable and Governor of Dublin, under William Fitz-Adelm, Seneſchal of Ireland, with Forty Knights, Two Hundred Horſemen, and Three Hundred Archers, paſſed the River Shannon, and invaded Connaught, upon whoſe approach the Inhabitants burnt their own Cities and Towns, hid their Proviſions in Caves under-ground, and drove their Cattle into Faſtneſſes; nevertheleſs the Engliſh Forces marched as far as Tuam, the Metropolis of that Province, and ſtayed Eight days; but not finding any Subſiſtence there, they return'd to the Shannon, where Roderic Prince of Connaught came againſt them with Three great Bodies of Men; and in a Wood adjoyning there was a ſharp and bloody Engagement, and many of the Iriſh were ſlain; but Miles and his Men got ſafe to Dublin with the Loſs only of Three Horſemen.

Upon which the Inhabitants burn their Cities, hide their Proviſions, and drive away their Cattle.

Roderic comes out againſt him with three Great Bodies, & had a ſharp diſpute; but Cogan got ſafe to Dublin with the Loſs only of three Horſemen.

[4.] Ib. c. 18.

[4.] After this William Fitz-Adelm was recalled from the Government for his evil Adminiſtration, and Hugh de Lacy was made by the King chief Seneſchal or Deputy of Ireland, and Robert Poer Governor of Wexford and Waterford.

There was nothing elſe conſiderable done in Ireland this year, but only that in a General Synod held at Dublin by Cardinal Vivian the Legate; he publickly ſet forth the Right of the King of England over Ireland, ſtrictly forbidding both the Clergy and Laiety, under the pain of Anathema or Excommunication, to preſume to depart from their Fealty and Allegiance.

[5.] This

Anno Dom. MCLXXVIII.

[5.] This Year the King went into Anjou, and kept his Chriſtmaſs at the City of Angiers, where the chief Nobility of that Country were ſummon'd to attend him during that Feſtival; then returning into Normandy after Eaſter, and having a great Mind to go for England, he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King of France for his Protection for all his Territories on that ſide of the Sea, who preſently by way of Letter granted it; which being very extraordinary, I ſhall here ſet down at length: "Lewis King of France, to all to whom theſe Preſents ſhall "come, Greeting; Know ye, that We have received into our Cuſto- "dy all the Lands of our moſt Dear Brother Henry King of England "on this ſide the Sea, if he ſhall pleaſe to go over into England, or "go on Pilgrimage, viz. to the Holy Land; and that if his Bayliffs, "or Officers, ſhall require us, we ſhall truly, without deſign, give "them our Counſel and Aſſiſtance for the defence and protection of "the ſame. Given at Bois de * Vincennes.

France being for the greateſt part now in Peace, I find nothing there worth Notice, but that [1.] King Henry having the laſt Year ſent his Son Richard into Poictou to ſubdue his Enemies, he had made War upon them ever ſince. The Sum of thoſe Actions was, That he marched with a Great Army to the City of Oſſea, on the Borders of Spain, and there found the Earl of Bigorre kept Priſoner by the Citizens, whom he cauſed to be releaſed, he delivering to Earl Richard for his Ranſome the Town of Clermont, and the Caſtle of Mumbrun; after which the Earl alſo took Genzai and Martillian, and ſeveral other Caſtles which he razed to the ground; and the Earl Engoleſme ſurrendered to him his City of the ſame name, as alſo the Caſtle of Montiniac, both which Places he diſmantled by throwing down their Walls. But to return to England.

[2.] About the beginning of July King Henry arrived from Normandy, and by the way to London paid his Devotions at the Shrine of the New Saint Thomas; and when he heard that William Archbiſhop of Rheims was come over upon the ſame Errand, he ſtayed for his coming about London, where he received him very ſplendidly; and after he had perform'd his Devotions to this reputed Saint, he return'd home again.

[3.] Some time after the King's return from Normandy, being at Woodſtock, he made his Son Geoffrey a Knight; who preſently paſſing over into Normandy, did there (as alſo in France) follow Torneaments, or the manly Exerciſe of Tilting; wherein he was ambitious of gaining Reputation by his Valour, becauſe his Elder Brothers Henry and Richard had already acquired great Honour in thoſe Military Performances. The Reader is to take notice, that theſe Tiltings on Horſeback with Spears were then very much in faſhion; but at laſt, becauſe of the miſchief that often happen'd thereby, they were forbid by the Pope's Decree.

Tilting then very much in faſhion, but afterwards forbidden by the Pope.

But I can meet with nothing further to have happened conſiderable in Civil Affairs, and therefore I will give an Account of ſome Eccleſiaſtical Matters in France, where [4.] R. Hoveden gives us a long Relation, how that the Arian Hereſy, as he terms it (or rather the Doctrine of the Albigenſes) having been the year before condemn'd in a Synod of all the Biſhops of Languedoc, the Kings of England and France

[4] Id. p. 327.

The Kings of England and France reſolv'd to root the Arian Hereſy out of their Dominions.

Anno Dom. MCLXXVIII.

France were reſolved to root thoſe reputed Hereticks out of their Dominions too; but firſt of all they ſent the Cardinal of St. Chrogonus, the Pope's Legate, with divers of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of France to try if they could convert them: Theſe Clergymen were backed by great Forces under the Conduct of Raymund Earl of Tholouſe, the Viſcount of Touraine and other Noblemen, who, in caſe of Obſtinacy, were to aſſiſt the Cardinal in expelling them out of thoſe Parts.

[5.] Id. ib. Earl of Tholouſe, and the Pope's Legate cite the Heads of them before them.

Whereupon the [5.] Earl and Legate arriving at the City of Tholouſe (which was no ways able to reſiſt them) they cited the Heads of thoſe reputed Hereticks before them, beginning with Peter Moran, one of the Richeſt Citizens they had, and likewiſe their chief Teacher; but he being convicted and condemned for ſeveral reputed Heretical Opinions, and not being deſirous then to dye a Martyr, thought it his beſt way openly to recant them; however notwithſtanding he was ſentenced to be publickly whipped, and his Eſtate to be confiſcated; at which ſevere proceedings his Followers were ſo terrified, that many of them came in, confeſſed and abjured their Opinions, only Two of them, whoſe Names were Raymond and Bernard, and ſome few other of their Preachers refuſed to recant, yet, being ſummon'd, they appeared, having firſt obtained a ſafe Conduct for their coming and returning back; the Proceſs againſt them is very long, but the Sum of it is to this effect: [1.] That they produced the Articles of their Faith in writing, containing ſeveral paſſages which were judged bordering upon Hereſy; therefore the Biſhops would have them give an account of their Faith in Latin, But they not being able to do that, the Cardinal and Biſhops were fain to Examine them in their Mother-tongue; in which when they anſwer'd alſo as if they had been true Catholicks, the Earl of Tholouſe and Others laid many wicked Opinions to their charge, as that they had preached up Two Gods; that Mariage and Baptiſm of Infants were unlawful, with divers other Heretical Doctrines, all which they poſitively deny'd; yet being urg'd to abjure them upon Oath, they utterly refuſed it, juſtifying themſelves by the words of our Saviour, Swear not at all.

Beginning with Peter Moran their chief Teacher, but tho' he recanted, he was ſentenced to have his Eſtate confiſcated.

Many thereupon abjured.

Raymond and Bernard, with a few more of their Preachers, refuſing to recant, appear upon Summons.

[1.] Id. p. 328.

Many wicked Opinions laid to their Charge.

Therefore when (after Admonition) they ſtill perſiſted in refuſing to Swear, the ſaid Cardinal and Biſhops in the preſence of all the People, Excommunicated the ſaid Raymond and Bernard and their Abetters, and order'd that all Princes ſhould drive them out of their Territories; then the Earl of Tholouſe and other Great Men of that Province bound themſelves by Oath, That for the future they would be neither moved by any Prayers or Rewards to favour thoſe Hereticks, as they were then call'd.

Upon their refuſing to abjure, they are Excommunicated, and their Abetters.

Thus have I here given you (as briefly as I could) Roger Hoveden's Account of the Proceedings in France againſt theſe Albigenſes or Waldenſes (as ſome call'd them) who, by what has been here laid to their charge, ſeem'd then to have held the ſame Opinions with the Manichees, and divers other antient Hereticks: Yet for all this, that they were not Manichees, appears by their antient as well as modern Confeſſions of Faith, being the ſame People that were driven out of France by thoſe cruel Perſecutions, and fled chiefly to thoſe of their own Religion, who liv'd in the mountainous Parts of Savoy and Piemont, and who have continued there till our times under the name of Vaudois.

Theſe were the Albigenſes or Waldenſes.

They fled to the Mountainous parts of Savoy and Piemont, and are now call'd Vaudois.

[2.] Mez-

[2.] Mezeray in his Hiſtory diſtinguiſhes them from the Manichees, and ſays that many of them being perſecuted in Thrace, whither they had been tranſplanted by the Greek Emperor Joannes Zimiſces, got by Land into France, and there lay conceal'd (as to their Opinions) for ſome years; but theſe were Strangers, and could never encreaſe to that Multitude, as to make up the greater part of the City of Tholouſe as they now did.

An Eclipſe of the Sun.

I find nothing elſe remarkable that happen'd this Year, but that there was an Eclipſe of the Sun on the Thirteenth of September, of which Gervaſe of Canterbury has given us an exact Account.

Anno Dom. MCLXXIX.

[3.] This year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Wincheſter, his Sons Geoffrey and John being with him, for young King Henry was in Normandy, and Duke Richard in Poictou; but in [4.] Lent following Henry the Son return'd into England, and the King his Father and He kept their Eaſter together at Wincheſter. Not long after this Richard de Lucy, Juſticiary of England, reſigning his Office, became a Chanon Regular in the Abby of Lewis, which he had lately founded: after whoſe Diſmiſſion, the King held a Great Council at Windſor, and by the Common Advice of his Archbiſhop, Biſhops, Earls and Barons, he divided England into four parts or Circuits, and to every one he appointed Diſcreet men to do Juſtice in the Land: aſſigning to every Circuit (except the laſt) five Juſtices, for whoſe Names as well as thoſe of the Counties aſſign'd them, I refer you to my [5.] Author, thinking it enough to mention, That Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Richard the King's Treaſurer were appointed the Two chief Juſtices for Hampſhire and the reſt of the South Weſtern Countries; and Geoffrey Biſhop of Ely, and Nicholas the King's Chaplain, were the Two chief Juſtices for Cambridgſhire, and the reſt of the Counties there mentioned; John Biſhop of Norwich, and Hugh Murdac the King's Clerk, were the Two chief Juſtices for Norfolk and the reſt of the Counties there recited, whereof Middleſex is one, which yet was not before mention'd in the former Diviſion, and theſe Six, viz. Geoffrey de Lucy, John Cumin, Hugh de Gaerſt, Ranulph de Glanvil, William de Bendings and Alan de Furnellis, who were before appointed Juſtices in the * King's Court to hear the People's Suits, had now the Seven Northern Counties (beginning with Nottinghamſhire and Derbyſhire) aſſigned them for their Share.

From whence the Reader may obſerve, that the King did not by his own Authority alone, without the Advice and Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, take upon him to appoint theſe Itinerant Juſtices; ſo that the Kingdom was now divided into but four Circuits, where as the former Diviſion was into Six; for which alteration it is difficult to give a Reaſon at this great diſtance of time.

But not by his ſole Authority, but by the Conſent of the Great Council.

You may likewiſe further obſerve, That Biſhops and Clerks (that is, Men in Holy Orders) did ſtill act as Judges in Cauſes of Life and Death, notwithſtanding the late Canon made againſt it; for how otherwiſe could they be ſaid to have done Juſtice throughout the Kingdom?

Biſhops and Clerks ſtill acted as Judges in Cauſes of Life and Death.

After this nothing happen'd either here or in foreign parts, only that [1.] Lewis King of France, being now very much broken with Age, reſolved to have his Son Philip crown'd King in his Life-time; and to that end ſummon'd the Eſtates of the Kingdom to meet at Rheims, but on the Day appointed for this Solemnity, the young Prince fell ſo deſperately ill of a Cold or Fright which he had taken upon loſing himſelf all night in the Woods, as he rode a hunting, that the King his Father grieved extreamly from him, inſomuch that He reſolved to come over into England on Pilgrimage to the Tomb of the New St. Thomas, to implore his Aſſiſtance for the Recovery of the young Prince's health, or (as our [2.] Monkiſh Writers relate) was Commanded by that reputed Saint in a Dream ſo to do: But this is certain, that notwithſtanding the French Nobility did all they could to diſuade him from it, yet he did come into England (being attended by Philip Earl of Flanders and divers other Princes and great Lords;) and ſo ſoon as he arriv'd, the King met him at Dover on the 22d of Auguſt, and from thence conducted him to Canterbury, where he ſpent Two days in Prayers at the Saint's Tomb, at which he offer'd a weighty Golden Cup, and beſides beſtowed upon the Monks of that Church for ever yearly One Hundred Meaſures of Wine to be delivered to them at a certain place in France, without any Charge or Duty; and he likewiſe granted, that whatever thoſe Monks ſhould buy in his Kingdom for their own Uſe, it ſhould be free from all Tolls and Cuſtoms; all which he confirmed by his Charter under his Seal.

To conclude this year, [5.] I cannot omit a ſtrange Prodigy that happen'd in the Chriſtmaſs Holy-days near Derlington in the Biſhoprick of Durham, where "at a place call'd Oxen-hall, the Earth rais'd it "ſelf up to a great Heighth in the manner of a lofty Tower, and re"main'd all that day till the evening (as it were fixed and unmovea"ble) in that poſture; And then on the ſudden it ſunk down again "with ſuch a horrid noiſe, that it terrified all the Neighbourhood: "and the Earth ſo ſuck'd it in, that it made there a deep Pit, "which continues as a Teſtimony to this day. This is ſuppoſed by [1.] Mr. Camden to be thoſe Wells or Pits now called Hellkettles, which, how well they anſwer the foregoing Deſcription, I ſhall leave to others to judge.

The

The Kings of England and France being now at Peace, there were no conſiderable foreign Wars, unleſs for reducing of ſome Rebels in Aquitain to their Obedience, [2.] for Duke Richard having been very much provoked by the Injuries and Affronts of a certain Nobleman called Geoffrey de Rancuna, he was reſolv'd to bring down his pride; and therefore in the beginning of May he march'd, and beſieged his ſtrong Caſtle of Tailborgh, which was ſo deſperate an Enterprize, that none of his Predeceſſors before him ever durſt attempt it, being (beſides the natural ſtrength of its Situation) very well provided both with Men, Proviſion and Ammunition: but the Duke, having firſt deſtroyed the Country round about it, laid cloſe Siege to the Town and Caſtle it ſelf, and the Gariſons preſuming upon their great Strength; ſallied out upon the Duke's Army, which not only beat them back to their very Gates before ever they could ſhut them, but ent'red the Town at their Heels, and put to the Sword all they found in the Streets, ſparing none but thoſe that fled to the Caſtle; the Lord of which was forced to Surrender it within a few days after.

He enters the Town, and puts all to the Sword that were found in the Streets. And in a few days after the Caſtle it ſelf was ſurrendred to him.

So ſoon as the Duke had got it into his poſſeſſion, he commanded the Walls to be batter'd down, and the like he did by ſeveral other Caſtles that only ſerved as encouragements for Rebellion in that Country; all which when Duke Richard had luckily finiſhed, he returned into England to his Father with much Honour.

He batters down the Walls of this, and ſeveral other Caſtles that only ſerved as Encouragements to Rebellion. And then returns into England with great Honour.

[3.] Alſo this year Duke Geoffrey (the certain time indeed is not ſet down) by the King his Father's commands went over into Bretaigne, and there raiſing an Army, waſted the Lands of Guiomar de Launs, till he forced him to ſurrender himſelf to his mercy. From whence you may obſerve the great Inſolence of the Noblemen of thoſe times, who if they had but Two or Three ſtrong places in their Cuſtody, thought themſelves an equal match for their Prince, though they often found themſelves miſtaken in their Account.

[4.] But to look back upon the affairs of Ireland, the Engliſh Intereſt this year received a very great Blow, by the loſs of Two valiant Commanders (viz.) Miles Cogan, and Ralph, Son to Robert Fitz-Stephen, who going toward Liſmore to treat with the men of Waterford about ſome affairs, reſolved to lodge with an Iriſh-man one Mac-Tyre the night following, for he had invited them to his Houſe; but while they ſtayed in the Fields expecting the Waterford men, their pretended Entertainer ſtealing out upon them unawares with a party of men, killed them both with five other Knights; and immediately thereupon Mac Tyre and Mac-Carty with all the Iriſh in thoſe parts revolted from the Engliſh Allegiance, and deſigned to deſtroy Robert Fitz Stephen, whom they beſieged in Cork: his Nephew Raymond hearing in what diſtreſs he was, preſently ſhipped himſelf at Wexford with Twenty Knights, and about an Hundred others, ſome being Horſe, and others Bowmen, who landing at Cork encountred the Enemy, killed many of them, cauſed Others to fly, and forced the greateſt Part of them to ſue for peace.

[5.] Hugh de Lacy at this time Governed Ireland with great Prudence and Moderation; he recalled ſuch as had been violently thrown out of their Habitations, ſo that in many places the lands were again ſtocked and cultivated; and in a ſhort time, he eſtabliſhed the Engliſh in Peace by his Generoſity and kind Behaviour, and by this means ſo alluring the Iriſh, and obliging their Great Men, that he was much ſuſpected to have aimed at the ſupreme Dominion, of that Nation.

[1.] England affording us nothing worth remarking in Eccleſiaſtical matters, I ſhall make bold to give you ſome Account here of that famous Council, called the Second Lateran, which was held this year at Rome; and to which, all the Biſhops of England, Scotland and Ireland had been ſummoned the year before by the Pope's Legates, and at which moſt of the Princes of Europe aſſiſted by their Ambaſſadors, as alſo all the Clergy repreſented by their Biſhops: yet out of England there went no more than Four Biſhops, becauſe they affirm'd that no more were neceſſary to be ſent to any Council. In this Synod were made Three and Thirty Decrees, which you may find at large in R. Hoveden, and Gervaſe of Canterbury; the Chiefeſt of which were to eſtabliſh the Election of the Pope, which was to be made for the future by no leſs than Two parts of Three of all the Cardinals there preſent. But thoſe which I ſhall take moſt notice of, are the declaring the Albigenſis, and all of their Opinion in Gaſcony and other places, Hereticks; the reſt, as wholly relating to Eccleſiaſtical matters, I omit.

[2.] R. H. p. 339. b The Young K. of France wholly influenced by Philip E. of Flanders. He uſes his Mother, Uncles and Father's Friends very ill. Young K. Henry comes into England to acquaint his Father with it. Philip treated his Relations. Both Kings go into Normandy, where the Father received the Oaths and Pledges of the French Nobility to ſtand to his Judgment. He raiſes an Army, and enters France.

[2.] King Henry this year kept his Chriſtmaſs at Nottingham, where William King of Scots was preſent; but in France things grew very turbulent, for the Young King taking advantage of his Father's Indiſpoſition, was in all things directed by Philip Earl of Flanders through whoſe advice he began to tyrannize over the People, and to deſpiſe and hate all thoſe that either loved his Father, or were his Friends; and ſo perſecuted his Mother, that he forced her out of his Dominions, and uſed William Archbiſhop of Rheimes, Earl Theobald, and Earl Stephen his Uncles by the Mother-ſide very harſhly: at whoſe requeſt King Henry the Son went into England to his Father, to inform him how Philip the Young King of France had treated his Relations through the inſtigation of the Earl of Flanders. Upon this Information, they both paſs'd into Normandy before Eaſter, where the Queen of France, with her Brothers, Earl Theobald and Stephen, were; and ſeveral others of the French Nobility came to them, and gave the old King of England their Oaths and Pledges, that they would not recede from his Judgment; Upon which he raiſed a great Army, with an Intention to enter France, and revenge the Injuries the young King had done his Mother, and Uncles:

[3.] Id. ib. Before any ſtility, upon a Conference between Old K. Henry and Philip, Peace was made.

But before they came to any Acts of Hoſtility, [3.] King Henry the Father came to a Conference with King Philip between Giſors and Trie, at which ſometimes by fair words, ſometimes by thoſe more harſh, he at laſt ſo effectually prevail'd with him, that againſt the Advice of the Earl of Flanders and Robert Clement, the Young King was reconciled to his Mother and Uncles, and received them into favour, appointing Her to receive Seven pounds of Paris money every day for her Diet, and promiſing to allow her her full Dower whenever his Father ſhould die. Anno Dom. MCLXXX.

In this Agreement the Earl of Flanders was alſo included, as appears by Two Letters of this Kings to Ranulph de Glanville, inſerted by * Giraldus Cambrenſis in his Manuſcript Treatiſe de Inſtructione Principis, wherein he lets him know that he had made a firm Peace between the King of France and Earl of Flanders on theſe conditions, that the Earl of Flanders and all his Adherents, ſhould return to the Allegiance of the King of France; and that all Caſtles and Priſoners taken in the late War ſhould be reſtored on both ſides; and laſtly, that the Earl of Flanders ſhould renounce all his Right to the County of Vermandois; and that at the ſame time King Henry had alſo reconciled the Queen of France to her Son King Philip, together with the Archbiſhop of Rheims, the Duke of Burgundy and other Great Men who had taken her part, and that he had made a firm Peace with the ſaid Earl.

In this Agreement the Earl of Flanders included.

* In. Bib. Cotton. Jul. C.

[4.] At this Conference likewiſe King Henry the Elder (for greater Caution) received Homage of the Earl of Flanders in the preſence of the King of France, and on that conſideration granted him yearly one Thouſand Marks to be received at his Exchequer in London; and in Recompence thereof he was to find the King of England every year for his Service, when he was thereunto ſummon'd, Five Hundred Knights or Horſemen for Forty days.

[4.] R. H. ib. The E of Flanders does Homage to the K. of England for One Thouſand Marks per Ann. and he is to find 500 Horſe for 40 days.

[5.] The ſame year Lewis the Seventh, King of France, died at Paris on the Eighteenth of September; and ſoon after his Son, the New King Philip and King Henry came to another Conference at the ſame place as before; and there renewed the ſame Peace and Agreement (and that in the ſame words) as had been made already between his Father and Himſelf, (except that Covenant of taking the Croſs, and going to the Holy Land) and confirmed it with their Oaths, as you may find in our Author at large.

[1.] This year alſo (though R. Hoveden does not ſet down the exact time) the King appointed Ranulph de Glanville, Chief Juſticiary of all England, by whoſe wiſdom and Advice the Laws of King Edward (which had been before confirmed by William I.) were again renewed; which Laws ſince they are already ſet down at the end of King William the Firſt's Reign, need not here to be further mention'd, only the Reader may obſerve, that theſe Laws of King Edward, were ſtill in force in this King's Time.

K. Edward's Laws again renewed.

I find nothing elſe remarkable to have been performed this year in England, [2.] only that all the old money being very much adulterated was called in, and coined anew by the King's Command under the care and management of Philip Aymari native of Tours in France; [3.] and He alſo ſeverely fined, and otherwiſe puniſhed the falſe Coyners for abuſing the Alloy, and corrupting the old Money.

As for Foreign Affairs, the moſt conſiderable was, [4.] That Henry Duke of Saxony (the King's Son-in Law) having ſeized upon certain Revenues belonging to the Archbiſhop of Cologn which lay in the Duke's Dominions, the Archbiſhop complain'd thereof to the Emperor, accuſing him not only of that, but of Perjury and Treaſon againſt his Imperial Majeſty, who thereupon cited him to appear at the the Court, or Dyet of the Empire, where he coming upon ſafe conduct, was accuſed of the aforeſaid Crimes, and perceiving he ſhould be condemned, (without making any defence to what was laid to his charge) privately withdrew into his own Dominions, which for his Contumacy, were forthwith adjudged forfeited, and his Perſon proſcribed; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Cologne being back'd with the Emperor's Forces, immediately Invaded the Duke's Territories; but He being ſeveral times defeated in divers Battles, he found himſelf at laſt reduced to that extremity, that he was forced to ſubmit to the Emperor's mercy; whereupon he was baniſh'd his Country for ſeven years; but afterward, at the Interceſſion of the Pope and the Kings of France and England, the Emperor releaſed four years of the Term preſcribed; the Duke being thus Exil'd came to his Father-in-Law King Henry, who was then in Normandy.

The A. Biſhop with the Emperor's Forces invades the Duke's Territories.

He is baniſh'd his Country for 7 years, but the Emperor remits four of them.

This being [5.] the Twenty Seventh year of King Henry's Reign, he kept his Chriſtmaſs at the City of Mans, and not long after he appointed by his Edict what Arms every man in all his Dominions beyond the Seas, ſhould have ready for the Defence of his Country; viz.

The D. in his Exile comes to K. Henry into Normandy.

Anno Dom. MCLXXXI.

He that was worth in Goods One Hundred pounds of Anjou Money, was to have a Horſe, and entire Arms of a Horſeman; every man that was worth Forty, Thirty or Five and Twenty Pounds of the ſame money in Goods, was to have an Iron Cap, a Gorget, a Lance and Sword: and all others to have a Wambais (i. e. a Coat quilted with Wool, or ſuch like matter) an Iron Cap, a Lance and a Sword, or elſe Bows and Arrows; and he prohibited all Men from ſelling their Arms, or pawning them, and ordained that at their deaths they ſhould go to their next Heirs. When the King of France and Earl of Flanders heard of this Law, they likewiſe cauſed their Men to be Armed after the ſame manner.

[5.] Id. p. 348. An Aſſize of Arms appointed by the K. in all his Dominions beyond the Seas.

K. of France and Earl of Flanders make the ſame Aſſize of Arms for their Men.

Though this Tranſaction does not properly belong to our Engliſh Hiſtory, yet I thought fit to inſert it, for the Reader to ſee that in thoſe times the Common People of France, as well as thoſe of England, were not abſolute Slaves and Vaſſals, for the very meaneſt of them were capable of bearing Arms for the defence of themſelves and their Country: and you will find by the Aſſize of Arms, which was not long after made in England, that the Privileges of the People as to this matter were much the ſame: and which is a plain proof, That conſtant ſtanding Armies were not then in faſhion in France.

[1.] Id. p. 350. a. The K. of England makes Peace between the K of France and E. of Flanders.

[1.] While King Henry ſtayed at Barfleur expecting his paſſage into England, there happen'd a freſh difference between the King of France and the Earl of Flanders, about the Earl of Clermont; and King Henry was ſent for to Giſors by the King of France, and there at a Conference made them Friends; and from thence went to Cherburgh, and ſo ſet Sail for England, and arrived at Portſmouth the Twenty-fifth of Auguſt, and brought along with him William King of Scots, whom he had ſometime before ſent for into Normandy, in order to make a firm Reconciliation between Him and the Biſhops of St. Andrews and Aberdene, who had been forced out of that Kingdom by his harſh uſage; but King Henry could not ſettle that affair, as appears by the many Letters, the Pope afterwards wrote to the King of Scots to permit thoſe Biſhops quietly to enjoy their Biſhopricks; which the King diſobeying, Alexis the Pope's Legate there with Roger Arch-

K Henry comes into England, and brings with him the K. of Scots, hoping to reconcile him to the A. Bps of St. Andrews and Aberdene, whom he had driven out of Scotland.

But the Scotiſh K. remain'd inflexible.

Archbiſhop of Tork, and Hugh Biſhop of Durham, pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication againſt the King of Scots, and put his Kingdom under an Interdict. Anno Dom. MCLXXXI.

[2.] Then King Henry not long after his return made an Aſſize or Law concerning men's having and keeping of Arms in England, (which ſeems to have been made in imitation of that lately publiſh'd beyond Sea:) But ſince it is ſomewhat long, I ſhall only give you an Abſtract of it, referring the Reader to the Law it ſelf at large in our [3.] Author, which You ſhall alſo find tranſlated among the Laws at the Latter end of this Reign.

[2] Id. p. 350 a. The Subſtance of this Aſſize, or Law.

[3.] Id. ib.

I. Whoſoever hath a Knight's Fee, ſhall have a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield, and a Lance: and every Knight ſhall have ſo many Coats of Mail, Helmets, Shields, and Lances, as he hath Knight's Fees.

II. Every Free Lay-man that hath in Goods or Rent to the value of Sixteen Marks, ſhall have a Coat of Mail, an Helmet, a Shield, and a Lance.

III. Every Free Lay-man that hath in Goods Ten Marks, ſhall have an Iron Gorget, an Iron Cap, and a Lance.

IV. All Burgeſſes, and the whole Community of Freemen, ſhall have a Wambais, a Cap of Iron, and a Lance, &c.

This is ſufficient to let you ſee, that the Common People of England, who were of any Subſtance, were not then ſuch Vaſſals to their Lords, as Some men (for what Ends they themſelves beſt know) would make them; ſince you may here find, that even the meaneſt Burghers and Farmers were to keep the Arms above-mention'd, and which were alſo to go to their Heirs for the defence of Themſelves and the Kingdom againſt Foreign or Domeſtick Enemies. Nay it further ſhews you, That the Kings of England did not then Govern by a Standing Army; for if they had, the King would have been ſo far from Commanding thoſe of ordinary condition to be Armed, that he would rather have taken away thoſe they had, as the King of France does at this day.

But to give you ſome account of the Affairs of Ireland. [4.] This Year the Suſpicions concerning Hugh de Lacy's ſeizing the Kingdom of Ireland ſtill encreaſing, eſpecially, becauſe he had without the King's leave married the Daughter of the King of Connaught, he was recall'd from his Government, and John Conſtable of Cheſter, and Richard de Pec were ſent by the King to undertake that Charge; but before Hugh left Ireland, and in the time of his Government, he had built very many Caſtles, and placed Gariſons in them for the Security of the Kingdom.

Theſe [5.] Two Governors above-mention'd were ſent into Ireland in Summer-time, and I find nothing done by them there, but the following Winter, Hugh de Lacy was reſtor'd to the King's Favour, and having ſatisfied him of his Fidelity, had the Government of that Country again committed to his Charge, and Robert of Shrewsbury, a Clerk, was joyned with him in Commiſſion by the King, as his Co-adjutor

[1] R. H. p. 348. b. The A. Bp. of Dublin brings thither the Son of the K. of Connaught as a Hoſtage for the Tribute his Father had agreed to pay the King

I ſhall here alſo take notice of ſome other paſſages relating to Ireland, [1.] whilſt the King continued in Normandy. In February Laurence Archbiſhop of Dublin brought thither with him the Son of Roderic King of Connaught as a Hoſtage for the Tribute his Father had lately agreed to pay the King; and the Archbiſhop deceaſing there not long after, the King preſently ſent Geoffrey de la Haye (one of his Clerks) into Ireland to ſeize the Revenues of the Archbiſhoprick. At the ſame time alſo John, Conſtable of Cheſhire, and Richard de Pec, were ſent to take the Government of the City of Dublin out of the hands of Hugh de Lacy, for the Reaſon already given.

At the A Bp's Death, Geoffrey de la Haye ſeizes his Revenues.

Hugh de Lacy diſcharged from his Government of Ireland.

[2.] And to put whatever relates to Ireland together, the King not long after his Arrival in England beſtow'd that Biſhoprick upon John Cumin his Chaplain; though the Annals of Ireland relate, that he was unanimouſly Elected by the Clergy of Dublin: which is to be thus underſtood, That the King recommended him, and they choſe him.

[2.] Id. p. 350 b. John Cumin made A. Bp. of Ireland.

[3.] Alſo this Year died Roger Archbiſhop of York, who had in his Life-time ſcraped together a great Sum of Money, which he bequeathed to divers Biſhops to be diſtributed amongſt the Poor: But ſo ſoon as the King heard it, he vacated his Teſtament, as being made upon his Death-bed, and ſent to all his Juſtices, requiring them to make diligent Inquiſition concerning the Money of the ſaid Archbiſhop, and to confiſcate it to the King's uſe; alledging, That the Archbiſhop himſelf had formerly iſſued out a Decree, forbidding any Eccleſiaſtical perſon to make any Will or * Device of his Goods, unleſs it were done in perfect Health.

[5.] The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Wincheſter, and not long after the Young King Henry's undutiful Carriage cauſed his Father to go over into Normandy, becauſe of the freſh Troubles and Vexations which his Son ſtill procured him there; for He and his Queen being now with her Brother King Philip, through his inſtigation the King her Husband wrought all the miſchief imaginable againſt his Father, notwithſtanding the ſolemn Oaths he had taken to be obedient and faithful to him; he now again demanded of him Normandy, or ſome other Province of his Dominions for his ſhare; yet at laſt he once more returned to his Duty, and ſwore to ſubmit to his Father's Will and Advice, and that he would never recede from it, nor deſire more for his own Expences than one Hundred Pounds a-day of Anjou Money, nor any more for his Wife than Ten Pounds a-day of the like Money: And further, the King granted to pay One Hundred of his Knights, or Menial Servants, their Wages for that year; and ſo for the preſent all Differences ferences between them are compos'd. However, this Agreement did not last long, the Quarrel between them breaking forth a new by reason of the Inconstancy and Undutifulness of this Young Prince. Anno Dom. MCLXXXII.

[1] After this King Henry the Father set on foot a Treaty between Philip King of France and the Earl of Flanders, concerning several Differences that were then between them, which by the King of England's means were at last agreed; but because they are foreign to our English History, I purposely omit them: only at this Assembly the Earl of Flanders deliver'd up to King Henry the Charter which the King his Son had formerly made him, and also discharged both Him and his Brothers from all Agreements made between them during the late War.

[1] Id. ib. The Differences between the K of France and the E. of Flanders, made up by K. Henry's means.

The Earl delivers up the Charter to K. Henry, which his Son had formerly made him.

[2.] This Year also (though the expres time is not set down) King Henry sent William Earl of Albemarle, with some other of his Courtiers, Ambassadors to the Emperor Frederic, to desire him, that he would mitigate his displeasure against Henry Duke of Saxony the King's Son in Law, who had been not long since deprived of his Dominions by the Sentence of the Princes of the Empire (as you have already heard:) But all that these Ambassadors could obtain of the Emperor, was, That the Duke being condemn'd to Banishment, all those that should accompany him, might have Free Liberty to return again into their own Country; the Emperor also granted to Mathilda, Dutchess of Saxony, the King's Daughter, out of respect to the King her Father, That if she would remain in Germany, she might quietly enjoy her Joynture; but if she rather chose Banishment with her Husband, the Emperor only agreed, that he would appoint some to preserve it for Her. So, when the time came, that was prefix'd for the Duke's departure, he went away accompanied with his Wife and Children, and divers Earls and Barons and other People of Quality, who all came into Normandy to King Henry, and were received very kindly by Him; but not long after the Duke gave those Noblemen his Followers, leave to return home, on whom the King of England bestow'd many Presents; but the Duke and his Dutchess continued Three years in Normandy, being all that time nobly maintain'd, till at last the Duke went on Pilgrimage into Spain to St. James's Shrine, whilst the Dutchess remain'd with the King her Father at Argenton.
